Yudhishtira looks at Bhima containing your still vast army; he turns to Dhrishtadyumna and says, "Ride against the pot-born Drona! O Parantapa, you were born a full-grown youth from the sacred fire, wearing armour and armed with a sword, bow and arrows. You were born to kill Drona! So go confidently into battle; you need have no fear. Let Janamejaya, Sikhandin, Durmukha's son and Yasodhara attack Drona from every side. Let Nakula, Sahadeva, the sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas, Drupada, and Virata with their sons and brothers, Satyaki, the Kaikeyas, the Pandavas and Dhananjaya all attack him together. Let all our maharathas, all our elephants, our cavalry and foot-soldiers join forces to bring down the implacable Acharya who burns up the very night!"

Thus commanded by the illustrious son of Pandu, all of them launch a combined attack against Drona, determined to put an end to the Brahmana ablaze. Drona, however, meets their onslaught with such a fusillade of arrows and astras! He hold them all up. Anxious for Drona's life, Duryodhana rushes to his support with all his forces, might and resolve. A general battle now breaks out between the Kurus and the Pandavas, all of them shouting and roaring at one another.

By now, the animals of both armies as well as the warriors are all exhausted. The greatest maharathas find they can hardly keep their eyes open or move their limbs, and feel helpless and worn. This horrific night of nine hours appears to have no end. While they mutilate and slaughter one another in droves by darkness, and while sleep sits heavy on their eyelids, it is past midnight. All the Kshatriyas are miserable and the soldiers of both armies have no weapons or arrows left. Yet, the warriors of both the armies do not quit the fight; they keep their svadharma and, summoning the very dregs of the reserves of strength they still possess, battle on.

Others, blind with sleep, lay aside their weapons and lie down, some on the backs of elephants, some on chariots, some on horseback and some on the ground. And when they fall into helpless slumber, other warriors who are awake despatch them to Yama's abode. Others, senseless with fatigue, and in a waking dream, kill their own comrades as well as their enemies. Indeed, they fight giving vent to weird cries and exclamations. Many warriors of our army who still want battle stand half awake but unable to fight on, their eyes half shut. However, some exceptional Kshatriyas, during the terrible night, although exhausted and being dragged down by drowsiness, continue to glide superbly across the field killing one another. Many among the enemy, stupefied by slumber, are slain without their being aware of the strokes and barbs that send them into eternity.

Seeing this state of the troops, Arjuna cries out in a loud voice, "All of you, and your animals, are exhausted; you are plunged in darkness and dust and sleep overcomes you all. So let us all agree to call a halt to the battle and sleep awhile. When the moon rises, Kurus and Pandavas, awake again and do battle once more to find victory or heaven."

The tired men of both armies gladly agree. The Kaurava troops shout all together, "O Karna, O Duryodhana, stop the fighting. The Pandava army has ceased to attack us."

At Arjuna's word, the Pandava army as well as yours, O Bhaarata, refrain from battle. Indeed, the Devas and the noble Rishis all applaud Partha's noble thought and all the worn out Kshatriyas lie down to sleep like some sea subsiding among all the corpses that are strewn everywhere, of man and beast. Your army blesses Arjuna, "In you, great Arjuna, the Vedas and all the astras truly dwell together. In you are intelligence and supernal ability. In you are dharma and compassion for all creatures, O sinless Partha. And since you have comforted us, we wish you well, O Dhananjaya. Let prosperity be yours. May you soon have, O hero, all that is dear to your heart!"

Blessing him thus, the great Kuru maharathas fall silent and sleep comes swiftly over them. Many lie down to sleep with their weapons—maces, swords, battleaxes, lances and with their armour still strapped on. Elephants, heavy with sleep, make the earth cool with their breath that passes through their snake-like trunks stained with dust. Surely, the great elephants, as they breathe on the ground, and sleep standing, look as serene and beautiful as hills scattered across the field of battle over which giant snakes hiss.

Horses in trappings of gold and with manes entwined with their yokes and stamping their hooves, make the ground uneven. Thus, every warrior sleeps there with the animal they ride. The slumbering host, plunged in unconsciousness, looks like a wonderful picture drawn on canvas by the most gifted artists.

The more youthful Kshatriyas, their kundalas gleaming softly, their limbs lacerated by arrows and swords, have laid themselves down on the round heads of their elephants, and look as if they lie in the embraces of beautiful women.

Then, the Moon, the delighter of the eye and lord of the lotuses, white as the fair cheeks of a virgin, rises in the East, adorning the direction presided over by Indra. Indeed, like a lion of the Udaya hills, its rays his mane of brilliant yellow, he issues out of his cave in the east, shredding the blackness of the night. The lover of all lotuses and lilies in the world, bright as the body of Mahadeva's Bull, full-arched and radiant as Kama's bow, enticing as the smile on the lips of a bashful bride, Soma Deva begins to bloom in the firmament.

Soon, however, the divine lord with the hare for his sign shows himself more fully, shedding brighter rays. Soma Deva gradually emanates a bright halo of far-reaching light with the splendour of amber-gold. Quickly, his lustre, dispelling the darkness entirely, spreads over all the quarters, the sky and the earth. The world is illuminated and the unspeakable darkness that had hidden everything melts away. When the world is lit up in silver, among creatures that wander the night some continue to roam while others retire to their hides, caves and holes.

The sea of troops, Rajan, is awakened by the light of the Moon and they arise like a great lake of lotuses blossoming or like the ocean surging up in tide at moonrise. Then, Rajan, the war commences again on earth, for the destruction of the race of warriors, between men who wish to attain heaven.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'An excited and rested Duryodhana approaches Drona and, to encourage him and provoke his ire, says to him, "You should have shown no mercy to our enemies while they were downcast after Ghatotkacha's death and exhausted, especially when they are all deadly archers. To satisfy your noble wish, Acharya, we showed them misplaced kindness by allowing a cessation in a battle we were winning. Having rested and slept, the Pandavas are stronger now.

As for ourselves, we loose energy and strength in every way, hour by hour, while the Pandavas, whom you so lovingly protect, gain ground and success. All the Devastras and Brahmastras dwell in you. I say to you, O Drona, if you put forth your true prowess, neither the Pandavas nor we, nor any other bowmen in the world are a match for you on the field of battle.

O Mahamuni, you are a consummate master of every manner of weapon and warfare, the teacher of us all. With your devastras, you can destroy the three worlds with the Devas, the Asuras and the Gandharvas. The Pandavas are all afraid of you and yet, time and again, you spare them, remembering fondly that they were your students. Or, perhaps, this is all because of my ill luck and the stars turning against me."

Thus chided by your son, Drona wrathfully tells Duryodhana, “Although I am old, Suyodhana, I still exert myself to the utmost in this war. All these men are hardly acquainted with the weapons of which I do indeed possess mastery. So, if, from a desire for victory, I become responsible for the death of such common soldiers, there can be no more ignoble deed. However, now, O Kaurava, I will at your evil command, do what you have in your dark heart, be it good or bad. It will not be otherwise. Duryodhana, I will not remove my kavacha from my body until I have killed all the Panchalas. I swear this to you.

You think that Kunti’s son Arjuna is worn out by the war? Listen to me carefully, and I will truly tell you about his prowess. If Savyasachin is truly roused, not the Gandharvas, the Yakshas or the Rakshasas can hope to stand up to him. In the Khandava vana, he encountered the Lord Indra himself in battle. Arjuna confounded a raging Indra with his arrows. He killed the Yakshas, Nagas, Daityas, and all rest, so proud of their might in that forest when it burned, so none escaped.

And when you went to mock the Pandavas in the forest and were humiliated and taken captive by Chitrasena and his people, it was Arjuna that vanquished the Gandharvas and set you free, while the unearthly ones had you bound firmly in a net. This is the hero who quelled the Nivatakavachas, who not the Devas could resist or conquer in battle.

Naravyaghra Partha vanquished the thousands of Danavas who dwelt in Hiranyapura. How can you be so foolish to imagine for a moment that mere human warriors can withstand him? You saw with your own eyes, Duryodhana, how Arjuna razed your army on his way to kill Jayadratha. Is your mind so clouded with darkness that you have forgotten that so quickly?”

Duryodhana replies in anger to hear Arjuna being extolled, “Dusasana, Karna, Sakuni, and I will divide this Bharata army into two akshauhinis. We will take one host with us and kill Arjuna today.”

Drona laughs and says sardonically, “My blessings go with you! But which Kshatriya among you will kill this bull among all Kshatriyas, the immortal bearer of the Gandiva, the hero who blazes forth with divine tejas? Not Kubera, Lord of treasures, not Indra or Yama, not the Asuras, the Uragas and the Rakshasas can face an armed Arjuna in battle. Only fools will speak such nonsense as you just have, Duryodhana! Who can return with his life after facing Arjuna in battle? As for you, you are sinful, cruel and suspicious of everyone. You are always ready to rebuke even those who risk their lives to fight for you.

Yes, go and give battle to the son of Kunti, for you are a well-born Kshatriya who seeks combat. But why cause all these other unoffending Kshatriyas to be slain? You are the root of this enmity and this war, so go and fight Arjuna yourself. Your uncle Sakuni has wisdom and observes Kshatriya dharma. Let Sakuni the great gambler take the field against Arjuna. He is skilled in dice, wedded to deception, addicted to gambling, and a master of cunning and subterfuge. Surely, this great man will vanquish the Pandavas in battle!

With Karna in your company, you often boasted foolishly in the hearing of Dhritarashtra, "O father, we three, Karna, Dusasana and I will kill all the sons of Pandu in battle."

We heard this brag of yours at every conclave in the Kuru sabha. Do what you said you would now; show that your boasts were neither hollow nor idle. Look, there before you is your mortal enemy, Arjuna, son of Pandu. Observe Kshatriya dharma and fight him. Your death at the hands of the Vijaya shall be worthy of our every praise. You have practised charity, you have eaten everything that you ever wished, you have gained as much wealth as you wanted, more than any other man, and you leave no debts. You have done all that a prince should do. So have no regrets or fears. Go and fight the son of Pandu."

Then, the battle begins.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'When three yaamas of the night have worn away, Rajan, the battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas resumes and both sides are exhilarant, born warriors that they are! Soon after, Surya's sarathy, the legless Aruna, weakening the splendour of the moon, appears upon the Udaya mountain, turning the sky a coppery hue. The east is soon lit with the crimson rays of the Sun, who, rising, resembles a circular plate of gold. All the warriors of the Kuru and the Pandava armies alight from their chariots, horses and palanquins, stand with joined hands, facing Surya Deva, and recite the Gayatri Mantra appropriate to greet the first sandhya of the day, the golden dawn.

The Kuru army is divided into two parts. Drona, with Duryodhana going before him with one of the hosts, advances with the other one against the Somakas, the Pandavas and the Panchalas. Seeing the Kuru army thus divided, Krishna says to Arjuna, "Keep your cousins to your left, and the division commanded by Drona to your right."

Arjuna moves to the left of the mighty Drona and Karna. Understanding Krishna's intention, Bhimasena says to Partha who is at the van of the army, "Arjuna, Bibhatsu, listen to me. The time has come to fulfil the purpose for which Kshatriya women bear sons. If you fight for victory now, you will demean your birth. The moment has come to pay the debt you owe Truth, Prosperity, Virtue and Fame. O greatest of warriors, keep this akshauhini to your left and destroy it."

When Bhima and Krishna urge him on, Arjuna truly puts his unrivalled prowess on display and, dominating Drona and Karna, begins to raze the Kaurava forces all around him. Many great Kshatriyas among the Kurus do their best but cannot stop the Kiritin as he sweeps over them like a raging conflagration, consuming them all. Duryodhana, Karna and Sakuni shoot tremendous volleys at Kunti's son. Defending himself with light like swiftness, he cuts down every arrow loosed at him, and then strikes each of the three with ten deep barbs.

The dust and thick arrow showers darken the sky as if night has returned, and a great din arises everywhere. The sky, the earth and all the directions are obscured. Blinded by the swirling dust, and yet again no one can tell friend from foe, ally from enemy. Once more, the kings and warriors loudly call out their own names, and fight the war for dharma by instinct and approximation.

Maharathas losing their chariots run headlong into one another and are tangled together in chaos. Their horses killed and charioteers slain, many remain petrified, sitting or standing perfectly still to save their lives. Dead horses and their riders lie on felled elephants as if stretched out on mountain summits.

Drona then rides away from the general melee towards the north and takes up his station there, like a smokeless fire, resplendent, magnificent and blazing with energy. Seeing him, the Pandava troops tremble; they turn pale and falter on the field, O Bhaarata. From seeming like an elephant in rut, the enemy loses its nerve entirely, terrified as the Danavas when they fought Vasava. Some among them are broken in spirit, while other, bolder ones are enraged. Others are filled with wonder, and some, though they would try, are unequal to the challenge of the refulgent Acharya. Some of the Pandava kings wring their hands, and some are beside themselves with anger and bite through their lips in that wrath. A few brandish their weapons, others rub their arms; and some who possess truly great tejas and whose souls are under complete control, attack Drona. The domineering Brahmana mauls the Panchalas in particular with arrows mundane and unworldly; mangled, burnt and bleeding, and in agony, they yet continue to contend with him.

Then Drupada and Virata take the field against Drona who by now rages unchecked all across Kurukshetra sowing death wherever he rides like some storm of another furious world. Drupada's three grandsons also ride against Drona, as do the mighty Chedi archers. Seeing them come, in a flash, Drona beheads all three Panchala princes, who are no remote match for him. He next routs the Chedis, the Kaikeyas, the Srinjayas and all the Matsyas.

In rage past enduring, Drupada and Virata unleash gales and hurricanes of arrows at the dreadful Brahmana. The scourge of the Kshatriyas swathes both Drupada and Virata with harrowing gusts of shafts, and they, also, strike him back ardently. Drona, roused, looses two of his favoured crescent-tipped shafts and breaks both Drupada and Virata's bows at the same moment.

Virata flings ten spears at Drona, desperate to have his life, while Drupada, great Kshatriya, casts a blazing astra of iron and gold inlaid with lapis lazuli, a weapon like a gleaming serpent, at him. Drona cuts all these weapons down with a lordly and serene display of superhuman archery. Next moment, with a long roar, with two perfect arrows, he sends both those great and aged kings to the world of Yama, cutting one's head from his throat and blowing the other's heart to shreds. A terrible wail rises from the armies of the Panchalas and the Matsyas.

Dhrishtadyumna watches Drona kill his father Drupada, his own sons, and Virata; he watches him slaughter the Kaikeyas, the Chedis, the Matsyas and the Panchalas; he sees him kill Drupada's three grandsons and the fire-prince is filled with grief and swears an oath in rage before all the maharathas: "Let me lose all the punya of all the dharma that I have done, as well as my Kshatriya and Brahma tejas if Drona escapes me today with his life, or if he succeeds in vanquishing me!"

With this, taking his own division with him, the Panchala prince rides at Drona. The Panchalas then fall upon Drona from one side and Arjuna from the other. Duryodhana, his brothers, Karna and Sakuni defend Drona against the attack and, though the Panchalas fight with fury and vigour, your sons and their allies prevent the dead Drupada's sons and warriors from so much as catching a proper look at the Acharya.

Bhimasena is furious with Dhrishtadyumna and berates him, "What Kshatriya is the warrior born into great Drupada's vamsa, and who is besides the greatest warrior of all born from the fire, who can only look at his enemy standing before him? What true man, who has seen his father and his son slain before his eyes, and who has sworn to have revenge on their killer, stands listless and helpless before his enemy? There stands Drona like a fire blazing high with its own energy and, with his bows and arrows for fuel, consumes all our Kshatriyas that come before him like mere straws. Why, he will annihilate all the Pandava army by himself in a brief hour if he is not extinguished.

If you will not fight, be spectators and watch me as I fight Drona. I do not fear this vile Brahmana. I do not revere him."

With this, the fuming Vrikodara rips into Drona's vyuha and begins to decimate that host. In a moment, Dhrishtadyumna follows Bhima and quickly the two of them engage Drona in a fiery battle as the sun rises and bathes the holy field of Kurukshetra in dawn's light. By first light of day, we see the enormity of the night's carnage—the rathas entangled with one another, and the dead scattered in their thousands and thousands, men and beasts, all over the field. And again, the war resumes between the two armies, more bloodthirsty than ever. Some, while riding towards another part of the field are waylaid and butchered; others, who are fleeing, are struck in their backs, or through their sides like beasts on a hunt.

The general engagement, the war from which every vestige of a dharma yuddha has fled, continues to rage as the morning sun rises higher.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The warriors, however, Rajan, do pause briefly to worship the thousand-rayed Aditya, as he ascends the field of battle on this morning. When they have paid their daily homage to God of day, they fight again exactly as they did by night.

Bharatarishabha, horsemen fight maharathas, elephants confront horsemen, foot-soldiers battle elephants and horsemen other horsemen. Sometimes united and sometimes separately, the warriors lay into each other, and many, having fought through the night and slept only briefly, are tired, weak with hunger and thirsty and they fall unconscious. The uproar made by the blare of conches, the beating of drums, the trumpeting of elephants and the twanging of bowstrings drawn and released with force, reaches the very heavens.

So, too, is the clangour of charging infantry, weapons falling, horses neighing, chariots thundering along, and the roaring, shouting and yelling of the warriors earthshaking; it, too, swells by the moment and echoes in the realms of the gods. The screams, groans and wails of pain, of falling and fallen foot-soldiers, rathikas and elephants multiply by the moment; they wash across the field in a piteous, horrifying wave.

Men and animals fall like leaves in autumn blown down by a strong wind. Hurled from Kshatriyas' hands at other warriors and elephants, we see swords heaping themselves on the ground, many bloody, like heaps of cloth on a washing ghat. The sound of falling swords resembles that of clothes being beaten to wash them well. Rajan, though we should now be inured to the horror after the grisly night, the battle by daylight continues to be appalling.

A river runs again towards the land of the dead. The blood of elephants, horses and men are its current, weapons its fish in profusion, blood and flesh its mire, the cries of grief and pain its roar, and proud banners cut down and other bloodied cloths are its froth.

Pierced all over by arrows and spears, elephants and horses stand perfectly motionless on Kurukshetra, worn out with exertion, spent with the grim toil of the night, and utterly exhausted so they cannot move. With their arms in graceful attitudes, their beautiful coats of mail, with their turbaned and crowned heads decked with sparkling kundalas, even on this ghastly morning the warriors bearing the instruments of war look magnificent.

Meanwhile, the chariots find passage across the field difficult indeed, for all the dead, the dying and the scavenging carnivores that cover the ground of death. Stricken by arrows and worn out by their exertions, steeds of the noblest breed and high mettle, of gigantic size and strength, tremble with effort as they attempt to draw the chariots whose wheels have been mired deep in the blood swamped earth. Terror and only terror holds every warriors of both armies in its cold, benumbing clasp, O Bhaarata, with the exception of only Drona and Arjuna. These two become the refuge, the saviours of the warriors of their respective legions. Others who encounter these two are swiftly sent to Yama's abode.

Entwined, enmeshed, even like the great bodies of unimaginable and violent lovers in the throes of lethal lust, the armies of the Kurus and the Panchalas are no longer distinguishable. During this carnage where Kshatriyas turn Kurukshetra into an endless smasana, a cremation ground, nothing and no one is plainly visible—not Karna, Drona, Arjuna, Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, the twins, the Panchala fire-prince, Satyaki, Dusasana, Drona's son, Duryodhana, Subala's son, Kripa, Salya, Kritavarman, all the great others, nor the earth, nor the points of the compass, nor I, can be seen as clouds of dusts shroud all the heroes, their chariots and beats and the thousands of foot-soldiers.

As the war burgeons by the moment, it seems that another night has fallen over the filed for the pall of dust that rises and billows, and the swarms of arrows and other weapons, which cover the sky, hiding the sun. You cannot tell Kaurava from Panchala, or Panchala from Pandava; all is a single haze, which rings hellishly with roars and screams. The warriors, possessed absolutely by the spirit of murdering, by now kill friend and enemy alike, making no more distinction, for to kill is all that matters regardless of who kills and who is slain.

Then, suddenly, strong winds arise and, blowing powerfully from all directions like the breath of a many faced God, blows away the single vast cloud of dust. Now there is a unique rain of blood everywhere, Rajan! Elephants, horses, maharathas and foot-soldiers, all bathed in crimson, look as wondrous as the celestial forest of Parijata flowers.

The four Kaurava maharathas Duryodhana, Karna, Drona and Dusasana attack the Pandava host with renewed ferocity. Duryodhana and his brothers fight Nakula and Sahadeva, while Karna battles Vrikodara Bhima, Arjuna confronts Drona, and all the troops from every side stand still and gaze at these scintillating duels. Why, even the maharathas of both armies pause and quietly watch the superhuman engagement between those greatest among all Kshatriyas.

The interminable and deadly rain of arrows and other weapons pours on. The great maharathas, bulls among all men, riding their chariots of solar effulgence, still look as stunning as dark and golden clouds in the autumn sky. Avid for blood, thirsty for revenge and killing, this handful of the greatest warriors on earth engage one another like infuriated leaders of elephant herds.

In truth, Rajan, death does not ever come until its hour is come, and not all the warriors on Kurukshetra perish all together in the battle. Strewn with lopped off arms, legs, heads with dazzling earrings, bows and arrows, lances, swords, battleaxes, nalihas, razor-headed arrows, cloth-yard shafts, darts, diverse kinds of exquisite armour, splendid rathas broken into pieces, slain elephants, other huge chariots without standards broken like cities, yet others being dragged here and there by frightened horses without a charioteer to control them, by hosts of grandly adorned warriors of immeasurable courage, fallen chamaras and coats of mail and standards, scattered ornaments, robes and fragrant bloodied garlands, chains of gold, diadems, crowns, helmets, rows of bells, jewels worn on breasts, cuirasses, collars, and with gems that adorn coronets, the field of battle looks as marvellous as the endless firmament spangled with countless stars.

Now there ensues a duel between a furious Duryodhana, voracious for revenge, and Nakula full of the same hunger. Madri's son shoots hundreds of arrows at your son on his right, and is loudly cheered by the Pandava soldiers. Duryodhana responds with vehemence and passion. Nakula wheels away to the left, and now attacks your son from that side. However, your son is not to be bested on this day and, with incandescent archery, forces Nakula to turn back. All the troops applaud Suyodhana's feat, while Nakula recalls every indignity of the past and roars at your incensed son, "Stop! Stop and fight, you wretched sinner!""

"Sanjaya says, 'An angry Dusasana pushes fiercely towards Sahadeva, making the earth shiver with the speed of his chariot. But, in a flash, with a wedge-headed arrow, Sahadeva strikes off the head of your son's sarathy, helmet and all. So swiftly does Sahadeva do this that neither Dusasana nor any of the troops even notices that the charioteer has been decapitated, until their reins hanging loose, Dusasana's horses careen wildly away.

Being a master charioteer himself, Dusasana quickly takes the reins up himself and fetches the horses under control. Friend and foe alike acclaim his feat, for now driving the chariot himself, he moves effortlessly and fearlessly across the field, attacking Sahadeva again. Sahadeva pierces your son's horses now with a volley of vicious arrows and, flowing blood, whinnying in pain, they bolt once more, for as soon as Dusasana picks up his bow to fight Sahadeva he loses control of his agonised steeds again.

The relentless Sahadeva drills him with a score of hate-filled arrows. Karna comes dashing to rescue your son, when, taking careful aim, Bhima strikes the Sutaputra deep through his arms and chest with three shafts like thunderbolts shot from his bow drawn into a circle. Struck by these arrows like a snake with a stick, Karna stops and faces Bhimasena in wrath, unleashing a terrific volley of slender deadly shafts at him.

Another fervid duel breaks out between Bhima and Karna, both roaring like bulls and their eyes dilated with rage. Both find themselves too close to each other and cannot shoot their arrows with any freedom. Thereupon, they fight with maces and Bhimasena quickly smashes the kuvara of Karna's ratha, a feat to watch. Then Karna hurls his gada in fury at Bhima's chariot; Bhima strikes it aside with his own mace. Bhima sweeps up another mace and hurls it with titanic force at Karna; Karna shoots the heavy thing with an astonishing golden-winged volley, which turns the massive gada right back at Bhima, like a snake charmed by mantras! The mace strikes Bhima's immense flagpole, which breaks, falls and strikes his charioteer senseless.

His brows knit, Bhima, with the greatest care, rives Karna's standards, his bow and shreds his leather gauntlet. Radheya takes up another gold-decked bow and in a blur kills Bhima's horses the colour of bears, and his two charioteers. Bhima quickly jumps into Nakula's chariot like a lion bounding down a mountain summit.

Meanwhile, Drona and Arjuna, the two greatest maharathas, Acharya and sishya, duel, stunning all that watch with their mastery over the astras, the sureness of their aim, and with the manoeuvres of their chariots. Watching that battle, the like of which they have never seen, the other warriors stop fighting and stand with hair standing on end, quivering with equal parts of awe and fear.

Both Arjuna and his master display immaculate tactics, while trying always to keep the adversary to his right. The plane on which these two make sublime war is such that all the other maharathas can only gaze in wonder. That duel is like one between a pair of eagles in the sky fighting over a piece of meat. Whatever Drona does to have the better of his favourite pupil, Arjuna matches.

When Drona can find no edge over his younger rival with common shafts or lesser astras, the Brahmana invokes into the Aindra, the Tvashtra, the Vayavya and the Yamya astras. No sooner do these issue from Drona's bow, Dhananjaya extinguishes them with his own astras. At this, Drona looses the very greatest astras at Arjuna, but even these Partha nullifies. Seeing Arjuna negate all his weapons, even the highest celestial ones, Drona applauds his disciple in his heart and is full of secret joy.

Since the days when Arjuna was his pupil, the Acharya has regarded himself as the greatest master of weapons in the world. Now, equalled by his sishya in the midst of all those most illustrious and discerning warriors on earth, Drona continues to attack and to defend himself energetically, marvelling all the while at the genius of his opponent.

We plainly see the Devas, Gandharvas in their thousands, Rishis and bodies of Siddhas, everywhere in the sky. Filled with these as well as with Apsaras, Yakshas and Rakshasas, it once more seems as if gathering clouds fill the vaults of the firmament. We hear a reverberant asariri, a disembodied voice from above, repeatedly sweep through the sky, end to end, full of praise for the mighty Drona and the noble Partha.

From the flames and lustre of the astras that Drona and Partha loose at each other, all creation seems to blaze with light, and the Siddhas and the Rishis on high say, "This is not a Manava, an Asura, a Rakshasa, a Deva or a Gandharva yuddha. Without doubt, this is a transcendent Brahma yuddha!"

And indeed so it is, the unmatched, spectacular contention, the like of which we have never even heard before let alone seen. As we all stand transfixed, now the Acharya prevails over Arjuna, and then the son of Pandu over Drona, and no one can find any difference between them. Only if Rudra, dividing himself into two parts fought against himself, could there be a battle to match this one. The astra shastra, focused, embodied, dwells in the Acharya on one side; so, too, does it, on the other, in the resplendent and profound Arjuna, along with deep substance. Virata, heroism, in one place, dwells absolutely in Drona; on the other side, heroism and strength are in the son of Pandu. Neither of these warriors can be challenged by enemies in battle. It is the opinion of all the invisible and visible beings, who watch the sacred conflict, that either of them can destroy the very universe with all the gods, if they wish.

Drona now invokes the Brahmastra against Arjuna and the all invisible ones above and below, and the Earth with her mountains and waters and trees tremble. Howling winds begin to blow, the seas rise up, and the warriors of the Kuru and Pandava armies, as well as all other living creatures are struck through with fear, when Drona raises that astra. Arjuna, O king, summons his own Brahmastra and like two other suns risen into the bright sky, their weapons extinguish each other. All agitated Nature is pacified again.

Finally, acknowledging that neither can vanquish the other, the two armies engage each other, generally, once more. Widespread havoc occupies Kurukshetra again. And mayhem, pandemonium and darkness engulf the battlefield all around. The sky is obscured with dark swarms of arrows, as if with masses of heavy clouds, and the creatures that fly through the air can no longer find a passage through the element.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'During the carnage of men, horses and elephants, Dusasana, O Rajan, meets Dhrishtadyumna in battle. Dusasana ravages the fire-prince mounted on his golden chariot; in fury, Dhrishtadyumna covers your son, his chariot, horses and sarathy in an opacity of arrows so they become invisible. Dusasana is forced to turn away from the Pandava senapati and Dhrishtadyumna forges on toward his main enemy, Drona, the one he must kill. As he goes, he showers arrows all around him, claiming a thousand lives each moment.

Kritavarman, with three of his Bhoja brothers, challenges dead Drupada's son, but Nakula and Sahadeva, who are following Dhrishtadyumna while he makes his way like a blazing fire towards Drona, are at hand to keep these heroes at bay. All of them, fighting now on the very brink of death, attack one another in perfect fury, determined to kill or be killed. Of pure souls and pure conduct, and with swarga in mind, they fight according to the noble tenets of dharma. Of impeccable lineage, unstained deeds and gifted with great intelligence, these lords of men fight righteously and with Kshatriya dharma, using no vile weapons that might be regarded as unfair.

None of them use either cruelly barbed arrows, those called nalikas, poisoned ones, those with heads made of horns, those with many pointed heads, ones made of the bones of bulls and elephants, those having two heads, ones with rusty heads, or those that do not fly straight. All of them use simple and direct weapons and wish to win both fame and heaven and the region of great blessedness, by fighting justly. Yet, the battle between the four warriors of your army and the three from the Pandava side is fearsome, O king.

Meanwhile, Dhrishtadyumna seeing Nakula and Sahadeva successfully contain your mighty maharathas, surges on toward Drona. Held up by the tigerish twins of Madri, your warriors fight them like the wind assailing two mountains.

Seeing the Panchala fire-prince ride like another wind at Drona and the four heroes of his own army obstructed by the twins, Duryodhana dashes against the dangerous Dhrishtadyumna, loosing thunderous volleys of blood-drinking arrows at him. At which, Satyaki rides up, quick as a wish, to stop him. These two Naravyaghras, descendants of Kuru and Madhu, fall wildly upon each other. Then the strangest thing, Rajan—both recall with pleasure and affection the days of their boyhood, when they had been loving friends and, even as they fight savagely, they look at each other with some love and smile repeatedly!

Indeed, so moved is your son that, with tears standing in his eyes, guilt and sorrow laying their touch upon his heart, he says to his ever dear Satyaki, "Shame on anger, my precious friend, and shame on revenge! Shame on Kshatriya dharma and shame on valour and prowess, for today you aim your astras at me and I also loose my shafts at you. In those days when we were young, you were dearer to me than life itself, and you felt the same for me. Alas, where have that love and those childhood memories gone now? They mean nothing on this field of war. Alas, O Satwata, moved by greed and hatred, we are here today fighting each other to kill or die!"

Hearing this, Satyaki draws a clutch of sharp arrows from his quiver, and replies with a smile, "This is no sabha, O prince, nor the home of our Acharya, where we once played together."

Duryodhana says, "Where have those games of our childhood gone, O bull of Sini's race, and how has this battle come upon us now? It seems that the influence of Time is irresistible. Urged though we are by the desire for wealth, what use is the wealth for which you and I meet to fight, moved only by avarice."

Satyaki replies, "This has always been the way of the Kshatriyas that they must fight even against their acharyas. If I am dear to you, Suyodhana my friend, then kill me quickly. Let me find the realm of the righteous by your hand. Nothing would make me happier. I cannot bear this loving talk. Put forth your best valour and let us do battle like the Kshatriyas that we are. For to speak of the past and our friendship is far more cruel than to fight with arrows."

With this, and not without tears in his own eyes, Satyaki rides at Duryodhana with his bow raised. Seeing him come, your son cascades a blithe shower of deadly shafts on his old and beloved friend, and a pitched and mighty duel breaks out between those scions of the races of Kuru and Madhu, like one between an elephant and a lion. Drawing his bow round, Duryodhana strikes the invincible Satyaki with a blizzard of vicious shafts and Yuyudhana of the Satwatas responds with first fifty, then with twenty, and once more with ten keening arrows.

Duryodhana, still smiling, his eyes still moist, rakes Satyaki with thirty arrows shot from his bowstring drawn to his ear; then, with a razor-headed arrow, he breaks Satyaki's bow. Quicker than thinking, Sini's grandson picks up another bow and covers Duryodhana with a marvellous unbroken straight line of burning barbs. With wonderful skill, Suyodhana cuts every shafts into pieces, at which your army cheers him loudly.

Duryodhana lacerates Satyaki with three and seventy shafts, with wings of gold, dipped in oil and shot from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch. In a flash, the explosive Yuyudhana cleaves your son's bow in his hands and gores him with a hundred barbs, which draw fonts of blood from Duryodhana and course agony through his body. Duryodhana swiftly seeks refuge in another chariot. Having rested awhile, he rides once more against Satyaki, shooting blazing salvos of arrows at the Satwata hero's chariot. Always smiling, Rajan, Satyaki continues to pour an endless river of arrows at his childhood friend, his enemy.

The immaculate shafts of both Kshatriyas meet in the sky, in small explosions and fall broken on every side, sounding like a raging fire consuming a great forest. The thousands of arrows that they both shoot densely cover earth and sky. Then, Karna sees that Satyaki is surely beginning to prevail over Duryodhana and rides up swiftly to rescue your son. However, Bhima is quick to see this and races up to cut Karna off. He unleashes powerful heavy volleys at the Sutaputra who, with great grace and ease, cuts down Bhima's wall of fire, severs his bow, and maims his charioteer.

Bhima hefts a mace and, running headlong at Karna, smashes his bow, standard, one of his chariot wheels and his charioteer with a flurry of sickening blows like thunder. But Karna stands on his broken chariot, immovable as Meru, the king of all mountains. His horses continue to draw his wonderful ratha with only a single wheel, even like Surya's one-wheeled chariot, drawn by the Sun God's seven celestial steeds.

Karna finds Bhima's irrepressible prowess intolerable; he continues to fight the titan with storms of arrows and diverse astras as well. An incited Bhima matches Karna's shaft for shaft, astra for astra.

Then the battle spreads, when Yudhishtira says to all the leading warriors among the Panchalas and the Matsyas, "Those who are our very life, who are our heads, who are powerful bulls among men are all fighting the Dhartarashtras. How then do you all stand here, as if stupefied and deprived of your very senses? Fly to those great maharathas of my army. Drive out your fears and fight. Hold your Kshatriya dharma high, for with that, regardless of victory or death, you will attain swarga. If you prove to be victors, you will perform great yagnas with lavish dakshina to the Brahmanas. If, instead, you are killed, you will become equals to the Devas, and win many realms of felicity and bliss."

Thus exhorted by the king, the rest of the maharathas of the Pandava army charge into battle, the Panchalas attacking Drona from one side, while Bhimasena leads the others from another.

Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva are the most ardent and active warriors for the Pandavas. They also read the battle the best at this time. They cry to Arjuna, "Dhananjaya, brother, drive the Kurus away from Drona's side. If the Acharya loses his defenders, then the Panchalas can kill him."

At this, Partha rides swiftly against the Kauravas, while Drona continues to battle the Panchalas led by Dhrishtadyumna. On the fifth day of Drona's command, O Bhaarata, Bharadwaja's implacable son slaughters the enemy with unearthly archery and inhuman ruthlessness.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Drona razes the Panchala legions even as Indra did the Danavas of old. Though he sends gales of fire and wind swirling at them, and countless numbers of their troops are consumed by the matchless, apparently deranged Acharya, the great Pandava maharathas remain unmoved and continue to advance and to fight. In fact, Rajan, the Panchalas and the Srinjayas rush all together at Drona with fierce yells and surround the dreadful Brahmana. He, however, burns and mows them down at will.

Seeing the lustrous Drona putting the Panchalas to rout with unworldly astras, to which they have no defence, fear grips the hearts of the Pandavas and they despair of having victory and tell one another, "Ah, it is plain that Drona will consume us with his astras like a forest fire does a heap of straw in spring. We have no one who can so much as look at him in battle. Arjuna is possibly the only one who can face this apocalyptic Brahmana, and he will not fight him, for he does not consider it dharma to fight his Acharya."

Finding the sons of Kunti sorely pressed, bleeding and now truly frightened, from Drona's many fires, the omniscient Krishna says to Arjuna and his brothers, "Not the Devas with Vasava at their head can vanquish this Brahmana in battle. He can only be killed if he were to lay down his weapons himself. You must set aside your lofty dharma, you sons of Pandu, and use some cunning stratagem to kill Drona. Otherwise, from the golden ratha, the Brahmana will kill us all."

He pauses and, seeing he has their attention, says quietly, "Drona loves his son more than his life. I think if Aswatthaman were to die, Drona would abandon the war and lay down his weapons. So, let someone go and tell the Acharya that his son Aswatthaman has been killed."

Arjuna looks at Krishna in some shock and does not approve of this counsel. The others, seeing the havoc from hell that Drona sows all around him, and knowing very well that the war would indeed be swiftly lost if he was not stopped, quickly concur with Krishna. Yudhishtira thinks a long while and then, unwillingly, accepts what Krishna says. Rajan, then Mahabaho Bhima armed with his mace goes and kills a dangerous elephant whose name is also Aswatthaman and which belongs to his own army, to Indravarman, the king of the Malavas.

Riding upto Drona, with some reluctance in his heart and shame, Bhima begins to roar aloud, "Aswatthaman has been killed. Aswatthaman is dead!"

Bhima proclaims this white lie for it is not the Acharya's son who has died. Drona hears what Bhima says and feels all his limbs turn weak as if they have dissolved like sand in water. Then, he remembers the invincible prowess of his son and quickly concludes that Bhima is lying. Strength floods back into his mighty body. He knows that his son wears a secret jewel that makes him invincible to his enemies; Drona knows that his beloved Aswatthaman could not be dead.

Drona bears down hotly on Dhrishtadyumna, who he wants to kill above all else, for he knows that the Panchala prince is destined to kill him, indeed born just for that. He covers Dhrishtadyumna with a thousand keen kanka-feathered arrows. At this, full twenty thousand powerful Panchala maharathas inundate him with their barbs even as he dashes across Kurukshetra as he likes leaving spasming corpses all around him.

Completely shrouded by Panchala arrows, we no longer see the Acharya; he is as the sun hidden by rainclouds during the monsoon.

But no Panchala arrow finds its home in Drona's body, for he invokes the Brahmastra to protect himself and to ravage them. Drona is like a smokeless, blazing fire and he is invested with celestial grandeur as he slaughters the Somakas. He fells heads and cuts off massive arms like spiked maces decked with golden ornaments; these fall in a veritable rain. Massacred by Bharadwaja's meridian son, the Panchala Kshatriyas fall everywhere like trees uprooted by a tempest.

Yet again, the field of death becomes impassable for fallen elephants and horses, O Bhaarata, and the thick sludge of flesh and blood. Having killed all twenty thousand Panchala maharathas, Drona shines forth gloriously, truly like a smokeless fire. The inexorable son of Bharadwaja then beheads Vasudana with a broad-headed arrow, and then he kills five hundred Matsyas, six thousand elephants and ten thousand horsemen, in less time than it takes me to tell you of it.

Seeing Drona annihilating the very race of Kshatriyas on chasmic Kurukshetra deeper than death, the Rishis Viswamitra, Jamadagni, Bharadwaja, Gautama, Vasishta, Kasyapa, Atri, and the Srikatas, the Prisnis, Garga, the Balakhilyas, the Marichis, the descendants of Bhrigu and Angiras, and diverse other sages of subtle forms, gather there quickly, with Agni, the bearer of sacrificial libations at their head. They want to fetch Drona to Brahma, the Grandsire. They say to Drona, the ornament of battle, "You are fighting sinfully, without dharma. The hour of your death has come, O Brahmana. Lay down your weapons, Drona. Look, we are here and, after seeing us, you must no longer perpetrate such cruel violence.

You are well versed in the Vedas and their angas. You are devoted to dharma, especially because you are a Brahmana. Such brutal deeds do not become you. Lay down your weapons, drive away the film of darkness that blinds your heart and your eyes and cleave fast again to the sanatana dharma. The time that you had to spend in this world of men is now full.

You have consumed ordinary soldiers with the Brahmastra, burnt men who know nothing of the divine weapons to ashes. What you have done, O Muni, is in no way dharma. O blessed Drona, put aside your weapons without delay, and do not remain an hour longer on earth. Sin no more! You have done enough grievous harm."

Drona hears what the great Rishis say; he remembers again what Bhima had declared, that Aswatthaman was dead; he sees Dhrishtadyumna advancing upon him and a great pang, verily of death, clenches his heart. Burning with grief and plunged into sudden dejection, while he burned with energy and wrath a moment ago, Drona rides up to the one man that he trusts completely. He goes to the always truthful Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and asks him if his son Aswatthaman has indeed been killed.

Drona firmly believes that Yudhishtira would never tell a lie, not for the sovereignty over the three worlds. This is why he asks the question of Yudhishtira and nobody else. He had always looked for and found perfect truth in Yudhishtira from that Pandava's very boyhood.

Meanwhile, Krishna, knower of all things, is anxious for he knows that the indomitable Acharya can indeed devour all the Pandavas with his astras; he knows that Drona cannot be killed unless he lays down his weapons. Addressing Yudhishtira he says, "If Drona fights as he does now for half a day more, he will have exterminated all your army and ourselves. Save us, Yudhishtira, from the terrible Brahmana. In dire circumstances, falsehood is advocated if it saves lives. There is no sin in a lie spoken to women, or in marriages, or to save kings, or to rescue a Brahmana's life."

Bhima says, "As soon as I heard of the only way by which Drona can be slain, I killed a mighty elephant, like the elephant of Sakra himself, which belonged to Indravarman, the king of the Malavas, a great beast that stood within our army. I then went to Drona and told him, 'Aswatthaman has been killed, O Brahmana. Lay down your weapons and stop fighting!'

However, the Acharya does not believe that I spoke the truth. If you want to save us all and win this war, Yudhishtira, do as Krishna says and tell Drona that Aswatthaman, the son of Saradwat's daughter, is indeed dead. The Brahmana bull will never doubt what you say to him, for it is known that you are the most truthful one in all the worlds."

Hearing what Bhima says, persuaded by what Krishna also says, and bowing also to inevitable destiny, Yudhishtira decides to go along with what they want him to do. Yet, fearing to tell an outright lie Yudhishtira clearly says that Aswatthaman is dead, but adds under his breath, "the elephant Aswatthaman". Until that moment, Yudhishtira's chariot and horses were always suspended at a height of four fingers' breadth from the ground, for his immaculate dharma and honesty. No sooner does he tell this white lie than his ratha and steeds descend and then on ride along the earth as any other man's! When Yudhishtira says that his son is dead, Drona's already faltering spirit breaks. Having heard what the unworldly Rishis said to him, he suddenly sees himself as a most heinous sinner, and particularly against the noble Pandavas who always trod the path of dharma. At this critical juncture, he sees Dhrishtadyumna drawn dangerously close to him, and finds that his arms have grown weak and that he can no longer fight as he did before.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Dhrishtadyumna sees Drona stricken before him and charges at him with doubled celerity. As we know, king Drupada received Dhrishtadyumna from Agni Deva at a great yagna, and the fire-prince was born for Drupada to have revenge against Drona who had humiliated him. Dhrishtadyumna had been born just to kill Drona.

Wanting to kill Drona, to accomplish the final purpose of his birth, the Panchala prince picks up an unearthly bow, a weapon with few rivals. He fits an arrow on it, a shaft like a serpent of the most virulent venom, and that arrows glow with a fierce flame within the circle of his bow, and is like the splendent autumn sun within a radiant disc. Seeing Prishata's son bend that blazing bow, all the troops think that the last hour of the world has come.

Seeing the arrow aimed at him, Drona, son of Bharadwaja, also thinks that the last moment of his body has come. The Acharya prepares to parry the shaft. However, his astras, O Rajan, no longer appear at his bidding, although he has not exhausted them despite shooting them ceaselessly for four days and one night. Yet, when the third part of the fifth day is past, his shafts are all exhausted. Seeing that his arrows have all been spent, broken with grief believing that his son is dead and finding that the Devastras no longer appear at his bidding, he is overcome by a wish rising from the very depths of his being to lay aside his weapons as the Rishis asked him to.

Though still full of great tejas, he cannot fight as before. But, being the master he is and tameless, he takes up another celestial bow given him by Angiras, and some arrows that are like a Brahmana's curse; with his last vestiges of strength, the Acharya continues to battle Dhrishtadyumna!

Suddenly renewed, like a flame that blazes most brightly before it dies, Drona covers the Panchala prince with a steaming fusillade, which strike his adversary heavily, drawing fonts of blood from Dhrishtadyumna. Drona shatters the Panchala prince's shafts into dust; he cuts down the Pandava senapati's standard, severs his bow and beheads his sarathy: all in a flash. Dhrishtadyumna, still smiling, takes up another bow and drills a long violent shaft deep into Drona's torso.

Deeply wounded by that staggering shaft, losing his self-possession, Drona roars dreadfully and again rives Dhrishtadyumna's bow. As the Panchala prince seizes up more bows, the Acharya, apparently undimmed, destroys all of them, Rajan, leaving him only his mace and sword. He strikes the enraged, roaring Dhrishtadyumna with nine shafts such as would kill any enemy. But maharatha Dhrishtadyumna, of immeasurable soul, invokes the protective Brahmastra, and with light like speed and adroitness entangles his own horses with the Brahmana's, steeds red and dove coloured. Their whinnying is like the raging of stormclouds during the season of rains, and their shimmering skins flash like lightning.

The unrelenting Dvija shatters the shaft-joints, the wheel-joints, and all the other joints of Dhrishtadyumna's chariot so it collapses under that hero. Deprived of his bow, ratha, horses and sarathy, Dhrishtadyumna, in great distress, grasps up a mace. In a wink, Drona splits that weapon into slivers just before it is hurled at him. Dhrishtadyumna, Naravyaghra, picks up a gleaming sword and a bright shield decked with a hundred moons. Despite every reversal, the Panchala prince remains absorbed in his single intention: to kill Acharya Drona.

At times sheltering low in his chariot, at others leaping onto his chariot-head, the fire-prince remains in constant motion, brandishing his sword and whirling his bright shield, perhaps foolishly, still wanting to achieve his impossible task of despatching the Brahmana, who has him at his mercy. Now he leaps onto the very yoke of Drona's ratha, then dives under his chestnut horses and hides himself briefly beneath their haunches. With such mercurial speed does he move, that the troops all around break into spontaneous applause. And indeed, O Dhritarashtra, he is an incredible marvel to watch darting about as quickly as the very mind, denying Drona any opportunity to strike him down. Both of them strangely resemble, in their different roles, hawks flying after a piece of flesh or a smaller bird—both are hawk and both are quarry.

Expertly now, Drona spears his antagonist's white horses, one after another, without touching his own red ones tangled with them. Dhrishtadyumna's horses die, freeing Drona's red horses from the traces of Dhrishtadyumna's chariot. Seeing his horses killed, Dhrishtadyumna, the best of all swordsmen, springs at Drona with his sword, even like Vinata's son Garuda swooping upon a snake. The appearance, Rajan, of Dhrishtadyumna resembles Vishnu's when he was on the point of slaying Hiranyakasipu. He performs many elegant flourishes with his sword, including the well-known twenty-one different kinds of movements. With sword and shield in hand, he wheels about whirling his sword above his head, makes side thrusts, rushes forward, runs sideways, leaps high, attacks his antagonist's flanks, retreats, closes with his enemy, and presses him hard. Having practised them thoroughly, he also shows the manoeuvres called the Bharata, the Kausika and the Satwata, as he prepares to kill Drona. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna's striking display as he charges about the field, sword and shield in hand, all the warriors, as well as the Devas assembled there, are full of wonder.

Drona shoots a thousand arrows in the thick of the fray and destroys Dhrishtadyumna's sword as well as his shield of a hundred moons. The arrows that Drona uses are special short ones, used only in close combat. No one other than Kripa, Partha, Aswatthaman, Karna, Pradyumna and Yuyudhana own or know how to use these; Abhimanyu also had such arrows. Now the Acharya wants to kill his helpless disciple, who is like his own son, and affixes a deathly shaft to his bowstring. Just then, from a way off, the splendid Satyaki shatters that lethal arrow with ten whistling barbs, in the very sight of your son and the noble Karna, and rescues Dhrishtadyumna who would not otherwise have escaped with his life.

Krishna and Arjuna cry joyfully, "Uttamam! Uttamam!" and loudly applaud Satyaki of unfading glory, who continually destroys the devastras of all the enemy maharathas. Then Kesava and Dhananjaya charge towards the Kurus.

Dhananjaya says, “Look Krishna, how Satyaki, the joy of the Madhu vamsa, sports before the Acharya and the other maharathas and gladdens the twins, Bhima, Yudhishtira and me. With skill acquired through long abhyasa and deep humility, Yuyudhana toys with these mightiest warriors.”

All the troops and the Siddhas in the sky look at the invincible grandson of Sini, are filled with joy and wonder and laud him, saying, “Wonderful, Wonderful!” Indeed, Rajan, all the warriors of both armies show their appreciation of the Satwata hero’s stunning feats.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing what Satyaki does, an angry Duryodhana and others quickly surround him. Kripa and Karna join them, loosing towering gales of arrows at the Satwata hero. Swiftly, Yudhishtira, the twin sons of Madri and the stupendous Bhimasena arrive to support Satyaki. Karna, Kripa, Duryodhana and many others attack Satyaki viciously, all of them at once. But Yuyudhana is equal to them all; he cuts down all their arrows and incinerates the devastras that flare at him from all around.

So bloody and brutal is the war now that Kurukshetra resembles a scene from antiquity when Rudra, filled with rage, destroyed all creatures. Human arms, heads, royal parasols cut down, and yak-tails are seen lying in heaps on the field of dharma where dharma itself has all but perished. The earth is strewn thickly with broken wheels and rathas, massive arms lopped off from trunks and brave horsemen deprived abruptly of their lives, many of them headless. Thousands of valiant men, mangled by cruel shafts and lances, roll and writhe on the ground in agony, in the spasms of death. What doubt can there be, Rajan, that the Mahabharata yuddha fought on Kurukshetra is like the Devasura yuddha of old fought on the filed of swarga?

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira says to his warriors, “O Maharathas, attack Drona the pot-born with all your might! Look where Dhrishtadyumna, the heroic son of Prishata, is doing his utmost to slay the son of Bharadwaja. Looking at him, I feel certain that he will not fail today. But the Acharya is formidable and you must support him if he is to succeed. So unite and fight Drona!”

At Yudhishtira’s command, the maharathas of the Srinjayas all rush forward feverishly to attack the still battling son of Bharadwaja; he sees them come at him and knows that his end is near. He does not pause but continues to fight back like some deranged god. Suddenly, the earth trembles unaccountably, fierce winds blow, meteors fall in showers out of the sky, seemingly issuing from the Sun, blazing fiercely, foreboding great terrors; the omens send waves of terror and panic through your army.

The weapons of Drona seem to blaze more lividly than ever; the chariots on the field rumble louder and the horses all seem to weep. Drona, then, appears to rapidly lose his tejas and his left eye and hand begin to twitch. He sees Dhrishtadyumna before him again and, he hears the words of the Devarishis echo in his mind, saying that the time had come for him to leave the world. Drona feels a tide of despair and resolves to give up his life but after burning fiercely again in battle.

Surrounded on all sides by the troops of Drupada’s son, Drona begins to range across the field, massacring countless Kshatriyas with his astras. After he first annihilates four and twenty thousand Kshatriyas, he despatches another hundred thousand, with his unearthly ayudhas. He stands upon Kurukshetra like a smokeless fire and, then, decides that he will exterminate the very Kshatriya race with the Brahmastra.

The mighty Bhima races up to help Dhrishtadyumna who, without a chariot or weapons, still defiantly assails Drona with his bare hands and with whatever he can retrieve from the bloody mire around his feet. Bhima takes the Panchala prince into his ratha and says to him, “Only you can kill the dreadful Brahmana. The task of killing him rests with you; Dhrishtadyumna, hurry or he will finish us all!”

Dhrishtadyumna quickly seizes up a fresh, marvellous bow and once more covers Drona with a tornado of arrows. Both invoke the Brahmastra and many other Devastras. Gradually Dhrishtadyumna destroys and somewhat depletes the arsenal of Bharadwaja’s son; having done this, the Panchala prince begins to mow down the Vasatis, the Sibis, the Balhikas and the Kurus, all those who are protecting Drona.

The incandescent Acharya continues to summon and unleash fusillades of elemental arrows on all sides, while Dhrishtadyumna too is resplendent as the sun with his millions of rays. Then, once more, Drona breaks the bow in the Panchala prince's hands and bores him deep with fierce clutches of shafts that pierce his very marmas and fling him back in Bhima's ratha.

At this, Rajan, Bhima loses his temper completely. Besides himself with fury, the Vayuputra leaps out of his chariot, seizes Drona's red horses by their bits, and cries reverberantly to the Acharya, "If the vilest wretches among Brahmanas, discontented with their swadharma but well-versed in the use of arms, did not fight, the Kshatriya varna would not have been exterminated. Refraining from injury to all creatures, non-violence, the highest of all virtues and the Brahmana is the root of that virtue. As for you, you are the greatest of all knowers of the Brahman. These Mlecchas and other warriors are all engaged in their own swadharma and are motivated by ignorance and folly, and by the desire for wealth for their sons and wives. But you, O despicable and lowly Brahmana, commit genocide for the sake of an only son. Are you not ashamed? Unknown to you, Aswatthaman for whom you have taken up weapons, and for whom you live, lies dead today on the field. Yudhishtira himself has told you this, and do you still doubt it?"

With such fervour does the great son of the Wind speak that the already heartsick Drona lays down his bow and all his other weapons as well. The invincible Brahmana says aloud in his lion's voice, "O Karna, Karna maharatha, O Kripa, O Duryodhana, I say to you again, be careful how you fight the Pandavas otherwise they will kill you all. As for myself, I am laying down my weapons now. My time has come."

And then he repeatedly, dementedly calls out Aswatthaman's name in absolute grief. Having finally laid down his weapons, he sits on the floor of his chariot, and takes up a Yogic posture to reassure all the warriors, why all living creatures and to dispel their abject terror of him. Seeing his chance, Dhrishtadyumna gathers all his strength and courage. Laying aside his own bow and grasping up a sword, he lean down from Bhima's ratha and runs towards Drona. All men, all the unearthly ones who watch from the sky cry out in distress.

Drona, having abandoned his weapons, is in a supremely tranquil state. Having called out the name of his son, he fixes his mind in dhyana, concentrating on attaining Yoga, communion with the Brahman. Endued with great radiance by years of tapasya, he fixes his heart on that Supreme, Ancient and Eternal Being, the Lord Vishnu. Bending his head down, thrusting his chest out a little, closing his eyes, yoking himself now to the sattva guna, giving his heart and soul up to the most profound meditation, focused on the Pranava, the single syllable AUM that is the Brahman, the ultimate, his heart flying like an arrow toward the puissant and indestructible God of gods, with great punya acquired through tapasya, the Acharya of the Kurus and the Pandavas soars into Swarga, which even the pious find so difficult to attain.

When Drona's spirit ascends into Swarga, the sky is lit by two suns, until the soul of Bharadwaja's incomparable son dims and vanishes. We hear strange cries of joy from the delighted celestial ones above, Devarishi, Gandharva, Charana, Apsara, Vidyadhara, Deva and others as well.

When Drona leaves his body thus, Dhrishtadyumna stands beside him, unconscious of what has happened. Only we five among men, Arjuna, Aswatthaman, Krishna, Yudhishtira and I see the noble Drona engrossed in Yoga ascend to the highest realm of blessedness. Nobody else, O Rajan, sees the lustre or magnificence of the wise Drona, devoted to Yoga, when he leaves this world. Indeed, all present know nothing of it, or that, after setting aside his weapons, Drona has attained to supreme Brahmaloka, a region mysterious to the very gods, in the company of the greatest Rishis, leaving his body lacerated by arrows and bathed in blood.

Dhrishtadyumna knows nothing of it either and he roughly seizes the Acharya's lifeless body and, coarsely dragging it around on the floor of the golden chariot, hacks off the Acharya's head with his sword in an eruption of blood, while the already departed one makes no sound. Having beheaded him, Dhrishtadyumna gives a tremendous shout of joy, and whirls his sword around in triumph.

Dark of complexion, with white locks hanging down to his ears, that Brahmana of five and eighty years ranged over the battlefield with the vigour of a youth of sixteen: only for your sake, O Rajan! Before Dhrishtadyumna has his way with Drona, Arjuna cries to him, "Take the Acharya alive, do not kill him. He should not be slain!"

All the troops also cried out similar pleas; Arjuna, in particular, melts with pity, and cries out repeatedly. However, Dhrishtadyumna disregards all those cries and kills Drona on the floor of his ratha. Covered with the Brahmana's blood, Dhrishtadyumna jumps down from the chariot, red as the sun and as fierce. This is how your troops and the Pandavas' witness Drona killed in the battle. Though we five saw how Drona, called by the Sages of Swarga, attained to a transcendent realm before Dhrishtadyumna apparently slew him, fulfilling his destiny.

Then the exultant Panchala fire-prince flings down Drona's leonine, majestic head, flowing blood from its throat, before the warriors of your army, roaring terribly all the while. Your soldiers flee in all directions.

Meanwhile, Drona courses up through the firmament along the path of the stars. Through the grace of the Rishi Krishna Dwaipayana, the son of Satyavati, I was a witness, Rajan, to the true circumstances of the death of Bharadwaja's great son. I saw the illustrious one going, after he ascended the sky, like a smokeless brand of blinding splendour.

Shocked and panic-stricken by the death of Drona, the Kurus, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, all run from the battle. As your army breaks up and flees, many are killed and many wounded. Your warriors seem as if they have lost all will to continue fighting; they seem already vanquished, dead, and fear rips through them. The Kurus think of themselves as having lost both worlds and lose all self-control.

The kings of your army seek out Drona's body, Rajan, on the field covered over with thousands of headless trunks, and they cannot find it. With Drona slain, the Pandavas celebrate, twanging their bows, blowing their conches and beating their drums. Bhimasena and Dhrishtadyumna embrace each other in the midst of the Pandava host and Bhima says, "I will embrace you again, O son of Prishata, as a senapati who has won the war, when the wretch of a Suta's son Karna, and the other wretch Duryodhana have been slain!"

After he says this, Bhimasena, in a transport of joy, makes the earth tremble by deafeningly slapping his cavernous armpits. Terrified by that sound, the remainder of your troops run from the battlefield, forgetting Kshatriya dharma and intent on saving their lives. The Pandavas, O king, are overjoyed, for, a short while ago, it had truly seemed that Drona by himself would annihilate them and win the war by himself.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Upon the fall of Drona the Kurus, beaten, broken, wounded and now leaderless, are listless, desperate and sapped of all will and energy to continue the battle. They mourn with loud wailing and lamentations and, seeing their enemies, the Pandavas, prevail over them all around, cutting them down at will, they quake with fear. Their eyes fill with tears, their hearts are afraid, and they become melancholic and gather forlorn around your son. Covered with dust and grime, they cast glazed and vacant looks all around, and with their very breaths choked with terror, they resemble the Daityas after the fall of Hiranyaksha in the olden days.

Surrounded by them, as if by small terrified animals, Duryodhana cannot bear to remain in their sorry midst and moves away. Hungry, thirsty and scorched by the sun, your warriors, O Bhaarata, are entirely demoralised. For them the fall of Bharadwaja's son Drona is as if the sun fell onto the earth, or the ocean dried up, or Meru was moved from his true place, or Indra vanquished and slain. Losing all composure and dignity they scatter with anxiety lending them great celerity.

Sakuni, king of the Gandharas, watches Drona of the golden chariot killed, and he too runs away with the maharathas of his division, with even greater speed than any of the others. Even Karna flees in shock, taking with him his own vast division, with all its standards flapping in the hot wind that blows across Kurukshetra.

Salya of the Madras casts vacant looks all around him; he, too, escapes with his akshauhini, with all his chariots, elephants and horses.

Saradwat's son, Kripa, too, flees crying aloud, "Alas! Alas!" at the fall of his brother-in-law, and takes with him his akshauhini of elephants and foot-soldiers, the greater part of which have by now been killed.

Kritavarman also takes flight, borne by his swift horses, and surrounded by the remnants of his Bhoja, Kalinga, Aratta, and Balhika troops.

Uluka, O Rajan, seeing Drona slain, is terror-stricken and runs away, with his teeming cohort of foot-soldiers.

Handsome, youthful and reputed for his bravery, Dusasana, also, turns his back on the battle with alacrity, surrounded by his elephant division.

Vrishasena also flees at the sight of Drona's beheading, along with his ten thousand chariots and three thousand elephants.

With his elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers, even your otherwise fearless son, the mighty Duryodhana also rides away in panic, Rajan, as do the remnants of the Samsaptakas whom Arjuna has not yet slaughtered. Seeing Drona die, Susarman flees.

Riding on their elephants, chariots and horses, all the warriors of the Kaurava army run from the field of battle; some call out to their fathers to flee, some to their brothers, some to their uncles, some to their sons and some to their friends. Others cry out to their brothers in arms, their sisters' sons or other kinsmen, and everyone bolts in all directions. With dishevelled hair, and clothes come loose, they all run so that no two men can bee seen to be fleeing together with any composure. It is every man for himself and each of them believes that the war is lost and the Kuru army has been entirely destroyed. Others among your troops flee, Rajan, throwing off their armour so they can go faster.

A very few of the warriors and soldiers cry out to the others, "Stop! Do not run!" And then they themselves flee. Abandoning their fine chariots, and their bright ornaments flashing, they flee on horseback or on foot.

Only Drona's son Aswatthaman, like a great crocodile swimming against the current of a river, does not run but bears down on his enemies instead. A fierce battle breaks out between him and the many warriors led by Sikhandin, the Prabhadrakas, the Panchalas, the Chedis and the Kaikeyas. Even while cutting down vast numbers of the enemy, this Brahmana hero, with the tread of an infuriated elephant, sees the Kaurava host running from battle, bent just upon escape.

Aswatthaman rides up to Duryodhana and says, “Why, O Bhaarata, do our men flee as if in some great dread? Why do you not rally them? Rajan, you seem dazed and not yourself. Which of our maharathas has been killed that our men flee in such terror? O Kaurava, Karna himself leads those who run away. Never before have I seen such a sight. What dire evil has befallen your troops, O Suyodhana?”

Duryodhana cannot bear to tell him. Your son seems to sink deeper into an ocean of grief, like a foundering boat; he looks at Aswatthaman and tears flow down his face. Full of shame, your son finally says, “Blessed are you that you ask before any other why our army runs like frightened boys.”

Then, Saradwat’s son Kripa, in great anguish, tells Drona’s son how his father had been killed. He says, “We set Drona, greatest of all maharathas, at the head of our troops and began to fight the Panchalas. The Kurus and the Somakas closed with each other with a roar as of spring thunder and we fought closely, with swords and bare hands. As the battle progressed, the Dhartarashtras were being swiftly thinned and, seeing this, your august father was filled with rage and invoked a Brahmastra, which incinerated thousands of the enemy, great warriors and common soldiers alike. Any man of the Pandavas, Kaikeyas, Matsyas or Panchalas, O Aswatthaman, who came near Drona’s ratha, died. With his Brahmastra, Drona sent a thousand maharathas and two thousand elephants to the land of Yama.

Dark, with gray locks hanging down to his ears, and full five and eighty years old, the aged Drona would ride into battle like a youth of sixteen. While he razed the enemy troops and slew so many of their kings and maharathas, the Panchalas, though desperate to have revenge on him, ran from the fight in disorder. Invoking Devastras and unleashing them without discrimination, Drona burned like the sun. Your father, radiating arrows as Surya does his rays, was like the star at his zenith at whom no one can gaze. He scorched his enemies; he incinerated them or sapped them of their energy and will.

Seeing Drona devour their troops, Krishna said to Arjuna, ‘Truly, not Indra who slew great Vritrasura can vanquish this Brahman in battle. O you sons of Pandu, set aside your dharma and look for victory, otherwise Drona of the golden chariot will slaughter all of you this very day. We must use stratagem against him for only thus can he be killed. I believe that if he hears that Aswatthaman is dead he will not fight on. Only if Drona lays down his weapons can he be killed. Someone must say to him that his son had been slain. That will break his heart and his will not only to fight but to live.'

Arjuna did not approve of what Krishna said but the others all agreed, even Yudhishtira although after struggling with his conscience. Then, Bhimasena killed a great elephant called Aswatthaman, which belonged to the Malava lord Indravarman; his heart full of shame, he then went to your sire and said, 'Aswatthaman has been killed.'

But your father did not believe Bhima and he asked Yudhishtira is this was true. Afraid of telling a lie, but knowing that the war would be lost otherwise, and wanting victory, Yudhishtira said to the Acharya, 'He for whom you wield weapons, he for whom you live, your beloved son Aswatthaman has been slain. He lies unbreathing on the ground like a young lion killed in his prime.'

Knowing well the consequences of telling a lie, Yudhishtira added under his breath 'the elephant Aswatthaman'. Hearing this from the Dharmarajan, whom he did not doubt for a moment, the stricken Drona wailed aloud, his limbs turned weak and he did not fight as he did before. Seeing him almost senseless with shock and anxiety, Drupada's son, the cruel Dhrishtadyumna, rushed towards him.

Seeing the prince who had been born to kill him, Drona, knower of all things, knower of fate and its inexorable ways, cast aside his weapons and sat down in his chariot in praya. Dhrishtadyumna bounded onto that ratha, seized Drona by the hair with his left hand and, ignoring the loud admonitions of all the heroes around him, struck off the Acharya's head with his sword.

'Drona must not be killed!' These were the words that echoed from all sides. Arjuna, too, jumped down from his chariot and ran towards Prishata's son with arms upraised and repeatedly cried to him, 'O you who know the ways of dharma, do not kill the Acharya but take him alive!'

Though the Kauravas and Arjuna forbade him, Dhrishtadyumna brutally killed your father even as he sat with his eyes shut in dhyana. And now, our terrified troops run in all directions as if they have themselves been beheaded. Aswatthaman, Anagha, I and my brothers are also plunged in grief and fear, and we are also fleeing the field."

When he hears this, Aswatthaman’s hisses like a serpent trodden upon; rage like a fire fed with ample fuel blazes up in him. He wrings his hands, grinds his teeth, breathes like a snake and his eyes turn red as blood.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When he hears about how his father Drona was killed, what does Aswatthaman say, O Sanjaya? He in whom the Manava, Varuna, Agneya, Brahma, Aindra and Narayana astras reside always, what does he say when he hears that Dhrishtadyumna has, sinfully and eschewing dharma killed the virtuous Acharya in battle?

Having learnt the astra shastra, the science of weapons, from Parasurama himself, including all the Devastras, Drona had imparted all his knowledge to his son, wanting to see him invested with all the accomplishments of a great warrior. In this world, there is only one person, and none else, whom even the greatest men wish to see become superior to themselves and that is the son.

All the noblest, greatest teachers have this characteristic and they impart all the mysteries of their science to either their sons or devoted disciples whom they think of as being their own sons. Becoming his father's disciple, and obtaining all those mysteries in every nuance and detail, Aswatthaman became a veritable second Drona. Aswatthaman is equal to Karna in the knowledge of weapons, to Purandara in war, to Kartavirya in might,

Brihaspati in gyana, a mountain in fortitude, in tejas to Agni, in depth to an ocean, and in wrath and virulence to the venom of a great serpent.

He is the best of all maharathas in war, accomplished and indefatigable. In speed, he is equal to the wind and he tears about in the thick of a battle, like Yama in a rage. The very Earth shakes when he shoots his arrows. With prowess that cannot be confounded, this Brahmana hero is remorseless as well.

Purified by the Vedas and by his vratas, he is a perfect master of the science of arms, why, even like Dasaratha's son Rama. Like the ocean, he is imperturbable.

Hearing that Dhrishtadyumna has killed his father Drona, with adharma, what did Aswatthaman say? Even as Yagnasena's son was born to become the slayer of Drona, so too was Aswatthaman born to avenge his father's death and to kill Dhrishtadyumna. What does Aswatthaman say, hearing that the ruthless Dhrishtadyumna has beheaded his sire, the Acharya?'"

"Sanjaya says. 'Aswatthaman is filled with grief and rage in equal parts, O Rajan, on hearing how Dhrishtadyumna slaughtered his father like some animal. His body blazes forth with wrath like that of the Destroyer while he consumes all the creatures at the end of the Yuga. Repeatedly wiping his tears, and breathing hot sighs in anger, he says to Duryodhana, "Ah, Yudhishtira is the greatest hypocrite that he bears the standard of dharma, always sanctimoniously preaches the virtue of truth but then lies so vilely himself. No one could have vanquished my father unless he first set his weapons down and he would have consumed the Pandavas and their entire army with the fires of his astras. Now, he has been killed by a lie and in the most treacherous and cowardly way even while he sat in praya. So this is the great dharma of Dharma's own son!

Men who fight a war must inevitably find either victory or defeat. Death in battle is always commended and the sages have declared that the death of a warrior fighting in the cause of dharma is never to be mourned. My father met with a noble death and he has, beyond doubt, found the loftiest realm of felicity. I should not mourn him. But the utter shame of being crudely seized by his white hair before all the troops, even as he fought a dhama yuddha, burns and rends the very core of my heart. If my father could thus be seized by his silver locks and be beheaded while he sat in dhyana, why then should any sonless man ever want to have a son?

Moved by lust, wrath, folly, hatred or levity, men perpetrate deeds of grave adharma and humiliate the noblest souls. The cruel and evil son of Prishata has committed this unforgivable sin but he forgot that this Aswatthaman is not dead but alive! He will pay with his life, and savagely, for what he did to Drona; the lying Yudhishtira will pay for the lie he told my father that made him lay down his weapons. Drona trusted Yudhishtira absolutely and the Pandava betrayed his trust to have his life and win this war.

This very day, the earth will drink the blood of this false Dharmaraja. Besides this, I swear by the Truth, O Kauravya, as also by all my religious karma, that I will not continue to live unless I annihilate all the Panchalas for what their prince did to my father. I swear that I will kill the sinner Dhrishtadyumna, even as brutally as he did my father. Let the means be any, mild or violent, but I will not rest in peace until I have wrought the destruction of all the Panchalas.

O Kaurava, Naravyaghra, men wish for sons so that they may be saved from great fears both here and in the hereafter. Yet, my father met a disgraceful death, like a friendless creature, although I, his son and disciple, am alive, and like a mountain in strength. Shame on my devastras, fie on my weaponry, shame on my prowess, for Drona, although he had a son in me, had his gray locks seized by the Panchala and his head hewn off!

O Duryodhana, king of the Bharatas, I will now do what will free me from the debt I owe my sire who has left this world. A superior man never praises himself. But I cannot bear the sinful slaying of my father and today I will speak of my prowess. Let the Pandavas, with Krishna among them, behold my tejas today as I consume all their troops even as Rudra does when the yuga ends.

Not the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Asuras, the Uragas, the Rakshasas, nor all the greatest Manavas shall contain me in battle today. There is none in the world to equal Arjuna or me in the knowledge of weapons. Today I will break into the Pandava army, shining like the Sun himself with his blazing rays, and I will incinerate the enemy with my devastras. Endless arrows will spume forth from my bow and devour them all. Today the warriors of our army will see all the points of the compass, O Rajan, obscured by my arrows, as if with dark torrents of rain. Today I will mow them all down like a great tempest does trees, great and small, that stand in its way. Not Arjuna, Janardana, Bhimasena, Nakula, Sahadeva, Yudhishtira, Drupada's evil son Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandin or Satyaki possess the astras that I have, for my father gave me more than he did any of them.

Once, assuming the form of a Brahmana, Narayana himself came to my father and, after bowing down to him, my father made his offerings to Him. Taking them in his own hands, the divine Lord offered to give him a boon. My father asked for the supreme weapon, the Narayanastra.

The Devadeva said to my sire, 'No man will ever be your equal in battle. However, O Brahmana, you must never use this weapon lightly or in haste, for it never returns without destroying the enemy at whom you loose it. There is no one whom it cannot slay! Indeed, the Narayanastra would consume even the immortals. Therefore, it should be used only after the greatest deliberation and to serve the gravest cause. This astra, O Parantapa, should never be cast against men who abandon their chariots or weapons in battle, at those who seek quarter or those that concede defeat. Also, he who seeks to injure the Immortal One with it will himself be severely afflicted by this supreme weapon!'

My sire humbly received the Narayanastra. Then Lord Narayana said to me, 'With this Narayanastra, you will also be able to unleash other astras beyond count in battle and blaze with tejas.'

Having said these words, the divine Lord vanished before our eyes and ascended into Swarga. This is the tale of how I came to possess the ineluctable Narayanastra. Today, I will put it to good use and annihilate the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Matsyas and the Kaikeyas, even as Sachi's lord razed the Asuras. My arrows, O Bhaarata, will fall upon my enemies in the very forms that I wish them to assume; they shall be without count or end and they will not cease falling upon the enemy until their last warrior is dead. I am a Parantapa, O Duryodhana, a blazing scourge of my enemies, and today you will see me destroy the Pandavas and all who fight their cause. As for that cur of the Panchalas, Dhrishtadyumna, who is an offender of friends, Brahmanas and of his own Acharya, who is a deceitful and ignoble wretch, he will not escape me with his life today."

Hearing what Aswatthaman says, the Kuru army takes heart and rallies. Many great warriors are delighted and blow their gigantic conches; the troops beat their drums and dindimas by the thousands. The earth resounds with the hooves of charging horses and the racing wheels of chariots; the sky echoes with the great sounds. Hearing this uproar, deep as rolling thunder, the Pandava maharathas take counsel together.

Meanwhile, after he has spoken, Drona's son, O Bhaarata, touches holy water and invokes the devastra called the Narayana.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'No sooner does Aswatthaman invoke the Narayanastra than violent winds begin to blow with lashing showers of rain, and we hear peals of thunder although there is not a cloud in the sky. The earth trembles and the seas swell up in great agitation. The rivers begin to run back towards their sources in terror; mountain peaks cleave themselves and giant crags come loose of their own accord and crash down sheer precipices; diverse beasts of the earth all run in panic, keeping the Pandavas ever to their right.

Darkness sets in. The sun is obscured and all manner of birds of prey and beasts of carrion alight on the field in joy of a further fresh feast to come. The Devas, the Danavas and the Gandharvas, Rajan, are all petrified. Seeing this tremendous upheaval in nature, all the men begin to cry out loudly to one another about its cause. A terrible wave of anguish, both bodily and spiritual, courses through all the kings and maharathas when Drona's son summons the Narayanastra.'

Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Sanjaya, tell me what strategy the Pandavas adopt to protect Dhrishtadyumna when they see the Kauravas advance again into battle, rallied by Drona's son seared by grief at the murder of his sire?'

Sanjaya continues, 'Having seen the Dhartarashtras turn tail earlier, and now finding them prepared for a furious battle, Yudhishtira asks Arjuna, "Dhananjaya, after Dhrishtadyumna slew the Acharya even as Indra did Vritrasura, the Kurus' spirit was broken and they fled in fear. Some kings dashed away on chariots along uneven paths without Parshni drivers, without standards, banners, chatras and with their kuvaras broken, and all their weapons awry.

Others, losing their wits with fear, whipped and kicked their horses and fled in frenzy. Many, riding on chariots with broken yokes, wheels and akshas, flew in absolute fear. Several on horseback were borne away, almost unseated and clinging on for dear life. Some warriors were dislodged from their lofty seats and transfixed by arrows to the necks of their elephants, while the great creatures lumbered away in equal terror. Elephants, mangled with hundred of barbs, trod on other fighting men, crushing them to pulp.

Having lost their weapons and armour, great fighting men fell down upon the earth from their chariots and animals. Chariot-wheels cut others in two, or they were crushed by horses. Others, calling loudly after their sires and sons, also fled in fear, without recognising one another, all their courage and energy gone from shock and grief at the death of Drona. Some, setting their dead sons, fathers, friends and brothers on their chariots and taking off their armour, were seen dementedly washing them with water. After the slaying of Drona, the Kuru army had fallen into utter despair and chaos and scattered in every direction. Who, then, has rallied it now? Tell me, Arjuna, if you know.

We hear neighing horses and trumpeting elephants, their cries resounding once more with the rumble of chariot-wheels. These fierce sounds from the Kuru ocean swell in tide and make my troops tremble. This spine-chilling uproar that we now hear, it would seem, will swallow the three worlds with Indra at their head. Why, I feel as if the Vajradhari himself makes this terrible din. Arjuna, I feel certain that Indra himself comes to fight us at the fall of Acharya Drona; I do fear that the gods themselves have taken the field against us and will fight for the Kauravas.

My hair stands on end; our greatest maharathas are all full of anxiety. O Dhananjaya, tell me who rallies the Kurus against us that they return to battle so fiercely and full of courage again?"

His eyes full of angry tears, Arjuna replies with some passion, “He, relying upon whose tejas, the Kauravas are determined to accomplish fierce deeds, and blow their conches in blaring challenge; who roars so loudly, having rallied the Dhartarashtras after the fall of the Acharya; who is endued with modesty, possesses mighty weapons, has the tread of an enraged elephant, a face like a tiger’s, always accomplishes fierce deeds and dispels the fears of the Kurus; he upon whose birth Drona gave away a thousand heads of the finest cattle to the worthiest Brahmanas; he, Rajan, who bellows like Nandin himself is Aswatthaman.

As soon as he was born, this hero neighed like Indra’s steed Ucchaisravas and made the three worlds tremble at the sound. Hearing that sound, an asariri spoke resonantly out of the sky and called him Aswatthaman, the horse-voiced. Aswatthaman is the shura who roars today as if he means to end the world.

Drupada’s son Dhrishtadyumna took Drona’s life brutally today, hacking off his head while the Acharya sat in praya. He killed him as if he was never his guru. Because Dhrishtadyumna seized his father, our Acharya, by his hair, the proud Aswatthaman will never forgive him.

You told your Acharya a lie for the sake of a kingdom! Although you know dharma better than anyone, yet you committed this grave sin. Your infamy will resound through the three worlds for the death of great Drona, and it shall be eternal, Yudhishtira, even as Rama’s is because of the way in which he slew Vali the Vanara, treacherously.

Of you Drona thought, ‘The son of Pandu possesses every virtue; besides, he is my sishya. He will never lie to me.’

And believing this he never doubted you when you told him that Aswatthaman was dead. You added ‘the elephant’ under your breath, but what you swore to your Acharya was still a lie and a terrible sin. Believing what you said, our Acharya laid down his weapons and grew indifferent to the war. His heart was broken and he was senseless with grief. He sat down on the floor of his ratha, shut his eyes and gave himself up to dhyana.

And it was at such a time that a sishya, Dhrishtadyumna, abandoning dharma, killed his own acharya. Having caused to lay down his weapons with your lie and thus be savagely killed, now protect Dhrishtadyumna if you can, with all your allies and counsellors. All of us together will not be able to protect Drupada’s son today from the grief and wrath of Drona’s son Aswatthaman.

Aswatthaman is no mere mortal warrior; the knowing say that he is an amsa of Siva himself. This superhuman Brahmana, who is given to showing affection and friendship towards all, is in the grip of righteous anger and no one will save us from his ire today. Aswatthaman will consume us all for the manner in which we slew his great father.

Although I cried repeatedly at the very top of my voice to save the Acharya's life, yet ignoring me and abandoning dharma, a sishya, Dhrishtadyumna, took the life of his own acharya in the vilest, most brutal manner imaginable. All of us have passed the greater part of our lives and the days that remain to us are limited. This sin that we have committed will darken the rest of our lives. For the deep love he bore towards us, he was like a father to us. According to the dictates of the scriptures too, he is a sire to us for he was our guru. Yet we killed our acharya for the sake of a short-lived, meaningless kingdom.

Dhritarashtra, Rajan, gave Bhishma and Drona all the Earth, and what is more precious, all his children. Though thus honoured by our uncle, our enemy, and though he had gained untold wealth from him, the Acharya still loved us as his own children. Of unfading tejas and prowess, Drona was killed only because, persuaded by your lie to him, he set aside his weapons. As long as he fought, he was invincible and not even Indra could kill him. Our Acharya was venerable in years and always devoted to our welfare. Yet sinners that we are, we had no scruple in sending him to his death. The sin that we have committed is inconceivably heinous and cowardly, for moved by the desire of enjoying the pleasures of sovereignty, we have murdered great Drona.

My Acharya always believed of me that, because of my love for him, I would gladly abandon my father, brothers, children, wife and life itself for his sake. And yet, moved by the lust for a kingdom, I did not intervene when he was about to be killed. I did not stop Dhrishtadyumna with an arrow when I well could have. For this crime, Rajan, I am overwhelmed with shame and I have already plunged into hell. For the sake of a kingdom, I caused the death of one who was a Brahmana, who was venerable in years, who was my Acharya, who had laid down his weapons, and who was at the time devoted, like a great ascetic, to yoga.

Ah, death has become preferable to me over life!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing what Arjuna says, the maharathas present there say not a single word to him, O Rajan, good or bad.

Then, an angry Bhimasena, his brow dark, upbraids Arjuna sharply, "You preach the truths of dharma like a sannyasi living in the vana or a Brahmana of rigid vratas and his senses under complete control. But a man is called a Kshatriya because he saves others from danger and harm. Being such, he must save himself from hurt and injury as well. Showing forgiveness towards the three that are good—the Devas, the Brahmanas and an Acharya—a Kshatriya, by performing his svadharma, soon wins the earth and also piety, fame and prosperity. O perpetuator of your race, you possess every attribute of a Kshatriya. Therefore, it does not look well for you to speak like an ignorant lout. O son of Kunti, your prowess is as that of Sachi's lord, Sakra himself. You do not break the bounds of dharma, like the ocean that never transgresses its continents. Who is there that will not worship you, seeing that you seek dharma, having abandoned the anger you cherished for thirteen years?

Fortunately, today your heart follows the path of dharma. O you of unfading glory, providentially, your intellect is disposed towards compassion. However, though you are inclined to tread the path of dharma, your kingdom was taken from you most sinfully. Dragging Draupadi to the Kuru sabha, your enemies insulted and shamed her. Clad in barks of trees and skins of animals, all of us were banished to the vana. Though we did not deserve it, our enemies compelled us to endure our exile for thirteen years. O sinless one, you have forgiven all these circumstances, every one of which demands the demonstration of our anger. Wedded as you are to Kshatriya dharma, you quietly bore these trials and tribulations.

I, however, remember all those sins committed against us and I came here with you for revenge. But when I see that you are so indifferent, why, I myself will kill these low wretches that stripped us of our kingdom. You once said, 'We will fight the war to the utmost of our abilities.'

Today, you reproach us and you now seek dharma. So what you said earlier must be untrue. We are already stricken with fear and you sow doubt and weakness in the very core of our hearts with your words, O Parantapa, like one pouring acid into open wounds. My heart is breaking to listen to you preach. You are virtuous, Arjuna, but you do not know what dharma truly consists of, since you laud neither yourself nor us, though all of us are worthy of praise for our deeds on the field of battle.

When Krishna himself told us how to kill Drona, how can you praise the son of Drona, a warrior who does not measure up to even a sixteenth part of yourself, Dhananjaya? Do you not feel ashamed confessing your own faults like some weakling?

I can rend asunder this earth in anger, or split the very mountains with my gada decked with gold. Like a tempest of my natural sire, I can tear down trees tall as hills. Partha, with my arrows, I can rout all the Devas with Indra at their head, together with all the Rakshasas, the Asuras, the Uragas and Manushas. Knowing me, your brother, to be such, O bull among men, it is not fitting that you should entertain any fear about Drona's son. Otherwise, stand here with all these heroes, Bibhatsu, while, alone and unsupported, armed with my gada, I vanquish this fellow of no great worth in a duel."

When Bhima has finished, Dhrishtadyumna rounds on Arjuna, and says in a tone as terrible as the one Hiranyakashyapu used when he once addressed Vishnu, "O Bibhatsu, the sages have ordained that assisting in yagnas, performance of yagnas, teaching, giving away alms, receiving gifts, and study to be the six duties of Brahmanas. To which of these six duties was Drona, whom I have slain, devoted? Fallen from the dharma of his own varna and practising those of the Kshatriya varna, this doer of evil deeds burned us and our common soldiers with his devastras. Professing himself to be a Brahmana, he used irresistible maya against us as well.

Today he has been killed with maya, an illusion. O Partha, what is reprehensible in this? If Drona's griefstricken and enraged son roars threats at us after I punished Drona, what do you lose by it? I myself believe that, after rallying the Kauravas back to battle, Aswatthaman, who roars so loudly, will find himself unable to protect them and will be the cause of their being killed instead.

You know dharma well. Why then do you say that I am a slayer of my Acharya? It is for this very task that I was born as a son to the king of the Panchalas, having sprung from a yagna fire. How, O Dhananjaya, can you call him a Brahmana or Kshatriya, to whom, while waging war, all actions, righteous and utterly sinful, are the same? O best of men, why should he who, losing his mind in anger, used the Brahmastra to kill even those who knew nothing of the astras, our common troops, not be killed by any means?

He who lives by sin is considered by men of dharma to be like poison. Knowing this, why do you, Arjuna, who know all the truths of dharma, reproach me?

I seized and killed the ruthless and cruel maharatha. I have done nothing that is worthy of reproach. Why then, O Bibhatsu, do you not congratulate me? O Partha, I cut off the terrible head of Drona that was like the blazing sun, virulent poison or the all-destroying Yuga fire. Why do you not approve a deed that is worthy of the highest praise? He has killed only my father and kinsmen and not those of anyone else. I say that by having only beheaded him, the fever of my heart has not cooled. My heart is in anguish that I did not fling Drona's head among the Nishadas, like that of Jayadratha!

I have heard, O Arjuna, that one incurs sin by not killing one's enemies. The dharma of a Kshatriya is to slay or be slain. Drona was my enemy. I have killed him in battle, O Pandava, exactly as you killed the brave Bhagadatta, who was your friend. Having cut down your own grandsire Bhishma in battle, you still speak of dharma! How, after that, do you dare say I sinned by killing my wretched and inveterate enemy?

Because of our relationship, O Partha, I cannot raise my head in your presence and am like a prostrate elephant with a ladder against his body for helping puny creatures to climb on its back. So do not reproach me, it does not become you.

For the sake of my sister Draupadi and her children, and no other reason, I forgive you what you have dared say to me today. It is well known that my enmity with the Acharya has come down from sire to son. Everybody in this world knows it. You sons of Pandu, husbands of my sister, are you not acquainted with it? The eldest son of Pandu has not lied. I myself, O Arjuna, have not sinned. The wretched Drona was a hater of his disciples. Stop whining like a witless boy and fight now. Victory will be yours.”””

"Dhritarashtra says, 'The illustrious Drona, who had studied the Vedas with all their angas; he in whom the entire science of arms and modesty dwelt; the Brahmana through whose grace so many of the greatest still achieve superhuman feats that the very gods perform with difficulty—alas, when the Maharishi Bharadwaja's invincible son was humiliated and beheaded by the base and sinful Dhrishtadyumna, slayer of his own Acharya while all men watched, was there no Kshatriya who felt called upon to display his anger? Shame on the Kshatriya varna and fie on wrath itself!

Tell me, O Sanjaya, what the sons of Pritha, and all the other royal archers of the world, say to the prince of Panchala after he murdered his guru Drona.'

Sanjaya replies, 'All that are present there remain perfectly silent, O Rajan, when they hear what Drupada's dishonest son says. Arjuna, however, casting oblique glances at Dhrishtadyumna, seems to reproach him with tears and sighs, which say, "Shame! Shame!", while Yudhishtira, Bhima, the twins, Krishna and the others stand there saying nothing.

But Satyaki says clearly, "Is there no man here who will at once kill this sinful creature, this lowest of men, who speaks so evilly? The Pandavas all condemn you for your sinful deed, like Brahmanas condemning a Chandala. Having committed such a heinous crime, and incurring the censure of all honest men, are you not ashamed to open your mouth and speak in the midst of such an honourable gathering of Kshatriyas? Despicable wretch, why did your head not burst apart into a hundred pieces when you were about to slay your own Acharya? Why does your tongue not spilt into slivers when you now defend what you did? Why does your sin not strike you down even now, vile Dhrishtadyumna?

You not only commit an unmentionable sin but you applaud and congratulate yourself in the midst of noble men. Panchala, I swear that you incur the censure of the Parthas, all the Andhakas and the Vrishnis. Having perpetrated atrocity, you still loudly declare your rancour and hatred for the one that taught you everything you know. And for this you deserve death at our hands. You should not be left alive for even a moment. Who other than you, O filthy wretch, would dare seize our great Acharya by his silver locks as he sat in yoga and cut his head from his neck?

Having got you for part of their great vamsa, vile man, your ancestors for seven generations and your descendants for seven generations, deprived of honour and fame, have sunk into hell. You dare charge Arjuna, bull among men, with the killing of Bhishma. But the truth is that Bhishma sought and brought about his own fall, for no other could bring him down. And in truth, wretched Panchala, it is your own brother Sikhandin, greatest of sinners, who was the cause of Bhishma's fall.

I say that there are no greater sinners in this world than the sons of the Panchala king. Your father created Sikhandin for Bhishma's destruction, and you to kill Drona in the most depraved manner. As for Arjuna, he only protected Sikhandin while your brother shot Bhishma down with his arrows because the noble Bhishma would not defend himself against one whom he regarded to be a woman.

Having you, whom all righteous men condemn, and your eunuch brother born into their clan, the Panchalas have fallen from dharma and, stained with malice, have all become haters of friends and acharyas. Dhrishtadyumna, if you say what you have again in my presence, I will then smash your head with my mace that is like Indra's Vajra.

Anyone who so much as looks at you, O Brahmana slayer, marked with the guilt of the direst sin of Brahmahatya, must look up at the sun to purify himself for having set eyes on such a sinner. You dog of a Panchala, evil man, do you feel no shame casting aspersions first on my guru Arjuna and then on my guru's guru the great Drona himself?

Stop, and have done, you lowly thing! Bear but one stroke of my mace and I myself will bear many blow of yours."

Harshly rebuked by the Satwata hero, Prishata's son Dhrishtadyumna, filled with rage, says to Satyaki with a superior, mocking smile, "I have heard you, O you of Madhu's race, but I forgive you. Being a sinner and an adharmi yourself, you now wish to censure honest men of dharma? The quality of forgiveness is acclaimed in the world while sin like yours deserves none. He who has a sinful soul regards the forgiving man as being weak. You are evil in your conduct, your soul is dark with sin, and you are wedded to adharma. You are culpable in every way, from the tips of your toes to the ends of your hair. And you, base Satwata, still speak ill of others?

What can be more sinful than what you did when you murdered the armless Bhurisravas, while he sat in praya, and you were unleashing devastras. Yes, Drona had laid aside his weapons and I killed him. Crooked hypocrite, what did I do that was wrong? How can you, O foolish Satyaki, blame me for what I did, when you did exactly the same, and that, too, after Arjuna saved your worthless life by cutting off Bhurisarvas' arm? This valiant Kuru enemy of yours displayed his prowess by throwing you down onto the earth and stamping on you with his foot. Why did you not kill him then, and show your manliness? No, vile Satyaki, you killed great Bhurisravas only after Arjuna had hewn away his arm and when he sat in dhyana.

And now you dare preach dharma to me? When Drona was annihilating the forces of the Pandavas, I fought him with thousands of arrows. But having yourself behaved like a Chandala and become worthy of censure, how do you now reproach me so harshly? You are the evil one and not I, O wretch of the Vrishni vamsa! You are the home of all sins, so it is better that you remain silent and not point your crooked finger at me again in blame.

Don't dare speak to me again. This is the reply I give you with my lips. But if, from folly, you say anything more, I will send you to Yama before you have finished talking.

Through dharma alone, O fool, one cannot vanquish great enemies. If you have forgotten, listen to all the adharma the Kurus committed against the sons of Pandu, which caused this war. Pandu's son Yudhishtira Dharmaraja was deceived with rank adharma at the game of dice. O Satyaki, the sons of Dhritarashtra and the sinner Karna coarsely humiliated my sister Draupadi in the hallowed Kuru sabha. The Pandavas, with Panchali, were then exiled and robbed of their all, O foolish Satwata. Was that, according to you, dharma?

With cunning, the enemy deprived us of a valuable ally, Salya of the Madras. Subhadra's son was trapped in the chakravyuha by your great Acharya and cut down by six maharathas. Do you call that dharma, O Yuyudhana, fool?

On our side, it was though adharma that Bhishma, the Kuru grandsire, was brought down and with adharma that you slew Bhurisravas. This is how both the enemy, as well as the Pandavas, have fought this war. They are all valiant and mighty; they are all knowers of dharma; yet, they have all sinned in order to have victory in this ghastly war. O glib Satwata, true dharma and adharma as well are difficult to comprehend, and vary according to circumstances.

I say to you, stop this talk now and now fight the Kauravas, without turning back to the home of your fathers!"

Dhrishtadyumna speaks with contempt and vituperation, and the radiant Satyaki begins to tremble from head to foot in anger. His eyes turn the hue of copper. Sighing like a snake, he leaves his bow in his ratha, grasps his mace and rushes at the prince of the Panchalas, and cries, "I will not speak to you anymore, but kill you as you deserve!"

Seeing Satyaki rushing at the Panchala prince, like one Yama at another, Bhima, urged by Krishna, jumps down from his chariot and clasps Yuyudhana firmly in his mighty arms. Satyaki, who is strong himself, still manages to take five steps forward, dragging Bhima with him. Then, Bhima plants his massive feet firmly and stops the bull of Sini's race at the sixth step.

With Bhima restraining the red-eyed Satwata, Sahadeva leaps down from his chariot, and mollifies Satyaki, "O Naravyaghra, we have no friends dearer to us than the Andhakas, the Vrishnis and the Panchalas. So, also, the Andhakas and the Vrishnis, particularly Krishna, have no friends dearer to them than us. The Panchalas, too, even if they comb the whole world to the confines of the sea, have no friends dearer to them than the Pandavas and the Vrishnis. You are such a friend to this prince Dhrishtadyumna; and he is a similar friend to you. You all are to us even as we are to you. Knowing dharma as you do, think now of the dharma that you owe your friends. Restrain your anger and be calm, O best of Sini's race! Forgive Dhrishtadyumna, and let him also forgive you. We, too, will forgive all that has been said in anger. What is there, Yuyudhana, that is better than forgiveness?"

Even as Sahadeva is attempting to pacify the furious Satyaki, Dhrishtadyumna, smiling arrogantly, says, "O Bhima, release Sini's grandson who is so proud of his prowess in battle. Let him come to me like the wind assailing the mountains and I will quell his anger and lust of battle. I will have his life with my arrows.

Look, where the Kauravas advance on us. After killing this fool Satyaki, I will burn all Duryodhana's troops with my astras, or let Arjuna do so if he chooses to. But now I mean to cut this vile Satwata's head from his neck. He thinks I am like the armless Bhurisravas. He will find he is sadly mistaken. Either I will kill him or he will kill me today."

Satyaki wriggles like an angry snake to get free from Bhima's clasp. Both Dhrishtadyumna and he bellow at each other like a pair of bulls. Finally, Krishna and Yudhishtira, with some effort, succeed in calming the two. Having placated those maharathas, whose eyes had turned the colour of blood, all the Kshatriyas of the Pandava army take the field against the Kaurava warriors to do battle again.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Then Drona's son Aswatthaman inflicts great carnage among his enemies like the Destroyer himself at the end of the Yuga. Killing them with banks of broad-headed missiles, he soon heaps a mountain of dead on the battlefield. The banners of chariots form its trees; weapons are its pointed peaks; lifeless elephants are its large boulders; dead horses and their riders are its Kimpurushas, half man and half equine; bows are its creepers and plants; and it resounds with the cries of birds of prey and carrion, its feathered population, and the spirits that walk there are its Yakshas.

Aswatthaman repeats his dreadful vow in the hearing of your son Duryodhana: "Since Kunti's son Yudhishtira, who wears only the false outer garb of dharma, lied to my father, who fought righteously, to lay aside his weapons and be slain, I will, in his very sight, destroy his entire army and then kill Dhrishtadyumna, sinful prince of the Panchalas. Rally your troops, O Suyodhana, for I swear to you that I will annihilate them all if they dare face me in battle!"

Dispelling the fears of his men with a booming bellow, your son gathers his troops. The battle between the Kurus and Pandavas resembles two seas in high tide surging into each other. The Kauravas are now emboldened by Drona's son, and the Pandus and the Panchalas are inspired by Drona's death. Indescribable mayhem and bloodshed rule Kurukshetra again and all who fight have battle lust and no trace of fear coursing through them.

Truly, Maharajan, the collision between the Kurus and the Pandavas is like one mountain striking another, or an ocean another ocean.

Full of spirit and bravado, the Kuru and the Pandava warriors beat thousands of drums and the ear-splitting bedlam that arises from the troops resembles that of the Kshirasagara when it was churned in days of old by the Devas and the Danavas when they sought the Amrita.

And now Aswatthaman invokes the Narayanastra and unleashes it at the Pandava and Panchala host. Thousands of serpentine arrows with blazing mouths appear in the sky, and rain down on the Pandavas. Like rays of the sun, in a moment these shafts shroud all the directions of the sky and engulf all the enemy legions. Innumerable iron balls appear like resplendent luminaries in the clear firmament. Sataghnis, some with four and some with two wheels, innumerable maces, and discs with edges sharp as razors and shining like lightning, also appear from the Narayanastra. Seeing all the sky covered by these uncanny weapons, O Bharatarishabha, the Pandavas, the Panchalas and the Srinjayas are absolutely terror-stricken. Most of all, wherever the Pandava maharathas offer resistance to the awesome astra of the Lord Vishnu, it only increases in power and ferocity. Devoured everywhere by the Narayanastra, as a heap of dry grass by some raging forest fire in summer, the Pandava warriors have no answer to Aswatthaman's ultimate ayudha and it consumes them rabidly on all sides.

Yudhishtira watches his men being incinerated and mown down in their thousands every moment, standing stupefied or flying blindly in all directions, and Arjuna doing nothing to stop the carnage, a panic-stricken Yudhishtira cries, "Dhrishtadyumna, escape with your Panchala troops! Satyaki, run with the Vrishnis and the Andhakas. Krishna will save himself. He can counsel the whole world so what need to tell him what he should do? We will not fight any more. This is my command.

As for myself, my brothers and I will climb onto a funeral pyre. Having crossed the Bhishma and the Drona oceans in this war, can I sink with all my followers in a cow's hoof print that is Drona's son? Let what Duryodhana wants be crowned with success today, for today I have killed our Acharya, who always loved us well, Drona who had the child Abhimanyu slaughtered by six maharathas and a host of warriors besides in the chakravyuha; the Acharya who sat indifferent with his son in the Kuru sabha, without answering Draupadi when she was dragged into that ancient court of dharma and asked him for truth and justice; Drona who wrapped an impenetrable kavacha around Duryodhana when Dhritarashtra's son wanted to kill Arjuna and sent him to protect Jayadratha; Drona who did not hesitate to turn Satyajit and his warriors into ashes with the Brahmastra while they protected my life; the Acharya, who, while we were being wrongfully exiled from our kingdom, gladly told us to go into the vana although our friends all asked him not to take sides with the Kauravas. Alas, it is this great friend of ours that has been slain! And for his sake today, I will, with my brothers and friends, lay down my life."

When Kunti's son, Yudhishtira says this with some fervour, Krishna makes a sign to the troops not to flee and says, "Be quick and lay down your weapons, all of you, and alight from your chariots. This is the only way, declared by the Lord Narayana himself, to render his great astra powerless. All of you come down onto the ground from your elephants, horses and chariots. If you stand weaponless on the earth, this astra will not touch you, while if you seek to fight it, it will only grow stronger and more devastating. The Narayanastra does not kill those who throw down their weapons and alight from their rathas, while those who even think of resisting it will be consumed, even if they seek refuge in the deepest Patala."

At what Krishna says, all the warriors of the Pandava army fling down their weapons and drive out every thought of violence from their hearts. But seeing this, Bhimasena roars, "No one should lay down his weapons here. I will face and extinguish Aswatthaman's astra. With this golden mace of mine, I will range across the field and quell the Narayanastra on my own!

There is no man here equal to me in strength, even as there is no luminary in the firmament equal to the Sun. Look at these arms of mine like the trunks of mighty elephants, which can tear down the very peaks of Himavat. I possess the might of a thousand elephants. I have no peer for strength among men, even as Indra has none among the Devas. Let all men witness today the might of these arms and my chest as I smash down Aswatthaman's Narayanastra. If there is no one else who can face this weapon, I, Bhima, do so alone before all the Kurus and the Pandavas. O

Arjuna, Bibhatsu, if you lay the Gandiva aside, a stain will attach to you like the one on the Moon."

Arjuna says, "Bhima, I have vowed that my Gandiva will not be used against the Narayanastra, cows and Brahmanas."

Hearing this, Bhima, roaring, riding his chariot of solar effulgence, whose rumble is like that of massed thunderheads, dashes off alone against Aswatthaman. With awesome prowess and lightness of hand, in the twinkling of an eye he covers Drona's wrathful son in a cloud of arrows. Smiling at Bhima's folly, Aswatthaman looses a storm of astras at him, each blazing like a small sun. Shrouded by these shafts that vomit fire and resemble snakes with mouth afire, as if covered with sparks of gold, Bhimasena looks like a mountain in the evening burning with many fires in the dry summer.

The Narayanastra now focuses it fury on just Bhimasena and, by the moment, swells in ferocity like a fire fanned by an angry wind. Watching this, further dread and panic seize the hearts of all the Pandava warriors other than Bhima. All the others, to the last man, throw down their weapons and alight from their mounts and chariots; now, that the rest supplicate themselves before it, the fulminant astra rages just at Bhima.

A great lament goes up from the Pandavas, for the dreadful Narayanastra swiftly overwhelms the defiant son of the Wind.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Bhimasena overwhelmed and being set on fire by the Narayanastra, Arjuna envelops him with a Varuna astra to douse its flames. So swiftly does Arjuna do this that no one can see the watery cupola that covers Vrikodara. Still enveloped by Aswatthaman's Narayanastra, Bhima, his horses, charioteer and ratha are like a great flame at the heart of a raging fire.

Even as at close of night, O Rajan, all the luminaries drop towards the Asta hill, the fiery arrows of Aswatthaman all fall on just Bhimasena's ratha, and he, his chariot, horses, and charioteer seem to be on fire. As the Yuga fire consumes the entire universe with all its creatures when Pralaya comes and finally re-enters the mouth of the Creator, even so does Aswatthaman's astra enter the body of the fearless and brash Bhimasena.

Just as one cannot see a fire if it falls into the sun or the sun if it enters into Agni, no one can see the blinding energy that suffuses Bhima's body. Seeing the astra invading Bhima, and seeing Drona's son swelling with tejas, and being without an opponent to face him; seeing that all the warriors of the Pandava army have laid down their weapons and that all the maharathas of the Yudhishtira's army have turned their faces from the enemy, Arjuna and Krishna, leap out of their chariot and run towards Bhima; using maya shakti, they dive straight into the fires of the Narayanastra. The flames of the Lord's own weapon does not burn for, unlike Bhima, they have laid down their weapons, and also because of the Varuna astra and their own tejas.

Then, to pacify the Narayanastra, ancient Nara and Narayana forcibly lay hold of Bhima and wrest all his weapons away from him, at which the son of Vayu begins to roar in anger like a pride of lions being attacked! As he resists Krishna and Arjuna, the terrific astra grows even more ferocious.

Krishna says to Bhima in an irresistible voice, "How is it, O son of Pandu, that after being warned by us, you still continue to fight? If the Kurus could be vanquished now, while the Narayanastra hangs above us like the pralaya, we and all our maharathas would surely have fought as well. Look, all the warriors of your army have left their chariots. And you must do the same if you do not want to die!"

Krishna's tone will brook no refusal, and Bhima allows him to be hauled out of his flaming chariot, his eyes still crimson with rage, and sighing like some unimaginable serpent. As soon as he is pulled out of his chariot and made to lay down his weapons, the Narayanastra is pacified and grows cool. It drifts away in the sky, now a clear azure again, from above Kurukshetra.

All the directions and points of the firmament, cardinal and subsidiary, became clear. Sweet breezes begin to blow and the birds and animals are all calm again. The horses, elephants as well as all the warriors are enlivened once more, O ruler of men. Indeed, when the dreadful urjas of the Narayanastra is stilled, Bhima shines resplendent as the morning sun! With the passing of the threat from the Narayanastra, the remnant of the Pandava army once more stands ready to fight your sons.

Duryodhana says urgently to Aswatthaman, "Quick, use this astra again, for the Panchalas have taken up their weapons again and stand ready for battle!"

Aswatthaman sighs and says sadly, "The Narayanastra, O king, cannot be brought back and used again. If it is summoned again, it will have the life of the one that invokes it. Krishna knew the only way in which the Lord's own astra could be overcome, and he saved them all. But defeat and death are the same, Duryodhana. In fact, defeat is worse than death. Look at the enemy, vanquished and forced to lay down their weapons and prostrate before our Narayanastra. They are full of shame and even look as if they have lost their lives!" Duryodhana says, "Aswatthaman, if this weapon cannot be used twice, let these murderers of their Acharya be slain with other weapons! In you all the Devastras dwell, even as they do in the three-eyed Siva of immeasurable tejas. Even a raging Purandara cannot escape you."'

Dhritarashtra says, 'After Drona was killed with deceit and the Narayana weapon foiled, what does Drona's son, incited by Duryodhana, do, when he finds the Parthas ready for battle again and leading their troops at our army?'

Sanjaya says, 'Aswatthaman thinks of how his father was killed and rage fills him again. Casting aside all fear, flying the device of a lion's tail on his banner, he rides furiously at Dhrishtadyumna. Racing towards him, he pierces the Panchala prince with five and twenty small thunderbolts. Dhrishtadyumna retaliates with sixty-four searing shafts that rake Drona's son, strikes his charioteer with twenty golden-winged arrows whetted on stone, and his four horses with four long keen barbs that make them whinny in pain.

Repeatedly striking Aswatthaman with endless flights of arrows, and making the earth tremble with his thunderous shouts, a murderous Dhrishtadyumna appears intent on taking the lives of all the creatures of the world. Making death itself his only goal, the mighty son of Drupada, a great master of weapons and gifted with unerring aim, charges Drona's son pouring a deluge of arrows upon his head.

A roaring covers the angry Panchala prince with endless volleys. Always remembering the killing of his father, he pierces Drupada's son with lightning bolts and cuts down Dhrishtadyumna's standard and breaks his bow with two perfect shafts with razor heads. Never pausing his assault, he deprives his adversary of his horses, charioteer and chariot, and envelops all his followers with dense showers of sizzling shafts. Mauled by Aswatthaman, the Panchala troops, Rajan, flee.

Finding the troops turning away from battle and Dhrishtadyumna in dire trouble, Satyaki dashes at Aswatthaman and drills him first with eight straight, slender arrows and again stabs the roaring Brahman with twenty shafts of diverse kinds. Yuyudhana is a blur of fluid movement, as he then pierces Aswatthaman's sarathy with four barbs and his horses with another four. Without a moment's pause, displaying wonderful adroitness, he breaks Aswatthaman's bow and standard, and then shatters his gold-decked chariot, killing his horses as well in the same insant. Finally, he plunges thirty violent barbs into Aswatthaman's chest.

Beset by the resplendent Satyaki, bleeding profusely from his arrows, the mighty Aswatthaman founders, he does not know what to do. Seeing Drona's son in grave peril, Duryodhana, Kripa, Karna and others begin to cascade arrows over the radiant Satwata hero. They besiege Satyaki from every direction; Duryodhana pierces him with twenty stunning shafts, Acharya Kripa with three, Kritavarman with ten, Karna with fifty, Dusasana with a hundred and Vrishasena with seven. However, the marvellous Satyaki whirling around in his ratha, quickly demolishes the chariots of all these great heroes and they have to run from him on foot.

Meanwhile, Aswatthaman regains consciousness and, sighing repeatedly in pain and grief, thinks of what he should do. Mounting another chariot, he challenges Satyaki, shooting hundreds of arrows at the Satwata. Seeing him come to battle again, Satyaki, quick as a thought, destroys his ratha again and forces him to turn back. The Pandavas blow their conches with great force and give tremendous shouts. Having deprived Aswatthaman of his chariot, the invincible, scintillant Satyaki kills three thousand great maharathas of Vrishasena's akshauhini, slaughters fifteen thousand elephants of Kripa's division and fifty thousand horsemen of Sakuni's army.

Aswatthaman, riding another chariot and beside himself with rage at Satyaki, sets upon him, determined to kill him. Satyaki, nemesis of his enemies, instantly gores him with diverse kinds of arrows, fiercer than he had used earlier. Although deeply injured by these variegated shafts that Yuyudhana shoots, Aswatthaman still says, with his superior smile, to his enemy, "O grandson of Sini, I know your affection for Dhrishtadyumna, killer of his Acharya, but you will not be able to save him or yourself from me. I swear to you, Satyaki, by truth and by my tapasya, that I will know no peace until I kill all the Panchalas. You may unite the Pandava and Vrishni forces together and attack me, but I will still rid the world of the Somakas."

Saying this, the son of Drona shoots an astra with the effulgence of the sun at Satyaki, just as Indra in days of old cast his Vajra at the Asura Vritra. That astra flashes right through Yuyudhana's armour, passes through his body and dives into the earth like a hissing snake into its hole. Like an elephant deeply struck with a hook, the Satwata hero is bathed in the blood that gushes from his yawning wound. His bow, with an arrow fitted to its string, comes loose from his mighty grasp and he sits down weakly on the floor of his chariot, while the blood continues to flow copiously, covering his magnificent body. Quickly, his sarathy whisks him away from the deadly Aswatthaman.

Immediately, Aswatthaman turns and strikes Dhrishtadyumna right between his eyebrows with another perfect arrow. Already sorely wounded, the Panchala prince, senapati of Yudhishtira army is flung back against his flagstaff and clutches onto it to prevent himself from falling. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna in distress and danger, like a weakened elephant attacked by a great lion, five Pandava maharathas—Kiritin, Bhimasena, Brihadkshatra of the Puru vamsa, a youthful prince of the Chedis and Sudarshana, lord of the Malavas, rush to defend him.

In moments, they surround Aswatthaman and, advancing twenty paces, all of them strike him simultaneously with five and twenty arrows. Pivoting on his heels, Drona's son cuts all twenty-five blistering shafts down with five and twenty barbs of his own that are like virulent snakes; so swift is he that he appears to achieve this feat in the heart of a single instant. Aswatthaman then draws seven fonts of blood from the Paurava prince, three from the Malavas' chieftain, one from Partha, and six from Vrikodara, once more, it seems, at the same moment.

Now Rajan, those maharathas attack Drona's son, both united and separately, with storms of arrows whetted on stone and fletched with wings of gold. The youthful prince of the Chedis drills him with twenty barbs and Arjuna pierces him with three. Aswatthaman strikes Arjuna with six arrows, Krishna with six, Bhima with five, and each of the other two, the Malava and the Paurava, with two arrows. Then gouging Bhima's charioteer with six thunderbolts, Aswatthaman destroys Bhimasena's bow and standard with another two heavy, precise shafts of iron. Drona's stalwart son covers Arjuna once more with a dense and furious volley, and the Brahmana hero gives a deep and echoing shout.

Aswatthaman covers the earth, the sky, all the directions, cardinal and subsidiary, with his arrows so they are shrouded in darkness. Fierce is his tejas and his skill equal to Indra's; with three exact arrow he hacks off Sudarshana's arms like yupastambas and his head. He shatters the Paurava's chariot, then lops off his sandalwood seared arms and noble young head as well. Next moment, with a blaze of burning shafts he sends the mighty Chedi prince, dark as a blue lotus, to Yama, along with his charioteer and horses.

Seeing the Malava lord, the scion of Puru and the youthful prince of the Chedis killed in front of his eyes by Aswatthaman, rage blazes up in Bhima and he swathes Drona’s son with hundreds of serpentine narachas. But Aswatthaman destroys these showers of fiery shafts and strikes Bhima deep with his own thundering missiles. The dauntless Bhima rives Aswatthaman’s bow with a wedge-headed arrow and pierces him deep with a smoking iron barb, heavy as a mace.

Throwing away his broken bow, Aswatthaman takes up another and rakes Bhima again with countless shafts. Locking into a duel, the two scathe each other with gales of arrows, like two masses of rain-clouds. Gold-winged arrows, whetted on stone and engraved with Bhima’s name cover Drona’s son, and thousands of powerful shafts shot by Drona’s son enfold Bhima. Though wounded and bleeding profusely, it is wonderful that Bhima feels no pain, O Rajan!

Mahabaho Bhimasena looses ten shimmering gold-decked arrows up into the sky, from where they fall squarely on Aswatthaman, truly like streaks of lightning. Aswatthaman shuts his eyes and supports himself by gripping his flagstaff. He recovers his composure in a moment and, bathed in blood, musters all his valour and strength and races towards Bhimasena’s chariot. From his bow drawn to its fullest stretch, he unleashes a hundred electrifying arrows at the hulking Pandava. Bhima merely shakes these off and responds with another burning volley.

As the battle continues, Drona’s raging, magnificent son once more cleaves Bhimasena’s bow in his hands and then gores his chest with a clutch of vicious shafts. The imperturbable Vrikodara merely picks up another bow and gashes Aswatthaman deep with five smouldering shafts. Once more, shooting ceaselessly at each other the two red-eyed heroes completely swathe one another with their banks upon banks of formidable missiles. Attempting to frighten each other by roaring and slapping their armpits echoingly, they fight on and there is nothing to choose between them.

Bending his massive bow, chased with gold, Aswatthaman gazes steadily at Bhima who continues to inundate him with shafts of fire, and, shooting back at Bhima, Drona’s son looks like the meridian sun radiating his rays on an autumn day. So quicksilver is Aswatthaman’s archery that no one can distinguish when he pulls an arrow from his quiver, when he fixes it to his bowstring, when he draws back the string, and when he looses his shaft. His bow, Rajan, seems always to be drawn into a circle of fire. And the terrible golden shafts, in their hundreds of thousands course like a river through the sky, like a swarm of locusts at Bhima's chariot.

We then see, O Bhaarata, an extraordinary demonstration of Bhimasena's skill, his strength, energy and spirit, for he shrugs off the riptides of Aswatthaman's arrows as if they were no more than gentle rain falling on him. Bhima, awesome, dreadful Bhima lets loose a typhoon of arrows at Drona's son, even as his father Vayu does at sea. Bhima's prodigious golden-backed bow also appears drawn into a constant circle; it is as lustrous as another bow of Indra and, spewing forth arrows past counting, shrouds Aswatthaman, that jewel of the war, so no one can see him or his chariot anymore. So thick and dense are their volleys that the very wind finds it difficult to flow through them.

Aswatthaman looses countless golden arrows, their points slick with oil, at Bhima. Bhimasena truncates each one into three segments before they can reach him. Bhima, with a roar, covers Drona's son in fierce rash of shafts. Aswatthaman shatters these in flight, then breaks Bhima's bow and pierces him with burning volleys.

Bhima casts a spear like a gash of lightning at the Brahmana; he divides it along its length as it flies burning at him.

Vrikodara the terrible takes up another massive bow and covers Aswatthaman in fire; Aswatthaman strikes Bhima's sarathy through his brow with a lean shaft and the charioteers swoons, drops his reins and his panicked horses bolt before all the watching warriors. Seeing Bhima borne helplessly from the field, the undefeated Aswatthaman blows a deep and echoing blast on his huge conch and all the Panchalas abandon Dhrishtadyumna and flee. Drona's son, unleashing torrid gusts of arrows pursues the fleeing Panchalas and cuts them down as he likes. Screaming, dying in droves, they never look back but continue their flight, and now many of the Pandava warriors join them.

Seeing the Panchala force broken and running, as also his own men, Arjuna quickly takes the field against Aswatthaman. The troops rally behind Krishna and Arjuna and remain on the field. Supported by the Somakas and the Matsyas, Arjuna lays dreadful siege to the Kauravas and stops them in their tracks.

The two Krishna ride up to Aswatthaman, and Arjuna says to him, "Now show me your prowess, your knowledge of the astras and your manliness, as well as your love for the Dhartarashtras and your hatred for us. Show me your fortitude and determination. I say to you that I will quell your pride today. Come now and face this Dhananjaya, who burns like the Yuga fire and Rudra himself, with Krishna for his sarathy. You have shown us your hubris in battle, Aswatthaman, but I will quell your arrogance."

Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Sanjaya, Aswatthaman is noble, mighty and worthy of our respect. He loves Dhananjaya dearly and the noble Arjuna loves him in return. Partha has never addressed Drona's son in this way before. Why then did the son of Kunti speak so roughly to his friend?'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the death of the youthful prince of the Chedis, of Brihadkshatra of the Puru vamsa, and of Sudarshana, the lord of the Malavas, who were all great warriors, and watching the defeat of Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki and Bhima, Arjuna feels great sorrow. He is also touched to the quick by what Yudhishtira said to him. Most of all, all the wrongs of the past rise up in Arjuna in tide, and with it, suddenly, wrath the like of which he had never felt before. This was why he rounded on Aswatthaman, who is indeed worthy of our regard, and spoke in rage to him, like any lowborn man, in a crude, indecent, bitter, and harsh manner. Hearing those coarse and cruel words so unexpectedly from Arjuna, Aswatthaman is furious and especially with Krishna, whom he blames for influencing Arjuna and the Pandavas and for the death of his father.

Standing resolute in his chariot, Aswatthaman touches water and invokes the Agneyastra, which the very gods cannot resist. Aiming the weapon of the Fire god at Arjuna and indeed all his enemies, he breathes a mantra into the ayudha incandescent as smokeless fire and looses it at the Pandavas and their allies. It spumes up into the sky and, hanging there, erupts into thousands of flaming missiles that flare down crackling over Arjuna's chariot. Many of these fly at that ratha in uncanny trajectories, from every side. Meteors blaze down from the firmament and a thick gloom descends the Pandava host and envelops all the directions.

Rakshasas and Pisachas, thronging together, utter fierce cries. Inauspicious winds blow like simooms of the desert and the sun no longer exudes any warmth; a dreadful chill falls on Kurukshetra. Ravens caw raucously everywhere, and strange crimson clouds shower a rain of blood from the sky. Birds, beasts, kine and rishis with souls under perfect control, all grow distraught. The Panchamahabhutas, the very elements, appear to be in upheaval; the sun seems to spin like a top and the entire universe, scorched by the heat of the weapon of fire, to be in a fever.

Seared by the fiery energy of that astra, great elephants and other beasts of the world lose their wits in terror and dash about, panting and desperate for salvation from the weapon made of the flames that consume the world when the yuga ends. Seas, lakes, river, pools and tanks begin to steam and bubble, and the fish and other creatures living in them are scalded and perish in agony. From all the points of the sky, from the highest firmament and from the very bowels of earth, cataracts of fiery arrows erupt out of the ground, as if released with the force of Garuda or Vayu himself. Struck and burnt to cinders by these, the enemy warriors are made ashes like trees devoured by a raging conflagration.

The biggest elephants, leviathans, are incinerated by the Agneyastra and fall in great mounds of whispering ashes, while others of their kind thunder about everywhere in absolute panic, trumpeting in terror. Everywhere, thousands of horses and chariots burn like the tops of trees in a forest-fire. Indeed, O Bhaarata, it is as if the divine lord Agni has come down to burn the Pandava army, like the Samvarta fire consuming everything at the end of the Yuga.

Your soldiers, Rajan, are elated and give vent to loud shouts. Sensing victory, your troops blow thousands of conches and trumpets as they watch the Pandava army being devoured by the flames of the astra of fire. Darkness and smoke wrap the world and neither any part of the Pandava army nor Arjuna can be seen at all. The war has not yet seen the like of this weapon which Drona's son unleashes.

Then, Arjuna invokes the Brahmastra, which belongs to the Lotus-born Brahma himself and which can confound every other astra. Within a moment, all the darkness is dispelled, cool winds begin to blow, and all the directions of the sky become clear and bright; and now the wondrous and dreadful sight of a full akshauhini of the Pandava army having being turned to ashes becomes visible. Some of the dead men, chariots and beasts of war stand as pillars formed of ash, like the most delicate sculptures, while all the rest have been entirely consumed and lie in grey heaps or blow in the dry wind that sweeps Kurukshetra.

Emerged from the darkness, we see Krishna and Arjuna again, like the Sun and the Moon. And, Rajan, there is not a wound, not even the merest scratch of burn upon them from Aswatthaman's astra. The ratha, which strikes such terror into your warriors' hearts, shines resplendent on the field, its great banner with Hanuman flapping free in the wind, its gandharva horses white and shining like great lotuses, and with all the mighty astras in it untouched and still unsummoned by the invincible Dhananjaya.

Now the remnant of the Pandava host erupts in joyful sounds, with roars and laughter of great relief, with booming conches and drumrolls. Both hosts had thought that Krishna and Arjuna had perished, but finding them alive and shine forth again after the darkness has been dispelled, all the Pandavas are filled with absolute joy, and the Kauravas with wonder.

Unharmed and cheerful, the two heroes blow their wonderful conches, the Panchajanya and the Devadatta, and Kurukshetra trembles in delight at their melodious thunder. Your troops, however, are crestfallen, as is Aswatthaman who had also believed that he had slain the two Krishnas. For a moment, my lord, he reflects on what has happened and he is filled with dismay and lancing anxiety; he breathes long, hot sighs and is plunged into an abyss of dejection.

Aswatthaman flings aside his bow, alights from his chariot, cries in utter despair, "Shame, O shame! Everything is lost, everything is a lie, all is adharma!" and like one gone mad he runs away from the battle, waving his arms wildly.

On the way, he meets the impeccant Krishna Dwaipayana, Maharishi Vyasa dark as thunderheads, compiler of the Vedas, home of the Shastras, the abode of Saraswati. Seeing him standing in his path, Aswatthaman prostrates before him and, in a voice choked with grief and frustration, asks, "O Sire, Mahamuni, is this an illusion or a whim of the Agneyastra? I do not know how my astra proved ineffectual. What flaw was there in its invocation? Is this my fault, something supernatural, or have the two Krishnas achieved victory over Nature herself and Agni that they are still alive?

Ah, it seems that Kaala is irresistible. The Agneyastra that I unleashed at the Pandava army, the Asuras, Gandharvas, Pisachas, Rakshasas, Uragas, Yakshas, Pakshis and Manavas cannot ever hope to confound, the blazing ayudha which must devour all that stand before it, was doused after killing just one akshauhini of troops. Why did it not kill Kesava and Arjuna, both of whom are human? O Holy one, O Mahamuni, answer me truly and in detail."

Vyasa replies, “What you ask is grave and significant, so listen well to what I have to tell you. He who is called Narayana is older than the very oldest ones. To fulfil a great mission in the world, the Creator of the universe was once born as the son of Dharma. He undertook the most arduous tapasya, the atikatora, upon the Himavat mountan.

Imbued with infinite tejas, and like fire or the sun in splendour, he stood there with arms raised to the skies. His eyes like lotus-petals, he emaciated himself there for sixty-six thousand years, subsisting all the while only on air. When this was over, he resumed his tapasya, now of another king, and this time for twice as many years as the first. He filled the space between earth and heaven with his boundless energy. When, through those tapasyas, he became like Brahma himself, he then beheld the Master, the Origin, and the Guardian of the Universe, the Lord of all the gods, the Supreme Deity, who it is well nigh impossible to gaze upon, who is more minute than the most minute thing, and greater than the greatest; who is called Rudra, who is the Lord of all the Superior Ones, who is called Hara and Sambhu, who wears matted jata on his head, who is the infuser of life into every living being, who is the First Cause of all things, mobile and unmoving; who is irresistible and of frightful aspect, who is fierce in anger and the Final Great Soul, who is the All-destroyer, and whose heart is as vast, loving and merciful as all eternity; who wields the celestial bow, the Pinaka, and wears two inexhaustible quivers, who wears golden kavacha and whose energy is infinite; who holds a blazing Trisula, the battle axe, a mace and a huge sword; whose eyebrows are fair, whose locks are always matted, who wields the heavy cudgel, who has the Moon on his brow, who is clad in tiger-skin; who is decked with beautiful angadas, who has snakes for his sacred thread, and who is surrounded by diverse creatures of the universe and by numerous ghosts and spirits; who is the One, who is the abode of ascetic austerities, and who is adored by those of venerable age; who is Water, Heaven, Sky, Earth, Sun, Moon, Wind and Fire, and who is the measure of the duration of the universe.

Sinners can never obtain a sight of the Un-born One, the slayer of all haters of Brahmanas, the giver of Mukti. Only Brahmanas of dharma, when cleansed of all their sins and freed from the control of grief, see him with their mind’s eye. As a result of his two unequalled tapasyas, Narayana obtained a sight of the Unfading One, Siva the embodiment of dharma, the Adorable One, the Being whose Form is the universe. Seeing that Supreme Abode of all splendour, the God with a garland of akshas around his neck, Narayana Vasudeva, his soul gratified, was filled with rapture, and he sought to express it through words, with his heart, understanding and body. Narayana worshipped the Divine Lord Siva, the First Cause of the universe, the giver of boons, the Puissant One who is always at love with the fair-limbed Parvati, the Noblest Being surrounded by large bands of bhutas, pramathas, the Unborn Aja, the Supreme Lord, the Embodiment of the Unmanifest Brahman, the Essence of all causes, the One of unfading power and glory.

Having saluted Rudra, destroyer of the Asura Andhaka, the lotus-eyed Narayana, his heart full of love, began to praise the Three-eyed One: 'O Adorable one, O First of all the gods, Creator of the Prajapatis who are the regents of the world, who having entered the Earth, your first work, O Lord, protected it once, all, all have sprung from you.

The Devas, Asuras, Nagas, Rakshasas, Pisachas, Manavas, Pakshis, Gandharvas, Yakshas and all other creatures, along with the entire universe, we know, have all sprung from you.

Everything done to worship and propitiate Indra, Yama, Varuna, Kubera, the Pitris, Tvashtri and Soma, is really offered to you.

Form and light, sound and sky, wind and touch, taste and water, scent and earth, time, Brahma himself, the Vedas, the Brahmanas and all these moving beings have sprung from you.

Vapours rising from diverse bodies of water, become raindrops, which falling upon the earth, are separated from one another. When the time of the Mahapralaya, the Universal Dissolution comes, these individual water drops, separated from one another, once more unite together and make the Earth one vast expanse of water. Thus observing the origin and the destruction of all things, the learned man understands your Oneness.

You have created everything—the two birds Iswara and Jiva, four Aswatthas with their wordy branches the Vedas, the seven guardians, which are constituted by the five Panchamahabhutas, the elements, the heart, the understanding, and the ten senses that constitute the body. But you are separate from and independent of them.

The Past, the Future, and the Present, over each of which none can have any sway, are from you, as also the seven worlds and this universe. I am your devoted adorer, Lord, be kind to me. Do not injure me by causing evil thoughts to enter my heart.

You are the Soul of souls, incapable of being known. He who knows you as the Universal Seed, attains Brahman. Wishing to offer you reverence, I do praise you, endeavoring to ascertain your true nature,

O you whom the very gods cannot fathom, I worship you fervently, so grant me the boons I want that are difficult to acquire. Do not hide yourself in your maya.'

The blue-throated God of inconceivable Soul, the wielder of the Pinaka, the divine Lord forever praised by the Rishis, then gave boons to the deserving Narayana.

Mahadeva said, 'O Narayana, through my grace, you will be of immeasurable might and soul among Manushas, Devas and Gandharvas. Neither Devas, Asuras, great Uragas, Pisachas, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Manavas, Garudas, Nagas, nor any creature in the Universe will ever be able to withstand you. None among even the Devas will be able to vanquish you in war. Through my grace, no one will ever be able to cause you the least injury, not even with the Vajra or with any weapon that is wet or dry, or with anything mobile or unmoving. You will even be superior to me if you ever go to battle against me.'

This is how Narayana acquired boons in the past. Even that Narayana now walks the Earth as Krishna, beguiling the universe with his maya. From Narayana's tapasya a great Muni of the name of Nara was born, and he was equal to Narayana himself. Know that Arjuna is none other than that same Nara. These two Rishis, said to be older than the oldest gods, are born in every Yuga to serve the mysterious purposes and designs of the universe. You, too, O you of great heart, have been born as an amsa of Rudra, by virtue of all your punya of past lives and as a result of your stern and lofty tapasya, and you are endowed with Rudra's own energy and wrath. You were, in a former life, imbued with great wisdom and were equal to a Deva.

Thinking of the universe as consisting only of Mahadeva Siva, you once emaciated yourself through diverse vratas from a wish to gratify this God. Assuming the form of a very superior person who blazes fourth with splendour, you worshipped the Great God with mantras, with homa, and with offerings. Thus adored by you in your past life, Siva was gratified with you, and granted you many boons, everything that your heart wanted. Like Kesava's and Arjuna's, your punya karma and tapasya were also exalted and superior. Like them, in your worship, you have, in every Yuga, worshipped Mahadeva as Linga, his phallic form.

Krishna is that devoted worshipper of Rudra who has sprung from Rudra himself. Kesava always worships the Lord Siva, believing his sacred Linga to be the origin of the universe. That supreme knowledge, which allows him to see the identity of Brahman with the universe, as well as that other trikaalagyana by which he sees the Past, the Present and the Future, the near and the remote, as if all are before his divine eyes, dwell in dark Krishna. The Devas, the Siddhas and the great Rishis worship Krishna to acquire that highest object in the universe, which is Siva Mahadeva. Krishna is the creator of everything. The Eternal Krishna must be worshipped with sacrifices. The Lord Kesava always worships Siva as Linga as the origin of all creatures. The God, with the bull for his mark, cherishes greater regard for Krishna than for anyone else."

Having heard what Vyasa says, Aswatthaman bows to Rudra and now looks upon Krishna as worthy of the highest reverence. Having fetched his soul under complete control, he is filled with bliss, the marks of which communion with Brahman appear on his body. Bowing to the great Rishi, Aswatthaman turns back to the unhappy Kuru army and withdraws them from the field for the night. The Pandavas also, Rajan, follow.

Having fought for five days and caused immeasurable carnage, thus does great Drona, the Brahmana who knew the Veda in its entirety, leaves this world and attains to Brahmaloka!'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'After the killing of Atiratha Drona by Drupada's son Dhrishtadyumna, what do my sons and the Pandavas do?'

Sanjaya says, 'After the rout of the Kuru army and the death of Drona, Arjuna, who saw something wonderful during the great battle, asks his grandsire Vyasa, who arrives in Kurukshetra during his wanderings.

Arjuna says, "O Maharishi, while I loosed a river of arrows at the enemy, I always saw before me, always going before my chariot, a shining, resplendent being, one who had the effulgence of fire. Wherever he went with his spear raised, all the enemy warriors fell before him. While everyone thought that I vanquished the enemy, in truth they died at the hands of this mysterious being. I merely followed I his wake and only put down those that he had already destroyed.

Holy one, tell me who is this greatest one that I saw, armed with a spear, and shining like the Sun himself in tejas? He did not touch the earth with his feet, nor did he cast his spear even once. Yet, through his energy, thousands of spears, why, millions of spears issued out of the single one that he held."

Vyasa replies, “Arjuna, you have seen Sankara, the First Cause[1] from which the Prajapatis have sprung; you saw the omnipotent One of infinite tejas, He who is the embodiment of Swarga, Bhumi and Akasa, the Divine Lord, the protector of the universe, the great Master, the giver of boons, who is also called Isana. O Arjuna, seek the protection of this boon-giving Deity, the Lord of the universe. He is called Mahadeva, the Supreme Deity, of Supreme Soul, the One and only Lord, with matted jata, Siva the abode of auspiciousness. With three eyes and mighty arms, with his locks tied in the shape of a crown, and his body clad in skins, He is called Rudra.

This Lord of the universe, the Supreme God, is also called Hara and Sthanu. He is the Best of every being in the universe; He cannot be vanquished, He is the delighter of the akhanda and its Supreme Sovereign. He is the First Cause, the light and refuge of the universe, and ever victorious. He is the Soul and the Creator of the Brahmanda with the Brahmanda for his form, and He possesses eternal fame.

The Lord of the universe and its great Ruler, this powerful One, is also the master of all karma, of every deed. Also called Sambhu, He is Self-born; He is the Lord of all creatures and the Origin of the Past, the Future and the Present.

He is Yoga and the Lord of Yoga; He is called Sarva, and is the King of all the worlds. He is superior to everything. The best of everything in the universe, and the highest of all, He is also called Paramesthin.

The Ordainer of the three worlds, He is their sole refuge. Invincible, He is the protector of the universe, and the cause of birth, decay and death. The Soul of knowledge, incapable of being grasped by knowledge, and the highest of all knowledge, He is unknowable.

Through his grace, He gives his worshippers the blessings they desire. This Lord has for his companions celestial beings, Ganas, of various forms, some of whom are dwarfs, some have matted locks, some are bald, some have short necks, some protuberant bellies, some huge bodies, some long ears and some possess great strength. All of them, O Partha, have deformed faces and mouths and legs and wear strange attire. These Siva Ganas are his nearest, greatest followers and they worship this Supreme God called Mahadeva.

It is this same Siva, O son, who, through his kindness and love, rides in front of you. Partha, who other than the divine Maheswara, the greatest of all archers, can even in imagination venture to vanquish a host led by maharathas like Aswatthaman, Karna and Kripa? No one can face the warrior who has Maheswara going before him. There is no being in the three worlds that is equal to Rudra. The very scent of an enraged Mahadeva causes men in battle, to tremble and fall senseless and in their thousands. It is for this that the Devas in Swarga worship and bow to Him. The men in this world and these other men of pious conduct, that devoutly worship the boon-giving, divine and auspicious Siva, find happiness here and attain to the highest state in the hereafter.

O son of Kunti, bow down to Him who is peace, to Him who is called Rudra or Nilakanta, to Him who is the Subtlest and of great refulgence and is also Kapardin, the skull-bearer.

Bow down to him who is terrible, who has tawny eyes, who is boon-giving; bow to the Great Ordainer of red locks and righteous conduct; to Him who always performs and enables auspicious deeds; to Him who is the final object of desire; to Him who is called Sthanu; who is called Purusha; who has tawny hair; who is without fear, who is subtler than all that is sukshma and of absolute radiance; bow to Him who is Light and the giver of light; who is the embodiment of all sacred tirthas and waters; to He who is the God of gods, and who is also endued with great impetuosity.

Bow down to him who is of manifest form; who is called Sarva; who wears truly agreeable attire; who wears a wonderful crown, who is handsomeness itself; who has the mountains for his dwelling; who is Peace; who is the Protector; who wears valkala, tree bark; he whose arms are decked with ornaments of gold; who is Ugra, fierce, who is the Lord of all the directions; he who is the Lord of the clouds and of all created beings: He who is the Lord of all trees and of all kine, He whose body is shrouded by trees.

Bow down to him who is the celestial Senapati; who inspires all thought; who holds the yagna ladle in his hand; who is ablaze; who wields the great bow; who is Rama's very self; who has diverse forms; who is the Lord of the universe; who is attired in munja grass; who has a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, a thousand arms, and a thousand legs.

O son of Kunti, seek the protection of this boon-giving Lord of the universe, the Lord of Uma, the God with three eyes, the destroyer of Daksha's sacrifice, the Guardian of all created things, who is always blissful, the Protector of all beings, the God of unfading glory; the One with jata; the Mover of all superior beings, the One whose navel is like that of a bull and who has the bull for his symbol; the one who is proud like the bull, who is the Lord of bulls; who is represented by the horns of the bull; and who is the Bull of bulls: He who has the image of the bull on his banner.

Seek the protection of him who is liberal to all the righteous; who can be approached only through Yoga; and whose eyes are like those of a bull; who owns the highest weapons: who has Vishnu himself for his astra; who is the embodiment of dharma; who is called Maheswara; who is of infinite belly and body; who sits on a leopard's skin; who is the Lord of the worlds; who is devoted to Brahman and who loves Brahmanas; who is armed with a trident; who is boon-giving; who wields the sword and the shield and who is the Auspicious One, who wields the bow called Pinaka, who gave away his battle axe to Parasurama, and who is the Protector and Lord of the universe.

I place myself in the hands of this divine Lord, the grantor of protection, the God clad in deer-skins.

Salutations to this Lord of the celestials who has Vaisravana for his friend.

Salutations to Him of great vows; to Him who has the mightiest archers for his companions; to Him who himself wields the bow; to the God with whom the bow is a favourite weapon; who is himself the shaft shot by the bow; who is the bowstring and the bow; who is the Acharya of acharyas who teach the use of the bow.

Salutations to the God whose weapons are fierce and who is the greatest of all the gods.

Salutations to Him of diverse forms, to him who is surrounded by many bowmen.

Salutations to Him who is called Sthanu and who has an immense host of great archers for companions.

Salutations to Him who destroyed the triple city of Tripura.

Salutations to Him who slew the Asura Bhaga.

Salutations to Him who is the Lord of trees and of men.

Salutations to Him who is the Lord of the Devas, the Mothers, and of those tribes of spirits known as Ganas.

Salutations to Him who is the Lord of kine and of sacrifices.

Salutations to Him who is the Lord of the waters and the Lord of the gods, who broke Surya's teeth, who has three eyes, who is the grantor of boons; who is called Hara, who is blue-throated, and who is of golden dreadlocks.

I will now tell you, as best I know, all the divine deeds of Mahadeva of Supreme Wisdom. If Mahadeva becomes angry, neither the Devas, the Asuras, the Gandharvas or the Rakshasas, even if they hide themselves in the deepest oceans, can find peace.

In olden days, Brahma's son, the Prajapati Daksha undertook a great sacrifice and insulted Siva by not inviting him to attend, not offering him a share in the havis. Daksha's daughter, Rudra's wife Sati, killed herself at her father's yagna and Mahadeva destroyed the sacrifice in wrath. He was truly fearsome on that occasion and roared most horribly and shouted in anger so earth and sky shook. The Devas were terrified then. Indeed, at Mahadeva's fury, Yagna himself fled and the gods were beside themselves for fear at the twanging of Mahadeva's bow and the sound of his palms.

The Devas and Asuras fled all together. All the waters, great and small rose up in agitation and the Earth trembled. The mountains split, all the points of the sky wavered, and the Nagas were petrified. The universe was enveloped in a thick darkness and could no longer be seen. The splendour of all the stars and of the Sun grew dim. The Rishis, filled with fear, were distraught and, wanting to save themselves as well as all creatures, performed propitiatory rites, with Surya being given the principal oblation to eat. Smilingly, Sankara approached him and tore out his teeth.

The humbled gods then fled as one. Once more, Mahadeva aimed a shower of arrows like the flames of the pralaya at the Devas, astras like densely smoking fire, or clouds with lightning. Seeing the luciferous volley, all the Devas prostrated again to Maheswara, and to Him a substantial share in yagnas. In fright, the gods, O prince, sought Rudra's protection. His wrath having been dispelled, for He is easily pleased, the great God then restored the yagna. The gods that had fled came back, but to this day they are afraid of Maheswara.

Once, the great and valiant Asuras had three cities in the sky, the Tripura. Each of these was vast and wonderful. One was made of iron, another of silver, and the third of gold. The golden city belonged to Kamalaksha, the silver city to Tarakaksha, and the third, made of iron, to Vidyunmalin. With all his weapons, Indra Maghavat Indra could not breach or make any impression on those triad cities. Troubled by the Asuras, the Devas sought the protection of Rudra.

Approaching Siva, all the gods with Indra at their head, pleaded, ‘These terrible dwellers of the Tripura have blessings from Brahma. Filled with pride because of these boons, they are wreaking havoc upon the universe. O Devadeva, no one save you can stop them. O Mahadeva, slay these enemies of the Devas. O Rudra, creatures sacrificed in every yagna will then be yours.’

Thus implored by the gods, Siva was moved by the desire to help them. He agreed and said, ‘I will overthrow the Asuras.’

Then Hara made the two mountains Gandhamadana and Vindhya the two poles of his chariot; He made the Earth with her oceans and forests his ratha. The three-eyed Lord made Sesha, that prince of snakes, the aksha, of that chariot. That God of gods, the wielder of Pinaka, then made the Moon and the Sun his two chariot wheels, and the Lord made Elapatra and Pushpadanta, the two pins of its yoke. Mahadeva made the Malaya mountains the yoke, and the great Takshaka, the rope that bound the yoke to the poles, and the ganas about him the traces of the horses.

Maheswara made the four Vedas his four horses and made the Vedangas the bridle-bits. Mahadeva made Gayatri and Savitri the reins, Om the whip, and Brahma was the charioteer. Making the Mandara mountains his great bow, Vasuki the bowstring, Vishnu his awesome astra, Agni the arrow-head, and Vayu the two wings of that missile, Yama the feathers in its tail, lightning its whetting stone, and Meru his standard, Siva, riding on that magnificent chariot which was wrought from all the celestial forces, went forth to destroy the Tripura, the three sky cities of the Asuras.

O Partha, then Sthanu of incalculable prowess, worshipped by the Devas and by Rishis, He of untold tapodhana, formed an unrivalled vyuha named after Himself, and stood unmoving for a thousand years. Finally, when the three cities came together in the firmament, the Lord Mahadeva struck them through with his that awesome astra of three knots. The Danavas could not look at the shaft made of the Yuga-fire and composed of Vishnu and Soma.

When the Tripura began to burn, the Devi Parvati went there to see the sight. She had on her lap a child with a bald head with five clumps of hair on it. The Goddess asked the Devas who the child was. Sakra, through malice, tried to strike that child with his thunderbolt. The divine lord Mahadeva, for the child was none other than He, smilingly paralysed the arm of the enraged Indra. Sakra, with all the celestials, flew went to the Lord Brahma of unfading glory and, bowing their heads to him, they said to him with joined hands, ‘Some wonderful Being, O Brahma, lies on the lap of Parvati, in the form of a child. We saw but did not pay him reverence and he has vanquished us all. We ask you, Pitamaha, who the child may be, who, without fighting, has with the greatest ease vanquished us all with Purandara at our head.’

Hearing this, Brahma the greatest of all the Gods, knower of the Brahman, reflected for a moment and knew that boy of immeasurable energy was none other the divine Sambhu. He said to all the Devas with Indra at their head, ‘That child is the divine Hara, Lord of the mobile and unmoving universe. There is nothing superior to Maheswara. That Being of immeasurable splendour whom you all saw with Uma, the Divine Lord, had assumed the form of a child for Uma’s sake. Let us all go to him. That illustrious One is the Supreme Sovereign of the worlds. O Devas, you could not recognise the Master of the universe!’

All the Devas with the Grandsire went to that child, of the radiance of the morning Sun. Beholding Maheswara, and knowing that he is the Supreme Being, the Pitamaha Brahma worshipped him: ‘You are Sacrifice, O Lord, you are the stay and refuge of the universe. You are Bhava, you are Mahadeva, you are the abode of all things and you are the highest refuge. This whole universe, with its mobile and rooted beings is pervaded by you. O Holy One, O Lord of the past and the future, O Lord of the world, O Protector of the universe, show your mercy to Indra whom you have paralysed.’

Hearing these words of the Lotus-born Brahma, Maheswara was gratified; He laughed aloud, a wondrous sound so full of grace. The Devas then eulogised both Uma and Rudra and paid them great reverence. Indra’s arm was free again when The Greatest God Maheswara, the destroyer of Daksha’s sacrifice, the Divine Lord with the Bull for his emblem, grew benign towards Indra and his Devas.

He is Rudra, He is Siva, He is Agni, He is Sarva, and He has knowledge of everything. He is Indra, He is Vayu, He is the Aswin twins, and He is the lighting. He is Bhava, He is Parjanya, He is Mahadeva, He is sinless. He is the Moon, He is Isana, He is Surya, He is Varuna. He is Kala, he is Antaka, He is Mrityu, He is Yama.

He is the day, and He is the night. He is the fortnight, He is the month, He is the seasons. He is the morning and evening sandhyas, He is the year.

He is Dhatri, He is Vidhatri, He is the Soul of the universe, and He is the doer of all karma in the universe. Though bodiless, He is also the Great God embodied. Endowed with the Splendour beyond all splendour, He is worshipped and praised by all the gods. He is One, He is Many; He is a hundred, a thousand and beyond all count.

Brahmanas versed in the Vedas say that He has two forms, the terrible, Ugra, and the auspicious, Siva. These two forms, again, are multifarious. His auspicious forms are water, light, and the moon. Whatever is most recondite and mysterious in the several angas of the Vedas, in the Upanishads, in the Puranas, and in the Atmavidyas, the sciences that deal with the Soul, dwells the Lord Maheswara.

O Arjuna, Mahadeva is Aja, Un-born. All the attributes of this God not even I can begin to enumerate, not if I were to describe them with out pause for a thousand years. Even to those who are afflicted by all the evil planets, even to those who are stained with every sin, this great Protector grants salvation, if only they seek him, and He becomes pleased with them. He grants and takes away life, health, prosperity, wealth and all the diverse kinds of objects of desire.

The prosperity seen in Indra and other gods is his. He is ever engaged in the good and evil of men in this world. As a result of his supremacy, He can always have whatever He wishes for. He is called Maheswara and is the Lord of even the Supreme ones. In many forms, of many kinds, He pervades the universe. The mouth of that God is in the deepest ocean. It is well-known that, assuming the form of a mare's head, this mouth drinks the sacrificial libation in the form of water.

This Siva always dwells in smasanas, burning ghats. Men worship this Supreme Lord in that place where none but the courageous can go. Many are the blazing and terrible forms of this God that men speak of and worship in the world. Many also are the true names of this Deity in all the worlds. These names are based upon his supremacy, his omnipotence, and his divine and unequalled deeds. In the Vedas, the marvellous and sacred hymn called the Sata Rudriya has been sung in honour of this great God, the infinite Rudra.

This God is the Lord of all wishes that are human and heavenly. He is omnipotent, and He is the supreme master. Indeed, He pervades the infinite universe. The Brahmanas and the Munis describe him as the First-born of all creatures. He is the First of all the gods; from his mouth was born Vayu the wind.

Since he always protects the creatures of the universe and plays with them, and since he is the Lord of all creatures, he called Pasupati.

Since his Linga is always in the observance of the vow of Brahmacharya, and since He always gladdens the world, He is called Maheswara. The Rishis, the Devas, the Gandharvas and Apsaras ever worship his Lingam, which stand eternally upright. This worship pleases Maheswara and makes him joyful.

With regard to the past, the future, and the present, Siva has many forms, and for that he is known as Bahurupa. Possessing one eye, he blazes forth in effulgence; He is otherwise known to have infinite eyes on every part of his body.

Since He possesses the worlds He is called Sarva.

Since his form is like that of smoke He is called Dhurjjati.

Since the Viswedevas dwell in him, He is called Viswarupa.

Since three Goddesses, Heaven, Water and Earth adore and depend on the Lord of the universe, he is called Tryambaka.

Since he always increases all kinds of wealth and wishes the good of mankind in all their actions, He is called Siva, the Auspicious One.

He has a thousand eyes, ten thousand eyes, and they gaze in all directions. And because He protects this vast universe, He is called Mahadeva.

Since He is Great and Ancient and is the Source of life and of its continuance, and since his Lingam is everlasting, He is called Sthanu.

Since the rays of the Sun and the Moon that appear in the world are spoken of as the hair on the Three-eyed One, He is called Vyomakesa.

Since, from Kalpa to Kalpa, He destroys every Brahma, Indra, Varuna, Yama, Kubera, and the rest, He is called Hara.

Since, He is the Past, the Future and the Present, and everything in the universe, and since He is the Origin of the past, the future, and the present, He is for that reason called Bhava.

Kapi means Supreme, and Vrisha is said to mean righteousness. The illustrious God of gods, is hence called Vrishakapi.

Since Maheswara, with his two eyes shut in dhyana, created through sheer force of will a third eye on his forehead, He is called Trinetra.

Whatever sickness there is in the bodies of living creatures and whatever health is in them represent that God. He is the Wind, the vital airs called Prana, Apana and the others in the bodies of all creatures, including those that are diseased. Those who worship any image of the Sivalinga, always obtains great felicity.

He is fiery below his waist, and the upper half of his body that is cool and auspicious is Soma the Moon. So too, half his Soul is Agni and the other half Soma. His auspicious form, full of tejas, blazes more brightly that than the forms of all the gods together. Among men, his burning and dreadful form is called Agni. With his cool and auspicious form, He practises Brahmacharya.

With the other terrible form He is the Supreme Lord who devours everything. Since He burns, since he is fierce, since he is endued with great prowess and devours flesh, blood and marrow, he is called Rudra.

O Partha, this is the Deity called Mahadeva, armed with the Pinaka, whom you saw going before your chariot and killing your enemies. After you vowed to kill the king of the Sindhus, O sinless one, Krishna showed you this God, in your dream, sitting on the top of Kailasa, the holiest mountain. This illustrious God goes before you in battle. It is He who gave you the weapons with which you brought carnage to the Danavas.

O Arjuna, I have now told you of the Sata-Rudriya, contained in the Veda, which is the hymn that describes and praises the God of gods, and enumerates some of his endless names, each one a potent and holy mantra. This hymn of four divisions, with which every objective is achieved, is perfectly sacred, destroys all sins removes all stains and destroys all sorrows and all fears. Men that always listen to this Sata-Rudriya, Siva's hundred names, will vanquish all their enemies and be highly regarded in the land of Rudra.

The person who always attentively reads or listens to this auspicious account of how Siva went before Arjuna's chariot and annihilated his enemies, and devoutly worships that illustrious Lord of the universe, will obtain all the objects of his desire as a result of the Three-eyed God being pleased with him. Go and fight, O son of Kunti! Defeat is not for you, who have Krishna on your side for your advisor and protector."

O Bhaarata, having spoken thus to Arjuna, Maharishi Vyasa, the son of Parasara, vanishes and returns to his asrama from whence he had come.'

[1]This passage is based on Siva's sacred names, each a holy mantra, found in the Sata Raudriya and the Koti Rudra.

"Sanjaya says, 'Having fought savagely for five days, Rajan, the Brahmana Drona fell and ascended into blessed Brahmaloka.

The very benefits that accrue from a study of the Vedas arise from a study of this Drona Parva. The great feats of the most intrepid and majestic Kshatriyas have been described here. He who reads or listens to the recitation of this Parva every day is freed from the most heinous sins and the most atrocious crimes. Brahmanas will always obtain the fruits of yagnas from here. From this Parva, Kshatriyas will have victory in the fiercest battles. The other varnas, Vaisyas and Sudras, can acquire desirable sons and grandsons and all objects of desire!'"

A Brief Introduction

The last complete version of the Mahabharata to be written in India in English prose was the translation by Kisari Mohan Ganguli in the late 19th century. He wrote it between 1883 and 1896. To the best of my knowledge, it still remains the only full English prose rendering of the epic by any Indian.

More than a hundred years have passed since Ganguli achieved his monumental task. Despite its closeness to the original Sanskrit and its undeniable power, in more than a hundred years the language and style of the Ganguli translation have inevitably become archaic.

It seemed a shame that this most magnificent of epics, a national treasure, an indisputable classic of world literature, believed by many to be the greatest of all books ever written, is not available in complete form to the Indian (or any) reader in modern, literary and easily accessible English: as retold by Indian writers.

So we, a group of Indian writers and editors, warmly and patiently supported by our publisher Rupa Publications India, undertook a line-by-line retelling of the complete Mahabharata, for the contemporary and future reader. Our aim has not been to write a scholarly translation of the great epic, but an eminently readable one, without vitiating either the spirit or the poetry of the original, and without reducing its length.

This is not a translation from the Sanskrit but based almost entirely on the Ganguli text, and he himself did use more than one Sanskrit version for his work. However, as will be obvious, the style of this new rendering is very much our own, and our hope is to bring as much of the majesty and enchantment of this awesome epic to you as is possible in English.

Karna Parva

AUM! Having bowed down to Narayana, to the foremost of Purushas, Nara, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Vaisampayana said, "After Drona's death, O Rajan, Duryodhana leads the anxious maharathas of the Kaurava army to Aswatthaman. They lament Drona's loss and sit around the son of Sharadvata's daughter, listless and grieving. Comforted for a little while by readings from the scriptures, the royal warriors leave for their respective camps at nightfall. However, Karna, Suyodhana, Dusasana and Sakuni find no rest in their tents when they consider the immense slaughter. They pass a sleepless night in Duryodhana's tent, reflecting upon the sufferings they had inflicted upon the noble Pandavas.

Once they had dragged a distraught Draupadi after the game of dice into the Kuru sabha. Now, their hearts filled with anxiety, they bitterly regret what they did. Thinking of the grief they had caused the Pandavas after the game of dice, they spend the night, O Bhaarata, in sorrow as if it were a hundred years long. When morning finally comes, they mechanically perform the customary and obligatory rituals. This comforts them to some extent and soon they deploy their troops, and prepare themselves for battle.

They ordain Karna as their senapati. They tie the auspicious thread around his wrists, have many leading Brahmanas pray for their victory and give them gifts of vessels full of curd, ghee, akshata, gold coins, jewels, gemstones, costly garments and kine. They arrange for heralds, musicians and panegyrists to recite hymns of victory.

The Pandavas, too, Rajan, perform their morning ceremonies and issue from their camp, intent on battle. Soon, yet again, a bloody clash of arms begins between the Kurus and the Pandavas, each bent on annihilating the other, and this lasts full two days. Finally, after he had brought huge carnage to his enemies, Arjuna kills Karna before the Kauravas. Sanjaya returns to Hastinapura and relates all that had happened at Kurujangala to Dhritarashtra."

Janamejaya said, "The venerable Dhritarashtra, son of Ambika, was already grief-stricken at the fall of Bhishma, Drona and the other maharathas. O greatest of Brahmanas, how could he bear now to hear of the death of Karna who was Duryodhana's dearest friend and greatest source of strength? How did he receive the news of the death of the warrior on whom his own hopes of his sons' victory had rested?

Ah, when the blind king did not quit his life even after hearing of Karna's death, it must truly be difficult for men to die even under the most extreme grief! Indeed, Brahmana, it must have been agonising for the king, for he had also to bear the grief of the fall of Bhishma, of Bahlika, Drona, Somadatta and Bhurisrava, as well as of other friends, and his sons and grandsons.

Tell me all the details of the war as they actually happened. I am always eager to hear of the great achievements of my ancestors!"

Vaisampayana said, “After Karna is killed, O Rajan, Sanjaya, the unhappy son of Gavalgana, sets out that night for Nagapura, on horses fleet as the wind. In deep anxiety, he reaches Dhritarashtra’s palace in Hastinapura, now empty of kinsmen and friends. Finding the king dispirited, he greets and salutes him with joined hands and bent head, and with a sorrowful face, says, ‘I am Sanjaya, O lord of Earth! Are you not happy? I hope you are not stricken by the loss? Remember, you spurned the sage counsel of Vidura, Bhishma and Krishna. I trust you feel no regret now? Rama, Narada, Kanwa and others also offered you wise counsel in the sabha. I hope you feel no pain now, when you remember how you disregarded them? I hope you feel no hurt, when you think of the slaughter of Bhishma, Drona and so many others—friends who were always concerned about your welfare?’

Dhritarashtra draws a long hot breath, and replies, ‘When I heard, O Sanjaya, of the fall of Bhishma, the valiant son of Ganga, the warrior with all devastras, and the greatest archer alive, my heart felt great pain and anguish. That shura of great tejas, born of the Vasus themselves slew ten thousand enemy maharathas every day; Bhrigu’s son Parasurama had given him greatest astras, when the Bhargava taught him archery when he was a boy; alas, Yajnasena’s son Sikhandi cut that matchless Kshatriya down with the Pandavas.

My heart is full of anguish after I heard how Dhrishtadyumna vilely killed the heroic Drona, through whose grace all the royal sons of Kunti, as well as so many other lords of earth, became maharathas. After Bhishma, there was no other archer like Acharya Drona.

No, no one in the world could equal Bhishma and Drona in the knowledge and use of the four kinds of weapons. Alas, hearing of the death of these two, my heart is indeed agonised with grief.

What did my army do when they heard of the death of Drona, who had no equal in the three worlds in the knowledge of weaponry? After Arjuna despatched the mighty force of the Samsaptakas to Yama, after Krishna rendered Aswatthaman's Narayanastra harmless and Arjuna routed the Kaurava divisions, what did my army do? I feel sure that after Drona's death my troops ran away sunken in an ocean of grief, like mariners shipwrecked on the bosom of the vast and fathomless deep.

What, O Sanjaya, was the colour of the faces of Duryodhana, Karna, Kritavarman of the Bhojas, Salya of the Madras, and of my remaining sons, and of the others, when the Kuru divisions fled the field? Tell me about all this as it happened, O son of Gavalgana, and describe to me the skill the Pandavas and my warriors demonstrated!'

Sanjaya says, 'O sire, do not feel any pain when you hear all that has happened to the Kauravas through your wrongdoing. The wise never feels any pain at what fate brings. Since Destiny is unconquerable, one may or may not attain human purposes. Hence, he who is wise never feels regret or pain on the acquisition or the loss of the objects he desires and cherishes.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I do not feel great grief, O Sanjaya. I regard all this to be the result of Destiny. Tell me all that you wish!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Upon the fall of Acharya Drona, your sons are pale and dazed. Although armed, O Rajan, they hang down their heads in grief and stand silent without looking at one another. Seeing this, your already agitated troops vacantly gaze up into the sky as if for hope from on high. The weapons of many soldiers, dyed with blood, fall from their hands; though many still grasp their weapons, from their despondent stances, they resemble meteors fallen from the sky.

Duryodhana finds your army standing paralysed and listless and says to them, "I challenged the Pandavas and embarked on this war relying upon the might of your arms! Now, at the death of Drona, the prospect of victory appears bleak. In war, all warriors may die and meet with either victory or death. What then is strange in Drona's death? So, fight resolutely!

Look how the noble Karna ranges all over Kurukshetra and uses his devastras. That coward Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, always flees from him in fear, like a small deer at the sight of a lion!

Karna reduced the mighty Bhimasena, strong as ten thousand elephants, to a sorry plight without any divine help. He slew the terrible Ghatotkacha, master of devastras, mayavi of a thousand illusions, and gave a deafening shout of triumph. Today you will see the vast strength and energy of great Karna of unerring aim. Let the sons of Pandu today confront both Aswatthaman and Karna with prowess like that of Vishnu and Vasava!

All of you are singly capable of slaying the sons of Pandu and all their troops. How much more then will you be able to accomplish when you are united. Be not dejected. With your great prowess and mastery of weapons, you will prevail today!”

Your son Duryodhana and his brothers proclaim Karna the senapati of the Kuru army. Taking command, the shura Karna, so staunch in battle, gives vent to a simhanada, a reverberating lion’s roar, and leads the fight against the enemy. He causes a great carnage among the Srinjayas, the Panchalas, the Kekayas and the Videhas. From his bow issues a dense flight of arrows, like a swarm of bees with their wings brushing. After he decimates the energetic Panchala and Pandava forces and thousands of their warriors, Arjuna finally kills him!’” Vaisampayana said, “Hearing this, Rajan, Dhritarashtra experiences the uttermost fierceness of grief and thinks of Suyodhana as being already dead. In his agitation, he faints like an elephant that has swooned. At this, the women of the royal household begin to weep aloud and their wails seem to fill the whole world. Approaching the king, queen Gandhari and the other Bharata women also swoon. Sanjaya comforts these stricken women, who tremble like a plantain grove in a high wind.

Vidura sprinkles water over the blind king and comforts his brother whose vision is limited to only gyana. Slowly restored to consciousness, the king remains silent for some time even as one who has lost his reason; then, after drawing long breaths, he censures his own sons and lauds the Pandavas. He blames himself and Sakuni, son of Subala, and his mighty frame begins to tremble and shake. Finally controlling himself somewhat, the king once more questions his suta, Sanjaya.

‘I have listened to you, Sanjaya. Has my son Duryodhana already gone to Yama’s world, despairing of success? Tell me truly, Sanjaya, all the details even if you have to repeat them!’

Sanjaya replies, ‘The maharatha Karna, Rajan, along with his sons, brothers, and other mighty and loyal suta archers is dead. Bhimasena killed Dusasana and then drank his blood on the field in triumph!’” Vaisampayana said, “Hearing this, Ambika’s son Dhritarashtra, in great agitation, tells Sanjaya, ‘Through the evil rule of my imprudent son Vikartana’s son Karna has been killed. This news cuts into the very core of my heart. Oh, I want to cross this sea of grief. Remove my doubts and tell me quickly the names of those who are still alive and those who are dead among the Kurus and the Pandavas.’

Sanjaya says, ‘Rajan, on the tenth day of the war, they brought down Shantanu’s son, the invincible Bhishma, after he slaughtered untold numbers of Srinjayas and Panchalas.

The mighty Drona of the golden chariot is also dead, after he butchered the Panchala divisions.

Karna is slain after he slaughtered half of those who survived the carnage that Bhishma and the illustrious Drona had wreaked.

They have also killed the powerful Vivimsati, O Rajan, who decimated hundreds of Anarta warriors.

The two great and mighty princes of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda, achieved the most difficult exploits before going to Yama’s abode.

After consuming eleven akshauhinis with his missiles, Arjuna killed your son-in-law Jayadratha, tejasvin Kshatriya and the ruler of ten kingdoms. Arjuna also killed the fearless Ambashta king Srutayus, and Sudakshina, who led thousands of superb elephants, as well as the inviolable king Paurava and his forces.

Savyasachi annihilated the Abhishahas, those fiercest warriors, along with the Sibis, greatest of maharathas, and the Kalingas. He also sent the fierce, fanatical and indomitable Narayana Gopas of Gokula to Yama, and many thousands of Srenis and Samsaptakas. Your two brothers-in-law, the great warrior princes Vrishaka and Achala met with similar fates at the hands of Dhananjaya.

The belligerent Arjuna killed the virtuous king of the Kiratas, Bhagadatta, devoted to Kshatriya dharma and the respected and dear friend of Indra, along with his troops from the lowlands on the sea coast.

Partha also slew that lord of the earth Srutayus, who always had a deep-rooted antipathy for the Pandavas, and not before he reminded him of that hatred.

O sire, with the slaughter of his son Abhimanyu in mind and his own vow, a vengeful Dhananjaya slew Karna's son, the vital and accomplished Vrishasena, in the very sight of Karna. He slew Karna, Radha's son of the Suta varna, and his maharatha brothers, as well as the Kaikeyas, the Malavas, the Madrakas, the fierce Dravidas, the Yaudheyas, the Lalittyas, the Kshudrakas, the Usinaras, the Tundikeras, the Savitriputras, the Easterners, the Northerners, the Westerners and the Southerners.

Also despatched were armies of foot soldiers, thousands upon thousands of cavalry, teeming squadrons of rathas, and many great elephants. The tireless Partha massacred so many noble, richly attired, and armed Kshatriyas, all veteran warriors. Other shuras, immeasurably powerful and always eager to kill their enemies, met with a similar fate at the hands of Indra's son.

Subhadra's son Abhimanyu killed the indomitable and ever obedient son of Duryodhana and Dusasana's brave son after fierce battles. He despatched the ruler of the Kosalas to Yamaloka, as well as the mighty Jayatsena, the son of Jarasandha and the prince of the Magadhas, in brutal encounters. He also killed the intrepid younger brother of Salya of the Madras, a radiantly handsome warrior who fought with sword and shield.

Rajan, Satyaki extinguished your kinsman, Somadatta's son, the celebrated Bhurisrava in a duel.

Sahadeva killed Salya's intrepid son Rukmaratha, who was the son of his maternal uncle and thus his brother as well.

The old king Bhagiratha and Brihatkshatra, king of the Kaikeyas, both awesome warriors, are also dead.

Nakula, who darts about the field with the speed of a hawk, slew the strapping and most intelligent son of Bhagadatta.

Bhimasena, Rajan, killed your ferocious and invincible princes—Dusasana, master of weapons, and the brilliant Chitrasena. Seething with the memories of the many wrongs that Duryodhana inflicted upon him, and honouring his own vow, Vrikodara sorrowfully killed even your son of dharma, Vikarna, who fought like a true Kshatriya despite losing his chariot and weapons.

Bhima annihilated your grandsire, the powerful Bahlika, and all his troops. He beat your mighty sons Durmukha and Dussaha to death with his mace. He despatched, in a great duel, your counsellor, the energetic Vrishavarman of the Suta varna, as well as king Shalva, great maharatha and master of powerful astras.

Oghavat and Vrishanta, O Rajan, who fought the war savagely for your sake, have both gone to Yama's abode. So too has maharatha Kshemadhurti, whom Bhimasena crushed with his mace.

Durmarshana, Durvisaha and maharatha Durjaya, after performing the most difficult and astounding feats in battle, and the two daring brothers Kalinga and Vrishaka have been sent to Yama's halls.

The war saw the annihilation of the Vasatis, numbering two thousand, all great fighters, as well as of the adept Surasena warriors.

Satyaki accounted for the mighty king Jalasandha after that hero had caused an immense carnage.

Ghatotkacha killed Alayudha, the other prince of Rakshasas, who rode a chariot harnessed to monstrous asses.

Rajan, so far in the battle, we have lost these and thousands of other kings and their forces. This is my answer to the questions you asked. And the devastation that took place when Arjuna and Karna fought was even as when Mahendra killed Vritra, when Rama slew Ravana; even as when Krishna slew Naraka or Mura; as when the incomparable Parasurama of Bhrigu's vamsa killed the Kartavirya with all his kinsmen and friends, after fighting a bloody battle that is celebrated through the three worlds; even as when Skanda killed the Asura Mahisha, and Rudra slew the Asura Andhaka—even so has Arjuna, in single combat, killed that greatest of all bowmen Karna, with all his kinsmen.

Karna was indeed invincible in battle and upon him the Dhartarashtras placed their hopes of victory. He was also a major cause of the hostility with the Pandavas for what he said in the Kuru sabha during the game of dice and after.

Pandu's third son Arjuna has accomplished what always seemed impossible. He has killed Suryaputra Karna, who the god themselves dared not face in battle. Thus, even as your well-meaning friends warned you, the disaster they predicted and the great destruction have now come about. O Rajan, for the hollow sinful happiness of your covetous sons, you have heaped these evils on their heads and millions of Kshatriyas have perished. Dhritarashtra, the fruit of these evils is now manifest.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'You have, O son, mentioned the names of those of my allies whom the Pandavas have killed. Now tell me the names of those among the Pandavas whom my forces slew.'

Sanjaya says, 'Bhishma decimated the veteran Kuntis warriors, irrepressible and valorous in battle, along with all their kinsmen and advisers, as well as the Narayanas, the Balabhadras and thousands of other Kshatriyas, all devoted to the Pandavas' cause.

Rajan, six of our leading maharathas led by Dusasana's son were finally able to surround and murder that resplendent shura, Abhimanyu, who, though a boy in years, was still equal to Arjuna, Kesava or Baladeva in war. He was an extraordinarily gifted warrior, and brought a hardly credible slaughter to our forces. He lost his chariot, but that heroic son of Subhadra continued to fight until the end, true to his Kshatriya dharma. Because they could not subdue Arjuna, they murdered his son to break his heart. This was the most dastardly deed of the entire war.

The destroyer of the Patachchatras, the handsome son of Ambashta, leading a large force, fought heroically and caused a great slaughter of our army until he encountered Duryodhana's son Lakshmana, who despatched him to Yama's realm. Your grandson also accounted for Sikhandi's valiant son Kshatradeva.

Fighting with great skill, Dusasana slew the fierce maharatha Brihanta.

Drona killed Satyajit, who was well-nigh the equal of the diadem-decked Arjuna in tejas and power, and the Acharya killed so many other mighty and seasoned archers among the Panchalas, as well as the two majestic kings, Virata and Drupada. He killed the two indomitable kings Manimat and Dandadhara, who fought us with tigerish courage, and maharatha Ansumat, lord of the Bhojas at the head of his army. He also felled the brothers Rochamana, who were like two brilliant planets ranging the field.

Similar was the fate of the vigorous king of the Magadhas, slayer of hostile warriors armed with the most potent astras, and Vasudana too, who now sleep on the battlefield after causing great carnage—Drona despatched both to Yama.

Drona also sent Purujit and Kuntibhoja, the two uncles of Arjuna, Mitravarman the Panchala prince, Satyadhriti of the Matsyas, the great Madiraswa, the powerful Suryadatta, as well as the valorous Srenimat to the regions of the dead.

The Acharya also slew the two shuras Suchitra and Chitravarman, father and son and both mighty warriors, as well as that lord of earth Suketu, son of Sishupala, who had strewn the field of dharma with the corpses of so many of our Kshatriyas.

Drona fought like a god and the Brahmana decimated these and countless other maharathas.

Samudrasena snuffed life from Chitrasena, the ruler of the seacoast, and his son, O Bhaarata, while Aswatthaman did the same to Nila and Vyaghradatta, two other mighty rulers of seaside countries.

Vikarna raced across the field on his ratha with uncanny speed and great nimbleness and he beheaded Chitrayudha and Chitrayodhin, who were slaughtering our forces.

Kaikeya killed his own brother, the king of the Kaikeyas, who was equal to Vrikodara himself in battle and who led the Kaikeya legions.

Your son Durmukha killed Janamejaya of the hill country, gifted with prodigious strength and an expert mace warrior.

Many other great and able kings, who fought for the Pandavas, have all gone to Yama's abode after achieving impossible deeds. Vasudana's son shot dead Abhibhu of the Kasis, riding at the head of his numerous host.

Our Kshatriyas killed the most skilful Yudhamanyu, and the powerful Uttamaujas, who between them had destroyed thousands of our most valiant warriors.

Vardhakshemi, O Rajan, who was like the ocean at full tide, exhausted all his astras in battle, and finally found undisturbed peace.

Bahlika slew Senabindu, the foremost of Sutas, after he had wasted many enemies in battle.

Dhrishtaketu, O Rajan, the greatest maharatha among the Chedis, also, laid down his life after many a heroic deed on the field.

The daring veteran Satyadhriti, Virata's son Sankha and the mighty Uttara, after they had slaughtered our troops and accomplished the most noteworthy feats, have repaired to Yama's abode.

As you desired, I have now listed the Pandava maharathas that we killed on the field of Kurukshetra.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When all my great warriors, O Sanjaya, have perished, I have no hope that those who remain will survive. When Bhishma and Drona are dead, what use is life to me any longer? I cannot bear the death of Radha's son Karna, that ornament of battle, the might of whose arms was as great as that of ten thousand elephants. O best of Sutas, tell me now, who yet remain alive in my army. It seems to me that all those who are still alive must be as good as dead.'

Sanjaya says, 'O Rajan, the shura Aswatthaman, to whom his father Drona imparted many devastras of the four kinds, still stands on the field. The noble son of Drona, as great a master of weapons as his sire, stands ready to battle for you.

Kritavarman, of the Anarta country, the son of Hridika, the greatest of the Satwatas, the lord of the Bhojas, great maharatha, is still alive and ready for battle.

Artayana's intrepid son, the invincible Salya, perhaps the most formidable Kshatriya who still remains alive on your side, he who was forced to abandon his own sister's sons, to keep his solemn word, still contends manfully. He who promised Yudhishtira that he would dispirit Karna, who is Sakra's very equal, also straddles Kurukshetra yet.

Subala, king of the Gandharas, with his forces of Ajaneyas, Saindhavas, Kambojas, Vanayus, mountaineers and dwellers of riparian regions, remains on the field, still eager to fight for you.

With his massive and wondrous bow, Sharadvata's son Kripa Gautama, Acharya, mahabaho, who fights with a myriad of weapons in different astonishing ways, still stands on the battlefield yet eager for fight.

The son of the Kalinga king, riding a sizeable chariot drawn by large horses and flying a proud standard, is still on the field, O Kurudvaha, battling for your cause.

Your son, the Kurusrestha Purumitra, Rajan, rides his ratha with the effulgence of fire, and remains upon Kurukshetra like the sun shining brilliantly in a cloudless sky.

The vigorous Duryodhana, at the head of an elephant force and accompanied by many great warriors, stands on his golden chariot, always prepared to engage in war. In the midst of many kings, that great shura, with the majesty of a lotus, is resplendent in his beautiful armour, like a fire with little smoke or the sun freshly emerged from behind dark clouds.

So, too, do your sons Sushena, armed with splendid sword and shield, and the heroic Satyasena, fight on, along with Chitrasena, their hearts full of undimmed excitement.

Those modest but powerful Bharata princes, Chitrayudha, Srutavarman, Jaya, Dala, Satyavrata and Dussala live to fight the war.

The courageous ruler of the Kaitavyas, who fearlessly wheels across the field and slays his enemies at will, leads his foot-soldiers, cavalry, elephants and chariots, determined yet to win your cause.

The proud and great Srutayus, Srutayudha, Chitrangada and Chitravarman, who always strike so effectively, continue to fight.

The sons of Karna, the noble Satyasandha and his two brothers, experts in the use of the most powerful astras and so exceptionally adroit, both fight on for your sake, leading large and unassailable forces.

Accompanied by all these Kshatriyas and by many of his finest and intrepid fighters, O Rajan, Duryodhana yet stands tall on Kurukshetra, in the midst of his elephant division, like a second Indra, always confident of victory!'

Dhritarashtra says, 'You have named all the great warriors who are still alive, both in my army as well as the enemy's. From what you have said, I can plainly infer whom victory will favour.'

Having learnt that only a small portion of his army survives and that almost all his great warriors are dead, Dhritarashtra's hearts is convulsed with grief and he swoons again. When he returns somewhat to his senses, he tells Sanjaya, ‘Wait with me for a moment, O son! My heart is greatly disturbed after hearing of this calamity. I am stupefied and my limbs are paralysed!’

Saying this, Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, again falls down on the earth, in a dead faint.”

Janamejaya asked, "O Maharishi, what did the king say after he heard of the slaughter of Karna and his sons, and when he had been comforted a little? Poignant must have been his grief. Tell me everything."

Vaisampayana replied, "King Dhritarashtra absorbed the fact that great Karna, who was like the impossible clouding of the intellect of the wise Shukra, was dead. His loss was like the defeat of Indra by his enemies, or the fall of the resplendent Surya from the firmament, or the unbelievable drying up of the inexhaustible waters of the ocean. His death was like the destruction of the earth, the firmament and the waters, or like the futility of both dharma and adharma.

Dhritarashtra realised that his army was annihilated. He knew that very soon the other warriors as enduring as Karna would meet with a similar fate as the Sutaputra. He burned with grief, sighed like a snake, and with all his limbs almost palsied, he lamented weakly and aloud.

He says, 'O Sanjaya, the valiant son of Adhiratha was powerful like the lion or the elephant; he had a bull's thick neck, eyes, walk and bellow. With limbs as hard as the Vajra, that young man like a rampant rishabha never stepped back from a fight even if his opponent be Indra Deva himself! At the sound of his bowstring, slapping palms and at the hiss of his relentless torrent of arrows, men, horses, chariots and elephants fled before him. Duryodhana provoked hostilities with the mighty sons of Pandu relying upon Karna, the Mahabaho, the slayer of akshauhinis of enemies, that warrior of unfading glory. How did Partha kill Karna, the greatest of maharathas, that unconquerable Naravyaghra?

He always relied on the might of his own arms and astras and had scant regard for Kesava, Dhananjaya, the Vrishnis, and all other enemies. Often he used to boast to the avaricious, kingdom coveting, foolish and spoilt Duryodhana, "Alone, I will fell the two invincible Krishnas from their great chariot, the wielder of Saranga and the wielder of Gandiva!"

He conquered so many mighty enemies—the Gandharas, the Madrakas, the Matsyas, the Trigartas, the Tanganas, the Khasas, the Panchalas, the Videhas, the Kulindas, the Kasi-kosalas, the Suhmas, the Angas, the Nishadhas, the Pundras, the Kichakas, the Vatsas, the Kalingas, the Taralas, the Asmakas and the Rishikas. Subduing all these brave vamsas with his keen arrows fletched with kanka feathers, great Radheya made all of them pay tribute to us to enhance the honour and power of Duryodhana. Alas, how did the sons of Pandu manage to kill that Vrisha, the warrior son of Vikartana, that leader of armies, that unrivalled master of devastras?

Among horses, Ucchaisravas is the best; among Yakshas, Vaisravana is the leader; among the Devas, Indra is the lord; among warriors, Karna was the foremost. In the three worlds, there is no one to match any of these. Unvanquished by even the mightiest of kings, he subjugated the whole world for Duryodhana's aggrandisement.

Why, the ruler of Magadha, after he had honoured and conciliated Karna and made him a friend, challenged all the Kshatriyas of the world, other than the Kauravas and the Yadavas, to battle! Now, to hear that Savyasachi has killed Karna in single combat, I am plunged in an ocean of grief like a broken ship, and sinking without a raft in the fathomless deep.

O Sanjaya, my heart must be made of something harder than the Vajra of adamant since I am not dead from such anguish. Who else in this world, save my wretched self, would not yield up his life after the defeat and humiliation of my kinsmen, friends and allies? Ah, give me poison to drink or fire to burn myself with or push me off the summit of a mountain, for I cannot bear this intolerable burden of grief!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The world considers you the equal of Nahusha's son Yayati in appearance, birth, fame, asceticism and learning. Indeed, in erudition you are, O Rajan, like a most accomplished and successful Maharishi. Summon your courage. Do not yield to grief.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I believe that fate is supreme and all hard work fruitless since even Karna, who was like a sala tree, has met his end in battle. After he put Yudhishtira's army and hordes of Panchala chariot-warriors to the sword, after he scorched all the directions with his scathing volley of arrows and confounded the Parthas in battle like the Vajradhari confounding the Asuras, alas, the enemy killed that maharatha, like a tempest uprooting a mighty tree.

Like a drowning man unable to see the end of the ocean, I cannot see the end of my sorrows. My anxieties increased when I heard of Karna's death and Phalguna's victory and I no longer wish to live. Indeed, Sanjaya, the killing of Karna is hardly credible. This heart of mine must surely be made of adamant, since it did not burst into a thousand pieces when I heard of his death. Without doubt, before my birth the gods ordained an inordinately long life for me.

Fie, O Sanjaya, on this life that is devoid of friends and kinsmen. Brought today to this sorry plight, fool that I am, I will have to live miserably, pitied by all. Once the whole world feted me, how can I now live, after my enemies have brought me down? I have gone from pain to greater sorrow and misfortune because of the deaths of Bhishma, Drona and now the noble Karna.

Sanjaya, now that they have killed Karna, I do not think that anyone from my army will escape alive. He was the great raft for my sons to cross the sea of this war. And that shura, after he ravaged his enemies, is now dead. Of what use is life to me without that Nararishabha? The son of Adhiratha struck down by arrows fell from his chariot like a mountain-peak split by a thunderbolt! Bathed in blood, he lies adorning the earth, like an elephant killed by another infuriated prince of tuskers. Alas, Arjuna has killed that pride of all archers, Karna, he who was the strength of the Dhartarashtras and a source of utmost fear to the sons of Pandu. He was an unequalled warrior, a mighty, mighty archer, the dispeller of my sons' fears, and alas, now he lies on the earth, lifeless, like a mountain struck down by Indra.

Now, the fulfilment of Duryodhana's wishes is as travel is to one who is lame, or the gratification of the poor man's desires, or stray drops of water to one who is thirsty. We plan in a certain way but all our most careful schemes end so differently from what we thought. Alas, destiny is all powerful and we cannot go against time.

Was my son Dusasana killed while running away from the battle, humiliated, unhappy in spirit and bereft of his manliness? Sanjaya, I hope that he did no cowardly deed? Did he not meet with his death like the other Kshatriyas who have fallen?

The foolish Duryodhana did not accept Yudhishtira's constant sage advice against the impropriety of war. When Bhishma begged for a drink as he lay on his deathbed of arrows, the illustrious Partha pierced the surface of the earth and created a jet of water. Bhishma then told Duryodhana, "Make peace with the Pandavas. When these hostilities cease, true peace will be yours. Let the war between you and your cousins end with me. Enjoy the earth in brotherliness with the sons of Pandu."

My son must certainly repent today, for what the wise Devavrata predicted then has now come to pass.

Sanjaya, now I have no counsellors and sons and am miserable like a bird that has lost its wings. Often children at play capture a bird and cut off its wings and merrily release it. But the bird can no longer fly. I too have become like a bird shorn of its wings. Weak, without any resources, without kinsmen and friends, unhappy and overpowered by enemies, which way shall I turn? Karna who vanquished all the Kambojas, the Ambashthas, the Kaikeyas, the Gandharas and the Videhas and subjugated the whole earth for the glory of Duryodhana—alas, the powerful Pandavas have killed him.

When Kiritin slew Karna, tell me, Sanjaya, which warriors remained with him on the field? I hope he did not die alone, abandoned by his friends? With powerful arrows, Sikhandi felled Pitamaha Bhishma, who did nothing to defend himself against the attack of that androgynous prince. Drupada's son Dhrishtadyumna slew the mighty Drona, who had laid aside his weapons and sat immersed in dhyana. I have heard that both Bhishma and Drona were killed mainly through deceit.

Truly, Indra himself could not have slain Bhishma and Drona in a fair fight. So, too, how could Death touch that shura Karna, surely equal to Indra himself, while he still had his many devastras? Purandara had given Karna the inexorable shakti of the splendour of lightning in exchange for the Sutaputra's kundalas; in his quiver, amid sandalwood dust, nestled that serpent-mouthed devastra, fitted with goodly wings, that ayudha that could destroy any enemy. From Jamadagni's son Parasurama, Karna had acquired the dread Brahmastra to fend off all the enemy maharathas led by Bhishma and Drona. Remember, he saved Drona and his warriors from Subhadra's son Abhimanyu and, in a trice, shattered the chariot of the invincible Bhimasena of the strength of ten thousand elephants and the speed of the wind, and then laughed at Bhima.

Karna vanquished Sahadeva as well and destroyed his ratha but did not kill him out of compassion and for the word he gave Kunti. He used Shakra's astra and slew Ghatotkacha, who fought with a thousand different sorceries. In fact, his prowess filled Dhananjaya with so much fear that for a long time he avoided facing him in a duel. Alas, how could they kill that Karna, that greatest Kshatriya of all?

How could his enemies best him unless either his ratha was destroyed, his bow riven and his astras exhausted? Who could vanquish that tiger among men, ah, the impetuous Karna, who brandished his formidable bow and unleased tides of arrows at his enemies? Surely, his bow must have broken, or his ratha must have sunk into the ground, or his astras were exhausted, since you tell me that the great Karna is dead. I do not see how else he could have been slain.

That noblest warrior who swore the grave oath, "I will not wash my feet until I kill Arjuna", he from fear of whom that bull among men, Dharmarajan Yudhishtira, had no sleep in the wilderness every night of thirteen years, that matchless maharatha of unearthly prowess—how did he meet his end?

My son forcibly dragged Panchali, the wife of the Pandavas, into our court, relying upon Karna's valour, and there in the midst of that conclave, in the very sight of the Pandavas and in the presence of the Kurus, called the princess of Panchala the wife of slaves. Karna, shura of the Suta varna, said to Draupadi, "O exquisite dark one, all your husbands are now like sesame seeds without kernels; they are men no more, so seek some other husband for yourself!" He said more in the heat of rage and pride; he forced her to listen to other taunts and vile abuse. How was that choleric, wild and bravest hero slain by the enemy?

He said to Duryodhana, "If Bhishma, who boasts of his prowess in war, or Drona, who is insuperable in a fight, do not kill the sons of Kunti out of their affection and favour, I will kill them all for you, my friend. Let the fever of your heart be dispelled!"

He also assured us, "What will Arjuna's Gandiva and his two inexhaustible quivers do to my astra, smeared with cool sandalwood paste, when it courses flaming through the sky?"

Alas, how did Arjuna kill that warrior with shoulders as broad as a bull's?

Sanjaya, he brushed off the fierce touch of the arrows shot from the Gandiva; and, yes, he said to Panchali, "You have no husbands now" and glared at the Pandavas. He was so confident of his own prowess that he had no fear of them or of even of Janardana. When I thought that he could not meet with death even at the hands of the very Devas led by Vasava, attacking him in fury, what then need I say of the Pandavas?

No one could face the son of Adhiratha when he put on his gauntlets and strummed his bowstring. I could believe that the earth could be without the splendour of the sun, the moon, or of fire, but not that Karna, greatest of all warriors, is slain. My foolish and evil-minded son decided to flaunt Krishna's sage advice to make peace with the Pandavas only because Duryodhana relied on Karna and his brother Dusasana to win the war for him. He surely will lament now, seeing how both the bull-shouldered Karna and Dusasana have died.

What did Duryodhana say when he saw Savyasachi and the Pandavas victorious and Vikartana's son killed? That son of mine must surely rue the slaying of Durmarshana and Vrishasena and the headlong flight of his kings, maharathas and all his forces from the field.

With his army dispirited, what did the unruly, proud and foolish Duryodhana, whose passions are always his master, say? Though his friends dissuaded him, he provoked such a horrific carnage as this age has not seen and suffered such an untold loss of his friends, followers and kinsmen in the war. Therefore, what did Duryodhana say?

What did Duryodhana say when he watched Bhimasena kill his brother and then drink his blood? My son, with the ruler of the Gandharvas, once proclaimed, "Karna will kill Arjuna in battle!"

What did Sakuni, the son of Subala, who was ecstatic after he cheated the son of Pandu at the game of dice, say when he saw Karna slain?

What did that mighty maharatha among the Satwatas, that great archer Kritavarman, the son of Hridika, say when he saw Vaikartana slain?

Sanjaya, what did the youthful Aswatthaman, Drona's handsome, intelligent and celebrated son, to whom Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas who wish to acquire the science of weaponry look for instruction, say when he saw Karna slain?

What did Sharadvata's son Kripa of Gautama's race, that best of maharathikas, that Acharya of the astra shastra, say when he saw Karna slain?

What did that king of the Madras, the mighty leader of the Madra warriors, maharatha Salya of the Sauvira vamsa, that ornament of gatherings of noble men and the greatest among warriors say when he saw Karna killed?

What did all the other Kshatriyas, those invincible lords of earth that came to fight, say when they saw Vaikartana slain?

After the fall of the shura Drona, that tiger among maharathas, bull among men, who now led our army of many akshauhinis? Tell me, Sanjaya, how they prevailed upon the great and proud Salya, king of the Madras, to become Karna's sarathy. Who guarded his right wheel, who his left wheel, and who protected his rear in battle? Who were the Kshatriyas who did not desert Karna, and who were those mean-spirited warriors that fled? How, in the midst of all our troops, was maharatha Karna killed? How did the Pandavas assail him with their torrents of arrows?

O Suta, tell me also how his mighty devastra, with the serpentine head, was rendered impotent. Ah, for certain I see no way by which even a small part of my now dwindled and miserable army can be saved when its greatest leaders have fallen.

When I have heard of the downfall of Bhishma and Drona, who were always ready to lay down their lives for my sake, what use have I now in living? Yet, I still cannot fathom how the Pandavas could kill Karna, the might of whose arms equalled that of ten thousand elephants.

Now, tell me, Sanjaya, all that transpired after the death of Maharatha Drona between the Kaurava warriors and their enemies. Tell me, also, how the sons of Kunti fought the battle with Karna, and how that parantapa found his end!'"

"Sanjaya says, 'O Rajan, after the fall of Drona, the vast army of the Kauravas flees but his son, maharatha Aswatthaman, holds firm. Partha, too, marshals his own troops and remains on the battlefield with his brothers. Seeing his own army running away, your son Duryodhana rallies them with great courage and fortitude and, relying just on his own might, fights the triumphal Pandavas for a long time.

When twilight comes, he orders his troops to disengage and to withdraw to their own encampment. There the Kauravas sit like the Devas on luxurious couches overlaid with rich coverlets and on deeply cushioned chairs and ample beds, and hold consultation about the future.

Duryodhana asks his greatest and closest commanders, "Give me your advice without delay! Under these circumstances, what do you think is essential and what is most urgent for us to do?"

In reply, those Naravyaghras, seated on their thrones, all declare without hesitation their wish to fight on. Observing their eagerness to pour their lives out as libations into the battle-fire, and seeing the king's face radiant as the morning sun at this, the Acharya's most intelligent son, Aswatthaman, says, "Enthusiasm, opportunity, skill and strategy—these are the means by which the learned declare that any end can be achieved. However, we have to rely on destiny. Those towering warriors that fought on our side, maharathas equal to the Devas, possessed strategy, devotion, and were accomplished and loyal. They all met with death. Yet we should not despair. If all these methods are properly applied, we can yet make even destiny favour us.

O Bhaarata, all of us should make Karna, endued with every accomplishment, our senapati! He is powerful; he is a conqueror, accomplished in weaponry and unassailable in battle. Irresistible as Yama himself, if we make Karna our senapati, we can surely vanquish our enemies in battle!"

Aswatthaman's words fill Duryodhana with joy and he immediately consigns his hopes and expectations upon Karna: that he would be the one to vanquish the Pandavas after the fall of Bhishma and Drona. Comforted again, he grows calm, his confidence quickly renewed, and says affectionately and respectfully to Karna, "I know your true ability and the great love you bear me! For all that, Mahabaho, let me share with you some of my concerns so that you can do what you think is needed, gifted as you are with great insight.

My two great generals, the Atirathas Bhishma and Drona, have both fallen. Now you be my senapati, for you are mightier than them! Both those great ones were advanced in years and were, besides, partial to Arjuna and the Pandavas. Yet, I respected them depending on your final assurance. Bhishma considered the sons of Pandu as his grandchildren and spared them for ten successive days. When you had laid aside your weapons, Phalguna used Sikhandi as a shield and felled the valiant Bhishma in a great duel.

After that indomitable warrior took to his bed of arrows, it was on your advice, O Naravyaghra, that we made Drona our senapati. He, too, spared the sons of Pritha because he was their Acharya. And Dhrishtadyumna killed that venerable Brahmana, his own master, in the most vile and horrible manner.

I do not see another warrior equal to you; not even those great men who have been killed in the war. I have no doubt that only you are capable of securing us victory! In the past, today, and tomorrow, too, you have only my welfare at heart. So, like the true leader you are, it is appropriate that you bear this burden. Take charge now as our senapati, and like the Devasenapati, Lord Skanda of unfading prowess, lead this Dhartarashtra host!

Like Mahendra slaying the Danavas, destroy the enemy forces. Seeing you fight, the Pandavas and the Panchalas will turn tail like the Danavas at the sight of Vishnu. Lead this vast host! When you stand ready on the battlefield, the vile Pandavas, the Panchalas and the Srinjayas will all flee with their allies. You will consume our enemies as the midday sun might any darkness!"

Your son, Rajan, still entertains hope in his heart that although Bhishma and Drona had failed, Karna will vanquish the Pandavas. He says, "O Sutaputra, Partha is afraid to fight you!"

Karna says, "I have, O son of Gandhari, said before in your presence, 'I will vanquish all the Pandavas with their sons and Janardana too!'

Calm yourself, O Rajan, I am willing to become your senapati. And I regard the Pandavas as already defeated!"

Duryodhana and all the other kings rise to honour Karna with command of the army, as the Devas once did for Skanda. They seat him at ease on a throne made of udumbara wood and overlaid with silken cloth, and invest him with the command according to the prescribed rites. They use golden and earthen jars filled to the brim with holy water sanctified with mantras, and ivory tusks and rhinoceros and bovid horns, use other vessels encrusted with jewels and gems, and fragrant herbs and plants and other auspicious things. He is bathed upon his throne, after which the Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and goodly Sudras eulogize him.

After the ceremony, Karna gifts niskas, kine and other riches to many leading Brahmanas to have their blessings. The panegyrists and the Brahmanas bless him, saying, "Vanquish the Parthas and Govinda with all their followers. O Radheya, slay the Parthas and the Panchalas, as the rising sun destroys darkness with his fierce rays! They will not be able to withstand you in battle, even as the Danavas failed before Indra. Arjuna and Kesava will not be able to even look at your astras, like owls unable to gaze at the rays of the sun."

Karna, installed as senapati, is truly radiant like a second Surya. Standing amongst your sons, he looks magnificent like Skanda surrounded by the Devas in the war with Taraka. Urged on by Death, your prince Duryodhana now regards himself as having already accomplished his purpose and achieved victory.

Karna orders the troops to be deployed at dawn.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'After the events which lead to Karna assuming command of the army and which culminate with his orders to the troops to be ready at the hour of sunrise, tell me, O Sanjaya, what does the Sutaputra do the next morning?'

Sanjaya says, 'As commanded by Karna, your sons, Bharatarishabha, order the troops to be woken with joyful music. Well before dawn, a loud clamour of "Fall in! Take up your positions!" arises among your troops. The sound of elephants and war chariots being readied, of foot-soldiers putting on their armour and of the warriors shouting to one another, is tremendous and reaches into the very heavens. Then Karna arrives in his chariot drawn by chargers of the hue of cranes, splendid like the irradiant sun, flying a white standard with the device of an elephants' girth rope and festooned with pennants tied with many bows, a hundred quivers, gadas, shataghnis, rows of bells, darts, lances and spears, and blowing his conch! He holds aloft his gold inlaid bow. When they see that resplendent, awe-inspiring golden maharatha, no one among the Kauravas, O sire, anymore grieves the loss of Bhishma or Drona or any other warrior.

Hurrying his warriors with blasts of his conch, Karna arrays the still vast army of the Kauravas in the makara vyuha, and leads them against the Pandavas. He stations himself at the tip of the snout of the crocodile. Its two eyes are the bold Sakuni and the mighty Uluka. At its head is Aswatthaman and its neck is created by Duryodhana's remaining brothers.

At the heart of the beast of war is Duryodhana supported by a large force. Kritavarman at the head of the invincible Narayana warriors, the Gopalas, forms its left foreleg. Gautama's indomitable son Kripa, surrounded by the mighty Trigartas who still live, and by the Dravidas forms the bent, clawed, right foreleg. Salya, with a large force raised in the country of the Madras, forms the left hind leg of the reptile. The upright Sushena at the head of a thousand chariots and three hundred elephants forms the right hind leg. The two royal brothers of brilliant tejas, Chitra and Chitrasena, with another large force, make up the thick, long and tapering tail of the makara.

Seeing great Karna come forth to give battle, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, says, "Look, O Arjuna, how Karna arrays the Dhartarashtra army for war, protected by Kshatriyas and maharathas. They have lost their greatest warriors and those that remain, mahabaho, are like straw. Only one great archer remains, the Sutaputra. He is indestructible. None in the three worlds with their mobile and immobile beings, not the Devas, Asuras and Gandharvas, and the Kinnaras and Nagas can vanquish him. If you kill Karna today, victory will be ours, Phalguna. Pluck out this thorn that has been planted in my heart for twelve years, my brother. Choose the vyuha that you wish to deploy." Arjuna chooses to deploy the Pandava forces in the chandrakala vyuha of the half moon. On the left wing is Bhimasena and on the right Dhrishtadyumna. Arjuna sets himself in the middle with Yudhishtira. Nakula and Sahadeva are behind them and the two Panchala princes, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, protect Arjuna's chariot wheels; they do not leave him for a moment. The remaining valourous commanders, their armour shining in the dawn light, stand in the positions assigned to them in the array, according to the measure of their vigour and resolution. O Bhaarata, the Pandavas and the mighty bowmen in their great vyuha, are soon ready for battle.

Looking at your army arrayed in Karna's makara vyuha, Duryodhana and all his brothers regard the Pandavas as already conquered. And Yudhishtira is equally convinced that the Pandavas' vyuha will overwhelm Karna and the Dhartarashtras. Both armies loudly blow conches and beat kettle-drums, tabors, cymbals, dindimas and jharjharas. Ferocious warriors let out loud exultant roars and shouts which can be heard over the noise of neighing horses and trumpeting elephants and the fierce clatter of chariot-wheels. O Bhaarata, in the Kaurava army, seeing magnificent Karna at the head of their vyuha, no man even thinks of the loss of Drona anymore.

Both armies teem with joyous men, eager for battle and eager to decimate each other without delay. The two shuras, Karna and Yudhishtira, wound up with wrath at sight of each other, ride through their divisions, each resolved to triumph. The two armies, as they advance to meet each other, seem to prance with enthusiasm. From the wings, warriors seeking individual combat, issue in bursts. Then, conches resound and the general battle commences, O Rajan, between warriors, elephants, cavalry and chariots, all bent on either killing or dying in the attempt.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The two vast armies, bursting with exultant warriors, horses and elephants, splendid like the Deva and the Asura armies, clash in thunder and begin to hack and mow down each other. Leonine warriors strike off the heads of other combatants—with crescent-tipped and broad-headed shafts, razor-faced arrows, axes, and curved and straight swords. Each noble head strewn on the field is lustrous like the full moon or the sun and fragrant like the lotus. The lopped off, long and massive arms, holding weapons and wearing bracelets, shine as they fall upon the earth and writhe, the arms with their red palms and fingers looking as if the ground is strewn with fierce five-headed snakes killed by Garuda.

Struck down by their enemies, brave men plunge down from elephant back, chariots and horses, like the inhabitants of heaven falling from their celestial vimanas upon the exhaustion of their punya. They massacre each other in their hundreds with heavy gadas, spiked clubs and short bludgeons; their hands, feet, weapons and rathas are all desiccated. In the turbulent melee, chariots, elephants, horsemen and foot-soldiers all cause bloody carnage.

As the battle spreads and swells savagely, terrible Vrikodara leads the Parthas against us. That force consists of Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, the five sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas, Satyaki and Chekitana with the Dravida men, the Pandyas, the Cholas, and the Keralas at the head of a mighty army. They are all exceptionally tall warriors with broad chests, long arms and large eyes. Their battledresses of diverse colours, they use powdered scents, wear ornaments, have red teeth, and are as strong as infuriated elephants. Armed with swords and nooses, they are powerful enough to restrain mighty elephants, never desert each other, are bound companions in life and death, carry bows and quivers of wondrous craft, and are pleasing in their speech. Satyaki leads the foot-soldiers to the Andhra tribe who have mighty physiques and terrific energy.

Other dauntless warriors such as the Chedis, the Panchalas, the Kaikeyas, the Karushas, the Kosalas, the Kanchis, and the Magadhas, also rush forward. Their chariots, cavalry and elephants, all of the best kind, and their brutal foot soldiers, all keened by the notes of diverse instruments, seem to dance and laugh as they plunge wildly ahead. In the midst of that vast force comes Vrikodara, titanic Bhima, riding on the neck of an elephant and surrounded by many other great elephant-warriors. His immense elephant is resplendent, like a stone-built mansion on the summit of the Udaya mountain crowned by the rising sun. Its wonderful armour of iron, studded with costly gemstones, is as glorious as the autum sky alight with stars. With a lance in his outstretched arm, a beautiful crown on his brow, and splendid as the meridian sun in autumn, Bhima begins to raze his enemies at his great and gory pleasure.

Kshemadhurti, the king of the Kulutas, riding an elephant himself, eagerly challenges a most willing Bhima. The encounter is like two hills topped with trees, fighting with utmost atavism. They strike each other with their spears brilliant like sun rays, and utter earthshaking roars. They circle each other on their elephants, and then attack with their bows and stir up the soldiers around with their deafening shouts and slaps on their armpits and the whizzing of arrows like bee swarms. Both are doughty and masterly beyond description and their elephants lumber about nimbly with upturned trunks and with banners floating wide on the wind.

Each rives the other’s bow, then seize up fresh bows and shoot showers of gleaming arrows and fling spears like two masses of clouds in the monsoon. Then, Kshemadhurti suddenly casts a spear at Bhimasena and pierces him through the chest and follows this with six more javelins and gives an echoing shout of victory. Bhimasena blazes up with wrath and, with those spears sticking out of his body, he is glorious like a cloud-covered sun with his rays issuing through the interstices of the canopy.

He hurls a dazzling iron spear at his antagonist, which the king of the Kulutas destroys with ten arrows and then strikes Bhima with a flurry of sixty smoking shafts. Bhima takes up a bow whose twang is like thunder, and with a truly paralysing yell, wounds Kshemadhurti's elephant with a spate of such vicious barbs that the wounded beast breaks its restraints and runs chased by Bhima's fierce leviathan: like one mass of wind-driven clouds pursuing another cloud in a tempest.

Finally, the valiant Kshemadhurti fetches his own tusker under control and looses a slew of arrows at his pursuer. He rives Bhima's bow with a razor-headed arrow and draws blood from Vrikodara's elephant as well; the enraged Kshemadhurti strikes both Bhima and his elephant with several long shafts through every vital part.

O Bhaarata, Bhima's massive beast's knees buckle and it falls with a booming bellow, but quick as a thought, Bhima leaps off its back, flies at his enemy and brings Kshemadhurti's grey beast down with a flurry of thunderous mace blows. Kshemadhurti also leaps off his dead war animal and, sword in hand, rushes in fury at Bhima. Quicker than seeing, Bhima looses a lethal volley at his noble adversary and Kshemadhurti falls dead right beside his elephant like a lion struck by a thunderbolt beside a thunder-cloven hill.

Seeing the celebrated king of the Kulutas killed, your troops, O Bharatarishabha, run away in panic.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'By now, the general battle is joined in earnest and Pravira Karna, powerful and audacious, begins to raze the Pandava army with his deadly fire and the Pandavas, too, O Rajan, retaliate in kind. Karna's cloth-yard shafts, polished and bright as the rays of the sun, bring dreadful devastation to the Pandava army and their elephants struck by Karna's relentless tirade, give vent to dismal bellows and flee.

Nakula attacks Karna with alacrity and valour, while Bhimasena assails Drona's son and Satyaki lays siege to the Kaikeya princes Vinda and Anuvinda. King Chitrasena stands firm against the advancing Srutakarman; Prativindhya faces Chitra, who uses a wonderful bow and flies a striking standard; Duryodhana charges Yudhishtira and Dhananjaya launches his onslaught once more against the seething Samsaptakas horde.

In that slaughter of great Kshatriyas, Dhrishtadyumna advances against Kripa; the invincible Sikhandi closes with Kritavarman; Srutakirti encounters Salya and Madri's son, and the valiant Sahadeva confronts your son Dusasana. The two Kaikeya princes and Satyaki shroud each other with bursts of brilliant arrows, fighting like two rival elephants goring each other in the forest; Satyaki's chest is lacerated while the brothers have their own marmas pierced by Yuyudhana's relucent arrows.

The war swells all around, with roars and cries of anguish, and blood spraying lavishly in the sun. Satyaki maharatha Saurin destroys the great war bows of the Kekaya princes; they seize up other bows in a flash and envelop the brilliant Satwata with gales of thunderbolts, even as all three wheel like triad winds across Kurukshetra. The brothers' potent golden shafts, fletched with kanka and peacock feathers, illuminate the field which has turned darkling from the dense profusion of arrows shot all around. This fervid contention lasts a while, with Satyaki and the heroic brothers often shattering one another's bows and cutting down each others' shafts in flight. Until, finally, the invincible Satwata prince hews off Anuvinda's head with a razor like arrow in a scarlet eruption. Anuvinda's severed head, its great golden kundalas sparkling and stained red, falls like the head of the Asura Sambara slain in the great Devasura yuddha of old, and fills all the Kaikeyas with grief.

Seeing the end of his beloved and fierce brother, Vinda strings another bow and, wheeling in a circle in his ratha, attacks the grandson of Sini from every side. He draws blood fonts from Satyaki with sixty arrows fitted with golden wings and whetted on stone, and shouts, "Stay and fight!"

Swift as thoughts he strikes Satyaki with thousands of arrows. Bleeding from his limbs, Yuyudhana looks resplendent, O Rajan, like a flowering kinsuka. Yet undaunted, the Satwata hero responds with five and twenty searing shafts, bathing the Kaikaya prince in blood. The two maharathas swiftly kill one another's sarathy and horses, then break one another's bows and then leaping down from their chariots, close with each other on foot to fight with swords drawn. Both have massive arms and flaunt awesome swords and shields decked with a hundred moons, like the mighty Jambha and Sakra in the war between the Devas and the Asuras, long ago.

They circle, gauging each other every electric moment, and watching for the slightest chance to strike a killing blow. As the duel progresses, each has his shield destroyed by the other; they continue to circle warily until, finally, Satyaki sees his momentary chance and, with a slashing sidestroke, cleaves Vinda clean in two, his blade bisecting the Kaikeya prince's body just above the waist, felling him like a hill split by a thunderbolt.

Satyaki clambers into Yudhamanyu's chariot and escapes. Later, after he has mounted another fully equipped ratha, he wildly attacks the large Kaikeya force and brings such wrath and death to them that they flee the field in absolute panic.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'A pugnacious Srutakarman, O Rajan, strikes Chitrasena, at the head of his forces, with fifty keening arrows; Chitrasena responds quick as light, driving nine perfect barbs into his attacker's body and five into his sarathy. Srutakarman plunges a single immaculate arrow into a vital marma on Chitrasena's body, and that prince collapses onto his chariot seat. Never pausing, Srutakarman covers his insensible adversary with ninety arrows.

Chitrasena recovers consciousness, leaps up, splits his antagonist's bow with broad-headed shafts and pierces him with seven vicious thunderbolts. Srutakarman picks up another heavy, gold inlaid bow and, with a great wave of fire, turns Chitrasena's body into an amazing sight with arrows protruding from every inch of him. The youthful king, wearing beautiful garlands and these arrows as well as ornaments, looks like a remarkable youth in the midst of a noble congregation!

But, unmoved, Chitrasena drills a dreadful thick shaft straight into Srutakarman's chest, shouting, "Halt! Fight!" Srutakarman spurts a geyser of blood like a mountain a spring of liquid red chalk. Bathed and dyed in blood, that shura too glows like a kinsuka in full bloom.

Red-eyed Srutakarman cleaves his adversary's bow in his hands. He strikes him with three hundred arrows shot in such a blur that Chitrasena is obscured by that dark, wide-winged swath. Finally, with another broad-headed and sharp-edged shaft, Srutakarman decapitates his enemy and Chitrasena's blazing head falls onto the earth like the moon come loose from the firmament.

Seeing their king slain, Chitrasena's troops recklessly charge Srutakarman. However, he tears into them, unleashing his arrow gales like an infuriated Yama at the time of the pralaya at yuga's end. Slaughtered by your grandson Srutakarman, they scatter and bolt like elephants scorched by a forest conflagration, and are pursued hotly by that shura, resplendent on his ratha.

Prativindhya, O Bhaarata, launches an assault on Chitra with five arrows, strikes his charioteer with three and his standard with one. Chitra defends, piercing his adversary in the arms and chest with nine broad-headed arrows with golden wings and fletched with kanka and peacock feathers. Prativindhya destroys his opponent's bow and deeply injures him, upon which Chitra casts an irresistible dart with golden bells at him, which flares at him like a burning meteor.

Prativindhya, however, easily truncates that missile into three slivers, and it explodes with a thunderclap, creating fear in all creatures as if it was the end of the yuga. Chitra takes up a massive gada finished with gold filigree work and hurls it expertly, killing Prativindhya's horses and sarathy, and crushing his ratha, all at once. Prativindhya jumps down from his ratha and flings a fiery spear with golden staff at Chitra. The noble Chitra catches it in his hand even as it flashes at him, and flings it back at Prativindhya. That powerful and occult lance plunges through Prativindhya's right arm and burrows down into the ground behind him, illumining that field like a blast of lightning.

A livid Prativindhya now casts another golden missile at Chitra; this astra crashes through Chitra's kavacha, through his great heart, blowing it to shreds, killing him instantly, then darts deep into the earth like a mighty snake into its hole. Chitra lies there lifeless, his massive arms that resemble iron clubs, outspread in death's final, poignant attitude.

Your most veteran warriors attack Prativindhya in stormy retaliation, impetuously from all sides. Shooting diverse kinds of shafts and sataghnis decked with rows of bells, they soon cover him like masses of clouds covering the sun. But gallant Prativindhya consumes them with his arrows, like the Vajradhari himself routing the Asura host. Your army, O Rajan, runs in all directions like cloud masses scattered by the wind.

Meanwhile, only Drona's son remains standing and singly charges the mighty Bhimasena. At once, a pitched duel erupts between them like the one between Vritra and Vasava in the battle between the Devas and the Asuras long ago.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Drona's vigorous son Aswatthaman, displaying unworldly dexterity, strikes Bhima with a scathing arrow, numbing him briefly, and then quicker than imagination, pierces all his vital marmas with ninety more shafts. Pierced all over, Bhimasena resembles the sun with his rays of light.

Imperturbable, Vrikodara, who feels no pain or pays it no mind, envelops Aswatthaman with a full thousand squally shafts, and lets out an earth-shaking simhanada. Aswatthaman coolly cuts down Bhima's tornado with his own recalescent volley and smilingly strikes the Pandava on his brow with a cloth-yard shaft, which the Pandava titan bears on his forehead even as the proud rhinoceros does his horn! With a grin, Bhima adorns Aswatthaman's brow with three arrows, so that the Brahmana resembles a triad peaked mountain washed with red rain in the monsoon presenting quite an extraordinary sight.

They continue to lash each other with hundreds of arrows, but neither can shake the other, like the wind failing to sway or torrents of rain failing to move a mountain. The two are resplendent on their magnificent rathas, like two apocalyptic suns arisen for the destruction of the world at yuga's end, their arrows the rays of the consuming sun as they scorch each other. With utmost expertise and care, they endeavour to match each other's feats and prowl the field of yawning death like two mythic tigers. Invincible and fearsome, the arrows are their fangs and the bows their mouths, and under the shroud of arrows, they hide like the sun and the moon in the firmament enveloped by masses of clouds. However, soon the two warriors break out of the dark mantle and blaze forth like Mars and Mercury freed from clouds that obscured them.

During the battle, Aswatthaman manoeuvres to place Vrikodara on his right and looses hundreds of vicious arrows at him. Bhima cannot brook his enemy's brief triumph and from that very station on Aswatthaman's right, unleashes his own torrid arrow storms at Drona's punitive son. Their chariots wheel, turn, advance and retreat strategically, and the battle between these two lions among men is a sight to behold. Racing along different courses, they circle and move with supernatural agility, as they continue to strike each other with arrows shot from bows drawn to their fullest stretch.

Determined to kill each other, they first try to demolish the other's chariot. Aswatthaman invokes many astras in this attempt, which Bhima nullifies with his own. The colliding astras illuminate all the directions of the sky and the troops all around. Covered with flights of arrows and clashing astras, the heavens assume an awesome sight, O Rajan, like at the time of pralaya, with colliding planets and meteors beyond count falling alight.

Great fires, with leaping sparks and towering flames, begin to consume both armies. Siddhas who arrive there, O Rajan, say, "O Lord, this war is the greatest ever and no battle fought so far measures even a sixteenth part of this one. A war like this will never occur again. Both these warriors, the Brahmana and the Kshatriya, are gifted with knowledge, possess courage and are both fierce in their attitudes. Tremendous is the might of Bhima, and wonderful is the skill of Aswatthaman. How great is their energy and how amazing their genius. The two awe-inspiring ones straddle the field like two universe-destroying Yamas at the end of the yuga. These two Naravyaghras are born like two Rudras or two Suryas."

One hears all the time such words from the Siddhas present there and a deep roar arises from the assembled Devas in the sky. The dense throng of Siddhas and Charanas are filled with wonder on seeing the inconceivable feats of the two warriors and, along with the Devas and the great Rishis, they laud them both saying, "Wonderful, O Mahabaho Aswatthaman! Excellent, O magnificent Bhima!"

Meanwhile, the two shuras ceaselessly inflict gashing injuries on each other; they glare and roll their eyes red with rage; their lips quiver; they grind their teeth and bite their lips in the intensity of their fury. They shower each other endlessly with arrows and their weapons flash as if the two of them, maharathas both, are two great thunderheads that rain arrows and unleash jagged streaks of lightning.

Thus they battle on, tireless, shredding each other's standards, raking each other's charioteers and chargers. Then, Rajan, each invokes an astra and looses it at the other; both strike home, like twin thunderclaps, and Bhima and Aswatthaman faint at the same instant, at the head of their troops. They fall senseless in the chariots and their sarathies whisk them away from the field.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Describe to me, O Sanjaya, Arjuna's contention with the Samsaptakas and the other lords of the earth, as well as his duel with Aswatthaman. Narrate to me also, the battle between the other kings and the Pandavas.'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen, O Rajan, and I will tell you about the battle between our heroic warriors and the enemy—ah, the encounter which destroyed bodies, sins and lives. The indomitable Partha penetrates deep into the still vast Samsaptaka forces and agitates it like a tempest stirring the fathomless deep. He beheads brave warriors with faces splendid as the full moon, with beautiful eyes, brows and teeth. Soon the earth is strewn with heads like lotuses, plucked from their stalks.

He also severs muscular, massive arms, smeared with sandalwood paste and other perfumes; he cuts away hands that grasp weapons, wear leather gloves, and look like five-headed snakes. He destroys horses, riders, charioteers, flags, bows and arrows and arms that wear jewels, and despatches maharathas, elephants, horses and horsemen to Yama's realm.

Throngs of enemy warriors, roaring like bulls mad with excitement for a cow in season, attack Arjuna with loud cries and cover him with their arrows. The hair raising encounter is like the battle between the Daityas and Vajradhari Indra during the conquest of the three worlds. Defending himself masterfully against his enemies' livid storms, Arjuna massacres them like the inexorable wind destroying massed thunderheads. The fearsome Arjuna, called Jaya, shatters squadrons of derelict chariots, which he earlier deprived of poles, wheels, axles, wooden fences, and whose warriors, horses and charioteers he had already killed and whose weapons, quivers and standards he had desiccated.

He fights like a thousand maharathas and his feats fill all with wonder. Crowds of Siddhas, Devarishis and Charanas applaud him and sound celestial kettle-drums and shower unearthly blooms down upon the heads of Kesava and Arjuna. An asariri, an incorporeal voice, says, "These two heroes, Krishna and Arjuna, own the beauty of the moon, the splendour of fire, the force of the wind and the radiance of the sun. Riding the same ratha, they are invincible like Brahma and Isana. These two shuras, the greatest of all beings, are Nara and Narayana!"

Aswatthaman, O Bhaarata, sees Arjuna's astounding exploits and so with equal parts of care and resolution, takes the field against him. Unleashing a gale of shafts, he then holds an arrow in his hand, pauses and hails the Pandava. Smiling, Drona's son says to Arjuna, "If, O shura, you regard me a worthy guest who has arrived before you, give me your wholehearted hospitality of battle."

Thus challenged, Arjuna considers himself honoured, and asks Krishna, "I need to annihilate the Samsaptakas, but Drona's son summons me to battle again. Tell me, O Madhava, which dharma should I attend to first? Possibly, if you think it proper, I should first provide the Acharya's son with the services of hospitality."

Without hesitation, Krishna drives Partha towards Aswatthaman's ratha, even like Vayu bearing Indra to the yagna. Saluting Drona's son, Kesava tells him, "O Aswatthaman, don't lose a moment, but both give and take. The time has come for dependents to repay their obligations to their masters. The contention between Brahmanas is subtle but the consequences of disputes between Kshatriyas are palpable, and bring either victory or defeat. To have the excellent rewards of hospitality which, from folly, you solicit from Partha, fight now the son of Pandu."

At this, the great Brahmana warrior says, "Tathaastu!" and strikes Kesava with sixty shafts and Arjuna with three. Arjuna destroys Aswatthaman's bow with three arrows and Drona's son picks up a more formidable bow. Stringing it in the twinkling of an eye, he rakes Arjuna with a thousand and Krishna with three hundred arrows. Then, my lord, he looses an unimaginable flood of arrows, in millions, past all count, and he stuns Arjuna. These unworldly missiles issue from the quivers, the bow, the bowstring, the fingers, the arms, the hands, the chest, the face, the nose, the eyes, the ears, the heads, the limbs, the pores, the armour, the chariot and the standard, of that Brahmavadi. Piercing Madhava and the son of Pandu with that fury of uncanny barbs, Drona's son, full with joy, roars like ten thunderclouds.

Hearing that roar, Arjuna says to Kesava of unfading glory, "Look, O Madhava, at this animosity of the Acharaya's son towards me. He thinks that if he covers us with a tide of countless arrows, we will die. But I will disappoint him and show him my prowess."

Arjuna, the Bharatasattama, splits every arrow of Aswatthaman's into three slivers; he dispels the Brahmana's darkness of arrows like the sun destroying a black fog. Immediately, he turns his attention back to the Samsaptakas, and once more harries them and their horses, charioteers, rathas, elephants, standards and foot-soldiers with his fierce fires. Arjuna's thunderbolts shroud all—spectators, foot-soldiers, chariot-warriors, horsemen and elephants. Shot from Gandiva, his winged arrows of myriad kinds slaughter elephants, horses and men, those right before him as well as those two yojanas away.

Elephants with ichor flowing down their faces in excitement, have their trunks severed by his broad-headed shafts, and fall down like great trees cut down with an axe, wailing dreadfully. They fall with their riders, like mountains that Indra has blasted with his Vajra. With his arrows, Dhananjaya demolishes splendid, well-equipped chariots into dust, so they appear to dissolve as vapour into the evening sky. The Vijaya, his Gandiva bent in a circle of flames, inundates his enemies with riptides of arrows; he massacres maharathas, horsemen and foot-soldiers. Arjuna is like the sun of the apocalypse that rises at the end of the yuga and he vaporises the immense Samsaptaka ocean with his arrows.

Then again, seamlessly, Arjuna switches his attention back to Aswatthaman and drills him with incandescent shafts, like sun flares, even like Indra striking the mountain of old with his Vajra. The dauntless and by now properly incensed Aswatthaman does not waver but closes, instead, on Arjuna, unleashing his own tremendous arrow storms. But Arjuna demolishes Aswatthaman's fusillades and indignantly offers him, the supposed “desirable guest”, quivers upon inexhaustible quivers of arrows, like a most charitable man offering everything in his house to a guest.

Leaving the Samsaptakas, the son of Pandu hastens towards Drona’s son like a host abandoning undeserving guests to attend to a more worthy one.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'The battle between Arjuna and Aswatthaman resembles the one in the sky between Shukra and Brihaspati, both trying to enter the same constellation. Wounding each other with burning arrows, the two terrify the world like two planets that have strayed from their orbit and shoot their rays at each other. Arjuna stabs Aswatthaman with a shaft between his eyebrows, while the Brahmana gashes the two Krishnas with hundreds of arrows, which dazzle like so many slivers of the sun at the end of the yuga.

When Krishna briefly appears to be stunned, Arjuna shoots an astra from which issue multitudes of shafts from all sides. He strikes Aswatthaman with innumerable shafts, each like the thunder or fire or the sceptre of Death. The ferocious, mighty Aswatthaman retaliates with a multitude of arrows shot with such force that Yama himself would have felt their pain. Arjuna blankets him, his horses, charioteer and standard with twice as many arrows fitted with wide wings.

Yet again, he then turns to assail the Samsaptakas and demolishes their bows, quivers, bowstrings and hacks off the arms and hands that tightly grasp weapons, and destroys chatras, standards, horses, chariot shafts, robes, garlands, ornaments, armour, handsome shields and ruins the beautiful heads of his relentless enemies. He destroys well-equipped rathas, chargers and elephants, as well as the Kshatriyas who ride in them. With crescent-tipped, razor-faced arrows, Arjuna snips away human heads that resemble lotuses from their throats, heads as bright as the sun, or the full moon in beauty and which glitter with crowns, and they fall endlessly onto the earth.

The seasoned Kalinga, Vanga and the Nishada elephant warriors, riding on their splendid beasts, which are as grand as the leviathans of Indra, come charging against Arjuna. Partha cuts off the giant animals' limbs and trunks and destroys their riders, the standards and banners, upon which those beasts fall like mountain summits riven by thunderbolts.

With that elephant force annihilated, Kiriti turns back to target the son of his Acharya with arrows that shine like the newly risen sun, and shrouds him with these as the wind shrouds the sun with cloud masses. Aswatthaman, however, brilliantly negates Arjuna's arrows with his own, and strikes both Arjuna and Krishna and gives a roar like that of thunder at summer's end. Deeply wounded, Arjuna swiftly dispels the darkness Aswatthaman's arrows bring, and pierces his adversary and his army with shining tides of shafts.

No one can see when Savyasachi picks up his arrows, when he aims them, and when he shoots them. All that is seen are the elephants, horses, foot-soldiers and maharathas, struck and falling dead. Drona's son looses ten great missiles, which flare from his bow as a single one. Shot with huge force, five of these strike Arjuna and the other five Krishna, and bathe them in blood as Kubera and Indra were once. A gasp goes up from all that watch for they are convinced that Aswatthaman, complete master of the astra shastra, has killed the two Krishnas.

Krishna, in some pain, asks Arjuna, "Why do you spare Aswatthaman? Kill him! Because if you do not he will cause you great sorrow, like some untreated disease."

"Tathaastu—So be it!" Arjuna of unfading glory replies.

Arjuna begins to carve Aswatthaman's splendid body with his arrows. He pierces his antagonist's massive sandalwood paste smeared arms, his chest, head, and his muscled thighs with shafts fitted with heads like goats' ears, and shot with untold force from the Gandiva. He cuts away the traces of Aswatthaman's chargers and gashes the steeds themselves so that, wild-eyed with pain, they bolt from the field. Bleeding from a hundred wounds, Drona's most intelligent son reflects for some time and ruefully realises that he can never hope for victory against Krishna and Dhananjaya;

Aswatthaman decides not to go back and renew the duel. He calms his horses, comforts himself a little and joins Karna's teeming division, his proud hopes belied and the armoury in his ratha almost exhausted.

After his runaway horses bolt with Aswatthaman, rather as incantations and medicaments remove a disease from the body, Krishna and Arjuna ride again at the Samsaptakas, on their ratha with its kapi-dhvaja floating wide on the breeze and with a rumble as of thunderheads.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'They hear the sound of a fierce battle towards the northern part of Kurukshetra where Dandadhara, the lord of the Magadhas, wreaks havoc among the chariots, elephants, cavalry and foot-soldiers of the Pandava army. Krishna turns his chariot yoked to Gandharva horses fleet as Garuda, and says to Arjuna, "That is Dandadhara with his dangerous and matchless elephant, and he himself is not inferior to Bhagadatta himself. Kill him first, before we fight the Samsaptakas."

Krishna takes Partha to where Dandadhara, unrivalled in wielding the elephant-hook, just as the headless planet Ketu is peerless among all the navagrahas, is annihilating the Pandava host like some awesome comet destroying the very earth. Riding his indomitable and brutal mastodon, Dandadhara razes thousands of chariots, horses, elephants and men with his torrid arrow banks.

The Magadhan's rampaging elephant legion tramples thousands of soldiers along with their horses and charioteers, crushing them to pulp. His own greatest beast also ranges across the field like a wheel of Death. Dandadhara shoots down men clad in armour along with their horses and foot-soldiers, and his elephants stamp them into the ground with their great legs, making a gory mess all around.

Arjuna, on his great ratha, races towards that prince of elephants standing in the midst of the Magadhan force with thousands of chariots, horses and other elephants; the whole place resounds with the clashing of innumerable cymbals, batteries of drums being pounded, booming conches, the awful clatter of chariot-wheels, the twanging of bowstrings, and with the echoing of striking palms.

Dandadhara straightaway strikes Arjuna with a dozen sizzling arrows, Krishna with sixteen and each of their horses with three, and then gives an echoing shout of triumph and laughs uproariously. Arjuna shatters Dandadhara's bow, his magnificent standard, then the traces of his hulking beast and the footmen that protect the animal. The lord of Girivraja's eyes turn red as plums; his elephant's temples have now split open and the juice of musth flows freely down them; the creature's linga hangs forth in wild erection. Dandadhara flings a volley of javelins at Dhananjaya.

Even as he does this, Arjuna, with three razor-headed arrows, hews off his enemy's arms at their shoulders, each like an elephant's trunk, and then his moon like head. He swathes the elephant covered in burnished armour with golden arrows, and it looks resplendent like a mountain in the night with its herbs and trees on fire. Trumpeting echoingly in pain, the beast staggers, totters and finally falls with its hastikas still on its neck, like a riven hillock.

Dandadhara's younger brother Danda advances in grief and rage against Krishna and Dhananjaya, determined to kill them; Danda comes on his snow white tusker caparisoned with gold, and big as a Himalayan peak. Danda strikes Krishna with three whetted spears bright as sun rays, and Arjuna with five, and gives a roar. Arjuna responds with a ringing roar of his own and, in a wink, cuts off Danda's arms as well with razor-headed arrows; the sandalwood paste smeared arms, wearing angadas and grasping lances, fall at the same moment from the elephant's back like two mighty snakes of great beauty falling from a mountain summit.

With a crescent-headed arrow, Kiriti beheads Danda and his head falls on the earth from the elephant's back, covered in blood, resplendent as if it is the sun fallen from the Asta mountain in the western quarter.

Partha turns to his enemy's elephant and fells it with a fusillade of dazzling arrows, with a reverberant sound like a Himalayan summit cloven by thunder. Savyasachi, never pausing, annihilates all the other invincible Magadhan elephants, which could turn the course of a war.

The vast hostile force breaks and the elephants, rathas, horses and men, in dense throng, break upon one another and die on the chasmic field of death and truth. His own troops mob Arjuna like the Devas surrounding a victorious Purandara, and they say, "O Shura, it is destiny that you slew this ferocious enemy who terrified us like Yama himself. If you had not saved us from his fear, our foes would now have felt that delight that we now feel at their death, O Parantapa."

Hearing these and other words of praise from friends and allies, Arjuna properly and gladly salutes them and, his heart cheerful, forges on to once more attack the Samsaptakas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Wheeling around, like the planet Mercury, Buddha in the ellipse of its orbit, Arjuna slaughters vast numbers of the Samsaptakas. His arrows, some of which are wedge-headed, some razor-edged, some crescent-tipped, and some with calf's tooth heads, strike men, horses, and elephants, O Bhaarata, who then falter, stagger, collapse and die. The son of Pandu destroys horses, charioteers, standards, bows, shafts and cuts off hands grasping weapons and the heads of heroic warriors opposing him.

Like bulls competing for a cow in season, thousands of valiant Kshatriyas close in on Arjuna. The bloodcurdling battle that ensues is like the encounter between the Daityas and Vajradhari during the war for the three worlds.

The son of Ugrayudha drills Partha with three arrows like three venomous snakes but Partha cut off his head in a scarlet blast. Their fury mounting, the enemy warriors attack Arjuna from every side with all manner of astras, like the clouds that the Maruts drive to shroud the Himavat at summer's end. Arjuna defends himself magnificently; he kills a host of his enemies with perfect arrows; he destroys the Trivenus, their horses, chariots, charioteers and weapons.

Kurukshetra appears like the luxurious mansions of the rich which elements have ruined. Elephants, their vital organs pierced with shafts like thunderbolts, fall like palaces struck by lightning falling from mountain cliffs. Arjuna's arrows mow down teeming troops of cavalry and they present an appalling sight, their entrails hanging out, gruesome and bathed in blood. Like Mahendra smiting down the Danavas does Partha smite enemies past all count, with his shafts whetted on stone, and which are like smoking venom in their deadliness. The bravest warriors lie dead on the field, wearing fine armour, ornaments and armed with diverse kinds of weapons, now their chariots shattered and their once proud standards felled. Noble men, of dharma and great gyana, ascend into swarga while their bodies lie on blood spattered earth, unbreathing.

Your various commanders lead their divisions and rush toward Arjuna. Warriors on their rathas, horses and elephants, and foot soldiers attack him with diverse weapons. However, Arjuna stops them in their tracks with a torrent of arrows. We then see him cross that raftless ocean formed by horses, foot soldiers, elephants and chariots, where mighty weapons are its waves, where his own mighty weapons are its bridge.

Then Krishna says to Arjuna, "Why, O sinless one, do you sport in this manner? Finish these Samsaptakas and then make haste to kill Karna."

Arjuna says, "So be it."

He tears into the remnant of the Samsaptakas with his astras, and decimates them like Indra destroying the Daityas. No one can discern when Arjuna takes out his arrows, when he aims them or when he shoots them. Govinda himself, O Bhaarata, thinks it wonderful. The white shafts of Arjuna plunge into the enemy force like swans diving into a lake.

Krishna looks at the enormous carnage on Kurukshetra, and says, "Here, O Partha, is this colossal destruction of the Bharatas and other kings of the earth, and all this is solely because of Duryodhana.

Look, O Bhaarata, at these golden bows of so many mighty archers and these belts and quivers loosened from their bodies.

Behold these straight shafts fitted with wings of gold, and these long arrows smeared with oil looking like snakes freed from their sloughs.

See these abandoned, beautiful gold embellished spears, and these suits of armour cut from the bodies of the warriors.

Look at these golden spears, these darts, and these heavy gadas chased with gold filigree and tied with cords of hemp. Look at these gilded swords and battle-axes, these spiked clubs, these short arrows, these bhusundis, these kanapas; look at these abandoned iron kuntas, and these heavy mushalas. These warriors must have fought so vigorously with all these different weapons, and though they are now dead, they still seem to be alive.

Behold, O slayer of enemies, the field of battle strewn with the bodies of thousands of Kshatriyas, their limbs crushed with maces, and heads split with mushalas; or whom elephants, horses or chariots have trodden upon; look at all the dreadfully mangled corpses of elephants and horses, bathed in streams of blood. Magnificent sandalwood-paste-smeared arms and hands wearing angadas, leather guards, keyuras, and other ornaments lie scattered across on the earth along with severed thighs that look like elephant trunks and with heads adorned with earrings and helmets and turbans set with great gemstones, which look so striking.

Look at those beautiful broken rathas with golden bells, the long quivers and stunning standards and banners of different kinds, the big conches, lying flecked with blood, the innumerable horses coloured in blood and those perfectly white yak-tails. Look at those elephants with tongues lolling out and lying on the field like hills with their dead warriors, their rich coverlets and blankets, the bells loosened and broken into pieces from the beasts as they fell; the fallen hooks with grips set with stones of lapis lazuli. Look at the ornamental yokes for horses, the diamond studded cuirasses, the rich golden tassels of the cavalry pennants, the motley horse caparisons and housings and ranku skins set with brilliant gems and inlaid with gold, all fallen on the ground.

Look, Partha, at the great solitaire diamonds that adorned the crowns of kings, their exquisite necklaces of gold, and their sovereign chatra, yak-tails and chamaras all fallen, all ruined.

Behold the earth strewn with heads flaunting finely trimmed manly beards, with earrings bright as the stars, each like a moon. This bhumi reminds me of a lake with a dense overgrowth of lilies and lotuses.

Behold the earth, brilliant like the full moon and strewn with myriad stars as in the autumn firmament. O Arjuna, these victories that you have achieved today are indeed worthy of you or of Indra, the king of the Devas himself in heaven."

Thus does Krishna show Arjuna the battlefield of Kurukshetra.

As they return towards their camp, they hear the blare of conches, the beat of cymbals, drums and patahas, the clatter of chariot wheels, the neighing of horses, the trumpeting of elephants, and the fierce clash of conflict from Duryodhana's army. Krishna is wonderstruck to see that great warrior Pandya charge into that force on his ratha fleet as the wind and destroying elephants, horses and men like Yama slaughtering those whose lives have been exhausted. Defending himself against his enemies, Pandya kills them like Sakra destroying the Danavas.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'You have never mentioned until now the name of that shura Pandya, famous for his feats, O Sanjaya. Tell me today in detail of his ability, skill, spirit, energy, the measure of his might and his pride.'

Sanjaya says, 'You consider Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Aswatthaman, Karna, Arjuna and Krishna as being the greatest of maharathas. Know, however, that Pandya regards himself superior to all of them. Indeed, that great king, that finest warrior, never thought of anyone among the kings to be his equal, not even Karna, Bhishma, Vasudeva or Arjuna. Filled with rage like the Destroyer himself, Pandya now massacres Karna's forces swelling with chariots, cavalry and seasoned warriors. Pandya's whirlwind of arrows spins them around as if on a potter's wheel.

Like the wind dispersing some clouds, like the splitter of mountains striking asunder parvatas with his Vajra, Pandya scatters and destroys the enemy cavalry, chariots, charioteers and standards; he fells elephants with their riders, as well as the foot-soldiers who protect those beasts. He mauls the Pulindas, the Khasas, the Bahlikas, the Nishadas, the Andhakas, the Tanganas, the Dravidas and the Bhojas, all mighty warriors, unyielding and of stoic fortitude. He divests them of their weapons and coats of mail, and then deprives them of their lives.

Aswatthaman sees Pandya on his spree of killing, seemingly dancing, a small Pandava in his chariot, as he razes the Dhartarashtra host before him. Aswatthaman rides up to confront that hero on the rampage, and tells him sweetly, "O Rajan, with your eyes like lotus petals, your noble birth, and your great learning, you are justly celebrated for your might and prowess for you do resemble Indra himself. Stretching your great bow with your massive arms, you look like a great thunderhead lashing your enemies with your torrential rain of arrows.

O Pandya, I do not see anyone other than myself who can match you in battle. Singlehandedly, you mow down chariots, elephants, foot-soldiers and cavalry, like some awful lion hunting herds of deer in the forest. You look magnificent, Rajan, like a crop-destroying autumn thundershower, and the heavens and the earth resound with the rumble of your chariot wheels. But now fight me, O Shura, shoot your arrows that are like snakes of virulent poison at me. Come, fight me as the Asura Andhaka once did the three-eyed Rudra!"

Pandya replies, "Tathaastu!"

Drona's son calls out, "Then strike!" and attacks him viciously. Quicker than thinking, Pandya Malayadhwaja pierces Aswatthaman deep with a barbed arrow. The Brahmana, smiling, gashes Pandya with a volley like flames, and other large and heavy shafts, all of which he shoots with ten subtly different kinds of speed and motion. Pandya, however, destroys all those arrows with nine shafts of his own, and with four others he kills Aswatthaman's four horses. Without a moment's pause he breaks the Brahmana's splendid stretched bowstring with another astonishing arrow.

Drona's son strings his bow in a flash, while his men yoke new horses to his ratha. He looses thousands of arrows at his enemy, filling all the sky and the ten cardinal points with them. Pandya knows that Aswatthaman's arrows are inexhaustible, yet that bull among men cuts them down and immediately kills the two protectors of his adversary's chariot wheels. Drawing his bow into a circle, Drona's son shoots so many arrows that in a mere eighth part of a day, he uses up eight large cartloads of shafts. Aswatthaman is like a furious Destroyer, or rather like an insane Destroyer of the Destroyer, as he lashes the enemy with a frenzy, a pralaya of arrows. Negating with that unendurable torrent from the Aswatthaman-cloud with a Vayavyastra, the exultant Pandya-wind gives a long and resounding roar.

Aswatthaman's response is to demolish Pandya's standard with the device of the Malaya Mountain, smeared with sandalwood paste and other perfumed unguents and kill his four horses in a blink. He next kills his enemy's charioteer with a single perfect shaft and, with a crescent-tipped arrow, breaks Pandya's bow whose twang was like spring thunder in his massive hands, and shatters his ratha into fragments. He stops his redoubtable enemy in his tracks, but Drona's son does not kill the Malayaraja so that he can have the pleasure of battling against him for some more time!

Meanwhile, Karna attacks the large elephant force of the Pandavas and annihilates it. Destroying the chariots of maharathas, he strikes elephants, horses and warriors, O Bhaarata, with tide upon tide of relentless arrows.

Aswatthaman resumes his duel with the great maharatha Pandya. Suddenly, a looming and riderless war elephant with enormous tusks, and maddened by Aswatthaman's arrows, charges Pandya. Seeing that prince of elephants, which is like a cloven mountain summit, Pandya does a most astonishing thing. He is an expert elephant warrior and, with a single bound leaps onto the neck of the demented beast, even like a lion springing with a roar onto the top of a mountain. He strikes the elephant masterfully with the ankush, taming it almost instantly, and in the same moment casts a golden spear bright as a ray of the sun at Aswatthaman, and then a roar of sheer joy and triumph erupts from him, echoing across all Kurukshetra.

Repeatedly shouting in excitement, "You are dead, you are dead!" Pandya flings his lance to destroy Aswatthaman's golden diadem studded with priceless gemstones—diamonds of the rarest kind—and padded with excellent cloth and festooned with strings of pearls, coronet which shines like the sun, the moon, the planets and fire. The crown falls from Aswatthaman's head and breaks apart into fragments.

Aswatthaman, enraged like a kicked serpent, picks up four and ten lethal shafts each like Yama's danda. With five of them, he severs the four feet and the trunk of his adversary's elephant; with three, the two arms and the head of king Pandya, and with six more he kills the six mighty and radiant maharathas who follow the Malaya king. Pandya's long and well-rounded arms, smeared with fragrant sandalwood paste, and adorned with gold, pearls and diamonds fall upon the earth and writhe like a pair of snakes killed by Garuda. His head, its face bright as the full moon, with a prominent nose and large eyes, copper red with rage, its ears adorned with resonant kundalas, fall onto the ground, luminous as the moon between two bright constellations.

Aswatthaman cuts up the king and his elephant into ten pieces as if they are yagna butter being divided into ten portions for ten deities. Thus Aswatthaman makes an end of mighty king Pandya, after that hero had annihilated countless horses, men and elephants and offered them as food to Rakshasas. Pandya dies like a blazing fire in a crematorium, extinguished with water after it has received libation of numberless dead.

Your son, the king, O Rajan, accompanied by his brothers, approaches Aswatthaman, the complete master of the astra shastra, with great respect, like Indra, the lord of the Devas joyfully worshipping Vishnu after the Lord came as the Vamana and subdued the Asura Bali.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'After Pandya is killed and that shura Karna destroys the enemy, O Sanjaya, what does Pandu's son Arjuna do? The eternal Sankara made Partha invincible and I greatly fear Dhananjaya. Tell me, O Sanjaya, all that Arjuna accomplishes.'

Sanjaya says, 'After Pandya's death, Krishna quickly says to Arjuna, "I do not see Yudhishtira and it appears that the other Pandavas have retreated. If only the Parthas had returned, we could have broken this vast enemy force. Here, in accordance with Aswatthaman's strategy, Karna razes the Srinjayas' cavalry, chariot-warriors and elephant division."

Partha understands the grave danger to Yudhishtira, and says to Krishna, "Whip the horses, O Hrishikesha!" and the chariot leaps forward.

Karna leads the Kurus and Bhimasena the Pandavas, and once more they fearlessly close with each other and another violent battle ensues that swells the population of Yama's kingdom. With bows and arrows, spiked clubs and swords, lances and axes, short clubs, bhushundis, darts, rapiers, battle-axes, maces, spears, polished kuntas, short shafts and hooks, Kurukshetra is again liberally strewn with corpses. Filling the welkin, the cardinal points of the compass, the subsidiary ones, the firmament, and the earth, with the thick buzz of arrows, the twanging of bowstrings, the sound of slapping palms and the rumble of chariot wheels, they fall upon each other madly, blindly.

Encouraged by the uproar, Kshatriyas fight Kshatriyas, anxious to end this long and harrowing war, either in victory or in death. The sound of bowstrings and bows, the trumpeting of elephants and the cries of foot-soldiers and dying men ring out everywhere in hideous cacophony. At the sound of flying arrows and the diverse shouts and roars of brave warriors, the common troops become pale with fear, and many even swoon.

The Sutaputra annihilates a vast number of his enemy troops, including twenty shining Panchala maharathas, with their horses, charioteers, and standards. Then many leading Pandava warriors wheel around and encompass him. Karna troubles that hostile force with showers of astras like the leader of an elephant herd plunging into a lake blooming with lotuses and full of swans. Radheya penetrates the enemy ranks, flourishes his bow, and begins to decapitate them with his arrows like snipping flowers off their stalks; and not one among them needs the touch of a second arrow from him. The shields and coats of mail smashed and cut away fall in a hail on the earth.

Like a charioteer whipping his horses, Karna with arrows that pierce armour and bodies like butter, takes the life that quickens them; he surely finds the wrist guards of his enemies who are perceivable only by their bowstrings. Like a whole pride of lions hunting herds of deer, Karna brings down the Pandus, Srinjayas and Panchalas that come within range of his arrows.

Dhrishtadyumna, prince of the Panchalas, O Rajan, and the sons of Draupadi, Madri's twins and Yuyudhana unite against Karna. While the other great warriors recklessly fall on one another with maces, short clubs and spiked bludgeons; they leap high into the air and utter loud shouts of challenge. They die, gushing blood from their limbs, and with their brains and eyes torn out. As they lie there dead, with faces shining like pomegranates, their beautiful mouths filled with blood, they appear to be still alive.

Others, in that vast ocean of war, mangled, dissected, truncated, slain with battle-axes, short arrows, hooks, spears and lances, fall gory and lifeless, like sandalwood trees cut down and oozing their cool blood-red sap onto the receiving earth.

Warriors now long past any count, horsemen and foot-soldiers lie on Kurukshetra, with arms hewn off by razor-faced, wedge-headed or crescent-tipped arrows, their faces and limbs like crushed lotuses and faded wildflower garlands. Horses, and tuskers with their trunks cut off, continue to fall like hills and mountains, and perish in their thousands. Broken chariots, standards, royal parasols lie strewn all over the battlefield. The beautiful shapes of elephants, horses and men, O Rajan, resemble clothes fouled with filth, and are repulsive to look at.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Your son orders his elephant warriors to move against Dhrishtadyumna, determined to finish him. Many men skilled in the use of war elephants, the Easterners, the Southerners, the Angas, the Vangas, the Pundras, the Magadhas, the Tamraliptakas, the Mekalas, the Koshalas, the Madras, the Dasharnas and the Nishadas join the Kalingas, O Bhaarata, to attack the Panchala forces with spears and arrows.

Drupada's son Dhrishtadyumna shoots back at those fearsome elephants that their riders goad forward with their heels, toes and hooks. He strikes each of those beasts, huge as the hills with ten, eight, or six keen barbs. Seeing those elephants surround the prince of the Panchalas, like clouds that cover the sun, the Pandus and the Panchala warriors hurry to his rescue, and with loud shouts, assail those elephants furiously.

They begin the dance of the Kshatriyas to the music of their bowstrings and the warriors keep time with the sound of their slapping palms. Nakula and Sahadeva, the sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas, Satyaki, Sikhandi and Chekitana vigorously attack those elephants from every side. The Mleccha hastikas prod the elephants until they are infuriated and drag down men, horses and chariots with their trunks and crush them underfoot. They gore many with the points of their tusks, and some they raise aloft and dash down on the ground; others they lift on their tusks and crash down, lancing fear through the enemy.

Satyaki shoots a long arrow with great force at the elephant of the king of the Vangas, pierces its heart and it drops dead. The Vanga king is now exposed and the Satwata hero despatches him even as he leaps off his felled beast's back.

Meanwhile, with three arrows shot with great care, Sahadeva strikes Pundra's elephant, as it charges him like a moving mountain, and takes away its standard, hastikas, armour and life. Sahadeva then moves to fight the king of the Angas.

However, his twin Nakula pre-empts Sahadeva and engages the Anga king, pierces him with three long arrows, each like the rod of Yama, and his enemy's elephant with a hundred arrows. The king casts a full eight hundred javelins at Nakula that coruscate like the rays of the sun but all of which Madri's son of unearthly handsomeness splits into three slivers. Then, with a crescent-tipped arrow, Nakula cuts off Anga's head, felling him from his beast.

On the death of their king, the Anga fighters all charge Nakula on their elephants covered in golden armour, which look like blazing mountains, their banners fluttering in the breeze. The Mekalas, Utkalas, Kalingas, Nishadas and Tamraliptakas support them. However, the Pandus, the Panchalas and the Somakas rush to Nakula's rescue.

A fierce battle breaks out between the maharathas and the elephant-warriors; the former attack with their arrows while the latter hurl lances by the thousands. The Pandava shafts strike the frontal lobes, limbs, tusks and adornments of the elephants and split and mangle them. With four and sixty flashing arrows, Sahadeva kills eight elephants which fall with their riders. Nakula, too, that delighter of his race, bending his outstanding bow with great vigour, kills many elephants with his unerring shafts.

Then Satyaki, Dhrishtadyumna and the sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas and Sikhandi cascade arrows on those massive beasts, and the hilly creatures collapse like a mountain being blown apart by many gashes of lightning and thunder. The leaders of the Pandava maharathas, after killing those elephants, cast their gazes balefully on the enemy army, which promptly flees like a river that has broken its banks.

Now, having put your army to flight, those great warriors who fight for Pandu's son turn on Karna and attack him savagely.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'While Sahadeva is savaging your army, O Rajan, Dusasana confronts him, cousin against cousin. Such a duel ensues between them that all the maharathas present shout and wave their bright scarves. Your son strikes the mighty Sahadeva's chest with three thudding arrows; Dusasana responds in a blur, first with one golden shaft, then with seventy more, and strikes Sahadeva's sarathy with another three.

Dusasana rives Sahadeva's bow and drills him with three and seventy arrows across his arms and chest. Sahadeva picks up a sword, whirls it around and hurls it at your son's chariot; that sword of great power destroys Dusasana's bow and then falls onto the earth like a snake from the sky.

The valiant Sahadeva sweeps up another bow and looses a shaft bright as Yama's danda at Dusasana, which, with his keen sword, your prince cuts in two as it flies towards him. Your son spins his sharp sword and launches it at his enemy even as he quickly picks up another bow and arrow. However, with the greatest ease, Sahadeva knocks that sword to the ground. Next, O Bhaarata, Dusasana shoots sixty-four whistling shafts at Sahadeva's chariot, which also Madri's sage son easily consumes with five shafts of his own, and then looses a veritable storm of arrows at Dusasana.

Your son cuts down each of Sahadeva's arrows and the very earth resounds with his fierce shout!

Dusasana strikes Sahadeva and his charioteer with nine thunderbolts. A furious Sahadeva fits a fearful shaft like the Destroyer himself to his bowstring and, drawing his bow into a circle, unleashes that missile at your son. The astra plunges right through Dusasana's kavacha, his great body and flashes into the earth. Your son, that great maharatha, collapses onto the floor of his chariot and his brave sarathy spirits away from the deadly field, thought Sahadeva rakes him all the while with burning shafts.

After he vanquishes Dusasana, Sahadeva turns his attention to Duryodhana's division and attacks it ferociously. Indeed, O Bhaarata, as an angry man crushes a swarm of ants underfoot, that son of Pandu destroys the Kaurava host.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'A rampaging Karna checks Nakula as he attacks and routs the Kaurava divisions. With a superior smile, Nakula tells Karna, "It has taken a long time, wretch, but through the will of the gods we finally meet on the battlefield. You are the root of all these evils and this horrible war, and you are the reason why so many men have died and are still dying. I will kill you today and dispel the fever of my heart."

Karna replies soberly, as befits a prince and an archer, "Strike me, O Shura, we want to see your mettle. Like a true Kshatriya, boast only after you achieve something in battle. Fight me to the best of your ability and I promise to quash your pride."

The Sutaputra scathes Nakula with three and seventy shafts; Madri's beautiful son responds with eighty narachas like venomous snakes. Karna breaks his antagonist's bow with one inexorable arrow and draws blood from him with thirty more. These pass through his armour and drink his blood like nagas drinking water after burrowing through the earth.

Nakula takes up another formidable golden bow, pierces Karna with twenty arrows, his sarathy with three, and cleaves his bow with a razor-headed shaft. Then, with a smile, he gashes the disarmed Karna with three hundred searing barbs. Seeing Nakula overwhelm Karna, O Rajan, all the maharathas present, and the Devas in the heavens, are filled with great wonder.

Karna takes up another bow and pierces Nakula's right shoulder with five arrows. Nakula, dauntless, rakes Karna with seven shafts and, again, Rajan, cracks one of the horns of his bow. But the awesome Suryaputra seizes up a fresh bow and now fills the firmament with his arrows. Nakula destroys them all with his own shafts which crowd the sky as if with myriads of fireflies. Indeed, the sky quickly seems to swarm with locust flights, dark with the hundreds of arrows that the magnificent twain cover it with.

Golden arrows flow in a continuous stream like rows of cranes winging through the air. With the sky so full of arrows, which hide even the sun, no bird ranging the air can fly down to the earth. The two noble warriors are luminous, like two suns at the end of the yuga.

Karna's gales decimate the Somakas, while Nakula spreads death through your warriors, tossing your legions about at will like a tempest some fleecy clouds. The two armies retreat beyond the range of the astras of the mighty twosome, and are soon mere spectators of their scintillating duel.

Now freely using their Devastras, O Rajan, they set the field alight with their luculent archery. Nakula's shafts, fletched with kanka and peacock feathers, and Karna's, seem to float in the firmament and to create a vast vault of arrows, making both warriors invisible, yes, truly like the clouds shrouding the sun and the moon.

The son of Adhiratha's arrows, shot with great force from every side, have little effect on Nakula, like the clouds on the sun. Karna, smiling haughtily, looses a barrage of shafts, thousands upon thousands of them, so that a cupola of arrows seems to rest on Kurukshetra, like clouds casting a shadow. Yet again, he shatters the noble Nakula's bow, and in a scarlet flash, despatches his sarathy and four horses to Yama's land.

Karna pulverises the ratha, standard, gada, sword and shield adorned with a hundred moons, and brutally beheads the protectors of Nakula's chariot wheels, so Madri's son suddenly finds himself standing on bare ground armed with just a spiked club. He raises that cudgel above his head with a defiant roar but Karna blasts it into dust with a flurry of arrows. Seeing his adversary weaponless, Karna lacerates him with a hundred shafts, but with great and almost loving care, so he does not wound him grievously.

His attack forces the mighty Nakula to withdraw in great confusion. Laughing repeatedly, Radheya pursues him and pulls Nakula up with his great bow, stopping Madri's son by restraining him with bow and string around his neck. The son of Pandu looks like the moon in the firmament within a halo of light, or a white cloud girdled by Indra's dhanusha.

Karna says, "Look how vain were your earlier boasts, Nakula. Dare you repeat them now, boy? O Pandava, fight your equals and not those that are immeasurably superior to you. O child, little one, do not feel humiliated but go back home, or go to Krishna and Arjuna."

With this, Karna removes his bow from around Nakula's throat and turns away from him—for the oath he had sworn to Kunti, as well as because his dharma forbade him from killing an already helpless enemy. In terrible shame, Nakula takes himself to Yudhishtira's chariot and, his head hung, climbs into it, burning with humiliation and sighing like a snake caught in a jar.

After he vanquishes Nakula, Karna rides against the Panchalas, his chariot flying many gorgeous pennants and drawn by horses white as the moon.

There is a great uproar among the Pandavas when they see the new Kaurava senapati assail the Panchala chariot divisions. Rolling all over the battlefield like a racing wheel, the Suta's son fetches great carnage there, just when the sun has reached his meridian. We see many Panchala warriors without horses, chariots with broken wheels, axles and with torn standards and pennants.

Numerous elephants wander deranged over the field torn by arrows, as if they have been scalded in a forest fire. Others with their round temples split open, bathed in blood, or with trunks lopped off, or with their armour cut away, or their tails severed, fall screaming in pain, all struck by the terrible Karna. Other elephants, terrified by the shafts and lances of Radheya, stampede and run at him, like insects toward a blazing fire, and he fells them without mercy. Other leviathans gore each other in frenzy and bleed like mountains with red rivulets running down their breasts. Horses of the best breed, without their armoured breastplates, their ornaments of silver, brass and gold, their trappings, bridle-bits, yak-tails, saddle-cloths and saddles fallen from their backs, and with their heroic riders all slain, dash wild-eyed and directionless everywhere across Kurukshetra.

We see, O Bhaarata, so many horsemen, although wearing armour and helmets, stabbed and gored with lances and swords, with some limbs hacked away, or killed or being killed, or trembling horribly with fear. We see gold embellished chariots, yoked to fleet horses being hauled directionless, for their charioteers are dead. Some of these have their axles and poles broken, others their wheels, flagpoles or their shafts.

Karna's firestorms of arrows incinerate many maharathas who wander about without their chariots, turning them to ash pillars. Many lie lifeless on the field weaponless, while some still clasp their weapons in dead hands. Elephants, studded with clusters of jewels like stars, adorned with rows of beautiful bells, and decked with different coloured variegated banners, lumbering about, their riders and their very minds and hearts and senses lost. Karna's arrows dissever heads and arms, bisect torsos and other limbs, and these lie scattered everywhere—some twitching, other writhing and yet other still.

The Pandava warriors meet with a great and brutal disaster at the hands of Karna. He slaughters the Srinjayas, as they blindly ride against him, like insects swarming at a blazing fire. Soon, as that maharatha is mowing down the Pandava legions, the Kshatriyas try to avoid him as if he is the very yuga fire. Those of the Panchala maharathas, who survive the slaughter, run. Karna pursues those broken and fleeing warriors and looses his arrows at them even as the sun, dispeller of darkness, scorches all beings at high noon.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Shouting "Stop and fight me!" Prince Uluka confronts your son Yuyutsu, who fights for the Pandavas, as that prince razes your son's vast army.

Yuyutsu responds with a winged arrow that strikes Uluka with great force. A bristling Uluka rives your son's bow with a razor-headed arrow and pierces him with a barbed shaft. His eyes red as roses, Yuyutsu picks up another formidable bow and first drills Uluka with sixty arrows, then injures his charioteer before turning his attention back to the prince. Uluka lacerates Yuyutsu with twenty golden arrows, and cuts down his lofty golden standard, and drops it in front of his chariot.

Now quite beside himself with rage, Uluka bloodies your prince's torso with five stunning shafts; Yuyutsu recovers quickly, O Bharatasattama, and decapitates Yuyutsu's charioteer with a broad-headed arrow slick with oil. He targets his four horses and then rakes Yuyutsu himself with five more arrows, forcing your son to find another chariot. After he bests Yuyutsu in that short duel, Uluka speeds away towards the Panchalas and the Srinjayas and tears into them with his stormy missiles.

Meanwhile, your son Srutakarman deprives the maharatha Satanika of his horses, charioteer and chariot in the twinkling of an eye. However, Srutakarman remains standing on his broken ratha and hurls a great mace at your son smashing his chariot, horses and charioteer into pieces and bloody pulp. Both Kuru-Praviras, having lost their chariots, retreat from the encounter, glaring at each other. While your son mounts Vivingsu's ratha, Satanika quickly climbs into Prativindhya's.

Sakuni strikes Sutasoma with raging flurries of arrows, but fails to shake the latter. Sutasoma envelops Sakuni, his father's enemy, with thousands of sizzling barbs. However, Sakuni, that seasoned warrior and master in all kinds of warfare, destroys all those shafts before they reach him, and strikes Sutasoma squarely with three more. He then swiftly destroys his opponent's horses and standard and kills his charioteer, drawing a shout of wonder from those who watch.

Sutasoma leaps down from his chariot, takes up another bow and a firm stance, and shrouds Sakuni's chariot with a tempest of golden-winged shafts. The illustrious son of Subala sees those showers of arrows fly towards him like a locust swarm; unmoved, he stands firm and cuts the lot down. The warriors all around, as well as the Siddhas in the firmament, all applaud this wonderful feat of Sutasoma fighting the chariot-mounted Sakuni on foot.

Sakuni destroys his adversary's bow and quivers. Sutasoma draws a sword of the hue of the blue lotus with an ivory grip, roars, and whirls it overhead as he circles a wary Sakuni who knows that the sword is as deadly as the rod of death. Brandishing that blade, Sutasoma displays, O Rajan, all the fourteen different kinds of manoeuvres. He wheels, whirls, makes side-thrusts, springs forward and leaps high, treads air, and flails forward and upwards.

Sakuni looses a clutch of arrows at his antagonist, who cuts them all down with his astonishing blade. Thwarted, Subala's son once more angrily unleashes a volley like serpents at the prince. With celerity and skill that equal Garuda's, Sutasoma cuts all these down as well with his marvellous blade. Then, with a most special shaft, Sakuni breaks that bright and magical sword in two, even as Sutasoma dances with it. Maharatha Sutasoma dances back six steps and hurls the half of the sword in his grasp, decked with gold and gemstones, at his enemy and rives Sakuni's bow.

Immediately, Sutasoma runs to the great chariot of Srutakirti for refuge. Sakuni takes up another massive invincible bow, and now turns towards the Pandava army.

A roar of alarm arises in that part of the army when they see the son of Subala on his chariot, fearlessly attacking the Pandava host. The onlookers watch him mow down those large and proud divisions, bristling with heroes and their weapons, just as the chief of the Devas once razed the Daitya army.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Kripa, O Bhaarata, faces Dhrishtadyumna, like a Sarabha in the forest facing a proud lion. Held up by Kripa, Prishata's son Dhrishtadyumna cannot advance at all. Suddenly, all are afraid that Dhrishtadyumna's end is at hand. Maharathas and horsemen are dispirited and say, "Undoubtedly, Sharadvata's mighty son is burning to avenge Drona's death. Will Dhrishtadyumna escape the ire of Kripa? How will this vast army escape this danger? Will this fearsome Brahmana not kill all of us? His appearance is like that of the Destroyer himself, and he will fight like another Drona today. This awesome Acharya is invincible in battle and today the usually mild one is full of rare fury."

As Dhrishtadyumna and Kripa face each other, warriors of both armies exclaim similar fears. Drawing a deep breath of rage, Kripa begins to target all Dhrishtadyumna's vital marmas, while the Panchala stands dazed, not knowing what to do.

His charioteer tells him, "All is not well with you, O son of Prishata. Never before have I seen you so overcome and dismayed in battle. It is fortunate that the great Brahmana's arrows do not all find their mark. I will turn the chariot around, like a river turned back by the sea. I do not think that you can face the Brahmana today; he appears to have destroyed your assurance."

Dhrishtadyumna slowly replies, “My mind is numb, perspiration covers my limbs, my body trembles and my hair stands on end. Avoid a duel with the Brahmana and drive me to Arjuna. I promise you, Suta, if you take me safely to either Arjuna or Bhimasena, I will see that you prosper.”

The charioteer whips the horses and drives to where the mighty Bhimasena is battling your troops. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna’s chariot break away, Kripa gives chase and shoots hundreds of shafts at it, repeatedly blowing his conch, much like Indra pursuing the Danava Namuchi.

The invincible Sikhandi, the cause of Bhishma’s death, confronts Hridika’s son Kritavarman who wears a broad smile as he fights him. Sikhandi strikes the maharatha of the Hridikas with five keen broad-headed shafts in his shoulder-joint. Kritavarman first responds by piercing his enemy with sixty winged arrows and then with a single barb he smilingly breaks his bow. A livid Sikhandi picks up another bow, and shouting, “Wait, Wait!” looses ninety golden winged shafts, shot with great force but they merely glance off Kritavarman’s armour. Seeing this, Sikhandi splits Kritavarman’s bow with a razor-headed arrow and excoriates his enemy’s powerful frame with eighty arrows. Kritavarman bleeds from his limbs like a jar with holes in it leaking its contents. Covered in blood, the Bhoja king looks rather stunning, like a mountain, O Rajan, streaked with streams of fluid red chalk after a heavy rain.

The powerful Kritavarman takes up another bow and pierces Sikhandi’s shoulder. With his shafts sticking out from his shoulder-joint, Sikhandi looks like some majestic tree with spreading branches and twigs. Having wounded each other, the two resemble a pair of bulls that have gored each other. Determined to finish each other, the two maharathas circle each other a thousand times in their chariots.

Then Kritavarman shoots the son of Prishata with seventy shafts with wings of gold and whetted on stone, and a final dreadful arrow that almost fells the Panchala prince. Sikhandi staggers and supports himself by holding on to his flagstaff and gasps for breath. His charioteer whisks him away from the fight. After this defeat, O Rajan, the badly beaten Pandava army flees en masse from the field.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Swetavahana, O Rajan, overwhelms your army like the wind blowing away cotton heaps. The Trigartas, the Sibis, the Kauravas, the Salwas, the Samsaptakas and the Narayanas bear the fury of his onslaught. Satyasena, Chandradeva, Mitradeva, Satrunjaya, Susruta's son, Chitrasena, Mitravarman and Susarman, king of the Trigartas, surrounded by his brothers and sons, all mighty archers and famed at arms, abruptly counter-attack, shooting a solid swath of arrows at Arjuna, like a fierce flash flood of water rushing towards the ocean.

However, those warriors, in their hundreds of thousands, dissipate when they reach Arjuna, like snakes at the sight of Garuda. Though mowed down, they continue to fall on the son of Pandu like insects helplessly drawn to a blazing fire. Satyasena strikes Arjuna with three arrows, Mitradeva with three and sixty, Chandradeva with seven, Mitravarman with three and seventy arrows, Susruta's son with seven, Satrunjaya with twenty, and Susharman with nine. Thus beset by so many warriors, Arjuna retaliates radiantly; he pierces the son of Susruta with seven arrows, Satyasena with three, Satrunjaya with twenty, Chandradeva with eight, Mitradeva with a hundred, Srutasena with three, Mitravarman with nine, and Susarman with eight.

Dhananjaya kills king Satrunjaya with a burst of whetted arrows, beheads Susruta's son, and without a moment's pause, despatches Chandradeva too. He continues fighting the other maharathas vigorously and stops them with five arrows each.

A spirited Satyasena hurls a formidable javelin at Krishna and utters a loud shout of triumph as the iron-tipped missile with a golden shaft passes through the left arm of the noble Madhava and dives into the earth. Krishna's whip and reins fall down from his hands. Seeing Vasudana's arm bleed, Arjuna's eyes turn crimson, and he says to his divine sarathy, "O Mahabaho, take the chariot to Satyasena, I mean to send him to Yama."

Kesava quickly picks up the whip and the reins and brings the chariot to face Satyasena's ratha. An angry Dhananjaya cannot countenance the Lord of the Universe being wounded; in a flash, he severs Satayasena's head from his throat with a wedge-headed arrow, and the large head decked with earrings falls spraying blood to the ground before all the army. Arjuna turns next on Chitravarman, despatches him with a slew of deadly shafts and then his suta with a keen calf-toothed barb. Still infuriated at seeing Krishna bleed, the mighty Partha mows down thousands of the Samsaptakas. He cuts off illustrious Mitrasena's head with a razor-headed arrow with wings of silver, and strikes Susharman through his shoulder.

The Samsaptakas themselves are now incensed and surround Dhananjaya and attack him with roars that resound all across the field. Maharatha Jishnu, of immeasurable soul and powerful like Sakra himself, is further roused and invokes the Aindrastra. From that single missile, thousands of arrows issue endlessly. Kurukshetra resounds with a din of breaking chariots and their standards, quivers, arrows, horses, spears, swords, maces, spiked clubs, darts, lances, axes, and sataghnis with wheels.

Heads decked with diadems, necklaces, angadas and keyuras, O Bhaarata, and gorgets, cuirasses, coats of mail, chatras and chamaras, lie scattered on the yawning field of absolute violence. Heads adorned with earrings, with beautiful eyes, each like a full moon, look like stars in the firmament. Bodies beyond all count of slain warriors lie on the ground, adorned with sandalwood paste, garlands of flowers and rich, fine robes. Kurukshetra looks like the heavens teeming with vapoury forms.

As Arjuna continually kills his enemies and strikes down elephants and horses with his lucific volleys, the battlefield soon becomes impassable with the bodies of slain princes, Kshatriyas of great prowess, and fallen elephants and horses, and there is no room for the wheels of Arjuna's chariot to move. My lord, it is as if the wheels themselves have stopped in fright at the thought of moving through that bloody mire. However, then, his horses, endued with the speed of the mind or the wind, with a great effort again haul the magnificent ratha forward.

Thus does Pandu's son put your army to savage rout, and your troops turn tail without leaving even the least remnant to face the inexorable enemy. Pritha's son Arjuna is magnificent as a great smokeless fire.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana, O Rajan, fearlessly rounds on Yudhishtira, as the Dharmaraja devours your army with his missiles. Yudhishtira whirls around to face your son, as that maharatha comes charging recklessly towards him, roaring, "Stop, stop!"

Duryodhana replies with nine sharp arrows that pierce Yudhishtira and then gore his charioteer as well. Yudhishtira retaliates first with three and ten whistling arrows with wings of gold loosed at Duryodhana; with four more heavy shafts, he kills his four horses and with a fifth, beheads his charioteer. With the sixth arrow he drops the Kuru king's standard to the ground, with the seventh rives his bow, and with the eighth cleaves his sword. With yet another five arrows, Yudhishtira severely wounds Duryodhana, drawing fonts of blood from his cousin.

Duryodhana jumps down from his chariot and stands on the ground alone and in great peril. Karna, Aswatthaman, Kripa and others rush to defend him. Yudhishtira leads the Pandavas to confront them and a ferocious battle breaks out. They blow thousands of horns and conches and a din of a million voices arises as the Panchalas clash with the Kauravas; men, elephants and rathikas fight with no thought but to kill or die. The myriad duelling pairs of maharathas and animals, all using diverse kinds of weapons, present a resplendent sight as these Kshatriyas flit everywhere, with great skill and energy, observing noble Kshatriya dharma again under Karna's command, after Drona's death.

However, soon enough, the battle degenerates into an atavistic encounter of madmen, in which the combatants show no ruth or temperance. The chariot-warriors target elephants; elephants gore horses and horsemen with their tusks, or seize and fling them down with great force so their bodies are blown apart; horsemen surround lone horses and massacre them; they attack elephants as these great beasts wander over the field, and slaughter them from behind. Many mighty tuskers, struck by cunning foot-soldiers with fierce spears, scream in pain and stampede, trampling their own troops as well as the enemy.

Some of the more intrepid and powerful foot-soldiers are able to kill many elephant-warriors and their beasts. Others astride massive elephants chase down the foot-soldiers, who run from them but are overtaken and gored and crushed to pulp beneath stupendous feet; yet others are seized in long curling trunks and flung high into the air and impaled deftly, horribly, on curved tusks. The elephants trap the other foot-soldiers adroitly under their stupendous feet and then roll them awfully along the ground until they are reduced to shapeless lengths of crushed flesh, bone and gore. Some the elephants seize with their trunks, whirl them around like fans and fling them far to their deaths.

Many elephants that confront other elephants are torn with spears, lances and darts—their cheeks, temporal lobes and between their tusks; while the bellies of others are slashed open so hot entrails and faeces fall out, and they sink dead onto their knees with dismal sighs and bellows.

In that dreadful battle, horsemen impale foot-soldiers with their lances and pin them down to the ground, where they writhe and die crying out piteously. Elephants attack chariot-warriors, and plucking them out of their rathas, hurl them down with great force, shattering their bodies. Cloth-yard shafts find their mark and kill some hulking mastodons, which collapse like mountain peaks struck by thunderbolts. Individual combatants pummel each other with their fists or, seizing each other by their hair, drag each other around before one is flung down and slain. Enemies push each other down violently and then set their feet on their enemy's chests and behead them. Some frenzied soldiers kick already dead men, some decapitate a falling enemy, while many run living ones through with spears and glinting blades.

In that atrocious melee, O Bhaarata, fighting men use all means, fair and foul, to prevail brutally over their foes. Some strike each other down slyly from behind, against all tenets of a dharma yuddha. In that macabre dimension of the general engagement, thousands of headless trunks stand upright on the grisly field for long moments before toppling over. Weapons and coats of mail, drenched with gore, look glorious, like starched cloth dyed gorgeous crimson.

The battle is like the tumultuary current of the Ganga in spate, as it seems to fill the whole universe with its uproar. In the manic grip of absolute bloodlust, the warriors fail to distinguish friend from enemy, as kings bent on victory cut down anyone they can reach, enemies and comrades alike. With broken chariots, fallen elephants, horses and dead men covering the bloody ground, Kurukshetra, field of truth, field of death, is soon impassable on all sides.

Karna slaughters the Panchalas while Dhananjaya decimates the Trigartas and Bhimasena annihilates the Kurus and all their elephant divisions. Thus, both the Kuru and Pandava troops destroy each other in the sole attempt to win great fame, as the sun passes his zenith in mid heaven.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'I have heard from you, O Sanjaya, incidents of great poignancy and unbearable grief as well as of the losses that my sons have sustained. From what you say about the manner in which they fought the battle, it is my certain conviction that the Kauravas are doomed. Duryodhana lost his chariot in his duel with Yudhishtira, so how did his battle with the Dharmaraja continue? Tell me now about the battle which was fought in the afternoon? Tell me all in detail, for you are a skilled raconteur, O Sanjaya.'

Sanjaya says, 'When both armies engage each other in battle, your son Duryodhana, O Rajan, riding another chariot and seething like a poisonous snake, tells his charioteer, "Fly to where the royal son of Pandu clad in mail shines under the royal chatra held over his head."

Seeing him come, Yudhishtira, looking like an angry elephant, urges his own charioteer, "Ride straight at Suyodhana."

Then those two cousins, invincible maharathas both, meet again to fight and maul each other with arrows. Duryodhana splits Yudhishtira's bow; the Pandava, his eyes turning red, takes up another and destroys Duryodhana's bow and standard. Beside themselves with fury, they shower storms of shafts at each other; they are like a pair of angry lions or two raging bulls.

They circle each other, always probing to find a weakness and wound the other grievously. Bleeding and stuck with shafts shot from bows drawn to their fullest stretch, the two look brilliant, like flowering kinsukas. They repeatedly give vent to tigerish roars and make echoing sounds with their palms and pull lustily on their bowstrings to make them twang loudly and blow their conches with great gusto.

Yudhishtira sees a momentary opening and gores your son’s chest with three thunderous shafts. Your royal son strikes back with five golden winged barbs and also flings a fierce spear like a blazing brand. As it flares towards him with a loud crackle, Yudhishtira cuts it into three slivers, and then drills Duryodhana with five arrows. The great and occult spear falls tamely, extinguished.

Your son seamlessly unleashes nine razorine arrows at Yudhishtira. Deeply struck, his blood spouting from those wounds, Yudhishtira, unmoved, looses a flashing missile at Suyodhana, which passes right through his body and leaves him dazed. Recovering swiftly, the incensed Duryodhana rushes at Yudhishtira, brandishing a mace even like Yama with his bludgeon, to kill his cousin, to have done with this endless war!

Yudhishtira casts a lance like a streak of lightning at Duryodhana, felling him in a dead faint. But then, Bhima remembers his own vow and says to Yudhishtira, “You must not kill him, O Rajan, for I have sworn to kill all the sons of Dhritarashtra.” Yudhishtira restrains himself and allows your son to live when he could have had his life.

At this time, Kritavarman arrives there and finds your royal son Duryodhana lying unconscious and in great distress and danger. Bhima takes up his mace, adorned with gold and flaxen strings, and attacks him. A tumultuous battle breaks out between your troops and the enemy that afternoon, O Rajan, and death rules Kurukshetra.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Your warriors led by Karna return to the battle which is indeed like the Devasura yuddha of old. Spurred on by the pandemonium created by the elephants, men, chariots, horses and conches, the maharathas, foot-soldiers, horsemen and elephant-warriors advance against the enemy and all lay into one another with every kind of weapon. Yet again the earth is littered with human heads that wear beautiful diadems and earrings, with faces that have strong teeth, fair faces and dark, handsome eyes and large noses—faces which resemble the lotus, the sun, or the moon.

Thousands upon thousands of elephants, men and horses lie dead, killed with spiked clubs, short bludgeons, darts, lances, hooks, bhusundis and maces. The blood that they shed forms another ghastly river on the battlefield and, with the boundless corpses of warriors and animals lying thickly everywhere, with their pallid faces and gaping wounds, the whole place looks like the domain of Yama, king of the dead, at the time of the pralaya at yuga's end.

O Kurusreshta, your troops and your sons who resemble the Devaputras, with a host of invincible warriors that shine with fierce beauty, ride against Satyaki, bull of Sini's race, with a great rumble and a roar as loud as that of the vast deep, like the army of the Asuras or that of the Devas. Karna, Suryaputra, like the king of the Devas himself in strength and even like the younger brother of Indra, strikes Satyaki with arrows brilliant like the rays of the sun. Yuyudhana envelops Karna, his chariot, chargers and charioteer with a myriad of arrows like poisonous snakes.

Many atirathas of your army with elephants, chariots and foot-soldiers rush to support Karna, when they see him beset by Satyaki. However, the Pandava warriors led by the sons of Drupada swiftly rout that force vast as the ocean and cause a fearful carnage of men, chariots, steeds and elephants.

Meanwhile, the two shuras, Arjuna and Kesava, say their daily prayers, duly worship the Lord Bhava and join the battle against your troops, determined to exterminate them. The Kurus look fearfully at their chariot as it comes thundering at them, drawn by white horses, with banners floating in the wind and with a rumble like the roar of the clouds. Arjuna bends the Gandiva and, as if dancing on his chariot, fills the firmament and all the directions with a pralaya of arrows, not leaving the smallest space empty. Like the tempest scatters clouds, the son of Pandu smashes countless chariots that are magnificent as deva rathas, and sends as many war elephants, numberless horsemen with their horses, hastikas, charioteers and foot-soldiers to Yama's realm.

Duryodhana stands against that unassailable maharatha and veritable Yama, and strikes him with some perfect shafts. Arjuna demolishes your son's bow and standard, kills his sarathy and horses with seven thunder flashes, and with an eighth shaft cuts down his royal parasol so it falls in shame to the ground.

Seeing his chance, Arjuna unleashes a deadly devastra at his cousin, but intrepid Duryodhana slices it into seven pieces. Tireless Dhanajaya splits Aswatthaman's bow and kills his four horses, and he also rives the bows of Kripa and Dusasana, and destroys Kritavarman's bow as well as his standard and slaughters his horses.

Arjuna turns his attention to Karna, who is forced to leave Satyaki and defend himself. He finds Krishna with twenty arrows and Arjuna first with three telling barbs and then repeatedly with many dense volleys. Karna feels no fatigue despite fighting furiously, without let, like an enraged Indra. Meanwhile, Satyaki races up and drills Karna first with nine and ninety blinding arrows, and again with a hundred.

All the leading warriors among the Parthas—Yudhamanyu, Sikhandi, the sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas, and Uttamaujas, Yuyutsu, Madri's twins and Dhrishtadyumna—surround Karna. The divisions of the Chedis, the Karushas, the Matsyas, Kaikeyas, the mighty Chekitana and Dharmarajan Yudhishtira, all with chariots, horses, elephants and valiant foot-soldiers, arrive and all together deluge Karna with different kinds of astras, shouting insults at him, both desperate and determined to kill him.

But the meridian Karna disperses his assailants with his astras like the tornado uprooting trees that stand in its way. Inflamed, he destroys chariot-warriors, elephants and riders, cavalry, and large bands of Pandavas foot-soldiers, who flee the field, devoid of weapons and with limbs torn and mangled. Then a smiling Arjuna thwarts Karna with his own astras which cover the sky, the earth, and all the points of the compass with cataracts of arrows. Arjuna's missiles fall like heavy clubs, spiked bludgeons, sataghnis and thunderbolts. Without mercy, he annihilates the Kaurava force—infantry, cavalry, chariots and elephants; those that survive his transcendent onslaught wander dazed and helpless across death's field, giving vent to piteous wails. Great hosts of horses, men and elephants perish there or are grievously wounded and run away in fear.

While your warriors are thus engaged in a desperate battle, the sun enters the Asta. Darkness falls, and because of the deepening night and also the thick pall of dust, we can no longer discern what transpires between the two forces, who kills or who is slain. Dreading another night engagement, the Kaurava maharathas retire from the field with all their men. Seeing this, the Parthas are heartened that they have won the day, and they also withdraw from horrific Kurukshetra and return to their encampment. As they go, they mock and jeer at their enemies with diverse atonal sounds on their musical instruments, even as they loudly shout and sing the praises of Krishna and Arjuna.

After those shuras have withdrawn their army, all the troops and all the kings shower blessings upon the Pandavas as those sinless men retire to their tents with some joy in their hearts.

And now the rakshasas, pisachas, jackals and hyenas and every other kind of scavengers and carnivores, swarm onto the horrible field in droves after waiting all day as slavering onlookers to the carnage that has been like the bloody sport of Rudra himself gone berserk. With ravening appetites, with growls and grunts, and the sounds of flesh being torn from bone, bone being cracked and blood being quaffed in absolute glee, they fall greedily to the ample feast before them.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Apparently Arjuna massacred all of you at will. Indeed, it appears that the Destroyer himself would not escape if Arjuna took up arms against Him. Single-handed, Partha attacked Bhadra and gratified Agni. Alone, he subjugated the whole world, vanquished all its kings, and made them pay him tribute. Unaided, with his celestial bow, he slew the Nivatakavachas, and contended with Mahadeva who appeared before him in the guise of a hunter. By himself, he protected the Bharatas, and pleased Bhava. I say that the Kurus deserve praise for standing up to such a warrior. Tell me now, O Suta, what Duryodhana and the others did next.'

Sanjaya says, 'Struck by Arjuna's arrows, wounded and brought down from their chariots, divested of armour and deprived of weapons, their beasts slain, beaten by their enemies and burning with grief, the vain Kauravas enter their tents and once more take counsel together. They look like snakes with fangs drawn, venom removed and trodden upon.

Karna, sighing like an angry snake, wringing his hands, says to Duryodhana, "Arjuna is always careful, determined, and masterful and has great intelligence. Moreover, he has Krishna advising him with the proper course of action at the apt time. Today, he surprised us with that sudden storm of astras. Tomorrow, king of the world, I will frustrate all his designs."

Duryodhana says, “Tathaastu” and gives leave to his commanders and allies to retire to their own tents.

The night passes and, come the dawn, they ready themselves for battle again and sally forth in some good heart. They see Yudhishtira Dharmarajan’s invincible vyuha that he has formed with great care, exactly as prescribed by Brihaspati and Usanas. Duryodhana thinks of the mahatejasvin Karna, the paraviraha with the neck of a bull, equal to Purandara himself in battle, the Maruts in might and Kartavirya in energy and prowess. The heart of not just your son but those of all his troops turn to that hero, the Sutaputra, as one’s heart turns naturally to a dear friend in a time of grave danger and crisis.’

Dhritarashtra asks, ‘What does Duryodhana do next, O Suta, when all thoughts are turned towards Karna? Do my troops look at Radheya like men afflicted with cold turning their faces towards the sun? When the battle begins, does Karna fight manfully and how do the Pandavas counter him? Ah, mahabaho Karna, whose might equals that of Sakra or Vishnu, could indeed single-handedly destroy the Parthas and the Srinjayas. It was relying on Karna’s superhuman prowess that Duryodhana decided to go to war against the sons of Pandu. Now, seeing Yudhishtira dominate Duryodhana, Arjuna raze our legions and watching all the Pandavas display their great might, what does maharatha Karna do?

Alas that the foolish Duryodhana, relying on Karna, hopes to vanquish the Parthas, their sons and Krishna himself in battle. Ah, it is a thing of great grief that Karna, with all his strength and astras and unworldly genius, could not overcome the Pandavas. Sanjaya, without doubt, Fate is supreme and inexorable, and now the evil end of that game of dice has truly arrived! O Suta, in my dotage I have to endure, like so many burning arrows, these heart-rending sorrows brought down on us by all Duryodhna’s vile deeds.

Subala’s son Sakuni is reputed to be a clever and wise man, and Karna and Duryodhana are closer than brothers. When this is so, why is it that I hear only of the repeated defeats and deaths of my sons and their allies? There is truly no one that can face the Pandavas in battle. They break into my army like men into helpless women. Sanjaya, Sanjaya, only fate is supreme.’

Sanjaya says, ‘Rajan, think now of all your own sins—the game of dice that you allowed and encouraged, and all the other crimes that you acquiesced in and abetted, things that possibly most men have by now forgotten. Yet, one should not dwell too much on the past since time and its terrible faults cannot be called back. What you hoped to acquire and achieve through your heinous crimes against your brothers' sons has not come to pass but rather its very reverse has, and the horrors of this most dreadful war of all—because, Rajan, you did not consider dharma when you chose to betray your nephews. Later, again, your heart full of dark greed, you chose to go to war against the Pandavas disregarding all the wise counsel you received that warned you of the dangerous folly of that course.

The carnage that we now witness on Kurukshetra, of our greatest Kshatriyas, is nothing but the natural fruit of the many grave sins and sufferings you inflicted on the sons of Pandu. But the time to rue all that is past now; so do not grieve, O Bharatarishabha. Listen again in detail to the progress of the gruesome war.

After all the others have left for their tents the previous night, Karna comes alone to Duryodhana and says, "Tomorrow, I will fight Pandu's illustrious son Arjuna. Either I will kill him, or he will kill me. For many reasons, and inscrutable fate as well, we two have not yet faced each other in a duel to death. Listen now, O Rajan, to what I say to you. Tomorrow I will not return from battle without killing Arjuna.

Now that our army has lost its greatest warriors, Partha will surely come to contend with me, and especially because I have spent the astra that his father Sakra gave me. The power of my devastras is equal to that of Arjuna's astras. O Bhaarata, Savyasachi was never my equal in speed, dexterity, in the range of arrows we command, in marksmanship, in physical strength, in courage, in the knowledge of astras, or in prowess.

My bow, the Vijaya, is the greatest weapon of its kind. Viswakarman, the celestial artificer, made it to please Indra. At its sound, the Daityas saw the ten points emptied and were defeated. Sakra gave that famed bow to Bhrigu's son Rama, who then gave it to me. With that bow, I will contend with the mighty-armed Arjuna, foremost of victorious warriors, even like Indra fighting the Daityas massed against him. This formidable Vijaya, the gift of Parasurama, is superior to the Gandiva for it was with this bow that the Bhargava subjugated Bhumi, three times seven over, and made lakes of Kshatriya blood to avenge his father Jamadagni. And tomorrow, O Duryodhana, I will bring rare joy to you and your friends by killing Arjuna with it. So let your mind be at rest, my beloved friend, and sleep in peace."

And the next morning, while the two armies are being arrayed, Karna comes again to Duryodhana. He says, "Today, you, your sons and grandsons will reign supreme over the whole earth with her mountains, forest and islands, without an enemy left to oppose you. There is nothing that I cannot achieve, especially since my purpose is to please you, just as a Rishi zealously devoted to dharma and with his soul under control cannot fail to achieve success. Arjuna will not be able to contain me in battle, even as a tree cannot bear the flames of a great fire.

However, I must tell you in what respect I am inferior to Arjuna. The string of his bow is celestial, and his two quivers are inexhaustible. His charioteer is Govinda and I have no sarathy like him. The Gandiva cannot be broken in battle. But Iam the elder Vijaya. So, with regard to our bows, I am superior to Arjuna.

Listen now to those matters in which Partha is superior to me. His charioteer is he of the Dasharha vamsa, Krishna whom all the worlds adore. His golden devaratha, which Agni gave him, is invincible, and his white gandharva horses have the speed of the mind. His celestial standard, the kapi-dhvaja with the image of the shining Hanuman, is awe-inspiring, and Krishna, who is the Creator of the universe, protects his chariot. Though inferior to Arjuna in these things, I still want to fight him.

This Salya, the ornament of royal courts, is Krishna's equal as a sarathy. If he becomes my charioteer, victory will certainly be yours. Let the invincible Salya be my sarathy. Let a number of carriages carry my long shafts as well as those that are fletched with vulture feathers. Let a number of goodly chariots, O Rajan, with excellent horses yoked, always follow me. And today I will prove better than Arjuna.

Salya is also superior to Krishna in another way. Both are masters of horses but there is no one equal to the king of the Madras in might of his arms. Just as there is no one to match me in archery, no one is Salya's equal in the knowledge of horses. If Salya agrees to be my sarathy, I will surely become Partha's superior; why, the very gods with Vasava at their head will not dare attack my ratha. And thus, I will vanquish Arjuna.

If you do what I ask, Duryodhana, you will see today, O Bhaarata, what Karna can achieve in battle. The very Devas and Asuras will not stand against me, so what need be said then of the sons of Pandu, who are mere men?"

After listening to Karna, your son salutes Radheya, and answers him with a happy heart, “O Karna, accomplish all that you say. Equipped with the best quivers and horses, a legion of chariots will follow you to battle. Let as many carriages that you wish bear your long shafts and vulture-feathered arrows. We, as well as all the kings, will follow you in battle.”

Your royal son then approaches the king of the Madras to persuade him to be Karna’s sarathy.”

"Sanjaya says, 'Your son, O Rajan, humbly approaches maharatha Salya, king of the Madras, and affectionately says, "O you of true vows, O you of great good fortune, O shura who instils fear in hostile troops, you have heard Karna. I want to beseech you before all these great kings, bowing my head in humility, out of your love for me, to be Karna's sarathy. With you for his charioteer, Karna will vanquish my enemies. You are Krishna's equal and there is no one else who can take the reins of Karna's horses. Protect Karna then in all ways like Brahma does Maheswara and Krishna does Arjuna.

Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, you, the valiant king of the Bhojas, Subala's son Sakuni, Drona's son Aswatthaman and I, are now the backbone of our army. And so did we divide the Pandava army into different parts that each one of us was responsible to battle. Bhishma and the noble Drona accounted not only for their charges but some part of mine as well. Those two aged Naravyaghras achieved the most impossible feats and the enemy killed them only through deceit. Many other great warriors of our army have also attained swarga, casting off their lives after displaying untold heroism on the field of battle.

O Rajan, the Parthas who were fewer than us at first, have reduced the greater portion of my army and they outnumber us now. You must tell us what we should do now. But, ah, great Salya do whatever we must to prevent the sons of Kunti from entirely exterminating what remains.

The Pandavas have slaughtered my bravest warriors. Only mahabaho Karna and you, who are the greatest maharathas in the world, remain, who are devoted to our cause. O Naravyaghra, Karna is determined to fight Arjuna today. My hopes of victory rest on him. There is no one else in the world other than you who can be the charioteer for Karna as Krishna is for Partha. With Kesava's guidance and protection, you see what Partha has achieved. Arjuna was never before so successful in battle, but here, united with Krishna, his prowess has increased beyond belief. Day after day, he has razed this vast army of Dhritarashtra, until only a mere fraction of it remains, under Karna's command and yours.

Mighty Salya, join forces with Karna today and, together, destroy the enemy. Karna is the greatest maharatha and you are the greatest sarathy. With you as his charioteer, Karna would be invincible even against Sakra leading the Devas, let alone the paltry Pandavas.

I beg you, do not doubt what I say. Even as Surya and Aruna together destroy the darkness, you must unite with Karna and kill Arjuna this day. Let the maharathas of the enemy flee at the sight of you both, radiant as two suns risen on the horizon. O Salya, even as darkness is dispelled at the sight of Surya and Aruna, let the Pandavas with the Panchalas and Srinjayas perish on seeing you and Karna."

But Salya is livid to listen to what Duryodhana says! His brow furrows into three deep crevasses, he repeatedly waves his arms and, rolling his bulging eyes red with anger, that Kshatriya of the massive arms and proud of his lineage, wealth, knowledge and strength, says, "You insult me, son of Gandhari, or surely you are suspicious of my loyalty, since you brazenly ask me, Salya, to be a sarathy to another.

You may regard Karna to be my superior and laud him but I do not consider Radheya to be my equal. O lord of the earth, assign to me a greater part of the enemy and I will destroy that portion in battle and then return home. Or, if you wish, I will fight the enemy single-handed and then watch my prowess!

Kurusattama, men like us never accept any assignment while stung and brooding over an insult. Do not entertain doubts about me and never humiliate me as you have done. Look at my two arms, strong as the Vajra. Behold my wonderful bow, and these arrows in my quivers that resemble virulent snakes. Look at my ratha to which are yoked horses swift as the wind. Duryodhana, look at my golden gada tied up with hemp cords. I can split open the earth, smash down the mountains in my wrath, and dry up the oceans with my oorjas. When you know that I, a great Kshatriya, can put the enemy to rout on my own, why do you seek to make the charioteer of a lowborn Sutaputra?

It is a sin that you even think of assigning such a base and menial task to me! Being Karna's immeasurable superior, I will not obey the commands of a lowly man, and a sinner besides. I came to fight of my own will and out of love for you. Now if you ask me, a great Kshatriya, to obey an evil, lowly Sutaputra, you will surely incur the sin of confusing the superior with the inferior.

Brahma created the Brahmanas from his mouth, the Kshatriyas from his arms, the Vaishyas from his thighs and the Sudras from his feet. As a result of the mixing of these four varnas, O Bhaarata, new ones have been created, which consist of those born of men of superior varnas marrying women of inferior varnas, as well as those born of women of higher castes marrying beneath themselves. According to the shastras, the Kshatriyas are established on the earth as the protectors of the other classes, and they acquire and distribute wealth; the Brahmanas assist at yagnas, teach and accept pure dakshina; the Vaishyas are occupied in agriculture, animal husbandry and giving dakshina; Sudras have been ordained to be the servants of the Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas and the Vaishyas.

So also, the Sutas are the servants of Kshatriyas, and not the other way around! Listen to me, Anagha. I am born into a race of Rajarishis, royal sages, and my coronal locks have undergone the sacred bath. I am also acknowledged the world over as a great maharatha. I deserve the worship and the praises that vabdhis and magadhis render and sing. Being all this, I cannot stoop to be the suta of a suta's son in battle. I will never fight again after being subjected to such a humiliation. Allow me, O son of Gandhari, to return home."

Saying this, an angry Salya stands up quickly and begins to stalk out of that gathering of kings. However, your son, from affection and great regard, stops him and in a sweet and conciliatory manner, tries to pacify him, "Without doubt, O Salya, what you say is true, but I beg you listen to what I have in mind. Karna is not superior to you, nor am I suspicious of you, Rajan. The noble king of the Madras will never do anything wrong and is rightly called Artayani or the descendant of those who always told the truth. O giver of honours, you are called Salya since you are like a barbed arrow to your enemies. O giver of large dakshina at yagnas, may you achieve all that you have said that you will accomplish.

Neither the son of Radha nor I am superior to you in valour that I would ask you to be Karna's charioteer. However, just as Karna is superior to Arjuna as a warrior, the world regards your expertise in managing horses to be better if not twice that of Krishna's."

Salya takes pause and replies, "I am gratified, Duryodhana, that you acknowledge in front of all these troops that I am superior to Devaki's son. For this I will do what you ask and become Karna's sarathy when he engages Partha in battle. However, let Vikartana's son understand that I will say whatever I please to him."

O Bhaarata, your son and Karna readily accept what Salya wants, both of them saying, "Tathaastu!"

'Duryodhana says, "Listen, O king of the Madras, as I tell you in detail about the battle long ago between the Devas and the Asuras as it was related by Maharishi Markandeya to my father. That was a great battle indeed of which the evil Taraka was the cause. We know that the Devas defeated the Daityas and, after their defeat, the three sons of Taraka, named Tarakaksha, Kamalaksha and Vidyunmalin, performed a tapasya of unprecedented severity and kept the most lofty and austere vratas. They emaciated their bodies through harsh penance and because of their self-restraint, atonement, vows and contemplation, Pitamaha Brahma was pleased with them and granted them boons. Together they prayed to Him for the boon of immunity from death, from all beings and forever. The divine Lord and Master of the worlds said to them, 'There is no boon that can confer immorality. So ask me for some other boon that you want.'

The three brothers conferred among themselves long and finally, bowing to Brahma, said, 'O Pitamaha, give us this boon. We will dwell in three sky cities and, with your blessings, roam safely over the earth. After a thousand years, our three cities and we will come together as one. That greatest of gods who can pierce the three cities at that time, with a single shaft, will, O Lord, destroy us.'

Saying, 'Tathaastu—so be it', Brahma left them and returned to his own lofty world.

Filled with joy at having obtained those boons, the three sons of Taraka asked the peerless Asura Mayaa, who is to the Daityas and Danavas what Viswakarman is to the Devas, and whom all the Asuras worship, to create their triad cities for them.

Mayaa wrought, with the vast power he had through his own tapasya, three cities without parallel. One was made of gold and was set in swarga; the second was created with silver and remained aloft in the sky, and the third was made from black iron upon the earth. These, together, cities of every marvel, were called the Tripura and they orbited one another synchronously.

Each city had houses, mansions, lofty walls and porches, and measured a hundred yojanas in width and a hundred in length. Though full of lordly palaces set close to each other, yet the streets were wide and spacious and adorned with mansions and grand gateways. The beautiful city of gold belonged to the illustrious Tarakaksha, the silver city to Kamalaksha, and the iron one to Vidyunmalin. Those three Daitya kings soon assailed the three worlds with their power, and continued to reign from the sanctuary of their Tripura, and, in their swelling hubris, began to ask, 'Who is this Creator?'

To these greatest of Asuras, who had no equal, flocked millions of proud and flesh-eating Danavas whom the Devas had once vanquished and driven into exile; now they streamed into the three cities and Taraka's sons welcomed their magnificent people, who had endured untold hardship hiding from the hunting Devas in deserts and mountain caves and other hidden fastnesses; they welcomed their people with opulent mansions and great wealth. Indeed, Mayaa himself fulfilled all their needs and they lived fearlessly in luxury and grandeur, relying upon him. Whenever any Asura living in the triple cities desired anything, Mayaa fulfilled his wish through his powers.

Tarakaksha had a heroic and mighty son named Hari. He underwent the most austere of tapasyas and gratified the Grandsire. Hari prayed for a boon of him, saying, 'Grant us a lake in our city, such that when persons slain by weapons are immersed in it, they emerge alive and with redoubled strength.'

With Brahma's boon, Hari, son of Tarakaksha, created a lake in his city that revived the dead. In whatever manner a Daitya died, as soon as they immersed him in that lake, he was reborn in his old form and appearance.

Thus restoring their dead, the Daityas began to visit the three worlds with grief and oppression. Because these enemies of the gods sustained no diminution in battle, they became greedy and arrogant, and savagely, recklessly, brought destruction to cities and towns across the universe.

Filled with pride at the boons they had received, they now hunted the Devas and their followers everywhere, wreaking violent revenge on the lords of light for the privation and torment they themselves had suffered. The demons roamed at will through sacred vanas and other realms dear to the Devas, through the peaceful sacred asramas of Rishis, and brought havoc and desecration with them wherever they went, with no regard or respect for anybody.

While the demons persecuted the three worlds, Sakra led the Maruts against them in their cities and cast his Vajra at them from every side. However, through Brahma's blessing, the three cities, the Tripura, were inviolable and Indra could make no dint on any of them nor harm any of the Asuras that lived in them in the least.

Indra and the Devas went to the Grandsire Brahma, to complain to him about the depredations of the Asuras. They told him all about the violence of the Asuras and, bowing before him, asked the divine Pitamaha of the worlds how Tripura, the triple city, could be destroyed.

The illustrious four-faced Deity heard Indra and reassured the Devas, 'He who causes you sorrow offends me too. All Asuras are evil and have always hated the Devas. I am impartial to all beings but it is my law that we must kill those who do not follow dharma. You can destroy Tripura only if you strike all the three cities with a single astra. No one except the great Lord Siva can achieve this. You Adityas should go and beseech Rudra, to become your warrior and he will destroy the Asuras and their cities for you.'

At this, Sakra and the Devas led by Brahma, sought the protection of Sankara, Vrishavahana, Bhava without compare with all their hearts and souls, while chanting the eternal words of the Vedas. They praised that dispeller of all fears, that Universal and Supreme Soul, the One whose Soul pervades all and worshipped him with a stern and most demanding tapasya. And when the Devas had perfectly stilled their bodies, minds and hearts in penance, they saw Umapati Siva as a mass of glory, which has no remote equal in the universe, that Source of everything, that sinless, taintless Self.

They saw that Deity, the Mahatman whose diverse forms they had individually conceived and imagined in their own hearts, and they were all filled with bliss and absolute wonder, as well as some trepidation. Beholding that Unborn one, Vishveswara, the embodiment of all creatures, the Devas and the Maharishis, the Devas all prostrated before blazing Mahadeva and touched the earth with their brows.

He greeted them lovingly, saying, 'Welcome, O Devas!' and raising them up, the lustrous Sankara smilingly asked, 'Tell us the object of your tapasya and your coming here.'

At this, the trembling Devas were somewhat comforted and said, 'Our salutations to you, O Lord, our salutations a thousand times! Our reverences and greetings to you who are the source of all the Devas, O Pinakin who are full of wrath. We give our salutations to you who once destroyed the yagna of Daksha Prajapati and to you who are adored by all the lords of creatures.

Our salutations to you who are always praised, to you who deserve to be praised, to you who are Death's self.

Our salutations to you who are red, to you who are fierce and are blue-throated Nilakantha.

Our salutations to you, O Sulin, who cannot be baffled, O lotus-eyed Kamalaksha.

Our salutations to you who fight with the greatest of weapons, to you who deserve all praise; to you who are pure, to you who are destruction itself, to you Sarvatapana and are irresistible.

Our salutations to you who are the Brahman, to you who lead the life of a brahmachari; to you who are Isana, who are immeasurable, to you who are the Great and Subtle Controller, to you who are clad in tattered deerskin, and who are always engaged in tapasya.

Salutations to you who are tawny, to you who observe the most impossible vratas, to you who wear animal skins; to you who are the sire of Kumara, to you who wield the very greatest of weapons; to you who destroy the afflictions of all that seek your shelter.

Salutations to you who destroy all haters of Brahmanas, to you who are the lord of all trees, the lord of all men, the lord of all kine, and always the lord of yagnas.

Salutations to you who are always at the head of armies; to you, O Trilochana, to you O Mahashaktimaya.

We devote ourselves to you in thought, word and deed. Be gracious to us, most kindly Lord.'

Gratified by their worship, the Holy One reassured them, saying, 'Let your fears be dispelled. Tell me, what can I do for you?'"

'Duryodhana continued, "O Salya, after that Mahatman Siva dispelled the fears of the multitude of Pitris, Devas and Rishis, Brahma greeted Sankara, and said for the benefit of the universe, 'Through your favour, O Lord, the dominance of all creatures is mine. I gave a great boon to the Danavas. Only you, O Lord of the Past and the Future, can destroy those evil spirits who show no regard for anyone and are the enemies of these Devas. The Devas seek your protection and beg you to show them kindness. Slay the Danavas, O Trisulin, and through your grace, let the universe be restored to peace and joy. O Trilokapati, we all seek refuge in you.'

Sthanu said, 'All your enemies will be slain. However, I will not kill them by myself. The enemies of the Devas possess great power. Therefore, all of you united together can destroy your enemies and you shall have half my might as well. Unity is great strength.'

The Devas replied, 'We have experienced their power and we think that the Danavas have twice our energy and might.'

The Holy One said, 'The sinful Asuras, who have transgressed dharma and persecuted you, shall be destroyed. With half of my energy and power, we will kill all these enemies of yours.'

The Devas pleaded, 'O Maheswara, we will not be able to bear half of your oorjas. On the other hand, with half of our combined power, you can kill our enemies.'

The Holy One said, 'If you truly cannot support half of my power, then, using half of your combined strength, I will kill them.'

The Devas acquiesced, 'Tathaastu.'

Sankara took half their combined energies unto himself and became superior in prowess to all in the universe and so came to be called Mahadeva. Mahadeva then said, 'With my bow and astra, I will burn your enemies from my chariot. Therefore, O Devas, see to my chariot, bow and astras even now, so that I may, this very day, cast the Asuras down.'

The gods said, 'O Someswara, we will gather what we need from the three worlds and have Viswakarman create an unequalled chariot for you.'

Soon, the fashioning of that chariot began and the Devas made Vishnu, Soma and Hutasana the astras for Sankara to use. Agni became the staff, Soma the arrowhead and Vishnu the point, O Rajan, of that greatest of arrows.

The Devi Bhumi, with her great cities, towns, mountains, forests, islands and the homes of different creatures, herself became the chariot.

The Mandara Mountain was its axle, and the great river Ganga, its jangha; and the points of the compass, cardinal and subsidiary, were the adornments of the unparalleled ratha.

The constellations were its shaft; the Krita yuga became its yoke; Vasuki, that best of Nagas, was the kuvara of that ratha. The Himavat and Vindhya mountains were its apaskara and adhishthana; and the Udaya and the Asta mountains the wheels of that ratha.

They made the Ocean, the abode of the Danavas, its other axle and the Saptarishi, the seven Sages, became the protectors of the chariot's wheels. Ganga, Saraswati, Sindhu and the Sky were its dhura; all the other rivers and all the waters of the world were the bonds which held the several limbs of that chariot together.

Day and Night and the other divisions of time, the kaalas and kaasthas and the rest, and the Seasons, became its amukarsha. The planets and the stars became its great railing; Dharma, Artha and Kama, united together, were its trivenu. The herbs and the creepers, decked with flowers and fruits, formed its bells.

The Sun and the Moon formed the other two wheels of that great ratha. Day and Night became its auspicious wings on the right and left. The ten foremost Nagas, with Dhritarashtra at their head, formed the other shaft of that chariot; the Sky was made its other yoke, and the clouds of the pralaya, Samvartaka and Balahaka, were the leathern strings of the yoke.

The two Sandhyas, Dhritri, Medha, Sthiti and Sannati, and the firmament spangled with planets and stars, were the skins used to cover that chariot.

The Lokapalas—Indra, Varuna, Yama and Kubera—were the steeds of that chariot. Kalaprishtha, Nahusha, Karkotaka, Dhananjaya and the other Nagas became the ropes that tied the mane of the steeds. The cardinal and the subsidiary directions became the reins of the horses yoked to that chariot. The Vedic sound Vashat became the goad, and the Gayatri was the string attached to that goad.

The four auspicious days were the traces of the horses, and the Pitris presiding over them were made the hooks and pins.

Karma, dharma, tapasya and artha were the chords of that chariot. Manas, the Mind, became the ground upon which that chariot stood, and Speech the tracks upon which it was to ride.

Beautiful banners of various hues floated in the air. With lightning and Indra's bow attached to it, that blazing chariot shone with fierce light.

That space of time which, once of yore, had been fixed as a Year during the noble Isana's mahayagna, was made the bow, and the goddess Savitri became the thundering twang of the bowstring. They made a celestial suit of armour, encrusted with priceless gemstones from across the universe, impenetrable and effulgent from the wheel of Time. That golden mountain Meru was the flagstaff, and the clouds streaked with flashes of lightning became its banners.

Thus equipped, that chariot shone like a blazing fire in the midst of priests officiating at a vast yagna. Beholding that chariot equipped with the energies of the entire universe united together in one place filled the gods with wonder. At last, they came and said to the illustrious Lord Sarveswara that the chariot was ready.

After the Devas had wrought that best of chariots, O Naravyaghra, to destroy the Asuras, Sankara placed upon it his own devastras. Making the sky its flagstaff, he placed upon it his Bull Nandin. The Brahmana's rod, the rod of Death, Rudra's rod and Fever became the protectors of the sides of that chariot and stood with faces turned outwards. Atharvan and Angirasa became the protectors of the chariot-wheels of that illustrious warrior.

The Rigveda, the Samaveda and the Puranas stood at the head of that chariot. The Itihasas and the Yajurveda became the protectors of the cosmic ratha's rear. All the sacred vaks and all the vigyanas stood around it, as well as all the holiest, most potent mantras and the Vedic sound of Vashat and Pranava, the syllable AUM, standing in the van of that chariot, rendered it magnificent and ineffable.

Having made the Year adorned with the six seasons his bow, Siva made his own shadow the irrefragable string of that dhanusha. The illustrious Rudra is Death's self. The Year became his bow; Kala Ratri, the Death-night, therefore, which is Rudra's shadow, became the indestructible string of that bow. The universe consists of Agni, Soma and of Vishnu. Vishnu is the Soul of the holy Bhava of immeasurable tejas. So Vishnu, Agni and Soma became the arrow and because of this the touch of that bowstring became unbearable to the Asuras.

Then the Lord Sankara infused into that arrow his own irresistible and universal wrath, the unbearable fire of anger, born of the fury of Bhrigu and Angirasa. He called forth Nila Rohita, dreadful deity robed in skins, refulgent as ten thousand suns, and shrouded by the fire of super-abundant energy, ablaze with splendour that cannot be described.

To humiliate even those who are difficult to discomfit, that ever-victorious One, that slayer of all haters of Brahman, who is also called Hara, that rescuer of those of dharma and destroyer of the unrighteous, was splendour itself, the first Light of all things. The illustrious Sthanu was accompanied by many beings of fearsome might and forms with the speed of the mind who could erase all foes, as if with all the fourteen faculties of the Soul awake about him. With his limbs for their refuge, this entire universe of mobile and unmoving creatures that were present there, O Rajan, was completely wonderful and presented a transcendent, most incredible spectacle, an unprecedented appearance.

Seeing his chariot fully prepared and equipped, the illustrious Rudra put on his armour and picked up his bow and that celestial astra born of Soma and Vishnu and Agni. The gods then commanded that foremost of Devas, Vayu, to breathe all his fragrance over that most powerful Deity. The Maharishis, the Gandharvas, the throngs of Devas and the different tribes of Apsaras worshipped, sang and danced as that boon-giving Lord, armed with sword, bow and arrow, ascended the chariot.

Smiling, he asked the Devas, 'Who will drive my ratha?'

The Devas answered him, saying, ‘Whoever you appoint, O Maheswara, will become your sarathy!’

Siva replied, ‘Think quickly and make him my sarathy who is better than me!’

Hearing this, the Devas rushed to Brahma and said, ‘We have accomplished everything that you ordered us to do to put an end to the Danavas. Rudra is happy with us and we have created a ratha of cosmic parts and equipped it with wonderful weapons. The Pinaka wielding Hara is ready to ride forth and battle the Danavas.

The four Vedas are its steeds; the earth with her mountains is the chariot and the stars are the adornments of that ratha. However, we do not know who is to be made the sarathy since he must be superior to all these. O Pitamaha, that ratha is equal to you, and Hara is its warrior. His armour, astras and bow are ready. Other than you we can find none who is fit to be his sarathy. You have every accomplishment and are superior to all the Devas. For our victory and the destruction of our enemies, mount the chariot, O Brahma, and take up the reins of those wondrous steeds. Earlier, you assured us that you would help us. It is only appropriate, O Lord, that you now keep the word you gave us.’

The Devas bowed their heads to the Grandsire and sought to induce him to accept being the charioteer and to please Trilokapati.

Brahma said, ‘All that you have said, O Devas, is true. I will hold the reins of the steeds for the Kapardin when he rides forth into battle.’

Thus, the gods made the Creator of the worlds, the Grandsire Brahma the sarathy of the noble Isana. They all worshipped him as he prepared to ascend the chariot; the horses, gifted with the speed of the wind, bowed their heads to the chariot that was Bhumi Devi. Scintillant with his own tejas, Brahma took the reins and the whip and said to Sthanu Mahadeva, ‘Ascend the chariot, Lord.’

Siva climbed into the chariot, taking with him the ultimate astra made of Vishnu, Soma and Agni, which caused the enemy to tremble. The Maharishis, the Gandharvas, the Devas, and the diverse tribes of Apsaras worshipped Sureshwara. Resplendent, the boon-giving Lord, armed with sword, astra and bow, stood on the chariot causing the three worlds to blaze forth with his own effulgence.

The great Lord Mahadeva once more said to the Devas with Indra at their head, ‘Do not fear nor doubt my ability to destroy the Asuras. Know that this astra has already killed them.'

The Devas said, 'It is true! The Asuras have already been slain.'

Indeed, the Devas were certain that the divine Lord's words were true, and they were exceedingly happy. Then that Lord of the Devas drove off upon that incomparable chariot, O Rajan, with all the gods in attendance and worshipped all the while by his Ganas that always wait upon him. Others, too, who live on meat, who were invincible in battle, and who danced in joy, ran wildly on all sides, shouting jubilantly and raucously at one another. Rishis of great good fortune, Tapasvins endued with the highest qualities, as well as the Devas, wished Him success.

When Mahadeva rode into war, the entire universe and all the Devas were full of rare bliss, O Rajan. The Rishis present worshipped him with hymns and enhanced his glory. Millions upon millions of Gandharvas played upon all kinds of musical instruments at the hour of his setting out.

With Brahma, Vishweswara set out to fight the Asuras, and He smilingly said, 'Uttamam, Uttamam! Fly, O Deva, to where the Daityas are. Today you will see the might of my arms when I slay them.'

Brahma whipped those horses, swift as the wind or thought, which all the worlds revered, and they seemed to devour the skies as they sped towards the Daityas and the Danavas' triple city of Tripura, taking Bhava the Illustrious into battle for the Devas. During that flight, his Bull bellowed, filling all the points of the sky. Just hearing that sound like no other, many of the descendants and followers of Taraka, those enemies of the gods, breathed their last, while others stood unmoved and ready for battle.

Then, suddenly, Sthanu, armed with his trident, erupted in wild wrath, terrifying all the living and the three worlds to tremble. Frightful portents appeared as he aimed that universal astra and the Earth chariot seemed to sink down because of the weight of Soma, Agni and Vishnu that were the shaft, as well as the weight of Brahma, Rudra himself and his bow. At this, Narayana issued out of the head of the astra, assumed the form of a bull and raised up that tremendous ratha. Meanwhile, the chariot had sunk low and the enemy began to shout triumphantly at seeing this. Incensed and more terrible than terror, Mahadeva standing on the head of his bull and on the back of his steeds began roaring so it seemed the very galaxies spun away from the places in the chasmal firmament.

Standing there and eyeing the Danava city, Rudra ablaze cut off the teats of the horses and split the hooves of the bull! From that day, all bulls and cows have cloven hooves and, O Rajan, horses came to be without teats.

Sarva strung his bow and aimed that astra beyond all astras, with which he had united the Pasupatastra, which is his own weapon, and waited in fathomless dhyana. And as Rudra stood waiting, his bow and its missile at the ready, the three cities spun together into confluence and became a single city. Tumultuous was the joy of the Devas, and along with the Siddhas and the Maharishis, they shouted 'Jaya!', and hailed Maheswara.

As soon as the Tripura appeared as one before that God, he drew his bowstring to his ear and unleased the astra shaft which contained the might of the whole universe at the triad city. His aim was unerring and that astra plunged burning into the Tripura and Mayaa Danava's cities of marvel fell out of the sky down towards the Earth. The screams and roars of the Asuras filled all the directions. Siva, now a Spirit of pure and absolute wrath, torched the three cities, incinerating all the Asuras inside them, and flung them into the Western ocean. Thus did Maheswara burn the Tripura in rage, and made ashes the Danavas for the good of the three worlds.

Trilochana then quenched the fire born of his own wrath, the fire of the apocalyptic astra, saying, 'Do not reduce the three worlds to ashes.'

Thus were restored the Devas, the Rishis and the three worlds to their natural state, and they all gave praise to the unrivalled Sthanu. With their objective accomplished, the Devas led by Brahma, returned to their homes after paying profound obeisance to and with the leave of Rudra.

Thus, Maheswara, Lord of both the Devas and the Asuras, did what was for the benefit of all the worlds.

Ah, great Salya, even as Pitamaha Brahma, Creator of the worlds, that Supreme Deity of unfading glory, became Rudra's charioteer when Siva consumed the Tripura, will you take the reins of the horses of the noble Karna, when he rides out today to kill Arjuna and win this war?

There is not the slightest doubt, O Naravyaghra, that you are superior to Krishna, to Karna, and to Phalguna. In battle, Karna is like Rudra, while you are like Brahma in strategy. Together you can vanquish my enemies even if they are like the Asuras of the Tripura. You must help Karna, O Salya, so that he can raze the Pandava troops and kill Swetavahana, who has Krishna for his sarathy. Karna, our kingdom, our victory, and we, depend on you, O Salya of the Madras. I beseech you again, take up the reins of Karna's wonderful horses, and become his sarathy!"

When Duryodhana sees that Salya still hesitates, he says, "Listen to another ancient tale, which a virtuous Brahmana once related in the presence of my father. When you hear these words full of dharma, O Salya, do what you must without any scruple or hesitation.

Jamadagni of severe tapasya was born in the race of the Bhrigus. His son born with great tejas and every virtue was the celebrated Rama. In order to acquire astras, he practised stern penance with a cheerful soul, observed all vows, kept his senses under control, and gratified the God Mahadeva. Because of his devotion and tranquillity of heart, Siva was pleased with him and, knowing the desire he cherished in his heart, showed himself to Rama and said, 'O Rama, I bless you. I am pleased with you and I know what you want. Make your soul pure and I will give you all that you desire as well as all the devastras. These astras, O son of Bhrigu, will make ashes of a man who does not know how to use them or who does not deserve them.'

When the son of Jamadagni heard the Trisulin, he bowed and said, 'O Lord, give me, who am always devoted to you, the astras whenever you think me fit to have them.'

With further stringent tapasya and by restraining his senses, observing vratas, through worship, offerings, and with yagnas and homa performed with mantras, Rama worshipped Sarva for many long years. At last, pleased with the noble Rama, Mahadeva described him in the presence of his divine spouse Uma as one who possessed many virtues: 'This Rama, of determined vratas, is always devoted to me.'

Happy with Rama of the Bhrigus, the Lord Sankara thus repeatedly proclaimed his virtues in the presence of Devas and the Rishis, O Salya. Meanwhile, the Daityas grew in strength and, blinded by pride and folly, they imposed themselves on the Devas. The Devas united and strove to destroy their demonic enemies but to little effect. They sought out Umapati Maheswara and began to serve him with devotion, pleading, 'Kill our enemies, O Lord.'

Sankara promised the Devas that their enemies would be destroyed and summoned Rama, the descendant of Bhrigu, and said to him, 'O Rama, kill all these enemies of the Devas, for me and for the good of all the worlds.'

At this, Rama asked the boon-giving Trilochana, 'What strength have I, O Lord? I have no astras to destroy the Danavas, who are accomplished warriors and invincible in battle.'

Maheswara replied, 'You go at my command, so you will slay these enemies. Vanquish them all and you will acquire numerous virtues.'

Rama accepted the Lord's command, performed propitiatory rites for his success, and went forth against the Danavas. He said to those mighty enemies of the Devas, by now completely possessed by folly and pride, 'You Daityas, who are fierce in battle, Mahadeva has sent me to defeat you.'

A battle began and the delighter of the Bhargavas massacred the Daityas with strokes of his axe reminiscent of the Vajradhari; he went back to Mahadeva bearing on his body many wounds acquired during the battle, which were instantly healed at Sthanu's touch. Pleased by his feat, the lustrous God gave diverse kinds of boons to Rama. Satisfied with Rama, the trident-wielding Mahadeva said, 'The pain that you have suffered from the injuries on your body is evidence of the superhuman feats that you have achieved, O delighter of the Bhrigus. Now receive from me the devastras that you desired.'

After he had obtained all the devastras and the boons that he had wanted, Rama bowed low to Siva and, with the leave of Mahadeva, that Maharishi went his way.

This is the story the Brahmana once narrated in the presence of my father. O Salya, tiger among kings. You know that the same Rama, the Bhargava, gladly imparted the entire astra shastra to our noble Karna. If Karna had any fault, Rama would never have given him his devastras.

Listen further to me now, mighty Madra. I do not believe that Karna is from the Suta varna. He must be the son of a Deva, born into the Kshatriya varna. Perhaps he was abandoned in his infancy so that his varna would stand revealed by his noble lineaments and accomplishments. No, by no means could this Karna have been born a Suta. Born wearing a golden kavacha and kundalas, this mighty maharatha with long arms, who resembles Surya himself, could not have been born to a common woman no more than a tiger could be born to a doe.

Each of his arms is like the trunk of a prince of elephants. Behold his chest so broad and able to resist the weapons of every foe. Karna cannot be an ordinary man. Endued with such great valour, this disciple of Parasurama Bhargava, O Rajan, is a noble being, at the very least a Kshatriya and I think even a Devaputra, the son of some great god.'

'Duryodhana continues, "This was how Brahma, Grandsire of all the worlds, became the charioteer of Rudra the warrior. The charioteer, O king of the Madras, should be superior to the warrior on the chariot. Therefore, take the reins of Karna's chariot. The Devas once chose Brahma because they felt that he was greater than Sankara. So, as you are Karna's superior, we now choose you, and you must take charge of Karna's ratha."

Salya says, 'O Bhaarata, I have heard this celestial itihasa of how Brahma was Bhava's charioteer, and how the Asuras were all destroyed with one astra. Krishna, too, must already know the story, for he knows the past and the future, in their every detail, which is why he became Partha's sarathy. If Karna somehow succeeds in killing Arjuna, it will force Krishna to take up arms himself in the war. If he does, that bearer of the sankha, chakra and gada will consume your army. There is no one who can remotely stand up to that illustrious one of Vrishni's vamsa if he comes to fight."'

"Sanjaya says, 'To the king of the Madras, your mahabaho son replies, "Do not think disparagingly of Vaikartana; he is the greatest of all warriors and knows all our Shastras. The Pandava troops flee in terror from the twang of his bow and the sound of his palms losing his arrows. You have seen how he killed Ghatotkacha, the master of maya. Why, all these days Arjuna was afraid to confront Karna. Radheya even beat the mighty Bhimasena with the horn of his bow, and harshly called him ‘Fool’ and ‘Glutton’. Madri’s two brave sons also he defeated, though, for some unknown reason, he did not take their lives when they stood helpless before him.

Karna vanquished the heroic Satyaki, lord of the Satwatas and best of all the Vrishni warriors; he shattered Yuyudhana’s chariot. Repeatedly he had the better of the Srinjayas led by Dhrishtadyumna. Karna is a great maharatha who, when roused, can contain even Purandara armed with his thunderbolt in battle.

You, too, Salya, are a master of every weapon as well as of all the branches of learning. There is no one on earth who is your equal. Irresistible to your enemies you are like a savage dart, and it is for this that they call you Salya. The Satwatas jointly could not get the better of you, so how is Krishna superior to you? Just as Krishna will bear the burden of the Pandava troops after Partha is dead, you will shoulder the responsibility of this great Kaurava army if Karna dies in battle.

And hear me, O sire, for your sake I would willingly follow my dead brothers and the other heroic kings of the earth!”

Salya says, “O son of Gandhari, I am happy to hear you say before our troops that I am superior to the son of Devaki! And so I accept what you ask of me. I will take the reins of the celebrated Vaikartana’s ratha when he rides against Arjuna. Yet, I have one inviolable condition. We must have a solemn compact between us: I must be allowed to say whatever I wish to him, while we ride in battle.”

Your son, O Rajan, says, “Tathaastu!” in the presence of all the Kshatriyas; Duryodhana is delighted that he has prevailed on Salya to be Karna’s sarathy, and he embraces Karna in joy. All the bards and panegyrists present eulogise your son, who, his eyes shining, says again to Karna, “Finish all the Parthas even like Indra slaying the Danavas!”

Though Salya finally agrees to be Karna’s sarathy, Karna says to Duryodhana, “The king of the Madras does not appear to be very happy to accept this role. O Rajan, speak to him again in sweet words.”

At this, Duryodhana, prince of great wisdom and diplomacy, speaks again to Salya in his deep voice, which seems to fills all Kurukshetra. “O Salya, Karna feels that he should fight Arjuna today and kill him. I ask you humbly again to guide Karna’s horses in battle. Just as Krishna is Partha’s mentor and protector, so must you counsel and protect Radheya from every danger today."

Now Salya embraces your son and joyfully answers him, "If this is what you want, O handsome and royal son of Gandhari, I will do everything I can, with all my heart, to make you happy. I will bear the burden of all that you have decided, but both of you must pardon me for anything I might say to Karna while I am his sarathy, be it agreeable or disagreeable, for I will speak only for his good."

Karna says in his humblest tone, "O king of the Madras, may you always be engaged in our welfare as Brahma is for Isana, or Keshava for Partha."

Salya says, "The honourable never indulge in four kinds of conduct—self-rebuke, self-praise, speaking ill of others and adulation of others. However, learned one, what I now say to instil confidence in you may be construed as being self-adulation. Yet, listen carefully when I tell you that I am fit to be the sarathy of even Indra, and am a match for Matali himself in watchfulness, in managing horses and in anticipating and avoiding danger in a battle. When you engage Partha, I will drive your ratha; so dispel your anxiety, O Sutaputra."'

Duryodhana says, "O Karna, Salya, king of the Madras, who is superior to Krishna, will be your sarathy, as Matali is the charioteer of Indra, king of the Devas. With you as the warrior on that chariot and Salya as its sarathy, that ratha will certainly vanquish the Parthas."

When all is being finally prepared for the morning's battle, O Bhaarata, Duryodhana says again, "O Salya, take the reins of Karna's ratha. With your protection, the son of Radha will vanquish Dhananjaya."

Salya, answers, "Tathaastu."

Salya approaches the chariot and Karna cheerfully says to him, "O Sarathy, prepare the chariot for me."

Salya duly equips his ratha, the best of its kind, which resembles a vapour mansion in the sky, and fetches it to Karna, saying, "I bless you. May victory be yours."

Maharatha Karna duly worships the ratha, which a priest conversant with Brahman has sanctified, circumambulates it in pradakshina, fervently worships the Surya Deva and says to Salya, "Ascend the ratha now, great Salya."

The mighty Salya climbs into Karna's invincible and wonderful chariot, like a lion springing up a mountain summit. Karna follows him. Mounted on the ratha, the two shuras dazzle like Surya and Agni sitting together on a cloud in the sky. The vabdhis and magadhis eulogise those two heroes, like Ritwiks and Sadasyas worshipping Indra and Agni with hymns at a yagna.

Karna is like the sun on the Mandara Mountains, riding on a mass of lightning charged clouds; a halo of brilliant lustre encircles him, his arrows are like sunrays. Ah, the son of Surya is glorious to behold as he stands on his ratha stretching his formidable bow.

Duryodhana says, “O son of Adhiratha, O Shura, I had always believed that those two mighty maharathas, Drona and Bhishma, would kill Arjuna and Bhimasena. Like a second Vajradhari, go forth, my precious friend, and achieve that which they could not accomplish. Either seize Dharmaraja Yudhishtira or slay Dhananjaya, Bhimasena and the twin sons of Madri. Bless you and let victory be yours. Set out, O Naravyaghra, and reduce the Pandava troop to ashes!”

Then, thousands of conches and tens of thousands of drums sound together and the sound they make is like that of massed thunderheads in the sky. Karna then tells Salya, “Whip the horses forward, Mahabaho, so that I can destroy Dhananjaya, Bhimasena, the twins and Yudhishtira. Arjuna will feel the true might of my arms today when I unleash my arrows fletched with kanka feathers in tides, and annihilate the Pandavas and give victory to Duryodhana!”

Salya says, “O Suta’s son, why do you underestimate the sons of Pandu, all of whom are mighty warriors, great archers, and have mastery over every weapon? They are unrelenting, invincible, enjoy great good fortune and can inspire fear in the heart of Indra himself. When you hear the twang of the Gandiva, which is like the peal of thunder, you will find yourself less able to so facilely brag. When you are faced with the Dharmaputra and the twins and their canopy arrows in the sky; when you face the other invincible warriors of the Pandava army lashing and mowing down our forces with arrow storms, you will feel less inclined to boast, O Karna.”

Ignoring what Salya says, Karna only roars, “Ride Salya, let us be at them!”’

"Sanjaya says, 'When the Kauravas see mighty Karna take up his station and ready for battle, they let out loud shouts of delight from every side. With the clash of cymbals and the sound of drums, with the whizzing of arrows and the roars of the fierce warriors, all your troops are ready to fight till death. The Earth trembles and a great sound emerges from her very bowels and it seems as if the seven great planets including the Sun are set for combat. We see meteor showers and all the quarters seem to be on fire.

We hear thunder from a cloudless sky, fierce winds begin to blow, and animals and birds in ever larger numbers pass your army to their right, foreboding a great calamity. When Karna sets out, his horses stumble and fall to their knees; a frightful shower of bones falls from the sky and the weapons of the Kuru warriors seem to be ablaze; their standards tremble; and their animals, O Rajan, shed copious tears.

These and many other dreadful portents appear, indicating ruin for the Kurus. Lulled by fate, none of the commanders and men in the Kaurava army notice these omens, but seeing Karna set out, wish him victory and regard the Pandavas as having already been defeated.

Vaikartana, as he rides on his chariot, reflects on the death of Bhishma and Drona, and on the mighty feats of Partha and burning with self-conceit and pride, and breathing long and hard in simmering anger, tells Salya, “Fighting from my ratha and armed with my bow, I would challenge a furious Indra himself armed with the Vajra. Seeing those great warriors, even the flawless and invincible Bhishma and Drona, the equal of Indra and Vishnu, those crushers of chariots, horses and elephants slaughtered by the enemy, O Salya, do not be anxious for I am not afraid.

The Acharya was a master of mighty astras and the foremost of Brahmanas, yet why did he not kill all our enemies, when he saw them destroy the mightiest of our kings and their charioteers, elephants and chariots? Remembering that Drona in battle, I tell you truly, that there is no one among you, other than me, who can match this Arjuna advancing towards us, this Kshatriya who resembles Death himself in his fiercest form. Drona acquired his skills through inborn might, practice and bravery; he possessed the greatest of astras and was a master strategist. When even he had to succumb to death, I regard all the others in our army to already be in death’s very jaws.

Even upon deep reflection, I do not find anything in this world that is permanent or anything that is fated which can be changed through human effort. When the Acharya himself was killed, who then can be certain that he will live until today’s sunset? I have no doubt that not astras, strength, skill, achievements, or cleverness can fetch man any happiness. Only what is fated will come to pass.

In energy, Drona was equal to Agni or the Sun, in prowess he resembled Vishnu or Purandara; in strategy he was equal to Brihaspati or Usana. Yet, irresistible as he was, astras could not protect him. When our women and children lament and weep, when the enemy has laid our valour low, I know, O Salya, that it is I who must now fight. So ride, O great Madra, at the enemy army. There is no one other than me who can face the Pandava army that has Dharmaputra Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Arjuna, Satyaki and the twins among them.

Come, fly at the Panchalas, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas. I will either kill them all, or follow Drona’s path into Yama’s presence. Do not think that I will not break into the very heart of those warriors. Wise or ignorant, when a person’s time has run out, the Destroyer has no favourites; no one can escape him, and I too will not escape my destiny.

Duryodhana loves me and is always concerned about my welfare, and for his sake I will not hesitate to cast away my life’s breath and this body that are so dear. Rama gave me this great ratha covered with tiger skins, its axle silent, and furnished with a golden seat and a trivenu made of silver, and yoked to these splendid horses. Look Salya, at these wonderful bows, these standards, these maces, these shafts of fierce shapes, this blazing sword, this mighty astra, this white conch of the loud and ferocious blare.

Riding in this chariot, whose wheels rumble deep as thunder, with white horses yoked to it, and with these superb quivers, I will put forth all my might to kill Arjuna, that bull among maharathas. If Death himself, that universal destroyer, were to protect him vigilantly, I will still meet him in battle and either kill him or leave this world of sorrow for Yamaloka. If Yama, Varuna, Kubera, and Vasava, with all their forces come here united and protect the son of Pandu, I will still vanquish all of them."

Hearing Karna's bravado and his great delight at the prospect of battle, the valiant king of the Madras laughs aloud in derision and, in order to temper his arrogance, says, "Forbear, forbear, O Karna, from your bragging. In your transports of delight, you have said things that you should never say. Where is Dhananjaya, that foremost of men, and where are you, O lowest of men? Who else save Arjuna could abduct the younger sister of Krishna, that greatest of all beings, by storming the home of the Yadus, which the younger brother of Indra protected and one that resembled Devaloka?

What man but Arjuna, who is as powerful as Indra, could challenge Bhava, the Lord of Lords, the Creator of the worlds, to battle when a dispute arose over the slaughter of an animal in the forest?

To please Agni, Vijaya slaughtered Asuras, Devas, great Nagas, Pisachas, Yakshas, Rakshasas, men and birds, and offered Hutasana the food he wished for in the Khandava vana.

Do you remember, Karna, how Phalguna killed throngs of celestial Gandharvas, with arrows that flashed like the sun, and freed Dhritarashtra's son? Indeed, do you remember that occasion, when you were the first to flee, when the Pandavas freed the foolish sons of Dhritarashtra after they were beset and captured by those rangers of the skies, Chitraratha and his Gandharvas?

Do you remember the battle when Virata's kine were stolen, and Arjuna single-handedly routed the Kauravas, who had far superior numbers, as well as Drona, Aswatthaman and Bhishma in their ranks? Why, O Sutaputra, did you not vanquish Arjuna then?

But fortunately, another great battle will now take place for you to die at Partha's hands. If you do not flee in fear, know that as soon as the battle begins, you will be killed."

While Salya is heartily engaged in deflating Karna with these rough words, while simultaneously singing his adversary's praises, an incensed Karna says, "Yes, yes, it may be so! However, why do you praise Arjuna so? A battle is about to take place between us and only if he kills me can your lofty praises be regarded as being deserved."

The king of the Madras replies, "Let it be so," and says no more.

A determined Karna says, "Ride at them!" That great maharatha, his white steeds yoked to his chariot covered with tiger skins and with Salya for his charioteer, wildly attacks his enemies, slaying great numbers of them, like the sun destroying the darkness of night. Indeed, he rides with a joyous heart and, breaking upon the Pandava army, immediately looks for Dhananjaya.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna gladdens the hearts of his soldiers when he sets out for battle and tells every Pandava soldier that he meets, "I will give whatever wealth he asks for to him who will point out the noble Dhananjaya to me today. If he is not satisfied, I will further give him a cartload of jewels and gemstones. If he is still not satisfied, I will give him a hundred heads of cows and as many vessels of brass for milking them. I will give him a hundred fine villages and a number of long haired, black eyed damsels and a chariot yoked to white mules.

If all this does not yet satisfy the one who points out Arjuna to me, I will give him another magnificent golden chariot yoked to six bulls as big as elephants. I will give him another hundred fair damsels, decked with ornaments and with collars of gold, all of them accomplished in singing and dancing.

If that man is still dissatisfied, I will give him a hundred elephants, a hundred villages, a hundred chariots, and ten thousand fine horses, fat, docile, well trained and with many excellent qualities, all able to draw chariots. I will then give him four hundred cows, each with golden horns and a calf.

If he is still not satisfied, I will give him a yet more valuable gift of five hundred horses in trappings of gold and decked with jewelled ornaments. In addition, I will give him eighteen other docile horses, a bright golden chariot with priceless ornaments and pulled by Kamboja steeds.

If that still does not satisfy the man who discovers Arjuna for me, I will give him six hundred trained elephants born on the western shores of the ocean, with golden chains around their necks and in gold caparison.

If that does not satisfy him, I will give him an even more valuable gift of fourteen wealthy, populated Vaishya villages, situated in the proximity of forests and rivers, free from all danger, well furnished with other luxuries and fit for kings. I will also give him a hundred young and nubile female slaves from the country of the Magadhas, all wearing the finest golden necklaces.

If that man is still not sated, I will make him an even more valuable gift, which he himself could not but want. I will give him, if he desires them, my sons, wives and all things of pleasure and enjoyment that I possess. Indeed, I will also give him all the wealth left by Kesava and Arjuna, after I kill them!"

When he has said all this, Karna blows his wonderful conch, sea-born and its boom honeyed and reverberant. Duryodhana, with all his followers, is elated to listen to Karna, to hear the assurance in his voice. The sounds of cymbals, drums, the trumpeting of elephants, along with those of diverse musical instruments, arise among the Kaurava troops along with their shouts of exultation.

However, even while the Kaurava troops are full of joy, Salya, king of the Madras, laughs scornfully, and derides the maharatha son of Radha, who, even as he is about to plunge into the ocean of battle, is bragging so vainly.'"

'Salya says, "O Sutaputra, you will see Dhananjaya today without any trouble, so you need not give away a golden chariot with six bulls as big as elephants. You are foolishly offering to give away wealth as if you are Kubera, the Lord of treasures, and you do not see the sin that attaches to gifts made to the undeserving. Instead, you should perform many yagnas with that wealth. And as far as your foolish intention to kill Krishna and Arjuna, who has heard of a jackal hunting down a pair of lions?

You seek to do what is well beyond you because you have no friends to warn you that you are about to fall into a blazing fire. You cannot discriminate between what you should do and what you should not. Without doubt, your end is near for no man that wants to continue living will speak as you do, insanely, like the worst fool. Your endeavour is like that of a man who wants to cross the vast ocean with just his two arms and, besides, after having tied a heavy stone to his neck; or like that of one who wants to leap off a mountaintop and hopes to live.

For your own good, I suggest that you fight Arjuna from within the relative safety of your vyuha, and with the help and protection of all your warriors. My advice is only for the good of Duryodhana and not from any ill will towards you. Listen to me if you have any wish to preserve your life."

Karna replies, “I seek out Arjuna relying only on the might of my arms. You, Salya, are an enemy with the face of a friend and all you want to do is put fear into me. No man will deter me from my resolve, not even the Vajradhari himself; so what can a mere mortal do?”

Salya says, “You will lament your encounter with Partha when that mahabaho drills you with his arrows fletched with kanka feathers and shot with all his might. When Savyasachi burns your army and gashes you with his arrows loosed from the Gandiva, you will repent your folly. Even as a child lying in its mother’s lap wants to seize the moon, do you seek naively to vanquish the resplendent Arjuna in his chariot. Why, you are like a fool who would thrust his own body into a trident!

Your challenge, O Suta’s son, is like that of a frisky little deer calling an angry lion to fight! You dare contend with the greatest Kshatriya of all, even like a little fox in the forest, with its belly full, challenging his great maned king.

You, O Karna, are like a rabbit challenging an elephant with tusks big as plough-shafts, with rent cheeks and rut juices flowing out of its mouth; you face a certain death when you encounter Arjuna.

In your folly in wanting to fight Partha, you are like an idiot poking at a virulent black cobra inside its hole.

You are more than stupid, Sutaputra, to discount Arjuna, that narasimha, and to shout out to him like a jackal howling at an angry lion. When you challenge Dhananjaya, Karna, you are like a snake that seeks its own destruction by challenging Vinata’s son, the fierce Garuda, with his splendid plumage.

You are as one who, despite having no raft, wants to cross the savage ocean, receptacle of all waters, with its mountainous waves, when the moon is waxing.

O Karna, your battle with Arjuna will be as one between a little calf meeting a great charging bull, his neck thick as a drum and his horns sharp as arrows.

Like a frog croaking at a mighty cloud lashing down torrents of rain, you croak at Arjuna who is like a Parjanya among men.

You are like a dog, Karna, which barks at a forest-roaming tiger from within the safety of his master’s house when you snarl at Dhananjaya, that tiger among men.

A jackal, Karna, living in the forest among rabbits, thinks it is a lion until he actually sees one. You, too, consider yourself a lion for you do not yet see that Naravyaghra Arjuna. You will think yourself to be a lion until you see the two Krishnas riding on the same chariot like Surya and Chandra. As long as you do not hear the twang of the Gandiva, you can continue to say what you please.

When you see Partha and hear the rumble of his ratha and the twang of his bow resound around the ten cardinal points of the sky, and when he roars at you like a tiger, Sutaputra, you will turn into a jackal. You were always a jackal, and Dhananjaya always a lion. O fool, it is your envy and hatred for truly great warriors that makes you a jackal. As a mouse and a chariot are to each other in strength, or a dog and a tiger, a fox and a lion, or a hare and an elephant, as falsehood and truth, as poison and nectar, even so are you and Partha known to all by your different deeds.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Salya's word barbs now infuriate Karna and, losing his temper, he responds in fury, saying, "The qualities of men of dharma, O Salya, are known only to those who are themselves noble. When you are far from being exemplary yourself, how can you be a judge of worth? The mighty astras of Arjuna, his wrath, his tejas, his bow, his shafts and his abilities I know very well. You also do not know, as well as I do, the greatness of Krishna, that bull among the lords of Earth.

However, it is knowing my own prowess as well as that of Pandu's son, that I challenge him to battle. I am no insect flying into a fire. I have this blood-drinking astra, O Salya, which lies alone within a quiver in a bed of sandalwood dust, and which I have worshipped for many years. It is like a venomous serpent and it can consume whole aksauhinis of men, horses and elephants. It can pierce any armour and make ashes of flesh and bones, and if I am provoked, I may unleash it even against the mighty Meru.

I tell you, Salya, that I will use that astra only against Phalguna or Krishna. And that would be a worthy feat, since, of all the shuras in the Vrishni race, it is Krishna in whom Prosperity resides and among the Pandavas it is Partha in whom Victory always dwells. Both Naravyaghras, riding the same chariot, will advance against me to do battle. And today, you will see the nobility of my lineage. You will see, Salya, the two dark cousins, one the son of the other's aunt, and the other the son of the other's uncle, both invincible warriors, impaled by my one astra, like two pearls on a single string.

Arjuna's Gandiva and his kapi-dhvaja, Krishna's chakra and his garuda-dhvaja, create fear only among the timid. In me, O Madraka, they cause only delight.

You are a fool, base Salya, of evil disposition, and unskilled in the strategy for great wars. You are either raving because terror grips you, or you praise them for some reason unknown to me. Today, I will first kill those two, and then kill you with all your kinsmen! Born in a sinful country you are ignoble, mean and a wretch among Kshatriyas. Being a friend and ally, why do you, like an enemy, try to frighten me by singing the praises of the two Krishnas? Either they will kill me today or I will kill them. Knowing my own might as I do, I have no fear of them. Why, I will single-handedly kill a thousand Vasudevas and hundreds of Phalgunas.

Hold your tongue, O you who are born in the sinful country of the Madrakas. Hear from me, O Salya, what the people, young and old, men and women and travellers, say about the evil Madrakas. Brahmanas have also been speaking of these same things in the courts of kings.

The Madraka is always a hater of friends and there is no friendship in him. He is mean in speech, is the lowest of humankind, a base one, always untruthful and crooked. It is said that until their death, the Madrakas are evil. Among them, the father, son, mother, mother-in-law, brother, grandson, and other kinsmen, companions, strangers, slaves, male and female mix lasciviously together in their homes. Their women mingle freely with men, known and strangers. Their conduct is without dharma and they subsist on fried and powdered corn and fish in their homes; they drink heady spirits, eat beef, speak coarsely and laugh and cry with no restraint or dignity. They sing incoherent songs, are always lustful and say whatever they please, with no thought. How then can virtue have any meaning for the Madrakas, who are arrogant and notorious for all kinds of venal and mortal sins?

No one should befriend or provoke enmity with a Madraka. They are the dregs, the dirt of humanity, and all their deeds of friendship are impure as gandharakas or the libations poured in a yagna in which the king is himself the sacrificer and priest. Then, again, it is truly seen that wise men treat a person bitten by a poisonous scorpion, with these words: 'Just as a Brahmana who assists at the religious ceremonies of a Sudra, or as one who hates Brahmanas always suffers degradation does one who makes an alliance with the Madrakas becomes debased. As there is no friendship among the Madrakas, so, O scorpion, your poison is as nought.'

With these mantras from the Atharvan, I have duly performed the rite of exorcism. Knowing this, O learned, wretched one, hold your tongue, or listen to something further that I have to say. The intoxicated Madraka women throw off their clothes and dance naked, while their unattached women are promiscuous and utterly depraved in their behaviour. You are the child of one of those women; how can you be fit to declare the dharma of men? Yes, you are the son of one of those sinful and shameless women, who live and answer every lust and call of nature like camels and asses; how are you fit to discourse on the duties of men? When you ask a Madraka woman for a little vinegar, she scratches her hips and says cruelly, "Let no man ask me for any vinegar that is so dear to me. I will give him my son or my husband, but I will not give him any vinegar."

We are told on good authority that young Madraka maidens are without any shame, hirsute, gluttonous and filthy and carnal to the core. Many others and I, too, can vouch for these and many other similar qualities in them. How then would the Madrakas and the Sindhu-Sauviras know anything of dharma, being born, as they are, in a sinful country, being Mlecchas in their practices, and being entirely careless of all dharma?

We are told that the highest duty of a Kshatriya is to die in battle, lauded by men of dharma. That I should lay down my life in this war is my foremost wish, for I seek swarga through death. I am also the dearest friend of Duryodhana. Why, I live for him and whatever wealth I have is also his. As for you, O you who are born in a sinful country, it is evident that you are under the influence of the Pandavas, since your behaviour towards us in everything is as that of an enemy. Like a man of dharma whom atheists cannot lead astray, hundreds of men like you cannot dissuade me from this battle.

Like a deer, bathed in perspiration, you are at liberty to weep or thirst. You cannot frighten me for I observe Kshatriya dharma. I recall what my Acharya Bhargava Rama once described to me about the death in battle of those lions among men, the Kshatriyas he slew, those unrelenting heroes.

I am determined to follow the example of Pururavas, to rescue the Kauravas and to kill our enemies. I do not know of a man in the three worlds who can turn me away from my resolve. So do not even try, O Salya. Or do you rave and rant so only from fear?

Wretched Madraka, I do not kill you even now and present your carcass as an offering to scavengers and carnivores only from my regard for Duryodhana, and to avoid any blame. But, know, that if you speak to me as you have again, I will crush your head with my gada.

I say to you again, Salya, the people of this world will today see or hear either that the two Krishnas have killed Karna or that Karna has killed the two Krishnas!"

Having said these words, the son of Radha, O Rajan, once more fearlessly commands the king of the Madras, "On! Fly at the enemy."'

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing, O Rajan, what Karna says, Salya responds with some heat, "I was born in the race of men who performed great yagnas, who never retreated from battle, who were kings whose coronal locks underwent the sacred bath. I too am devoted to the practice of dharma. You, O Vrisha, seem to be drunk. Still, from friendship, I will try and cure of your vainglorious intoxication. Listen, stupid wretch, to this story of a crow and then do what you like.

I do not recall any fault of mine for which you wish to kill me. It is my duty to make you aware of what is good for you and what is not, for I know both, and as I am now your sarathy and have Duryodhana's welfare at heart. I know what ground is level and what is uneven; I know the strength and weakness of the warrior on my chariot; I know at all times the fatigue and fitness of my horses and my warrior.

I have a thorough knowledge of the weapons you possess; I can decipher the cries of animals and birds; what would be heavy for the horses to carry and what would be exceedingly heavy for them; I know about the extraction of arrows and the healing of wounds, which astras counteract which other astras, the many battle tactics, and the meaning of all kinds of omens and portents. As the sarathy of this ratha, I am a master of my craft, and so I will narrate this story for you.

There once lived, on the other side of the ocean, a Vaishya who owned an abundance of wealth and corn. He performed yagnas, gave liberal dakshina, was peaceful, devoted to the duties of his own varna, and was pure in habits and mind. He had many sons whom he loved, and was kind to all creatures. He lived fearlessly in the dominions of a king of dharma. A crow lived in his home, as well, eating the leavings of the food set before the Vaishya's well-behaved young children. The children always gave the crow meat, curds, rice payasa, honey and butter. Thus well fed, the crow became arrogant and disrespected all birds that were equal or even superior to him.

It so happened that once some happy swans, of swift flight, which could fly anywhere at will and equal to Garuda himself in the range and speed of their aerial journeys, crossed the ocean and came to the Vaishya's dwelling. Seeing the swans, the Vaishya boys said to the crow, 'O ranger of the skies, you are superior to all winged creatures.'

The crow, in his folly and arrogance, was deceived by what the callow children said and believed them. Proud of the remains of the children's food upon which he fed, the crow alighted in the midst of those swans, and then challenged one among them whom he thought was their leader, saying, 'Let us compete in flight.'

Hearing the raving crow, the assembled swans, those great birds born with vast speed and endurance, began to laugh. They asked the crow. 'Our home is the Manasa Lake. We navigate the whole earth, and among winged creatures, we are famed for the distances we traverse. Foolish crow, how can you challenge a swan? How will you keep up with us?'

The crow, true to the stupidity of his species, repeatedly mocked what the swan said and finally boasted, 'I will fly showing you a hundred and one different kinds of flight, a fresh one for every hundred yojanas. I will soar up, swoop down, whirl around, fly straight, and fly swiftly, and then gently and steadily. I will show you all the diverse kinds of flight. I will display all these and you shall all witness my prowess and my genius.

With one of these different kinds of flight, I will now rise into the sky. You decide which of these ways in which you want me fly and then match me in that particular style. You must match me in all the different kinds of flight through the sky where there is no support.'

Listen, O Radheya, to what one of the swans said to the foolish, ungainly crow. 'You, O crow, will doubtless demonstrate the hundred and one different kinds of flight. I, however, will fly in just one kind of flight that all other birds know, for I do not know any other. As for you, O bird with red eyes, fly in any manner that you like.'

At this, the other crows that had assembled there laughed aloud, cawing, 'How will the swan with just one kind of flight compete with a hundred different kinds?'

Then the swan and the crow rose into the sky, challenging each other. The swan who could fly gracefully anywhere, at will, flew using a single kind of wing beat, while the awkward crow chose a hundred different kinds of flights. The swan and the crow flew, each one praising himself. Seeing the crow fly in hundred different ways, the other crows were delighted and cawed raucously. The swans laughed, mocking the clumsy crows. The other crows joined the first one now, all of them flying in many ways, up and down, slowly then quickly, and in all kinds of acrobatic foolish manouvers, cawing victoriously all the while. The swan, however, with his single regal kind of flight, began to cut through the skies. For a moment, O Karna, he seemed to fall behind, and, seeing this, the crows, cried, 'The swan is losing!'

Hearing this, the soaring swan flew westwards, now with great speed, towards the ocean, the home of the makaras. The crow quickly grew frantic at not seeing any island or trees on which he could alight and perch, when he grew tired, upon that vast expanse of water. The ocean, being the home of countless creatures and hundreds of monsters, is indeed more terrifying than the air. Karna, nothing can exceed it in depth and men know that the waters of the ocean are as limitless as space and the crow swiftly lost his arrogance, terror filling him instead.

The swan, having traversed a great distance in a moment, looked back at the crow, and did not have the heart to leave him behind. Turning back, he flew to the struggling black bird, and hung on the air waiting for the crow to fly up to him.

The exhausted crow somehow found the strength, before he fell into the sea and sank, to fly up to the gracefully hovering swan. The swan felt that he must rescue the foolish bird, and said, 'You repeatedly spoke of the hundred different kind of flight you would show us but this one is mysterious indeed! You skim the waves with your wings and beak, almost as if you mean to dive into the water. What is the name of this kind of flight, O crow? Come, come, quickly, crow, I am waiting for you.'

Stricken, and unable to rise above the ocean, the humbled, frightened crow cried, in despair to the swan, 'Ah, we are mere crows that wander here and there, cawing as we go. O swan, I seek your protection, I place my life in your care. Oh, carry me to the shores of this dreadful ocean with your wings and beak!'

With that, the crow fell into the sea and struggled desperately in the water to stay afloat. Moved to pity, the swan said to the dying crow, 'Remember now, O crow, what you said in praise of yourself. You claimed that you could fly through the sky in a hundred and one different ways and were thus superior to me. Alas, why then are you tired and fallen into the sea?'

All his arrogance gone, the piteous crow looked up at the swan, and replied weakly, 'Proud of the leftovers upon which I fed, I imagined myself, O swan, to be the equal of Garuda and felt contempt for all other crows and many other birds far greater than me. I now seek your protection and place my life in your care. Oh swan, take me to the shores of some island. If I ever return safely to my own country, I will never again belittle anyone. Rescue me now from death by drowning!"

Without a word, the swan plucked up the crow with his feet, adroitly set the wet, trembling and miserably cawing creature on his back, and flying up as gracefully and strongly as ever, flew back to the island from where they had flown out. Setting the crow down on dry land and having comforted him, the swan, fleet as the mind, rose up into the sky and continued on his way.

O Sutaputra, it was thus that the swan humbled the crow that lived on the food that the Vaishya's children fed him. The crow, on his part, entirely cast off his pride born out of his wild delusions, and took to living a life of peace and quiet, and never bragged again in all his days.

Just as that crow, who lived upon the remains of the food eaten by the Vaishya children, slighted his equals and superiors, so do you, O Karna, who feed on the scraps from the table of the sons of Dhritarashtra, denigrate your equals and superiors. Why did you not kill Partha at Virata's city when you had the protection of Drona, Aswatthaman, Kripa, Bhishma and the other Kauravas? Arjuna routed you all like a lion chasing away a pack of jackals. What became of your prowess then? Seeing Savyasachi kill your brother in front of all the Kuru heroes, you fled. Again, when the Gandharvas attacked you beside the Dvaitya Lake, Sutaputra, you deserted the Kurus and were the first to run. Finally, it was Partha who vanquished the Gandharvas led by Chitrasena and freed Duryodhana and his wife.

Rama himself spoke of the great prowess of both Arjuna and Krishna before the kings in the Kuru court. You have frequently heard Drona and Bhishma, in the presence of all the kings, say that the two Krishnas are invincible. I have spoken only about those matters in which Dhananjaya is superior to you as the Brahmana is superior to all created beings. Soon you will meet the son of Vasudeva and the son of Kunti and Pandu riding on their great ratha. As the crow in the story, acting with intelligence, sought the protection of the swan, you too had best seek their protection.

O Karna, you will not speak so proudly or confidently when you actually face Vasudeva and Dhananjaya. When Partha quells your pride with his arrow storms, you will realise the difference between you and him. Those two are celebrated among the Devas, the Asuras and Manavas. You are only like a firefly among men, Karna, so do not speak foolishly or even think disrespectfully of those two resplendent luminaries. Krishna and Arjuna are radiant like Surya and Chandra. O learned Sutaputra, do not think insolently of Achyuta and Arjuna. Those two noble ones are lions among men, so desist from your tawdry boasting.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna remains unconvinced by Salya. He says, "I know only too well what and who Krishna and Arjuna are. I know the Saurin's skill in managing chariots, and the might of Arjuna's astras. You, Salya, have not experienced them in battle. Knowing what they are, I will still fight the two Krishnas, those two greatest of men and warriors.

However, the curse of Parasurama Bhargava, that best of Rishis, that Avatara, haunts me today. When I was young, I lived disguised as a Brahmana with Rama, wanting to acquire the devastras from him. One day, Indra, who wanted to help Arjuna by weakening me, assumed the form of a vicious insect, and came and bit almost through my thigh while my Acharya slept with his head in my lap. The creature drew a pool of thick blood from me. I was in agony but, not wanting to disturb Rama's slumber, I did not move my leg. When he awoke, the Bhargava, the Kshatriya slayer, saw what had happened and how I had endured the pain.

He said grimly, 'You are not a Brahmana. Tell me truly who you are.'

I confessed that I was a Suta. The Maharishi's eyes turned crimson, and he cursed me in rage, 'Because, O Suta, you have acquired this final weapon, this Brahmastra, from me through deceit, at the time when you need it most, when the hour of your death comes, you will forget the mantra to summon it. Brahma surely cannot dwell in one who is not a Brahmana.

And it is true that I had forgotten that astra and its mantra during this war. Today it has returned to me. Among the Bharatas, Arjuna, who is the ultimate Kshatriya, has already and will further annihilate many of our greatest warriors. But have no doubt that I, Karna, will kill that fiercest and most dangerous shura, that savage archer whose tejas is unbearable, that Vijaya who always achieves his ends.

Strangely, I have my greatest astra back today and with it I will consume vast numbers of the enemy and Arjuna along with them. The immeasurable Ocean, that Lord of all the waters, surges with fierce impetuosity and engulfs innumerable beings. The Continent, however, holds him at bay. Today, while Arjuna ceaselessly shoots his tides of arrows, making each one a killer and destroys my warriors, I will contain him as the Continent does the Ocean.

Salya, O Madraka, today you shall witness the greatest duel of this war, why, the very reason for which all this carnage has taken place—the duel between great Arjuna and me, a battle that will eclipse every other contention, even the most ferocious one between the Devas and the Asuras combined.

That son of Pandu is inordinately proud and today he will face me with his great and extraordinary astras. And today, I will set all his weapons at naught and vanquish him with my own. I will scathe Dhananjaya with my arrows, scorching him as the Sun does his enemies. I will extinguish the great son of Kunti like the great torrent of rain from the sky, which puts out a blazing fire that threatens the whole Earth.

With my wide-headed shafts, I will still the son of Kunti, who is like a slippery and fearsome serpent; who is like a conflagration that flares up in wrath and always consumes its foes. As Himavat withstands fierce, devastating Vayu, the wind god, I will, without moving, contain the raging Dhananjaya. Yes, O Salya, this momentous day I will face the greatest archer in the world, the rampaging and invincible maharatha Arjuna, who once conquered all this Earth for his brother to perform the Rajasuya yagna. And Salya, who else but me will fight Savyasachi, who has vanquished everybody, including the very gods in the land of Khandava? Arjuna is proud; his astras strike deep; he has unearthly dexterity; he knows how to control horses; he singly harries vast hosts; and he is an Atiratha among atirathas.

Yet, today, I will strike his head from his neck with my arrows and this greatest of men will lie dead on this Kurukshetra.

O Salya, always keeping death or victory before me, I will fight Dhananjaya today. When I myself will gladly speak of the prowess of Phalguna in the midst of any grand gathering of Kshatriyas, why do you, fool that you are, hold forth to me about Phalguna's abilities? You are a doer of unpleasant works, a cruel and mean man, and an unforgiving critic of one who is forgiving. I can kill a hundred like you, but I forgive you. You are a man of sinful deeds and, like a fool, you have rebuked me and attempted to undermine me for the sake of Pandu's son.

Crooked as you are, you have said all this to me who am sincere and straightforward. Cursed are you that wound your friends. The critical hour is upon us, wretched Salya, for Duryodhana himself has come to battle and I am determined to see his purposes achieved. You, however, are behaving in a manner from which it is plain that you have no friendship for him, but great affection for his enemies, your nephews among them!

A friend is one who shows affection, makes his friend happy and makes himself agreeable; who protects the other and honours him, and who rejoices in the joys of his friend. I have all these attributes, and Duryodhana knows this well. On the other hand, he that subtly undermines, fetches doubt and sorrow to his friends and allies, wronging them in diverse ways, is no friend but a deadly enemy clasped to our very hearts.

All these villainous attributes are in you and you will discover all qualities of true friendship in me. For the sake of Duryodhana, for the sake of doing what is agreeable to you, for the sake of victory, for the sake of myself, and for the sake of God himself, I will fight today to the ends of my prowess; I will fight both Partha and Vasudeva. Witness today my feats. Behold today my Brahmastra and other devastras, as well as those that are not divine but deadly still.

Today is the day of fate on which Arjuna, tameless hero, will find death at my hands even as an enraged tusker in musth is killed by another. I will cast the Brahmastra at mighty Partha today, and he will not escape it."

But now, suddenly, a shadow of doubt clouds his magnificent face, a rictus of anguish briefly convulses his noble features. Karna whispers as if to himself, "But ah, if only the wheels of my ratha do not sink into the Earth in battle today."

Next moment, he is himself again and says, “Know this, O Salya, that I would not be frightened of Yama armed with his rod; or Varuna with his noose; or Kubera with his mace; or the lord of them all, Vasava, armed with his Vajra; or, for that matter, I will not fear any enemy of heaven or earth who may attack me. Then, why would I fear Partha or Janardana?”

Now, again, he bites his lip and falls silent as another memory stirs in him. Much more softly, confessionally, Karna says, “Once, while practising with my bow Vijaya in a solitary forest, I accidently killed a calf of a Brahmana’s homa cow with one of my arrows. The Brahmana cursed me saying, ‘Since you have carelessly killed the calf of my homa cow, the wheel of your ratha will sink into the earth when you are battling your greatest adversary and fear will enter your heart.’

Ever since, when I remember the curse of that Brahmana, I feel afraid. The kings of the Soma vamsa, the Lunar race, who are lords of other people’s weal and woe, offered to give that Brahmana a thousand cows and six hundred bulls. But, with even such a gift, O Salya, the Brahmana would not be gratified and withdraw his curse. I offered him seven hundred elephants with large tusks and many hundred slaves, male and female, and yet the Brahmana would not relent. I next took to him fourteen thousand black cows, each with a white calf, but he would not forgive me and take back his curse.

I then offered him an opulent mansion, full of every object of desire, and whatever wealth I had, with due worship, but he refused to accept it. He then said, ‘That which, O Suta, I have said will come to pass. It cannot be otherwise. If I withdrew my curse and turned myself into a liar, many creatures would die from my sin and their deaths would all be upon my head. For that, for the preservation of dharma I never speak a word of untruth. Do not, ever again, destroy the means of a Brahmana’s support. There is no one in the world who can prevent what I have said from happening. Accept my curse with humility, and let that be your atonement for the sin of having slain a blameless calf.’

Although you have chosen to rebuke me, still for friendship’s sake, Salya, I have disclosed all this to you. Hold your tongue now and listen further to what I say.”

"Sanjaya says, 'Thus silencing the king of the Madras, Karna continues, "says, you cannot frighten me with your stories of crows and swans. If Indra with all his Devas came to fight me, I would not be afraid; then how will I fear Arjuna and Krishna? You may unnerve another man with your words, but not this Karna.

Your heart is crooked and dark, Salya, and you are a base man that you have said all the bitter things you have to me, and not a word of praise or encouragement. Karna was not born, O Madraka, to be afraid of battle. I was born to flaunt my valour and to achieve glory for myself. After what you have dared say to me, you remain alive because of my friendship for you, my affection, and because you are an ally, Salya.

What I must do today for Duryodhana is crucial and he depends on me. That is why you are still alive. Earlier, I agreed to allow you to say what you pleased while you are my sarathy. I will keep my word and you will live, O Madraka. Although, I can vanquish my enemies without the help of a thousand Salyas. I believe that he who harms a friend is the worst sinner. It is for this that you are still alive.'"

"Salya says, 'Your ravings, O Karna, are with regard to the enemy. As for myself, I can vanquish him without the help of a thousand Karnas.'

Karna, twice as roughly, says, "Listen closely, O king of the Madras, to what I once heard told in Dhritarashtra's court where sage Brahmanas would narrate the tales of different lands and of many kings of ancient times. A venerable Brahmana once said this about the Bahikas and Madrakas.

The Brahmana said, 'One should always avoid the Bahikas, for those impure people are beyond the very pale of dharma. They live away from the Himavat, the Ganga, Saraswati, Yamuna, Kurukshetra, and the Sindhu and its five tributaries. Once, as a youth, I lived among them when I was on a secret mission and so their conduct is well known to me. I remember that a slaughterhouse for kine and a hall for storing intoxicating spirits always distinguished the entrances to the homes of the Bahika kings.

There is a town called Sakala, a river named Apaga, and a clan of the Bahikas known as the Jarttikas. The Jarttikas constantly drink a strong liquor called Gauda, and eat fried barley with it. They also eat beef with garlic, cakes of flour mixed with meat, and boiled rice that is bought from others. They have no dharma whatever or even any idea of it. Their women, intoxicated with drink, laugh and dance naked outside the walls of the houses in the cities, without wearing so much as garlands, singing the most obscene songs that are as musical as the bray of the ass or the bleat of the camel.

In intercourse, they are without any restraint, and in all other matters, as well, they do exactly as they like. Maddened with drink, they call out to one another, using many foul and endearing epithets. Addressing many drunken exclamations to their husbands and lords, the fallen women among the Bahikas, without observing restrictions even on the most sacred days, give themselves up to lewd dancing.'

One Bahika, who had lived among those arrogant women, who also happened to live for some days in Kurujangala, burst out sadly at this, saying, 'Alas, my ample Bahika woman, wearing the sheerest robe, through which her great breasts with their outthrust nipples show clear, even now prepares for bed and she thinks of me, while I am in this bland foreign land! Oh, when will I cross the Sutlej and the delightful Iravati, and arrive in my own country? When will I see those lush, beautiful women with blazing circlets of red arsenic on their foreheads, with streaks of jet-black kohl lining their eyes, and dancing naked and uttering wild and lascivious cries?

When will I be happy again in the company of those always drunken women, gyrating to the frenzied beat of drums and conches sweet as the cries of asses, camels and mules? When will I be among those sweet wanton wenches, and eating cakes of flour and meat and balls of pounded barley mixed with skimmed milk, and in the forests, with verdant paths lined by sami and pilu and karira trees? When will I again be among my own countrymen, muster some strength in numbers and fall upon unsuspecting wayfarers on the wild roads, and snatch away their robes and gold and beat them repeatedly to my heart's content!'

The Brahmana said, 'Listen to him! What sane man is there that would willingly dwell, for even a moment, amongst the Bahikas so fallen and wicked, and so completely depraved in their ways?'

This is how that Brahmana described those base Bahikas, a sixth of whose punya and paapa is yours, O Salya, for you are their king. That pious Brahmana then once more spoke at further length about those subjects of yours.

Listen to what he said. 'In the large and populous town of Sakala, a Rakshasa woman used to sing on every fourteenth day of the dark fortnight, accompanied by a drum: "When will I next sing the songs of the Bahikas in this Sakala town, having gorged myself on beef and drunk the Gauda liquor? When will I again, decked in ornaments, and with those ample maidens and women, gorge myself on mutton, pork and beef and the meat of fowls, asses and camels? For they who do not eat flesh live in vain!"

And this was what, O Salya, the young and old, among the inhabitants of Sakala, drunk out of their minds, sing and cry. How can there be dharma among such a people?

I must yet tell you of what another Brahmana said in the Kuru court: 'There where forests of pilus stand, and those five rivers, the Satadru, the Vipasa, the Iravati, the Chandrabhaga, and the Vitasa flow with the Sindhu being the sixth, there in those regions removed from the Himavat, are the countries called the Arattas.

Those lands are without any virtue and religion. No one should go there. The Devas, the Pitris and the Brahmanas never accept dakshina from the fallen, or those begotten by Sudras on women of other castes, or from the Bahikas, who never perform yagnas and are lustful and blasphemous.'

That learned Brahmana went on to add, 'Without any feelings of revulsion, the Bahikas eat from wooden vessels, earthen plates and vessels that have been licked by dogs and that are stained with pounded barley and other corn. The Bahikas drink the milk of sheep and camels and asses and eat curds and other preparations made from those different milks. Those degraded people number many bastards among them. There is no food and no milk that they will not consume. The Aratta-Bahikas are steeped in ignorance and should be avoided.'

You may know this, O Salya, but I will still tell you about what yet another Brahmana said to me in the Kuru court, 'How can one go to heaven, having drunk milk in the town called Yugandhara, and stayed in the place called Achyutasthala, and bathed in the spot called Bhutilaya? There where the five rivers flow just after issuing from the mountains, there among the Aratta-Bahikas, no respectable person should dwell even for two days.

There are two Pisachas named Bahi and Hika in the river Vipasa. The Bahikas are the offspring of those two Pisachas. They are not creatures made by Brahma. Being of such dark and unknown origin, how can they be conversant with the duties ordained in the shastras? The Karashakas, the Mahishakas, the Kalingas, the Keralas, the Karkotakas, the Virakas, and other peoples of no religion, also, one should always avoid.'

This is what a Rakshasa woman of gigantic hips told a Brahmana who once went to that country to bathe in a sacred tirtha and passed a single night there. That land is known by the name of Aratta. The people living there are called the Bahikas. Only the lowest of Brahmanas live there from very early times. They are without the Vedas, without gyana, without yagna and without the power to assist at another's yagnas. They are all fallen and many among them have been begotten by Sudras upon other men's women. The gods never accept any offerings from them. The Prasthalas, the Madras, the Gandharas, the Arattas, those called Khasas, the Vasatis, the Sindhus and the Sauviras are almost as blameworthy as the Bahikas in their practices."

'Karna continues, "You know all this, O Salya, but I still want to tell you what another Brahmana said, who once came to our house as a guest, so listen carefully. He watched our practices, was exceedingly happy, and said, 'I dwelt for a long time on a peak of the Himavat quite alone. Since then, I have travelled in various countries and seen the practices of different religions. Never, however, have I seen all the people of a country live without dharma.

All the races I have met will admit that the only true religion is the one that those who know the Vedas have expounded. Travelling through various countries, where different religions were observed, I at last came to the land of the Bahikas. There I heard that a Bahika would at first become a Brahmana, then a Kshatriya, after that a Vaishya, then a Sudra, and finally an Ambatta, a barber. Having become a barber, he would then again become a Brahmana.

Returning to the status of a Brahmana, he would yet again become a slave. When one person in a family becomes a Brahmana, all the others renounce the path of dharma and do as they like. The Gandharas, the Madrakas, and the foolish Bahikas are such people. Having travelled through the entire world I have heard of these practices, which is the dharma only among the Bahikas."

You should know all this, O Salya. But let me share the ugly root of all this venality of the Bahikas with you. Once upon a time, robbers from Aratta abducted a chaste woman. They raped her horribly so she cursed them, 'Since you have sinfully violated a helpless unwed girl, the women of your families will all become unchaste. You lowest of men, never will you escape from the consequences of this dreadful sin.'

It is for this, O Salya, that the sisters' sons of the Arattas, and not their own sons, become their heirs. The Kauravas with the Panchalas, the Salwas, the Matsyas, the Naimishas, the Koshalas, the Kasapaundras, the Kalingas, the Magadhas, and the Chedis who are all highly blessed, know what sanatana dharma is. Even the vilest ones of these countries know what dharma is. The Bahikas, however, live without dharma or any knowledge of it.

Beginning with the Matsyas, the people of the Kuru and the Panchala countries, the Naimishas, as well and the other honourable people, the pious among all races, know the eternal truths of dharma. This cannot be said of the Madrakas and the crooked-hearted race that dwells in the country of the five rivers.

Knowing all these things, O Salya, hold your tongue on things connected with dharma. You are the protector and king of such people and you share a sixth part of their paapa and punya. Or perhaps, you only share in their sins, for you never protect them. In the olden days, when sanatana dharma was revered in all lands, Brahma saw the ways of the people of the country of the five rivers, and condemned them. Why even in the Krita yuga, he censured the wayward conduct of those evil people whom Sudras had fathered on others' wives. When all other people observed the dharma of their respective varnas, the Pitamaha found fault with these men, even in that purest age.

You should know all this, O Salya, so let me tell you what a Rakshasa named Kalmashapada, while drowning in a tank, said. He said, 'Cowardice is a Kshatriya's dirt, while the non-observance of vratas is a Brahmana's dirt. The Bahikas are the scum of the Earth, and the Madra women the scum of the whole female sex.'

A king rescued the sinking Rakshasa and questioned him. Listen to his answer: 'The Mlecchas are the dirt of humankind; the oilmen are the dirt of the Mlecchas; eunuchs are the dirt of oilmen; those who use Kshatriyas to perform the priestly ministrations at their yagnas are the dirt of eunuchs.

The sin of those who have the last-named for their priests, and of the Madrakas, will be yours if you abandon me.'

The Rakshasa declared that this was the formula that should be used for curing a person possessed by a Rakshasa or one killed by a poison. The Panchalas observe the duties enjoined in the Vedas; the Kauravas observe truth; the Matsyas and the Surasenas perform yagnas, the Easterners follow the practices of the Sudras; the Southerners are fallen; the Bahikas are thieves; the Saurashtras are ill begotten bastards. They who are ungrateful, are thieves, drunkards, commit adultery with the wives of their Acharyas, are harsh in their speech, slaughter cows, wander during the night out of home from lust and wear other people's ornaments—what sin is there that they do not incur? Shame on the Arattas and the people of the country of the five rivers!

The Panchalas, Kauravas, Naimishas, Matsyas—all these know what dharma is. The old men among the Northerners, Angas and Magadhas, without themselves knowing what virtue is, follow the practices of the pious. Many gods, including Agni, dwell in the East. The Pitris dwell in the South and Yama of righteous deeds presides over them. The mighty Varuna protects the West and rules over the other Devas there. The divine Soma, along with the Brahmanas, rules the North.

The Rakshasas and Pisachas protect that best of mountains, the Himavat. The Guhyakas, O Maharajan, guard the mountains of Gandhamadana. Without doubt, Vishnu, otherwise called Janardana, protects all creatures. However, the Bahikas have no patrons among the Devas.

The Magadhas read omens and signs; the Kosalas understand what they see; the Kurus and the Panchalas comprehend everything even from a half-uttered speech; the Salwas cannot comprehend the whole until it is fully told. The Mountaineers, such as the Sibis, are stupid. The Yavanas are omniscient, the Suras particularly so. The Mlecchas are wedded to the creations of their own fancy, which other people cannot understand. The Bahikas resent beneficial counsel and the Madrakas are not like any of these.

O Salya, you are like that. So stay quiet and listen! The Madrakas are regarded as the scum of every nation so the Madra woman is called the filth of all womankind. The Madrakas constantly drink of spirits, violate the beds of their Acharyas, destroy unborn embryos through abortion, rob others of their wealth—ah, there is no sin that they do not have! Fie on the Arattas and the people of the country of the five rivers. Knowing all this, O Salya, hold your tongue and do not preach dharma to me. Do not force me to kill you before I kill Krishna and Arjuna."

Salya replies, "The abandonment of the ill and the sale of wives and children are, O Karna, prevalent amongst the Angas, whose king you are. Remember the faults of yours that Bhishma enumerated during the discussion about the Rathas and Atirathas, and quell your wrath. Do not be angry. Brahmanas or Kshatriyas as well as Vaishyas and Sudras, O Karna, can be found everywhere; so too chaste women and admirable vratas. Everywhere men take delight in jesting with men and wounding one another. Lustful men also are found everywhere.

Everyone, on every occasion, is skillful in speaking of the faults of others. No one, however, knows his own faults, or knowing them, feels shame. Everywhere you see kings devoted to their respective religions, and employed in correcting the wicked. One can also find virtuous men everywhere. So, it cannot be, O Karna, that all the people of a country are sinful. There are men in many countries that surpass the very Devas in their conduct."

Then Duryodhana stops Karna and Salya from continuing their duel with words that is heating up by the moment. He speaks to the son of Radha as a friend, and begs Salya with joined hands. Karna, O sire, refrains from saying anything more and Salya too falls silent and faces the enemy. Smiling once more, Karna urges Salya, saying, "Onwards! Fly at the Pandava army!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna, O Bharatarishabha, deploys his troops in a counter-array after seeing Dhrishtadyumna's invincible battle vyuha. Next moment, with a roar as of ten lions, he attacks. The rumble of his chariot and the loud din of musical instruments shake the earth, while that Pravira trembles with pent-up rage. He makes an immense slaughter of the Pandava forces like Maghavat annihilating the Asura host. He strikes Yudhishtira with countless arrows, while keeping him to his right.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'How, O Sanjaya, did Karna marshal his forces to counter the Pandavas' vyuha with all those invincible bowmen led by Dhristadyumna and Bhimasena? Who leads the wings of our army? How are the warriors stationed? How does that dreadful battle erupt? Where is Arjuna when Karna attacks Yudhishtira? Who can dare attack Yudhishtira in the presence of Arjuna who once singly slew all the fell beings of the Khandava vana! Who other than Karna would dare fight him?'

Sanjaya replies, 'I will tell you of the battle formations, of Arjuna's strategy and the manner of his attack, and how both sides fought the battle led by their respective kings. Kripa, the violent Magadhas, and Kritavarman of the Satwata vamsa take up their positions on the right wing. Sakuni, his son the maharatha Uluka, leading fearless Gandhara horsemen armed with bright lances, and many veteran mountaineers, numerous as flights of locusts and grim like Pisachas, protect the right of your army.

On the left flank of the Kaurava army are your sons and thirty-four thousand unrelenting Samsaptaka maharathas, mad with battle lust and all eager to kill Krishna and Arjuna. On their left are the Kambojas, Sakas, at Karna's command, with rathas, horsemen and foot-soldiers, also threatening Arjuna and the mighty Keshava. At the head of this army stands Senapati Karna, clad in beautiful armour, wearing angadas and garlands, to defend the centre. With his sons around him, that shura shines resplendent as he repeatedly draws his bowstring.

Dusasana, effulgent as the sun or fire, with tawny eyes and rough handsome features, rides on the neck of a huge elephant, leading many troops; he is stationed at the rear of the army and gradually makes his way forward to join the fray. Behind him comes Duryodhana himself, O Rajan, protected by his brothers riding on majestic horses and cased in beautiful mail, and the united Madrakas and the Kekayas of furious energy. He looks like Indra of a hundred sacrifices surrounded by the celestials.

Aswatthaman and the other chariot-warriors, and many vicious elephants shedding temporal secretions like the very clouds and ridden by brash and brave Mlecchas, follow behind. Decked with triumphal standards and blazing weapons, those huge creatures, ridden by warriors skilled in fighting from elephant back, look like verdant hills. Many thousands of inexorable warriors, armed with axes and swords, guard the feet of those elephants. The Kaurava vyuha, filled by horsemen, chariot-warriors and elephants, is as striking as a vyuha of the Devas or of the Asuras.

That immense array, wonderfully formed by the norms of Brihaspati, seems to dance as it advances and strikes terror into the hearts of its enemies. Like bank after bank of clouds scudding into the sky during the monsoon, foot soldiers, equestrians, car-warriors and elephants, all agog for battle, begin to issue from the wings of the Kaurava vyuha. Yudhishtira sees Karna at the head of the enemy troops, and says to Arjuna, "Look Dhananjaya at Karna's mighty vyuha with its countless wings. Ensure that this vast force does not overwhelm us."

Arjuna replies with folded hands, "Everything will be done just as you desire, O Bhaarata. I will target their leading warriors and destroy the enemy."

Yudhishtira says, "Then attack Radheya, while Bhimasena does Suyodhana, Nakula fights Virshasena, Sahadeva contends with Sakuni, Satanika faces Dusasana, Satyaki battles Kritavarman, and Pandya does Aswatthaman. I myself will face Kripa. Let the sons of Draupadi and Sikhandi contend with the rest of the Dhartarashtras, while the other warriors of our army assail the rest."

Arjuna says, "Tathaastu," duly issues instructions, and Krishna and he forge on to the head of the army, riding the primeval ratha which once belonged to Brahma and for which Agni Deva, who derives his effulgence from Brahma, became the steeds, the chariot which had successively borne Brahma, Ishana, Indra and Varuna.

Seeing that wondrous chariot advance, Salya says again to Karna, "There comes the invincible chariot, with white horses yoked to it with Krishna for its charioteer, even like the inevitable fruit of karma. There comes the son of Kunti, of whom you have been asking, slaughtering our men as he does. From the pandemonium, the roars and screams, there is no doubt that it is the noble Vasudeva and Dhananjaya who ride at us.

Look there at the cloud of dust that rises into the sky and overspreads it like a canopy. The whole Earth, O Karna, seems to tremble, cut deep by the rims of Arjuna's chariot wheels. Violent winds blow on both sides of your army and carnivores howl, and make other fearful cries. Look, O Karna, where the awful and portentous Ketu of vapoury form has appeared and covers the Sun, making one's hair stand on end. Look, where all kinds of wild beasts in seething packs, mighty wolves and tigers, look up in awe and fear at the Sun.

Look where the crows and vultures have gathered in their thousands, sitting with faces towards one another, as if in conversation. The coloured yak-tails attached to your chariot wave restlessly and your standard trembles. See your beautiful horses, with their great limbs, and swift like soaring birds, also quiver in alarm.

From all these portents, it is certain that great Kshatriyas and kings, in hundreds and thousands, will lay down their lives today. The hair-raising boom of conches, the battering of drums and the clash of cymbals, O son of Radha, resound on all sides, as well as the dense whizzing of diverse kinds of arrows, and the din of chariots, horses and men. Listen also, O Karna, to the deafening twang from the bowstrings of noble warriors. Ah, look, Karna, how Arjuna's banners fitted with rows of bells, and decked with golden moons and stars, blaze on his ratha, like flashes of lightning in a mass of clouds, as they flutter in the wind. Hear those other banners as they snap and crackle in the wind. The noble Panchala maharathas, with their bright flags and standards, are glorious, O Karna, like the very Devas on their unearthly chariots.

Behold the heroic son of Kunti, the unconquered Bibhatsu, flying his splendid and fearful kapi-dhvaja on his ratha, which attracts the gaze of all the warriors and strikes terror into his enemies; see where it advances to destroy our forces. Krishna, with his chakra, gada, Saranga, Panchajanya and his burning ruby, the Kaustubha—ah, he is transplendent as he comes urging those white horses fleet as the wind.

Hark! There twangs Savyasachi's Gandiva, and his arrow-storms that flare at us in tides and raze our forces on every side. Already, the earth is strewn with the heads of brave kings, with faces handsome as the full moon, with their large and coppery eyes of nobility, which see the world no more. Look where seasoned warriors, with raised weapons, fall with their arms hewn off, arms that look like spiked iron maces with other weapons in their grasp, and smeared with the finest pastes and perfumes.

Horses with eyes, tongues and entrails gouged out, lie prostrate along with their dead riders. Lifeless elephants big as mountain summits, mangled by Partha, fall like rows of hills. Ghostly chariots, their royal riders slain, collapse like the celestial chariots of the Devas whose punya is exhausted.

Look, look, Karna, where Arjuna Kiritin churns our army as a mighty maned lion might a herd of cattle. There the Pandava warriors massacre our kings and vast numbers of elephants, horses, chariot-warriors and foot-soldiers of your army. Partha, shrouded by friends, foes, weapons and dust, is not to be seen, even like the Sun covered by clouds. Only the top of his standard is visible and the twang of his bowstring can be heard.

Karna, today you will see Shwetavahana, whom you have been seeking, with Krishna for his sarathy, the two Naravyaghra of red eyes, annihilate us all in battle. If, O Radheya, you succeed in killing him, who has Keshava for his charioteer and the Gandiva for his bow, then truly, truly you deserve to be our king." Challenged by the Samsaptakas, Arjuna now turns towards them and makes an immense slaughter of their ranks.

Seeing this, Karna in a froth, says, "Behold O Salya, how the furious Samsaptakas assail Partha from all sides and like the Sun shrouded by clouds, he is no longer visible. Plunged into that ocean of warriors, Arjuna is sure to perish."

Salya replies, "Who can kill Varuna with water, or quench Agni with fuel? Who is there that can seize the Wind, or drain the Ocean? Your wanting to vanquish Arjuna is no different. The Devas and Asuras, united and led by Indra himself, cannot quell Arjuna.

Of course, Karna, you can always satisfy your vanity by bragging that you can kill Partha; but vast is the chasm between your hot hollow words and the accomplishment of the deed, for Vijaya is invincible. Why don't you turn your mind to any other less impossible task, one that you can achieve? Only he who can lift up this Earth in his two arms, burn all its creatures in anger, or cast the Devas down from swarga, can vanquish Arjuna Parantapa.

Now turn your gaze to mahabaho Bhima, the other son of Kunti, who knows no exhaustion, standing there glowing and resplendent, like another Meru. With anger blazing in him and longing for revenge, Bhima mahatejasvin has taken the field today seeking victory, and his mind is aflame thinking of all the indignities that were heaped on him, his brothers and Panchali dearer to him than his life.

And look where the most noble and pure Dharmaraja Yudhishtira stands, that subjugator of hostile cities, equally invincible in battle.

Look now at those two Naravyaghras, sons of the twin Aswini Kumaras: Nakula and Sahadeva, each insuperable in battle.

Yonder are the five sons of Draupadi with the features of Panchala princes. All of them, equal to Arjuna, and burning for battle and victory.

Beyond them stand the sons of Drupada, with Dhristadyumna at their head, surging with pride and energy: heroes endowed with untold tejas and valour.

And look where radiant, magnificent Satyaki, most celebrated Satwata, irresistible as Indra, advances against us, like an angry destroyer."

While those two lions among men speak together thus, the two armies flow into each other with an earthshaking report, like the currents of the Ganga and Yamuna flowing into each other in a flashflood.'

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When the two armies clashed in their battle formations, O Sanjaya, how did Partha destroy the Samsaptakas, and how did Karna assail the Pandavas? I am eager to know about all that happened in detail, and you are a skilled raconteur.'

Sanjaya says, 'This war is the result of the evil policy of your son. Arjuna arrays his troops in a vyuha to counter your vast force deployed by Karna.

The teeming Pandava army under Dhrishtadyumna, with its many divisions of horsemen, elephants, infantry and chariots, looks magnificent indeed. The son of Prishata, his ratha drawn by horses white as doves, is splendid like the Sun or the Moon, and armed with his bow, he is glorious like Death embodied. The sons of Draupadi, endued with the prowess of tigers, brandish exceptional weapons as they stand by the side of their mother's brother like the stars appearing with the Moon.

Seeing the Samsaptakas standing in battle formation, Arjuna tears into them with fusillades of fire from the Gandiva. The Samsaptakas fight back manfully: either to kill Partha or die in the attempt. That engagement between the fiery band of shuras, with infantry, cavalry and infuriated elephants and the Kiritin is swiftly comparable to the one between Arjuna and the Nivatakavachas. Dhananjaya destroys chariots, horses, elephants and foot-soldiers with his endless tirades, as well as standards, bows, swords, discs and battle-axes, and hacks away arms upraised with weapons in their grasp. He exterminates thousands and thousands of his sworn enemies in mere moments.

Seeing Partha's ratha caught in that deep vortex of warriors, the Samsaptakas utter loud shouts and roar like tigers. Partha, however, like Rudra in rage slaughtering all living beings, first mows down all his enemies immediately before him, and then cuts down those that stand further off, and, finally, those who are on his right and behind him.

Meanwhile, the encounter between the Panchalas, the Chedis and the Srinjayas with your troops is torrid and bloody. Kripa, Kritavarman, Sakuni, and their battle-hardened veteran fighting men ferociously engage the Kosalas, the Kasis, the Matsyas, the Karusas, the Kaikeyas and the Surasenas, all themselves valiant in the extreme. The ensuing carnage fetches the destruction of body, life and sins, and leads to fame, heaven, and virtue, for the Kshatriya, the Vaishya, and the Sudra heroes who are embroiled in it.

O Bharatarishabha, at this same time, Duryodhana with his brothers, and many other Kuru heroes and many Madraka maharathas, all protect Karna while he takes fire to the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Chedis and Satyaki. Karna destroys that immense division with his arrows, killing numberless chariot-warriors, and Yudhishtira soon finds himself hard pressed by the meridian Sutaputra. Calm as ever, the Dharmaraja destroys the armour and weapons, and mangles the bodies of thousands of his enemies and sends them to swarga and eternal fame and brings joy to his friends.

Thus, O Rajan, that battle between the Kurus and the Srinjayas that decimates so many men, horses and chariots, is like the war long ago, between the Devas and the Asuras.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, O Sanjaya, how, after a bloody slaughter of the Pandava troops, Karna strikes at Yudhishtira. Which leading warrior among the Parthas withstood his attack? Whom did Karna have to overcome before he could reach Yudhishtira?'

Sanjaya says, 'Finding Dhrishtadyumna leading the Parthas and prepared for battle, Karna charges them recklessly. Like swans rushing towards the sea, the Panchalas, equally eager for battle, surge out against that noble warrior advancing toward them. The blare of thousands of conches, piercing the heart, and the fierce sound of thousands of battle drums arise from both armies. The sound also of diverse musical instruments and the general rumpus made by elephants, horses and chariots, and the deafening shouts of warriors is quite unbearable.

It is as if the whole earth with her mountains, trees, oceans and the entire sky covered with wind-tossed clouds, and the whole firmament with the sun, the moon and the stars, trembled with that sound. All who hear that noise are terribly disturbed, while the weak among them fall dead. Then Karna, excited with battle lust, invokes his astras and begins to hack into the Pandava army like Maghavat smiting the army of the Asuras.

Swiftly penetrating the Pandava host, Karna kills seven and seventy of the Prabhadrakas and five and twenty Panchalas. With many inexorable cloth-yard shafts fitted with wings of gold, he then slaughters the Chedis in thousands. While he achieves these superhuman feats, throngs of Panchala chariots, O Bhaarata, quickly surround him. Karna looses five irresistible shafts and kills Bhanudeva, Chitrasena, Senabindu, Tapana and Surasena, five famed Panchala warriors, and loud cries of dismay go up from the Panchala host.

Ten Panchala maharathas surround Karna and them, too, Karna kills in moments. His two invincible sons, Sushena and Satyasena, who protect his chariot wheels, fight heedless of their very lives while his eldest son, the mighty maharatha Vrishasena, protects his father's back.

Now Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, the five sons of Draupadi, Vrikodara, Janamejaya, Sikhandi, Nakula and Sahadeva and many other formidable Prabhadraka, Chedi, Kaikeya, Panchala and Matsya warriors attack Radheya all together inundating him with him different kinds of astras. Karna's sons and many other warriors of your army fight back powerfully in his defence. Sushena, with a loud shout, breaks Bhimasena's bow with a broad-headed arrow and pierces him with seven cloth-yard shafts in the chest. The dreaded Vrikodara, quite dancing with rage on his chariot, sweeps up another immense bow, strings it in a flash, smashes Sushena's bow and pierces him with ten arrows. And in a wink, he rakes Karna with seventy more.

With ten other arrows, Bhima then fells Bhanusena, another son of Karna, with his horses, charioteer, weapons, and standard, in the very sight of the prince's friends. He removes his head beautiful as the moon with a razor-headed arrow, like a lotus plucked from its stalk, and, never pausing, resumes demolishing your troops.

He destroys the bows of Kripa and Kritavarman, and puts them to flight. He gores Dusasana with three solid iron arrows and Sakuni with six, and shatters the chariots of Uluka and his brother Patatri. Shouting "You are dead!" at Sushena, Bhima fits an arrow to his bowstring, but Karna, quicker than thinking, truncates that shaft and strikes Bhima himself with three barbs. Bhima losses another perfect barb at Sushena, but Karna cleaves that one, too, in flight.

Incensed by now, and wanting to save his son, Karna plunges seventy-three arrows into Bhima in a blur. Now, with a superb bow, Sushena lacerates Nakula's breast and arms with five sizzling barbs. Nakula strikes him back with twenty sturdy shafts and gives such a roar that it frightens even Karna.

However, Sushena pierces Nakula with ten arrows and breaks his bow as well. Beside himself at this, Nakula takes up another bow and retaliates with nine searing shafts. He, O Rajan, shrouds all the quarters with showers of arrows, kills Sushena's charioteer, stabs Sushena deep with three shafts and, with three other broad-headed arrows, breaks his wonderful bow into three pieces.

Red-eyed, Sushena seizes up a fresh bow and bores sixty arrows into Nakula and seven into Sahadeva. The battle rages intensely between them, yes, my lord, even like that between the Devas and the Asuras.

Satyaki kills Vrishasena's charioteer, rives his bow with a wedge-headed shaft, and gashes his horses with another seven. He first destroys his flagpole and then wounds Vrishasena with three cruel barbs through his chest. Vrishasena staggers and almost swoons for a moment, but quickly recovers and, then armed with a sword and shield, attacks Yuyudhana with virile ferocity. But Satyaki, with ten arrows with heads like a boar's ears, knocks his sword and shield out of his grasp. Seeing Vrishasena's plight, Dusasana dashes up to his rescue, taking him into his own chariot, and bearing him away like the wind to the edge of the field where he finds him another ratha. Vrishasena rejoins the battle and strikes the five sons of Draupadi with seventy, Yuyudhana with five, Bhimasena with four and sixty, Sahadeva with five, Nakula with thirty, Satanika with seven, Sikhandi with ten, and Yudhishtira with a hundred fuming arrows. That formidable archer, the son of Karna, continues to assail these and many other fearsome warriors and to protect Karna from the rear.

Meanwhile, Satyaki, with iron quarrels, first destroys Dusasana's charioteer, horses and ratha and then strikes him in the forehead with ten shafts. The Kuru prince gains another ratha and once more begins to fight the Pandavas, from within Karna's aksauhini. Then Dhristadyumna finds Karna with ten arrows, the sons of Draupadi pierce him with three and seventy, and Yuyudhana with seven, Bhimasena with four and sixty arrows and Sahadeva with seven; Nakula drills him with thirty shafts, Satanika with seven, the heroic Sikhandi with ten and Dharmaraja Yudhishtira with a hundred.

They and other valiant warriors, O Rajan, all wanting swift victory, begin to all target Karna. He, manoeuvres his ratha with astonishing adroitness, and strikes every one of those warriors with ten arrows each. We then witness the wonderful, supernal nimbleness of the noble Karna and the power of his astras. No one can distinguish when he draws his arrows, when he aims them, and when he shoots them. All we see are his enemies falling dead. The sky, the earth, and all the quarters are entirely shrouded with his lethal arrows and are uncannily resplendent as if covered with red clouds.

The valiant, most elegant son of Radha strikes each of his assailants with thrice as many arrows as each of them had struck him with. And once more piercing each of them, and their horses, charioteer, chariot, and flagpoles with ten arrows, he gives a loud roar and deftly flits his way between his attackers. After crushing those mighty bowmen with gales of arrows, Radheya penetrates, unresisted, into the midst of Yudhishtira's aksauhini, destroys thirty chariots of the ruthless Chedis, and injures Yudhishtira himself with a punishing, dangerous volley.

At this, many Pandava warriors, O Rajan, with Sikhandi and Satyaki, rush to Yudhishtira's rescue and surround Karna. All the greatest archers of your army resolutely protect Karna. Then the sound of various musical instruments rises up, O Rajan, and the leonine shouts of heroic warriors rend the sky. The Kurus under Karna and the Pandavas under Yudhishtira once more fearlessly face each other.' "

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna, leading a force of a thousand chariots, elephants, cavalry and infantry, pierces the Pandava host and, marvellously fending off thousands of missiles unleashed at him, attacks Yudhishtira Dharmaraja. He cuts off the heads, arms and thighs of his enemies, and drops them dead on the earth, and the survivors flee in panic.

Satyaki leads a determined charge of the Dravida, the Andhaka, and the Nishada foot-soldiers against Karna. However, Radheya hews off the arms and heads of hundreds, thousands and, soon enough, tens of thousands of these warriors and they fall continuously onto the earth, like a forest of sala trees cut down with countless axes. Karna, called Vaikartana, moves purposefully on the field like the Destroyer himself, while the Pandus and the Panchalas try to obstruct him, ineffectually, rather as those that try to stop a great epidemic with drugs and mantras. Karna races towards Yudhishtira, mowing down all before him.

Finally, the Pandus, the Panchalas and the Kekayas spring to the Dharmarajan's defence, and Karna finds himself checked, like Death that cannot touch those who are conversant with the Brahman. Then Yudhishtira, his eyes red with fury, says, "O Karna, Karna, O conceited Sutaputra, obedient to the wishes of Duryodhana, you have always tried to oppose us and to challenge Phalguna. Show us your might today, your energy, and all the hatred that you bear the sons of Pandu. Today, I will purge you of your very desire for war."

Yudhishtira, O Rajan, pierces Karna with ten solid iron shafts, golden-winged, while Karna in return contemptuously strikes Yudhishtira with ten arrows with heads like the calf's tooth. Yudhishtira blazes up in anger like a fire fuelled by butter, and, bending his formidable golden bow to its fullest stretch, he shoots a whetted arrow that can pierce the very hills and is as fatal as the rod of Yama; a missile that flies with a sound like a thunderclap and sorely injures Karna deep in his left side. Stricken by the violence of that shaft, Karna's limbs seem to turn to water and he falls in a swoon in his chariot, his bow dropping from his hand.

Seeing Karna fall, the colour drains from the faces of the Dhartarashtra army and cries of dismay are heard. The Pandavas, on the other hand, watch the success of their king, and leonine shouts and a bedlam of cries of joy arise from their ranks.

However, Karna almost immediately recovers his senses, raises his formidable gold-chased bow, the Vijaya, and looses a veritable tempest of arrows at Yudhishtira, apparently determined to kill him at once. With two razor-headed arrows, he kills the Panchala princes Chandradeva and Dandadhara, splendent like the constellation Punarvasu by the side of the moon, who stand beside Yudhishtira's chariot to protect his two wheels and flanks. With a roar, Yudhishtira gores Karna with thirty arrows, Sushena and Satyasena with three, and all the others who protect Karna, each with another three immaculate barbs. The son of Adhiratha then laughs aloud and, brandishing his bow, inflicts a deep wound on the Pandava king's body with a flat-headed arrow, and then, in a blur, pierces him with sixty shafts more and gives an echoing roar of triumph.

In some panic to save Yudhishtira from the vicious and indomitable Sutaputra, a host of formidable Pandava warriors attack Karna. The Panchala prince Janamejaya finds Karna with some telling volleys, while Satyaki, Chekitana, Yuyutsu, Sikhandi, the sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, Bhimasena, Shishupala and the Karushas, the Matsyas, the Suras, the Kaikeyas, the Kasis and the Kosalas, all these redoubtable warriors, together assail Radha's recalescent son. Armed with different kinds of arrows and diverse astras, leading a mixed force that consists of chariots, elephants and cavalry, they surround the mighty Karna.

Thus set upon from on all sides by those Pandava warriors, Karna invokes the Brahmastra, filling all the points of the sky with arrows past count and imagination. Then, like a wind-fanned fire, which has burning arrows for its flame tongues, the ineluctable Sutaputra rides unhindered across the field as he pleases, burning the vast forest of Pandavas troops at his blazing will.

Karna, incomparable archer, unleashes some powerful astras and laughing, first destroys Yudhishtira's bow and, then, in the blink of an eye, cuts away his golden, jewel-encrusted armour. It falls away shimmering wonderfully, leaving Yudhishtira exposed.

The bleeding son of Pritha wrathfully hurls an iron javelin at Adhiratha's son; Karna fluently cuts it into pieces as it courses at him. Yudhishtira, roused, pierces Karna with four lances through his arms, brow and chest, drawing fonts of blood, and roars repeatedly. The livid Karna, hissing like some great Naga, cuts down his antagonist's standard and gashes the Pandava with three flat-headed arrows. He also blows apart Yudhishtira's quivers and then smashes his chariot.

The Dharmaraja moves to another ratha, to which are yoked his favourite battle horses, white as ivory and with black tails, and turns his face and begins to beat a retreat. His Parshni charioteer killed, Yudhishtira is crestfallen, desperate and cannot face Karna anymore. Radheya pursues Yudhishtira, and, in an amazing gesture, cleanses himself by touching his unknowing brother on the shoulder with his hand, the palm of which bears the auspicious signs of the thunderbolt, the chatra, the hook, the fish, the tortoise, and the conch shell. Karna can now easily seize Yudhishtira and make him his captive, but then he remembers his vow to Kunti.

Salya shouts urgently to him, "Karna, do not seize Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. As soon as you take hold of him, he will reduce both you and me to ashes, such is his punya."

Karna, O Rajan, laughs in mockery and says sneeringly to the helpless Yudhishtira, "How can you, born of a noble race and who observe Kshatriya dharma, flee the battlefield in fear, to save your life? I do not think that you know Kshatriya dharma. Endued with Brahma-shakti, you are indeed devoted to the study of the Vedas and the performance of yagnas. But do not, O son of Kunti, fight Kshatriyas or approach true warriors again! Do not disparage Kshatriyas and never again take any part in great battles or wars. You may speak as you have done to others, my lord, but not shuras like Karna! You have seen today what the consequence are.

Go back to your tent, O son of Kunti, or go to Keshava and Arjuna. O Rajan, Karna will never kill one like you."

Saying this, the mighty Karna lets Yudhishtira go, and wades into the Pandava army like the Vajradhari slaughtering an Asura host. Seizing the opportunity, Yudhishtira does indeed flee, along with the Chedis, the Pandavas, the Panchalas, and Satyaki, the sons of Draupadi, the Suras and the twin sons of Madri. Seeing the aksauhini of Yudhishtira in flight, Karna is absolutely enthused and pursues the retreating force with all the Kuru warriors.

The din of battle-drums, conches and cymbals, the twang of bows, and loud shouts of joy arise from the Dhartarashtra troops.

Meanwhile, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, O Kurunandana, riding on Srutakirti's ratha, feels the full extent of Karna's prowess. He is filled with biter royal rage on seeing his troops slaughtered, and, losing control over himself, yells at his warriors, "Kill these enemies! Why are you like passive women?"

At the king's command, Bhimasena leads the Pandava maharathas against your sons. The shouts of the warriors of both armies, combined with the noise of the chariots, elephants, horses, foot soldiers and the clash of weapons, is tremendous, as they begin to tear into one another in the dreadful encounter. Their showers of shafts cast a shadow like that of clouds over Kurukshetra, as they cut down banners, standards, royal parasols, horses, charioteers and weapons.

Kshatriya kings, deprived of life and limb collapse like mountain-summits, as do elephants with their riders, falling lifeless like mountains struck by thunder. Thousands of horses with their armour and fine caparisons all torn, fall dead along with their heroic riders. Maharathas with weapons loosened from their grasp die; great phalanxes of foot soldiers die in their thousands.

The earth is strewn with the heads of heroic warriors with large and staring coppery eyes, and faces reflecting the intoxication of battle, yet handsome, beautiful as the lotus or the moon. The sounds of music and song are heard from the sky and on the earth, from choruses of apsaras riding on their devarathas, as they continually greet the newly arrived heroes above, those killed in war in hundreds of thousands. They are then seated in the heavenly chariots and flown towards Indra's domain. Witnessing with their own eyes these wonderful sights and wanting to join these fortunate ones in swarga, the living Kshatriyas joyfully slay one another.

Maharathas, other rathikas, foot soldiers, cavalry and elephants confront each other wildly and fight magnificently.

Indeed, the carnage is immense and the battlefield is covered over with the dust that the troops raise. Enemies slay enemies and friends kill friends in the blind, mad pall of darkness. They drag one another by their hair, bite, and tear each other with their nails, strike with clenched fists, and fight with bare arms in that fiercest of all wars that consumes both lives and sins.

As the battle continues, another frothing river of blood runs from the bodies of slain men, horses and elephants, and that current carries away numbers of dead elephants and steeds. It is mired with torn flesh and it is horrific. Yet, compelled by the desire for victory, some warriors ford the bloody river, some remain on the bank on which they are, some plunge into its depths; some sink in it, while some swim through it, their armour, clothes and weapons all bloody.

Some deranged by all the horrors they have seen bathe in it, some drink the blood, O Bharatarishabha. Chariots, horses, men, elephants, weapons, ornaments, robes, armour and warriors, the earth, the sky, the firmament, and all the points of the compass turn red. With the stench, touch, taste, and the crimson sight of the flowing blood and its rushing sound, almost all the survivors are plunged in dejection.

The Pandava heroes, with Bhimasena and Satyaki, once more assail your already beaten army and force them to flee the field. Indeed, your army with its chariots, cavalry, elephants and soldiers, is no longer a compact array, as they break ranks and run in all directions with riven armour, with weapons and bows loose in their nerveless hands, with the enemy close on their heels—like a herd of frightened elephants in the forest harried by a large pride of lions.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing the Pandava warriors rout your host, Duryodhana attempts to retrain your fleeing soldiers, O Bharatarishabha, but in vain. Then, one of the wings of your army and its further wing, as well as Sakuni and his well-armed troops rally the Kauravas against Bhimasena. Finding the Dhartarashtra army with all its kings fleeing, Karna tells Salya, "Drive towards Bhima's chariot."

The king of the Madras urges the magnificent white horses towards Vrikodara's ratha to join the battle. Seeing him, a livid Bhima says to Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna, "Go and protect Yudhishtira who has escaped great peril before my very eyes. Evil Karna cut away his armour and had him at his mercy. Either today I will end Karna's life, or he will kill me. I entrust the king to you as a sacred pledge and you must protect him at all costs."

With that, Bhima rides straight at Karna, his roars resounding all around. Seeing him come, Salya tells Karna, "Here comes the vengeful Bhima to take his resentment of years on you. I have never before seen him look as he does now, not when Abhimanyu or Ghatotkacha were killed. He looks like the all-destroying fire at the end of the yuga, and seems as if he can consume the three worlds."

By this time, Vrikodara reaches Karna's chariot and Karna, laughing blithely, says to Salya, "What you say about Bhima, my lord Salya, is no doubt true. He is brave, full of anger, reckless and stronger than anyone else is. While living disguised in the city of Virata, he secretly killed Kichaka and all his relatives with his bare hands to protect Draupadi. Today, he comes wearing armour, insensate with wrath and ready to battle even Yama armed with his gada.

I have always cherished the desire that one day I will either kill Arjuna or Arjuna will kill me. That aspiration of mine will be fulfilled today. If I kill Bhima or destroy his ratha, Partha will come to fight me. And that will please me, so decide quickly whatever you think we should do."

Salya says, "O Mahabaho, face mighty Bhimasena first and then you will find Phalguna. I suspect that the longing which you have cherished for so many years in your heart will be fulfilled today."

Karna says again, "Either I will kill Arjuna or he will kill me. Prepare for battle and take me to Vrikodara."

Rajan, Salya swiftly drives the chariot to where Bhima is decimating your army with torrents of polished shafts. Then, to the blare of trumpets and the peal of drums, Bhima and Karna clash and a stunning duel erupts, one that leaves them both covered in a thousand gaping wounds, all their limbs lacerated and covered in blood. Finally, Bhima, ablaze with wrath, fixes an arrow to his bow, a weapon that can pierce mountains and, drawing the bowstring to his ear, looses it at Karna with all his enormous force. Thundering, that shaft passes right through Karna like a thunderbolt piercing a mountain.

Struck through, spouting blood, your Senapati, O Kuruvarya, buckles and faints in his chariot. Seeing this, Salya spirits him away from the battlefield, and now Bhimasena begins in earnest to massacre the vast Dhartarashtra army like Indra routing the Danavas.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Bhima accomplished an exceedingly difficult feat, O Sanjaya, when he caused the mighty-armed Karna to measure his length on the platform of his chariot. Duryodhana would often tell me that only Karna was capable of killing the Pandavas and the Srinjayas. Now seeing him felled, what does my son do?'

Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Karna driven off the field, your son, O Rajan, says to his brothers, "Fly with my blessings, and protect Radheya who is plunged into a fathomless sea of calamity."

At this command, his brothers Srutarvan, Durddhara, Kratha, Vivitsu, Vikata, Soma, Nishangin, Kavashin, Pasin, Nanda, Upanandaka, Duspradharsha, Subahu, Vatavega, Suvarchasas, Dhanurgraha, Durmada, Jalasandha, Sala and Saha, at the head of a teeming chariot force, all in fury, charge Bhimasena like insects flying into a forest fire, and surround him. They shoot showers of arrows of different kinds from every side at him. In a flash, Bhima mows down fifty of their leading maharathas and five hundred warriors ranged against him. With a broad-headed arrow, he decapitates your son Vivitsu, his face like the full moon and adorned with earrings and headgear.

His vengeful brothers fall upon Bhima, who, with two more arrows, kills Vikata and Saha, who resemble two Devas and they fall like a pair of tempest-uprooted trees. Without pausing a moment, Bhima dispatches Kratha to Yama, with a long needle-like arrow through his throat. Cries of rage and woe ring out from your other sons.

Mighty Bhima next kills Nanda and Upananda, at which your sons, terrified out of their wits, all turn tail and flee helter-skelter for they see in Bhimasena, the Pandava, the Destroyer himself at the end of the yuga.

Seeing your sons slaughtered, an anguished Karna again urges his steeds, white as swans, towards Bhimasena at frenetic speed. The duel between Karna and Bhima is the fiercest yet, and dreadful and deafening. I too, O Rajan, was most curious to watch the battle between them.

Bhima and Karna loose relentless torments of winged arrows to engulf each other. They are both sorely wounded and bleeding copiously, until Karna destroys Bhima's bow with a broad-headed arrow. An incensed Bhima picks up a fearsome golden parigha, wound with hempen cords and which resembles Death's bludgeon, and hurls it at Radheya with a roar. It flies true with a tremendous peal of thunder. Karna smashes that spiked mace into fragments with a marvel of arrows as it flies towards him.

Bhima, grasping his bow more tightly, shoots Karna with volleys of viciously sharp darts; their duel is a pair of massive lions locked in a death struggle.

Karna draws his bowstring to his very ear and drills Bhimasena with three terrible shafts like fire. Deeply struck, Bhima yet responds with a fearful shaft of his own, which passes through Karna's armour and body and enters the earth like a snake into an anthill. Karna trembles with the pain that plunges through his body; he shows some agitation. But recovering quickly, he retaliates with five and twenty shafts, followed by blizzards more, none of which miss Bhima. Seizing the moment, the rampant Sutaputra cuts down Bhima's flagstaff, kills his charioteer, rives his bow, and at last destroys his ratha.

Lord of the Bharatas, mahabaho Bhima, who is like his father Vayu in prowess, picks up a gada, jumps down from his chariot in a towering rage and begins to savagely butcher your troops, smashing heads, limbs, spraying blood, brains and flesh everywhere. He puts to rout seven hundred war elephants with tusks as big as plough-shafts. With his titanic strength and intimate knowledge of the marmas of an elephant, he strikes them on their temples and frontal lobes, their eyes and the parts above their gums causing the terror-sicken animals to turn tail and run from the monstrous human.

However, their hastikas manage to bring them back and to surround Bhimasena once more, like clouds covering the sun. But then, Bhima of supernatural strength now smashes down those beasts along with their hastikas, weapons and standards, before turning his attention to Sakuni's two and fifty elephants and killing these as well.

Bhima gone wild, Bhima drenched in the blood of man and beast, irresistible, elemental Bhima, a spectre of death runs amok, roaring like a hundred lions on Kurukshetra, ravages your army, destroying a century of chariots and several hundreds of foot-soldiers in the absolute bedlam and mayhem that he brings in his mad wrath.

Scorched by the sun as well as by the wild Bhima, your army begins to shrink like a piece of leather spread over a fire. Your troops, O Bharatarishabha, filled with fear of Bhimasena, flee in all directions. Then, five hundred maharathas, all cased in fine armour, rush towards Bhima with loud shouts, shooting thick showers of arrows. Like Vishnu destroying the Asuras, Bhima annihilates all those brave warriors with his mace, with their charioteers, chariots, banners and weapons. Sakuni unleashes three thousand of his feared horsemen, all armed to the teeth, at Bhima. That Paraviraha smashes them all down with his swinging gada, spraying the air and strewing the ground with blood, heads, limbs, brain, bone and marrow. After exterminating the Gandhara horsemen, he mounts another ratha and rides after Karna.

Meanwhile, O Rajan, Karna engages Yudhishtira in another duel, covering him with thick arrow showers; he kills the eldest Pandava's sarathy and pursues Yudhishtira as he tries to escape, loosing sizzling volleys of kanka-feathered arrows after him.

Bhima comes up on them and covers the entire sky and Karna with torrents of arrows. Radheya whirls around and, leaving Yudhishtira, attacks Bhima hotly. Satyaki joins the fight and, setting himself beside Bhima's chariot, also begins to shoot at Karna. Doubly afflicted, Karna still attacks Bhima with undimmed ferocity. Resplendent those two are, and fierce and grim, as they loose flights of shimmering shafts at each other that resemble shining cranes.

Their thousands of arrows, O Rajan, obscure the rays of the sun, the points of the sky, cardinal and subsidiary. Why, even as Surya lazes at his zenith at midday, over Kurukshetra a great dimness falls. Seeing Sakuni, Kritavarman, Aswatthaman, Karna and Kripa engage the Pandavas, the Kauravas rally and return to the fight. The reverberation of the ensuing battle is as that of seas roaring when it rains.

The sun has reached the meridian and the two armies battle in furious exuberance—very likely, a battle such as we have not yet seen, even though both armies have been vastly denuded and the war has aged. The sound of battle is loud and deep as not one but of several oceans that crash into one another. Indeed, they appear no more to be two armies but a single one, intent on obliterating itself.

A desperate battle ensues between the Kurus and the Pandavas, both driven by the desire to win immortal fame. A great pandemonium of voices is incessantly heard, O Bhaarata, and as I listen to them call each another names and ridicule and deride each other about their ancestry or about their ways and conduct, I feel certain that their lives have run out and a terrible fear grips my heart about the dire consequences that must necessarily follow. The carnage continues, O Rajan, as the Pandavas and the Kauravas, mighty maharathas all, maul and carve one another.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Pure and complete hatred filling their every fibre, those Kshatriyas massacre each other. Squadrons of chariots and divisions of cavalry, infantry and elephants clash in mortal combat. We see maces rise and fall, drawing geysers of blood and brain; spiked bludgeons do the same; we watch lances and short arrows fly to their marks, and astras flare at each other.

Storms of vicious arrows fly like locust clouds. Elephants gore each other horribly, while horsemen, chariot-warriors and foot-soldiers confront one another and kill and die, while each moment Kurukshetra becomes a more horrific spectacle, until one cannot bear to look at the grisly field. The earth, covered with blood, is like a vast plain infested by the red coccinella of the monsoon; she resembles a beautiful maiden attired in white virginal robes dyed deep scarlet.

Flesh and blood are the golden ornaments of the spectral field. Everywhere other macabre adornments lie thickly strewn—severed heads, trunks, arms, thighs, and earrings and other ornaments displaced from the bodies of warriors, O Bhaarata, and the collars, cuirasses and mangled bodies of brave archers, coats of mail and banners.

Elephants gore other tuskers and, bathed in blood, the huge creatures are stunning to behold, like moving hills shining with metals and with streams of liquid chalk running down their breasts. Lances hurled by horsemen or held by enemy warriors are snatched out of the air by these beasts who then twist and break them like twigs. Many of the great ones, who have lost their armour in the battle, look like mountains divested of clouds at the advent of winter; those pierced with gold winged arrows are as gorgeous as mountains whose summits are lit up with blazing brands.

Some of these stricken leviathans fall head first, like winged mountains of yore with their wings sheared away. Others roar strangely, like lions, while some trumpet and scream in almost human voices, and run here and there in agony and panic.

Horses in golden trappings with cruel arrows and spears protruding from them run in all directions; many fall down and writhe in agony. Men too, struck down, fall uttering cries of pain, O Rajan; many seeing their sires, grandsires, relatives and others, retreating, call out their well-known names and the names of their races. The chopped off arms of warriors, smeared with sandalwood paste and decked with golden ornaments, writhe on the ground, falling down and springing up, or dart forward like five-headed snakes, like little standards of gold drenched in blood.

The battle spreads out and rages on; hardly anyone anymore knows whom they fight or kill in the dementia that holds them all in its grip. A cloud of blood-flecked dust darkens the field and the warriors can no longer distinguish friends from enemies. Yet again, a mighty river fed by countless bloody rillets begins to flow, the heads of men its rocks and the hair of noble warriors its floating weeds and moss. Bones form the fishes of the ghastly river; bows, arrows and maces are its little floating rafts, while flesh and blood are the mire of the frothing current that flows from Kurukshetra to Yamaloka.

Many plunge into those crimson streams and perish, coursing fear through the timid and fetching exhilaration to brave Kshatriyas. Various carnivores, O Naravyaghra, roar and yell hideously turning the once allowed field of dharma into a precinct in the domain of the king of the dead. Innumerable headless trunks rise up everywhere, with naked necks, and fearsome creatures, gorging on flesh and drinking fat and blood, O Bhaarata, dance on the banks of that second Vaitarani. Crows, vultures and cranes, gorged with flesh, fat and marrow and other scavengers move about everywhere in glee.

There are warriors who cast off all fear and observing Kshatriya dharma, fearlessly continue to fight. Indeed, on that horrible field where arrows and spears beyond all count fly through the air, above the ground crowded with scavengers and carnivores both earthly and otherwise, brave and noble warriors fight on fearlessly, with lances and battle-axes, displaying their prowess and declaring their names and their lineage, ah, as if their eyes have seen no carnage.

As the battle rages on, the numbers of the Kaurava army dwindle and it flounders like a ship on the bosom of a stormy ocean.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The loud twang of the Gandiva, O Rajan, is heard above the din of battle, as the son of Pandu fights the Samsaptakas, the Kosalas and the Narayana forces. The determined Samsaptakas unleash a barrage of arrows at Arjuna, which he shrugs off and plunges into the thick of the enemy ranks and slaughters many of their foremost maharathas. Shooting his whetted arrows fletched with kanka feathers in waves, Partha comes face to face with Susarman, king of the Trigartas.

Susarman strikes Partha with ten shafts and Janardana with three in his right arm. Next, with a broad-headed arrow, he pierces Arjuna's kapi-dhvaja, made by Tvashtri, the celestial artificer himself, whereupon the huge image of that great Vanara fluttering on it begins to utter loud and fierce sounds and roars, and your troops freeze in fear. As it stands immobilized, your army looks like the Chitraratha forest laden with flowers of various kinds.

They soon recover their senses, O Kurudvaha, and begin to drench Arjuna with showers of arrows. They surround his magnificent ratha, and assail him with crazed roars although all the while he continues to mow them down. They attack his horses, his chariot-wheels, his chariot-shaft, and every other part of his ratha with great force. Some of them clutch Kesava's massive arms, while some seize Partha himself with glee as he stands tall upon his chariot, but the two Krishnas shrug their assailants off as an angry elephant shakes off riders from his back.

Finding himself cornered by these maharathas and Krishna under attack, Arjuna is filled with rage and mows down a large number of the enemy with special arrows used in close encounters.

He says to Krishna, "Behold, O Mahabaho, these countless Samsaptakas yet trying to accomplish a fearful task although they are slaughtered in their thousands! O Yadusrestha, there is no one on earth but I who can withstand such an attack on his chariot."

Saying this, he blows his conch; Krishna follows him and the combined blast fills the heavens and terrifies the Samsaptakas who begin to waver. Then that Paravirahan, greatest of heroes, paralyses the Samsaptakas as he repeatedly invokes the Nagastra and they are forced to stand motionless, O Rajan, as if turned to stone. Now Arjuna slaughters the motionless warriors like Indra long ago slaying the Daityas in the battle with Taraka.

The Nagastra binds their lower limbs with writhing snakes so that they cannot move a step. Seeing his army paralysed, the mighty Susarman invokes the Sauparnastra and numberless birds fly down and devour those snakes or chase them away. Freed from that astra, the Samsaptaka forces look like the sun emerging from behind clouds and shedding light again. Once more, they shoot their arrows and cast their spears and axes at Arjuna's chariot. Arjuna cuts down their every volley and fusillade, and he continues to slaughter them.

Then, Susarman plunges a perfect arrow directly into Arjuna's chest and immediately drills three more shafts into Partha closely around the first one. With a gasp of pain, his blood spurting from the four wounds, great Arjuna sits down on the platform of his ratha. All the troops cry out in alarm, "Partha is slain!"

The blare of conchs, the pounding of drums, the sound of diverse musical instruments, and loud shouts of triumph and lament envelop the battlefield. However, Arjuna quickly recovers and invokes the Aindrastra. Thousands of arrows issue from this single weapon and, screaming forth in all directions, kill kings, elephants, horses and warriors in thousands, creating a great fear in the hearts of the Samsaptakas and Gopalas, O Bhaarata. Not a warrior among them can stand up to Arjuna, and he destroys your troops, as he likes. All your foremost maharathas can do nothing to contain the unparalleled Dhananjaya, as he first kills ten thousand fighting men, then a further seventeen thousand warriors and three thousand elephants, and he stands resplendent like an intense and smokeless fire.

Then the Samsaptakas once again encircle the Pandava, and the battle between them is an unprecedented bloodbath.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Kritavarman, Kripa, Aswatthaman, Karna, Uluka, Sakuni, Duryodhana himself and his brothers, O Bhaarata, find the Kuru army like a ship wrecked on the raging ocean; in abject fear of Arjuna and unable to stand together, they still attempt to rescue the rapidly sinking craft of your forces; for a short while, a fierce battle rages.

Kripa shoots dark locust swarms of arrows and envelops the Srinjayas. A vengeful Sikhandi pours a cataract of arrows over that bull of a Brahmana, which Kripa, master of astras, renders tame, and he wounds Sikhandi deep with ten of his own scathing shafts. A breathless exchange of arrows follows and, finally, the twice-born Kripa demolishes Sikhandi's ratha, his horses and charioteer and forces him to leap out of his chariot.

Sikhandi picks up a sword and shield and rushes at the Acharya, and though Kripa strikes him with a flurry of thought-swift arrows, it is wonderful to see Sikhandi battle on undeterred. Noticing Sikhandi at bay, his brother Dhrishtadyumna flies to his rescue but Kritavarman cuts him off. Aswatthaman bars Yudhishtira's way as he, with his son and troops dashes towards Kripa's chariot. Your son Duryodhana holds up Nakula and Sahadeva as those maharathas come charging in. Karna holds off Bhimasena, the Karushas, the Kaikeyas and the Srinjayas.

Meanwhile, Kripa unleashes fire tides at Sikhandi, as if he wants to incinerate him. However, whirling his sword around, the Panchala prince strikes down all Kripa's livid golden arrows; Kripa demolishes Sikhandi's shield emblazoned with a hundred moons. This draws loud applause from your troops. His shield shattered, Sikhandi is at Kripa's mercy but, sword in hand, still attacks the Brahmana, like a sick man running towards the jaws of Death. Then, Chitraketu's noble son Suketu, seeing Sikhandi in dire straits, rushes to his defence and swathes Kripa in countless iron-tipped missiles. Seeing his chance, Sikhandi, O Kurusattama, makes good his escape.

Suketu and the son of Gautama are soon engaged in a deadly duel and, in a fierce exchange, the prince breaks Kripa's bow and badly injures his sarathy. An enraged Kripa picks up a fresh bow and rakes Suketu with thirty barbs through all his vital marmas, making that prince sway on his ratha like a tree trembling during an earthquake. Next moment, with a razor-headed arrow, Kripa strikes off Suketu's head adorned with a pair of blazing earrings and a helmet and it falls like a piece of meat from the claws of a hawk. Upon the fall of Suketu, his frightened troops flee from the terrible Kripa.

Meanwhile, the mighty Dhrishtadyumna challenges Kritavarman, "Stop and fight, O Bhoja!"

The two are soon at each other like two hawks fighting over a piece of meat. Dhrishtadyumna strikes Kritavarman through his chest with nine arrows, drawing spouts of blood from the Bhojaraja. Undeterred, Kritavarman mantles his assailant, his steeds and his chariot with such an opacity of arrows that he makes him invisible. An incensed Dhrishtadyumna, with all those golden arrows stuck in him, is magnificent to look at, and retaliates with a deluge of fire, which Kritavarman douses as it falls on him from the sky.

Dhrishtadyumna dispatches Kritavarman's charioteer to Yama, and having thus vanquished his mighty antagonist, begins to lay into the Kaurava forces. Your warriors, too, O Rajan, charge towards Dhrishtadyumna, uttering leonine roars and the battle is fully joined once more.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing that Satyaki and the sons of Draupadi protect Yudhishtira, Aswatthaman moves determinedly against him, loosing a riptide of golden-winged shafts as he flies at Yudhishtira. A master of all kinds of weapons, he fills all the sky with devastras and soon Yudhishtira is engulfed in a vast expanse of arrows. Covered over with that cupola of golden arrows, the firmament presents a striking spectacle, O Kurudvaha, as if a canopy embroidered with gold has been spread there and casts a shadow, as that of clouds. It is wondrous to behold, even with the carnage continuing without let all around, and not one creature of the air could fly through it. The shining dome comprehensively contains Satyaki, Yudhishtira, and all the other Pandava warriors.

The maharathas of the Pandava army are filled with wonder and cannot so much as look at Aswatthaman, who blazes like the sun. While Drona's terrible son is slaughtering the Pandava troops, for this is no benign covering of golden astras, Yudhishtira, the sons of Draupadi, Satyaki, and the Panchala warriors unite and, quite forgetting their fear of death, surge forward against him. The seven warriors all assail him violently, supported by many other Kshatriyas from every side. Hissing like a serpent, Aswatthaman responds with slews of arrows that find them all, bringing agony. He destroys Srutakirti's bow; that prince takes up another and gashes Drona's son with a light-like volley.

Aswatthaman continues to consume the Pandava troops, with relentless tides of fire. Smiling, he breaks Yudhishtira's bow and plunges three keen shafts into the Dharmaraja. Yudhishtira picks up another formidable bow and, quick as the mind, drills the Brahmana with seventy arrows through his arms and chest.

Satyaki flashes up and, with a roar, bisects Aswatthaman's bow with a crescent-tipped arrow. Aswatthaman fells Satyaki's charioteer with a spear and, taking up another bow, swathes him with countless arrows. Satyaki's horses without a charioteer run free on the battlefield. The Pandava warriors led by Yudhishtira sweep in and attack Drona's son with great violence.

Aswatthaman, finding himself under attack, unleashes firestorms of astras to consume the Pandava troops as a fire in the forest does dry grass and straw. The Pandava army is stricken, threatened like the mouth of a river by a whale, and all that watch Aswatthaman's prowess consider the Pandavas to be already dead.

A raging Yudhishtira cries to Drona's son, "O Naravyaghra, you have neither affection nor gratitude, since you want to kill today. The duties of a Brahmana are tapasya, dakshina and study. Only a Kshatriya should bend a bow, and you have reduced yourself to being a Brahmana only in name. Do whatever you can, Aswatthaman, but I will still vanquish the Kauravas in your very sight. You are a wretch amongst Brahmanas."

Aswatthaman smiles and reflects but without saying anything, he covers Yudhishtira with a shower of arrows like the Destroyer engaged in annihilating the creatures at yuga's end. Yudhishtira quickly retreats from the spot, abandoning his large aksauhini and Aswatthaman also does, O Rajan. Yudhishtira, avoiding the son of Drona, assails your army, determined to annihilate it.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, Vikartana stands firm against Bhimasena supported by the Panchalas, the Chedis and the Kaikeyas, covers him with arrows, and kills many of the enemy's maharathas. Bhimasena avoids Karna and rides against the Kaurava troops like a blazing fire towards a heap of dry grass, leaving the Sutaputra to contend with the mighty bowmen amongst the Panchalas, the Kaikeyas, and the Srinjayas, in their thousands. Indeed, while Partha and Vrikodara are exterminating the Samsaptakas and the Kauravas, Karna is decimating the Panchalas. It is because of your evil policy, O Rajan, that all these Kshatriyas are annihilated in the war.

A stirred Duryodhana wounds Nakula and his four horses, and knocks down Sahadeva's golden standard. The Pandava princes retaliate and strike your son with a myriad of shafts and, the battle quickly igniting, the twins lose their bows. Duryodhana's bow, O Bhaarata, seems always drawn into a circle and arrows appear to issue ceaselessly from it. Shrouded by Duryodhana's shafts, the Pandava princes cease to shine brightly, like the sun and the moon shrouded by masses of clouds, and all that we see is one uniform expanse of the work of the Destroyer himself, at he appears at the end of the yuga.

Seeing this remarkable exhibition by your son, all the maharathas consider the sons of Madri to have entered the presence of Death.

Dhrishtadyumna, Senapati of the Pandava army, sees Duryodhana on the verge of overwhelming the twins and flies to their rescue loosing a great wave of arrows before him as he comes. Your son, that Bharatarishabha, turns his attention to the Panchala prince, and they are quickly entangled in a duel of razor-faced arrows. Dhrishtadyumna quickly finds his bow broken and leather gloves cut to shreds. Standing resplendent on his ratha with red eyes and bleeding from his many wounds, he seizes up another bow, O Kurudvaha and, with godlike force, looses five and ten cloth-yard shafts fletched with kanka and peacock feathers at Duryodhana. These arrows that resemble hissing snakes blast right through the golden armour of your son and, passing through his body, enter the earth.

Deeply wounded and weak from his gaping, flowing wounds, your son looks like a beautiful and gigantic kinsuka in the spring. He shatters Dhrishtadyumna's bow again and strikes him with ten arrows between his brows. Those polished shafts adorn Dhrishtadyumna's face like a number of bees sipping honey from a full-blown lotus! Dhrishtadyumna's response, with a new golden bow, is to kill Duryodhana's four horses and sarathy and to destroy his chariot, the upashkara, the chatra, his spear, sword, mace, and his beautiful standard bearing the device of an elephant worked in rare jewels.

Duryodhana's brothers race up to rescue their defenseless older brother and, before Dhrishtadyumna's very eyes, Durdhara plucks him onto his ratha and bears him away from the battle.

Meanwhile, wanting to rescue Duryodhana, Karna bears down on the fierce Dhrishtadyumna, Drona's slayer. However, Satyaki, who is pursuing him, strikes your son with a lucific volley of arrows, like an elephant pursuing a rival and stabbing him in his hindquarters with his tusks. A fierce battle breaks out between those two noble warriors, while both armies look on.

Meanwhile, when the sun had climbed again to his zenith[1], Karna attacks the Panchalas and an immense slaughter of elephants, horses and men takes place on both sides. The Panchalas, O Rajan, anticipating victory, fly at Karna like birds towards a home tree. A frothing Karna begins to decimate them with a dark plague of arrows, singling out their commanders Vyaghraketu, Susharman, Chitra, Ugrayudha, Jaya, Sukla, Rochamana and the invincible Singhasena who surround him with their chariots and inundate him with their arrows. He seriously injures those eight warriors and goes to slay many thousands of other seasoned fighters.

Karna kills Jishnu, Jishnukarman, Devapi, Chitra, Chitrayudha, Hari, Singhaketu, Rochamana, the famed maharatha Salabha, although the Chedi warriors bloody him. Karna's archery causes a great agitation on the field, as so many elephants run in fear and others, lethally wounded, utter cries of distress and fall like mountains struck by thunderbolts. The corpses of elephants, horses, men and ruined chariots are strewn along the path of Karna's chariot. Neither Bhishma nor Drona, nor any other warrior of your army has ever achieved such feats as Karna achieves on this day. As a lion chases a herd of terrified deer, Karna rides fearlessly among the Panchalas and brings murderous havoc to the maharathas that oppose him.

Even as fire burns everything it touches, the Karnagni burns all the Srinjayas who face him. Shouting out his own name as a battle cry, Karna single-handedly kills many leading warriors among the Chedis and the Panchalas. Looking at his unworldly archery, O Bhaarata, I thought that not a single Panchala would escape him, as the Sutaputra demolishes them almost contemptuously.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira dashes up to help the Panchalas, along with Dhrishtadyumna, the sons of Draupadi, and hundreds of his warriors, and surround Karna. Sikhandi, Sahadeva, Nakula, Nakula's son, Janamejaya, Satyaki, and innumerable Prabhadrakas are quite magnificent as they ride behind Dhrishtadyumna. Like Garuda swooping down upon a writhing nest of snakes, Karna, unaided, calmly, splendidly, faces all those Chedis, Panchalas and Pandavas, and the battle between them is as atrocious as the Devasura yuddha of old. Like the sun dispelling surrounding darkness, Karna, fearless and by himself, stands alone and godlike, contending with all those renowned archers who shoot ceaselessly at him and inundate him with a sea of weapons.

While Karna engages the Pandavas, Bhimasena imposing as the lord Yama, is employed in butchering the Kurus, who include the Bahlikas, the Kaikeyas, the Matsyas, the Vasatas, the Madras and Saindhavas. The elephants, in their hundreds, which Bhima kills with his cloth-yard shafts, fall with their dead riders and make the earth tremble. Horses with their riders dead, foot-soldiers pierced with arrows and vomiting blood, thousands of chariot-warriors mangled by Bhima's gales of shafts, litter the battlefield. Mauled and terrified by Bhimasena, Duryodhana's army stands stunned and numb, like the ocean during a calm day in autumn.

Stripped of its pride, your son's mighty army loses its splendour and Bhima continues to make a rill of their blood. While Bhima on the rampage annihilates the Kurus, a rabid Karna wades into the Pandava aksauhini.

As that incomparably brutal battle continues without pause or let, the onlookers can only marvel, inured to its horror from which an uncanny magnificence emerges, and Arjuna, after killing another host of Samsaptakas, says to Krishna, "The Samsaptaka rathikas' spirit is broken and they run from me like deer from the roar of a lion. I have dispersed the vast force of the Srinjayas as well.

Look where Karna's banner with the device of the elephant's rope is in the midst of Yudhishtira's aksauhini, where he wreaks great havoc. No other maharatha of our army can contain peerless Karna. O Krishna, I want you to avoid all the other warriors and take me to the Sutaputra, but, as always, I put my faith in your wisdom, and you must do as you please."

Krishna smiles and says, "Kill the Kauravas, O son of Pandu, without delay!"

That ratha, flying the kapi-dhvaja and harnessed to pure white horses in golden trappings, urged by Krishna, penetrates your vast force with a clatter like a battery of thunder on high, like a deva-ratha fleeting through the firmament. With blood red eyes, the two Krishnas are fearsome and magnificent, like the twin Ashvinis invoked during a yagna. Those Naravyaghras are reminiscent of two elephants in a forest, enraged by the claps of hunters.

Like Yama with his paasa, they fall upon your army. To check them, your son once more unleashes the Samsaptakas, with a thousand chariots, three hundred elephants, fourteen thousand horses, and two hundred thousand foot-soldiers—all unerring bowmen, courageous and expert warriors—against the Pandavas. They make little impression as, assuming a form like that of Death himself, Arjuna slaughters them. He fills the sky with a deadly and relucent torrent of golden shafts that fall ceaselessly on them. The sound of Partha's palms slapping his bowstring make us feel that the earth, or the vault of the sky, or all the points of the firmament, or the several oceans, or the mountains have broken apart.

Arjuna kills ten thousand Samsaptaka Kshatriyas, and goes on to savage the farther wing of the Samsaptakas supported by the Kambojas. Like Vasava ravaging the Danavas, he hacks off the limbs and heads of elephants, horses, chariot-warriors and foot soldiers and they fall onto the earth, like trees in a hurricane.

The younger brother of Sudakshina, the king of the Kambojas, attempts to stop him but quicker than seeing Arjuna severs his arms at the shoulders and then his handsome head, felling him from his ratha, his body bathed in blood, like the thunder-riven summit of a mountain of red arsenic, like a column of gold or like a summit of the golden Sumeru. Now, O Rajan, a pitched battle commences and another great carnage follows as warriors of the Kamboja, the Yavana, and the Saka races die in lakes of blood, turning the indescribable field into a single crimson expanse.

While Savyasachi is exterminating the wings of the Samsaptakas, Aswatthaman rides up, shaking his formidable bow, to challenge him. With his mouth wide open and eyes red with rage the mighty Brahmana warrior looks like Death himself, gada in hand at the end of the yuga. He penetrates the Pandava army and, falling on both Krishna and Dhananjaya, shrouds and stupefies them with his arrows. The universe of mobile and immobile beings utters cries of dismay, thinking the two Krishnas slain.

Crowds of Siddhas and Charanas arrive from everywhere, praying silently, fervently, "Let good befall all the worlds!"

Never before, O Rajan, have I seen Aswatthaman fight as he now does the two Krishnas. The sound of his bow is like a roaring lion and its string flashes like lightning. No one can stand up to him and, Arjuna himself feels that he has met his match and his assurance and vigour appear to drain from him. Krishna is incensed and draws hot deep breaths. O Rajan, he seems to burn both Aswatthaman and Phalguna with his gaze as he looks repeatedly from one to the other.

He then says tightly, "This, O Partha, is exceedingly strange that Drona's son surpasses you today! Where is your tejas and the might of your arms? Do you not still have the Gandiva in your hands, and do you not ride on own your chariot now? Have your hands suffered some injury? Otherwise, why is it that I see the son of Drona prevail over you today? Do not spare your enemy, thinking that he is the son of your Acharya, O Bharatarishabha. This is not the time for sentiment."

In a blur, Arjuna draws fourteen flat-headed arrows and destroys Aswatthaman's bow, standard, parasol, banners, chariot, spear and mace. He then strikes Drona's son through his shoulder with a clutch of calf-toothed arrows. Aswatthaman swoons and supports himself by clinging to his flagstaff; but he then falls in a dead faint, gushing blood from his wounds and his sarathy whisks him away from Arjuna.

Arjuna turns back to your troops and resumes slaughtering them in thousands, in Duryodhana's very sight.

Thus, O Rajan, because of your evil policy, unimaginable carnage continues, as the two armies massacre each other. Within moments, Partha overwhelms the Samsaptakas; Vrikodara, the Kurus; while Vasusena overruns the Panchalas. Great and skilled warriors fall and many headless trunks weirdly rise all around, for the will to battle has not left them. O Kurudhvaha, in great pain from his wounds, Yudhishtira retreats some two kosas from the field of battle and rests for some time.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Then, going up to Karna, Duryodhana says to him and to Salya, as well as the other commanders, "This wonderful occasion, when the gates of heaven are wide open, has arrived on its own. Happy are those Kshatriyas, O Karna, who find such an opportunity to kill the Pandavas in battle and win this wide earth, or die and win the blessed realms kept for heroes."

Hearing these words, the warriors present utter loud joyful shouts, and beat their drums and blow their musical instruments. Gladdening them further, Aswatthaman adds, "Dhrishtadyumna murdered my father before everyone, after Drona had laid aside his weapons. In revenge and for the sake of my friend, I swear today that I will not remove my armour without killing Dhrishtadyumna. If I fail to keep this my vow, let me not find swarga. I vow that I will crush Arjuna, Bhimasena, or any other who faces me today in battle."

Another general battle breaks out between the Kaurava and the Pandava armies. The clash of the chariot divisions, O Bhaarata, is savage and bloody and the destruction of life in the van of the Kurus and the Srinjayas resembles the pralaya. Various celestial beings, including the Devas along with Apsaras, appear on high to watch the battle. The Apsaras shower unworldly garlands down on those Kshatriyas, as well as different kinds of heavenly perfumes, and with sparling gemstones. Soft winds carry the sweet scents to all the leading warriors and inspire them so that they kill one another with greater gusto.

Strewn with celestial flowers, golden arrows, and with the bodies of so many celebrated warriors, the battlefield is as wondrous as the heavens, strewn with stars past count. The applause from the sky, the sound of musical instruments and the furious passage-at-arms distinguished by the virile twanging of bows, the clatter of chariot wheels and the roars and screams of warriors makes the uproar on Kurukshetra, dharmakshetra, deafening.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'O Rajan, with Arjuna, Karna and Bhimasena fighting in fury and beside themselves, such a battle rages between those lords of earth.

After besting Aswatthaman and other maharathas, Arjuna says to Krishna, "Look, O Mahabaho, the Pandavas flee while Karna razes our famed warriors. However, I see neither the Dharmarajan nor the standard of his son. The third part of the day still remains, Janardana, and no one among the Dhartarashtras challenges me for a fight. I am anxious, Lord, so drive to where Yudhishtira is. Once I know that he is safe and well with our younger brothers, we will return to fight the enemy again."

Krishna drives the chariot to where Yudhishtira and the powerful Srinjaya rathikas are fighting the enemy and making a dreadful slaughter. As they go, he says to Arjuna, "Look, Partha, at this bloody carnage of the Kshatriyas on earth, and all for the sake of one man—the evil Duryodhana. Look at the gold-backed bows of the slain warriors and their costly quivers dislodged from their shoulders. Look at the straight gold-winged arrows, at the oiled cloth-yard shafts that look like snakes that have recently shed their skin.

Look at the rare and magnificent swords with ivory hilts, and engraved with gold; look at the millions of broken and fallen gold embossed shields. Look at those golden lances and spears, and those huge maces with gold filigree and those gilded scimitars, those axes with golden embellishments, and the heads of some battle-axes fallen off from their golden hafts. Look at those iron kuntas, those short heavy clubs, those huge bludgeons with spiked heads, those fallen chakras, all so beautifully wrought and all for this blood-drenched war. All these warriors now lying lifeless came energetically to battle armed with different weapons and even now seem alive.

Look at the thousands upon thousands of handsome, noble warriors lying on the field, with limbs severed and crushed, or heads broken, or torn and mangled by elephants, horses and chariots. Kurukshetra is mantled with arrows, spears, swords, axes, scimitars, spiked maces, lances, iron kuntas, the corpses of men, horses and elephants, all hacked down and lying in streams of blood, all their rich and complex lives lost.

Bhumi Devi is stunning to behold, even as she was meant to be on this day, O Bhaarata, with fallen arms smeared with sandalwood paste, wearing golden angadas, keyuras and leather gauntlets, with hewn off thighs like elephants' trunks, with fallen heads, decked with costly gemstones and earrings, and with dead heroes with large and noble eyes. Why, Kurukshetra resembles a vedi, an altar cluttered with extinguished fires, with headless trunks smeared with blood as if in anointment, with severed limbs like sacrificial offerings.

Look at those exquisite chariots with rows of golden bells shattered, and those dead horses with arrows protruding from their magnificent bodies. Look at the skeletons of the chariots, their quivers, banners, the various standards; look at these giant white conches of maharathas, now stained in red and littered all over the field. Look at those elephants, big as hills, lying dead with innocent tongues lolling out, the dead horses decked with triumphal banners. Look at the housings of the elephants, and the skins and rich varied cloths, all torn and bloodied.

Look at those rows of bells broken when the great tuskers fell; look at those strong goads set with stones of lapis lazuli now lying forlorn on the ground. Look at those whips also decorated with gold and jewels, so many still in the grasp of dead horsemen, and those horse coverings of ranku deerskins.

Behold the sad jewels from the crowns of kings and their ample golden necklaces, the fallen royal parasols and yak-tail fans. Ah, look at the earth, mired with blood, strewn with the faces of heroes, luminous as the moon and the stars.

Look at the wounded warriors in whom life is not yet extinct and who wail in pain and sorrow. Casting aside their weapons, look where their kinsmen tend to them, hopelessly, weeping inconsolably. And look again upon those warriors, who despite all this, are still afire with wrath and the mad impulse to fight and win victory after already killing thousands of living men, their own kind; look where they yet ride and run headlong against their enemies, their bloodlust undimmed.

Look at those who run here and there in frenzy, fetching water for fallen comrades, while others breathe their last. The brave ones return with water and, seeing their relatives lifeless now, fling down the water and run away, shouting wildly to one another, demented by sorrow. And elsewhere, look, Arjuna, many have died after having slaked their dying thirst, while others die even while drinking. Others, though loving towards their fallen kin, desert them and, entirely in the grip of the dread spirit of war, charge madly at the enemy. Others bite their lips and, with brows knit, stand still and survey the entirely ghastly and absolutely beautiful battlefield."

Thus showing Arjuna the field of battle, Krishna rides on towards Yudhishtira and Arjuna, seeing his brother the king, and repeatedly cries to his divine sarathy, "Ride on, Krishna! Ride on!"

Krishna says to Arjuna, "Look at those kings rushing towards Yudhishtira. Behold Karna, like a blazing fire on the field of war. Look there, where the mighty Bhima rides into battle. Look where the greatest Panchala, Srinjaya and Pandava warriors under Dhrishtadyumna follow Bhima. And look, the enemy's vast host is broken once more. O Arjuna, look where Karna wild as Death and like Indra in prowess, tries to rally the fleeing Kauravas. There goes Drona's son, greatest of all Brahmana warriors, and maharatha Dhrishtadyumna rushes to confront him with the Srinjayas close behind."

Thus does the immortal Krishna describe what is before them to Arjuna. Then, O king, there erupts another torrid and devastating battle. Loud shouts and roars ring out as the two hosts clash, O Rajan, with death their goal.

And thus, as a result of your evil policy, unimaginable destruction has set in on the earth, O Bhumipala, of both your warriors and those of the enemy.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Karna leading the Kurus and Yudhishtira the Parthas, meet again in a battle that rapidly swells the population of Yama's kingdom. Rivers of blood run again on Kurukshetra, O Bhaarata, and only a small remnant of the heroic Samsaptakas survive. Dhrishtadyumna, the Pandavas and their maharathas all converge on and target Karna; and he, by himself, like a mountain receiving a cataract of water, faces them confidently.

In a hair-raising battle, great Karna repulses all those maharathas. Dhrishtadyumna pierces Radheya with a powerful shaft and shouts, "Wait! Wait and fight."

The supreme warrior Karna, filled with rage, shakes his formidable bow, the Vijaya, and destroys Dhrishtadyumna's bow as well as his arrows that resemble snakes of virulent poison. He then strikes the Panchala deep with nine burning arrows, which, O Bhaarata, plunge through Dhrishtadyumna's golden armour and, washed in blood, are bright as cochineal. The Panchala throws aside his broken bow, sweeps up another and looses a volley of serpentine venomous narachas at Karna. Karna retaliates with a lovely, lethal golden arrow that resembles a second rod of death. This ineluctable shaft flies straight to claim Dhrishtadyumna's life, but, in the nick of time, from a distant flank, and displaying astounding skill, Satyaki cuts down that shaft that would otherwise have surely claimed the Panchala prince, the Pandava senapati's life.

With a mythic tiger's roar, Karna turns and unleashes a livid fusillade at the Satwata. He gores Satyaki with seven cloth-yard shafts but the blithe Yuyudhana coolly responds with a shimmering swath of golden arrows. All over, the horrible and beautiful battle rages on; it is both fearsome and entirely wonderful to behold.

Meanwhile, Aswatthaman joins battle with Dhrishtadyumna, roaring, "Stop! Wait, O Brahmana, you will not escape me alive today."

They blast towering volleys at each other. Just as Drona knew that the son of Prishata would be the cause of his death, so too now does Dhrishtadyumna, seeing Drona's son before him, know that Aswatthaman will be the death of him. However, he remembers that no weapon can kill him in battle and so rushes at Aswatthaman fearlessly, like Death running at the Destroyer at pralaya at yuga's end.

And Drona's heroic son, drawing deep breaths, charges straight back at the Panchala prince, both of them filled with untold rage and hatred. Aswatthaman says to Dhrishtadyumna, "O Panchala wretch, I will send you to Yama today. The sin that you committed when you slew Drona will fill you with regret today, if you fight me without Partha's protection, or if you do not flee, O fool!"

Dhrishtadyumna replies, "This sword of mine which answered your sire in battle, will today answer you as well. If I could kill Drona, why can't I kill you who are only a Brahmana in name?"

Dhrishtadyumna pierces Drona's son with a slender, needle sharp arrow. The duel blossoms and they mantle each other with thousands of arrows so that neither the sky nor the points of the compass, or they themselves, can be seen.

Karna, too, O Rajan, holds at bay the Panchalas, the Pandavas, the five sons of Draupadi, Yudhamanyu and the mighty Satyaki and is the radiant cynosure of all eyes.

Dhrishtadyumna rives Aswatthaman's formidable bow and destroys all his venomous arrows, but in a flash, the mighty Brahmana responds by breaking the Panchala's bow, spear, mace, standard, and killing his horses, his charioteer, and shattering his chariot. Dhrishtadyumna seizes up a great sword and a blazing shield decked with a hundred moons. In the twinkling of an eye, before Dhrishtadyumna can alight from his ratha, Aswatthaman smashes these weapons also into dust.

However, despite putting forth all his prowess and skill, when Aswatthaman still cannot, O Bharatasrestha, actually kill the injured and helpless Dhrishtadyumna with arrows, he flings down his bow and, taking up his blue sword, swoops down on his enemy, like Garuda on a large snake.

Seeing this, Krishna tells Arjuna, "Look, Partha, how Aswatthaman races toward Dhrishtadyumna's chariot. Hurry! You must rescue Drupada's son, who is in the very jaws of death."

Krishna urges the white horses towards Aswatthaman and, seeing Arjuna come, Drona's son does his best to finish Dhrishtadyumna. Seeing him, sword in hand, try to haul Dhrishtadyumna down, mighty Partha looses a burst of golden arrows from the Gandiva at the Brahmana, drawing copious jets of blood and forcing him to leave the Panchala prince. Aswatthaman quickly mounts his chariot and, seizing up his own bow, shoots back fiercely at Arjuna.

Meanwhile, Sahadeva darts up, pulls Dhrishtadyumna into his chariot, leaving Arjuna to deal with Drona's son. Aswatthaman strikes Arjuna through his arms and chest, and Partha responds with a long shaft like another Yamadanda, which plunges deep into the Brahmana hero's shoulder. Aswatthaman collapses from the sheer violence of that shaft and he sits down on the floor of his ratha.

At this, filled with rage, Karna roars again and again and shakes his great bow, the Vijaya, and repeatedly eyes Arjuna, wanting single combat with him. Aswatthaman's sarathy, seeing him senseless, swiftly bears him away from the field.

Seeing Dhrishtadyumna rescued and Aswatthaman stricken, the Panchalas and the other Pandava warriors, O king, sensing victory, give loud shouts and thousands of sweet instruments are sounded. Arjuna says to Krishna, "I fervently wish to fight the Samsaptakas."

Krishna turns his wonderful steeds and the marvellous ratha, flying many banners, and whose speed is as that of the wind or the mind, flashes forward.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'As the ratha flares forward, Krishna points Yudhishtira out to Arjuna, and says: "There is your brother, hard pressed and fighting desperately against the mighty Dhartarashtra archers but the indomitable Panchalas are flying to his rescue. Yonder, Duryodhana, king of the world, accompanied by his brothers, leads a large chariot force of seasoned warriors in pursuit of Yudhishtira, like desperate men after a priceless gemstone. Armed to the teeth, bearing astras whose touch is as fatal as that of poisonous snakes, they are intent on killing him. And look, Satyaki and Bhima thwart Duryodhana and the Kauravas are again nonplussed, like the Daityas whom Sakra and Agni petrified when the Demon tried to steal the Amrita.

The vast ratha divisions of the Kuru army again surge towards Yudhishtira like a flashflood rushing towards the ocean in the monsoon. Those mighty bowmen give resounding shouts, blow their conches, and shake their bows as they charge forward. Attacked viciously by Duryodhana, Yudhishtira is already in the jaws of death and is a libation already poured on the yagna fire.

Duryodhana's army is in full battle array and Indra himself would find it difficult to escape once he comes within the range of their arrows. Who can withstand Duryodhana, who in his anger resembles Yama himself, and shoots his relentless showers of arrows with such awesome force? The power of Duryodhana's shafts, like Drona's, Aswatthaman's, Kripa's or Karna's can bring down the very mountains. Karna always frightens Yudhishtira, as we saw when your brother turned his back on the battlefield. Then Yudhishtira had the support of other maharathas but he is isolated and he is weak from his constant fasting. He has great Brahmana-shakti, but alas, not much of Kshatriya might.

Karna's assault has put him in grave peril and I fear, O Partha, that Yudhishtira Dharmaputra might well have fallen. Indeed, from the fact that the wrathful Bhimasena does not respond to the victorious roars and blowing of conches of the Dhartarashtra forces, O Bharatarishabha, I fear that the king is dead. Look where Karna urges the mighty Dhartarashtra chariot-warriors armed with the astras Sthunakarna, Indrasjaha and Pasupata, with maces and other weapons, towards Pritha's son. The king must be grievously wounded and weakened, for the Panchalas and the Pandava forces fly like the wind to rescue him, rather like strong men rushing to save a man sinking in a bottomless sea.

His standard is no longer visible and Karna has probably struck it down. Partha, in the very sight of the twins, and of Satyaki, Sikhandi, Dhrishtadyumna, Bhima, Satanika, and of all the Panchalas and the Chedis, Karna is destroying the Pandava divisions with his incendiary arrows, like an elephant trampling a bank of lotuses. Look, look, Arjuna, the rathikas of our army retreat and our elephant divisions, too, are in flight with dismal cries of distress. Karna's great standard, with the device of the elephant's rope, moves freely all over the battlefield. There, Radheya is now attacking Bhimasena's legions, shooting hundreds of arrows as he slaughters our army at will. Ah, he destroys the Panchala maharathas even as Indra once did the Daityas.

Look Partha, Karna has defeated the Panchalas, the Pandus, and the Srinjayas, and looks around, I believe, seeking you. Ah, as he draws his majestic bow, Karna looks as splendid and handsome as Indra in the midst of the Devas, after vanquishing his enemies. And seeing the indomitable prowess of Karna, the Kauravas roar lustily, lancing fear through the Pandus and the Srinjayas. Karna himself addresses his troops and says, 'Bless you Kauravas! Unite and attack with such speed that no Srinjaya escapes alive. We follow behind you.'

With his great chatra of a hundred ribs resembling the full moon held over his head, O Bhaarata, Karna looks like the Udaya hills bathed in moonlight. Arjuna, he is looking for you and he will surely come here swiftly. Behold him, as he shakes his formidable bow and shoots his arrows like serpents. Ah, look, he has seen your kapi-dhvaja and turns in this direction. Yes, great, great Karna comes looking for his own death, like an insect drawn into the mouth of a lamp.

A noble mahatejasvin, entirely fearless, his only concern has always been for Duryodhana; his loyalty is absolute, and, of evil mind, he detests you and your brothers. Seeing Karna alone and unsupported, Duryodhana resolutely turns towards him, along with his chariot-force, to protect his friend whom he loves more than anyone. Put forth your prowess now, Arjuna, kill that evil one along with all his allies, and win fame, kingdom and happiness. Both of you are gifted with incomparable might and are equally famed; so when you fight him, O Partha, like a Deva and a Danava in the Devasura yuddha of old, let all the Kauravas see your true strength and Duryodhana will not be able to do anything. Remember that you are a purified soul, Bharatarishabha, and that the son of Radha harbours animosity towards the virtuous Yudhishtira. Succeed, O son of Kunti, in what you need to achieve. Set your heart on dharma and ride against that senapati of chariot-warriors, O Pravira, and his mighty five hundred maharathas, five thousand elephants, and twice as many horses, and innumerable foot-soldiers, that are all united and protect one another, and advance against you even now.

Show yourself to Karna and attack him swiftly! I see his standard flying towards Dhrishtadyumna's ratha. He is attacking the Panchalas and will wipe them out. But there are some good tidings as well, Partha, for I think Yudhishtira Dharmaraja lives! Look, Bhimasena has returned and now leads the army with the Srinjayas and Satyaki to support him. Bhima and the noble Panchalas are slaughtering the Kauravas, O Kaunteya, and Duryodhana's troops are running helter-skelter from battle with blood streaming from their wounds. Bathed in blood, the Bhaarata army presents a dejecting sight, as of the earth with its crops destroyed.

Yellow, red, black and white banners, adorned with stars, moons, suns as well as many chatras, O Arjuna, lie scattered everywhere as well as standards of gold, silver, brass and copper. Elephants, horses and chariot-warriors, lie dead all over the field, slain by the dauntless Panchalas and the mighty Bhimasena.

Through their sheer valour, the Panchalas slaughter the Dhartarashtras, like angry lions attacking elephants. If unarmed, they snatch the weapons of their enemies and strike off their heads and arms. The Panchala chariots, elephants and cavalry charge the Kauravas and the vast Dhartarashtra force, like swift swans leaving the Manasa Lake and flying to the Ganga. The heroic Kripa, Karna and other commanders defend their positions doughtily but the Panchala shuras led by Dhrishtadyumna wreak havoc among the Dhartarashtra army already sinking under Bhima's prodigious assault.

The greater part of the Dhartarashtra army is panic-stricken as their elephants, scourged by Bhima's cloth-yard arrows, either fall like mountain summits riven by Indra's Vajra or run wildly from battle, crushing their own ranks. Do you hear Bhimasena's deafening shouts and roars of victory, Arjuna? And there comes the prince of the Nishadas on his wonderful elephants, like Yama with his bludgeon, to meet the son of Pandu in battle. Look! Bhima has cut off the roaring prince's arms at the shoulders, his spear still in his grasp, with ten bright cloth-yard shafts.

And now Bhima turns his violent attention to the other elephants that look like masses of blue clouds and are ridden by skillful hastikas. See how they strike Vrikodara with multiple darts and javelins. But look how he dispatches them with his arrows, seven at a time, and cuts down their triumphal standards and slaughters the rest with ten shafts. The triumphal shouts of the Dhartarashtras have all died in their throats, now that they have encountered Bhima, who is equal to Purandara himself. Bhimasena by himself holds full three aksauhini of Duryodhana's soldiers at bay."

Bhimasena, O Bhaarata, achieves impossible feats of grand valour and Arjuna finishes off the remnants of your army and routs the mighty Samsaptakas, yet again, so they flee in all directions. Many among them, who fall and become the guests of Indra in his hallowed halls, attain happiness. Arjuna Naravyaghra, with his deadly, unerring volleys, every shaft among them a killer, continues to annihilate the Dhartarashtra host of the four kinds of forces.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When Bhima was battling our elephant legions, and the Pandus and the Srinjayas were slaughtering my troops, when the morale of my vast army was low, what did the Kauravas do, O Sanjaya?'

Sanjaya says, 'Duryodhana confronts Bhima, as Karna rallies the troops and then counter-attacks the Pandava chariot-warriors who brace themselves to meet his charge. Bhimasena, Satyaki, Sikhandi, Janamejaya, Dhrishtadyumna, the Prabhadrakas and the Panchalas, sensing an opportunity, charge in from every side to support the Pandavas. Your maharathas, O Naravyaghra, join battle and the two armies with their chariots, elephants, cavalry, and large bodies of foot-soldiers, meet in a tremendous melee.

Sikhandi fights Karna, Dhrishtadyumna clashes with your son Dusasana and his large force; Nakula struggles against Vrishasena, while Yudhishtira battles Chitrasena. Sahadeva engages Uluka, Satyaki combats Sakuni, and the sons of Draupadi take on the other Kauravas. Aswatthaman combats Arjuna, Kripa engages Yudhamanyu, while Kritavarman fights Uttamaujas. A lone and unsupported Bhimasena takes on the Kuru divisions led by your sons.

Sikhandi, the slayer of Bhishma, holds Karna in check with his winged shafts and the Sutaputra, his lips trembling in rage, hits him with three arrows between his eyebrows. The duel heats up and in an exchange of arrows, Karna kills his opponent's horses, charioteer, and then destroys his standard. A livid Sikhandi jumps down from his chariot and hurls a dart which Karna knocks down and quickly follows up with more arrows which badly wound Sikhandi, forcing him to retreat. Karna, unhindered, goes on to scatter the Pandava troops like a strong wind disperses a heap of cotton.

Meanwhile, Dhrishtadyumna and Dusasana engage in a bloody combat of their own where they strike and maul each other. An irate Dhrishtadyumna even splits Dusasana's bow, earning a loud shout of applause from all the troops but your son takes up another bow and blocks Dhrishtadyumna with showers of arrows. The soldiers as well as the Siddhas and the Apsaras are wonderstruck at this amazing ability of your son, to defy the mighty Dhrishtadyumna, like a lion holding a huge elephant at bay. Many Panchala chariot-warriors, elephants and cavalry, O Dhritarashtra, come to his rescue and surround your son. The resultant battle is as frightful, like the destruction at pralaya at yuga's end.

Vrishasena, fighting by the side of his father, Karna, duels with Nakula in which they injure each other in an exchange of thousands of arrows. However, their divisions run away and Karna who was following, tries to dissuade them while Nakula turns his attention against the Kauravas. Vrishasena, avoiding Nakula, goes to protect his father's chariot-wheel.

Sahadeva fights an angry Uluka and kills his four horses and his charioteer. Uluka manages to escape and finds refuge among the division of the Trigartas.

Satyaki engages Sakuni in an uneven contest in which he easily cuts down his banner, injures his charioteer and kills his horses. Although Sakuni responds and pierces Satyaki's armour and then destroys his golden standard, he prudently takes shelter in his son Uluka's chariot that drives him away with great speed from the battlefield. Satyaki, Rajan, turns his attention to your army and decimates them mercilessly.

Yudhamanyu severs Kripa's bow who picks up a new one and shoots down Yudhamanyu's standard, charioteer and umbrella forcing him to retreat, driving his ratha himself.

Uttamaujas sends a scathing volley of arrows at Kritavarman and a bloody battle ensues, O Rajan, such as I have never seen before. Kritavarman ultimately injures his opponent severely in the chest, and he collapses, forcing his charioteer to flee with him to safety.

Your son Duryodhana stands firm against Bhimasena until the latter destroys his horses, charioteer, ratha and standard, forcing him to retreat, which delights the Pandava troops. At this, the whole Kuru army charge Bhimasena determined to kill him and the din of battle is frightful, Rajan.

Dusasana and Sakuni arrive with a large elephant force and attack Bhima with small arrows. Vrikodara responds spiritedly, forces Duryodhana to retreat and quickly confronts that elephant force with his Devastras like Indra against the Asuras. Covered all over with gold mesh and varied gemstones, the elephants are spectacular like clouds charged with lightning. Bhima's shafts cover the sky like myriads of insects blanketing a fire, and he quickly decimates them. The elephants stampede and some with their hearts pierced, collapse with their warriors clad in their studded finery. The earth is refulgent, as if someone has strewn it with broken mountains and exhausted planets. Bhimasena's arrows injure the elephants in their temples, frontal globes, limbs and trunks, and they are like mountains with liquid metals running down their sides as they flee in their hundreds. All that we can see are Bhima's two arms, like two mighty serpents, smeared with sandalwood paste and other unguents, continually drawing the bow. The elephants hearing the sound of his bowstring and his striking palms that sound like the peal of thunder, run away in fear ejecting urine and dung. Bhima's feats are reminiscent of Rudra destroying all beings.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Riding on his magnificent ratha yoked to white horses, with Narayana himself as the sarathy, Arjuna appears on the scene like a tempest, agitating your army. Meanwhile, a rampaging Duryodhana leads half his troops and surrounds Yudhishtira; the two Kshatriyas cover each other with their razor-headed arrows. The Kaurava troops try to seize Yudhishtira but the Pandavas send Nakula, Sahadeva, Dhrishtadyumna, and a full aksauhini of troops to his rescue. Brushing aside your chariot-warriors, Bhimasena also races up to save the cornered king. However, shooting furious volleys of shafts, Karna single-handedly holds them up. Though they fight with great valour and determination, they cannot overwhelm Karna.

Sahadeva invokes a devastra and rakes Duryodhana with twenty arrows. Seeing the Kuru king covered in blood, like an elephant with split temples, a furious Karna comes rushing in, summons his astras and routs Yudhishtira and Dhrishtadyumna's troops. Cascades of his shafts fall together, one so quickly behind the other that they collide, ignite and a conflagration blazes in the sky. His arms smeared with red sandalwood paste and adorned with jewels and gold, Karna looses with unearthly force and fills the ten directions of the sky with arrows, each one piercing an enemy warrior. Yudhishtira is sorely injured yet he strikes back at Karna with fifty fierce barbs.

The dreadful battle continues into the darkness of night, O Bharatarishabha, and loud cries of distress arise from your troops, as lethal arrows fitted with kanka feathers, swords and clubs annihilate them. Wherever Dharmaputra Yudhishtira casts his eyes in anger, there your army breaks. An enraged Karna attacks him, shooting cloth-yard shafts and crescent-tipped arrows and shafts with calf tooth heads. They shoot vigorously at each other until Karna strikes the royal son of Pandu squarely through his chest with three heavy arrows and forces him to sit down on the platform of his ratha. Yudhishtira tells his sarathy to turn away from the duel.

At this, all the Dhartarashtras, with their king, start shouting, "Seize him! Seize him!" and pursue Yudhishtira. Seventeen hundred Kekaya troops join some of the Panchala forces and stop the Dhartarashtras. During that pitched battle, those two awesome warriors, Duryodhana and Bhima, come face to face and duel.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, Karna takes the offensive against the chariot-warriors and archers of the Kaikeyas that face him and unleashes howling gales of deadly arrows at them. He despatches full five hundred of them to Yamaloka. Those warriors suffer grievous losses and, finding the son of Radha irresistible, take refuge with Bhimasena's troops. Karna again rides after Yudhishtira, who, almost insensible from his wounds, is driving slowly towards the Pandava encampment flanked by Nakula and Sahadeva. He shoots the king with three lethal arrows but Yudhishtira strikes back. Madri's twin sons, who protect Yudhishtira's flanks, sweep down on Karna and fire volleys of arrows at him. Karna first quells them and goes on to kill Yudhishtira's horses, knocks down his diadem, destroys Nakula's horses and immobilises his chariot. The brothers are compelled to find refuge in Sahadeva's ratha.

Seeing his nephews hard pressed, Salya says to Karna, "You intend to fight Phalguna today so why do you waste time on Yudhishtira? You will be an object of derision and mirth when you finally encounter Partha, wounded, your astras and arrows exhausted, your armour weakened, and your charioteer and horses fatigued."

Ignoring Salya, Karna continues to assail Yudhishtira and also targets the twins. He forces Yudhishtira to turn back and face him and prepares with great resolution to make an end of him. Now Salya laughingly tells Karna, "Duryodhana has always thought you a better warrior than Partha; what will you gain if you kill Yudhishtira? You can hear the boom of Krishna's conch as well as the twang of Arjuna's bow. Look how he devours our troops and strikes down our chariot-warriors with his arrows. How ably Yudhamanyu, Uttamaujas, Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna support him!

And look where Bhimasena has the better of Duryodhana. Do something quickly so that he does not kill the king today in front of us all. Go and rescue the king from dire peril. What will you gain by killing the sons of Madri or Yudhishtira if Bhima kills Duryodhana?"

At Salya's urging, O Kuvalayesa, and seeing Bhima about to overpower Duryodhana, Karna turns away from Yudhishtira and the twins, and rushes to rescue your son. This enables Yudhishtira to retreat on Sahadeva's ratha, his body torn and lacerated, and accompanied by his twin brothers. He alights from the chariot at the Pandava camp and immediately sits down on his couch. While they extract the arrows from his body, the sorrowful royal son of Pandu says to his two brothers, "Go back now and support Bhima."

Using another chariot, Nakula and Sahadeva race away towards Bhima and take their places by his side.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, leading a large chariot-force, O Rajan, Aswatthaman confronts Arjuna on the field. Like the continent dares the surging ocean, Partha and Krishna defy that raging warrior as he envelops them with his missiles to the amazement of all the maharathas present. Arjuna conjures up a devastra, but Aswatthaman neutralises it, as well as all the other astras that Arjuna looses at him. The son of Drona is like Yama himself as he envelops the sky with volleys of lethal arrows. He wounds Krishna's right arm but Arjuna strikes back, kills Aswatthaman's horses and destroys a number of his maharathas.

The battle between them is bloody and takes a fearful toll of horses, charioteers, riders and elephants, and soon another river of blood flows there. Seeing Partha rampant on the field, Aswatthaman shakes his formidable bow and shoots at him from every side, bloodying him. With a sizzling volley, Arjuna destroys his opponent's bow. Picking up a vicious spiked mace, Aswatthaman hurls it at Arjuna, but, smiling, Partha demolishes it like a thunderbolt splitting a mountain. To overpower Arjuna, a livid Aswatthaman invokes an Aindrastra, and a deluge of arrows falls from the sky. Arjuna negates it with his own Aindrastra that blankets Aswatthaman's chariot with arrows. The battle continues as both warriors launch powerful astras until Aswatthaman is wounded and his charioteer dead. Then, in a wonderful demonstration of skill, he guides his horses himself and fights Arjuna at the same time, until his adversary severs his reins and his horses bolt.

Meanwhile, with loud yells, the Pandavas charge your troops from all sides, loosing deadly storms of arrows at them. They repeatedly rout the vast Dhartarashtra host, O Rajan, in the very presence of your sons, and Sakuni and Karna! The Sutaputra roars, "Stop! Stop!" but to no avail.

Seeing the Dhartarashtra army run, the Pandavas let out shouts of triumph.

Duryodhana says urgently to Karna, "Look how despite your presence our army is beset by the Pandavas! O Mahabaho, thousands of our warriors look to you for guidance. You must rally them!' Karna replies with a smile, "You will see my prowess and the energy of my astras, O Naradeva! Today, I will annihilate the Panchalas and the Pandavas."

Picking up his magnificent bow, the Vijaya, Karna strings and strums it repeatedly. Reassuring his terrified troops, he launches the Bhargavastra, which releases millions and millions of blazing arrows fletched with kanka and peacock feathers and shrouds the entire Pandava army. Soon, loud wails of despair arise and the earth trembles with falling elephants, horses, chariots and soldiers killed in their thousands. Karna stands triumphant, glorious like a smokeless fire, while the stricken Panchalas and the Chedis run wildly all over the field and cry for Arjuna and Krishna to rescue them like the spirits of the dead calling for Yama.

Hearing their cries for help Arjuna tells Krishna, "Behold, O Mahabaho, the power of the dreadful Bhargavastra! I fear that no one can contain it. Karna is like the Destroyer himself. Look how he repeatedly casts angry glances at me, and I feel that I may not escape him. A living man may meet with either victory or defeat. However, to the man who is dead, O Hrishikesha, even death is victory. How can he who is dead, face defeat?"

Krishna replies, "Karna has severely wounded Yudhishtira. Go and comfort him first, O Partha, before you face Karna."

Arjuna agrees, and they drive away avoiding the battle, hoping that, meanwhile, Karna will become fatigued. They fail to find Yudhishtira anywhere. Arjuna rides on after he fights and defeats Aswatthaman, the shura that even the Vajradhari himself may have found hard to subdue.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After he bests Aswatthaman, Arjuna surveys his own troops and applauds the efforts of his warriors. This raises their morale and the maharathas continue to fight with vigour. Not seeing his brother Yudhishtira, he goes to Bhima and asks him, "Tell me, where is the king?"

Bhima replies, "Gravely wounded by Karna, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira left the field. I doubt whether he still lives."

Arjuna says, "Go quickly, Bhima, and find out! He has surely retreated to our camp. Remember, despite the grievous injuries he sustained in the fierce fight with Drona, he remained on the battlefield until we killed the Acharya. Our brother was in great danger in today's battle, so go now and ascertain his condition; I will stay here and hold off our enemies!"

Bhima replies, "O Arjuna, it is best if you go. If I leave now, my enemies will accuse me of fleeing the battle!"

Arjuna says, "The Samsaptakas confront my aksauhini! I cannot leave this place without overcoming them."

Bhimasena assures Arjuna, "I can contain the Samsaptakas on my own. So go, O Kurupravira!"

Although Arjuna feels that his brother Bhima may be taking too much upon himself, he nevertheless says, "Urge the horses on, O Hrishikesha, and let us leave this sea of troops. I want to see king Ajatasatru!"

As he is about to drive away, Krishna says, “The task is not difficult for you, Bhima. We are going, so destroy the Samsaptakas!”

Then, after leaving Bhima in charge of the army and telling him to raze the Samsaptakas, Krishna drives his ratha yoked to horses swift as Garuda at great speed in search of the king. They find Yudhishtira resting on his bed and, alighting from their chariot, they touch his feet. Seeing him safe, the two Krishnas are overjoyed, like the twin Ashvinis on seeing Vasava. A smile breaks out on Yudhishtira’s careworn, anguished face, and the king embraces and congratulates them both like Vivasvat complimenting the twin Ashvinis, or like Brihaspati felicitating Sankara and Vishnu after they slew the mighty Asura Jambha. He assumes that Karna has been killed and is filled with indescribable delight and speaks to them in a voice choked with joy.’”

"Sanjaya continues 'Yudhishtira says to the two Krishnas, "Welcome, Devakiputra and Dhananjaya! The sight of you both, O Achyuta and Arjuna, fills me with joy. I see that, without being wounded, you two have slain the maharatha Karna! In war, he was like a serpent of virulent poison. He was accomplished in the use of all weapons and as the senapati of the Dhartarashtras, he was their invincible armour and protector. Those great archers Vrishasena and Sushena always guarded his back in battle.

He was energetic and invincible, and he learnt the astra shastra from Parasurama Bhargava. He led the Dhartarashtras and was their saviour. Unequalled, he always wished for Duryodhana's good and for this he was ever willing and eager to persecute us. As a maharatha, he had no equal in all the worlds. He was invincible in battle even to Vasava and the Devas. In tejas and oorjas, he was equal to Agni and Vayu. He was unfathomable as the Patalas, and this enhancer of the joys of friends was like Yama himself to his enemies.

It is only through good fortune that you could kill Karna, and you have now come to me like a pair of Devas after overcoming an Asura!

Today, I fought a great battle with that shura who was like Rudra exterminating all living beings. He cut down my standard, killed my horses and two Parshni charioteers; he destroyed my ratha in the very sight of Yuyudhana, Dhrishtadyumna, Nakula and Sahadeva, the heroic Sikhandi, as also the sons of Draupadi, and all the Panchalas. Having mastered those innumerable enemies, Karna mahatejasvin then subdued me, O Mahabaho, although I fought resolutely.

He pursued me, overwhelmed all my protectors and addressed coarse, harsh words to me. That I am still alive, O Dhananjaya, is only due to the prowess of Bhimasena. What more need I say? I cannot bear the humiliation I experienced today. For thirteen years, O Dhananjaya, through fear of Karna, I had no sleep at night or any peace during the day. Filled with hatred of the Sutaputra, I burned within myself, O Dhananjaya.

Like the bird baddhrinasa I fled Karna, thinking that the time for my own death had come. All my time I spent thinking how I could kill Karna in battle. Awake or asleep, the fear of Karna possessed me and the universe appeared to me to be full of just him. He vanquished me in battle but left me alive. After Karna humiliated me today, of what use is my life or my kingdom? At his hands today, I experienced what I never suffered during this war at the hands of Bhishma, Kripa or Drona.

So, O Kuntiputra, tell me in detail how you killed Karna! He was equal to Sakra himself in war, to Yama in prowess and to Rama in weaponry. He was a mighty chariot-warrior, a master of all modes of warfare, the greatest of all archers, and a man among all men! Dhritarashtra and his son always worshipped him and they were convinced that Karna would be your death, O Bharatarishabha. How then did you kill Karna who was keenly seeking you on the battlefield? Does he lie on the bare ground, slain by your keen arrows fitted with kanka feathers? Ah, you have accomplished a great deed for me today!

Have you really slain that sinful wretch who always hated and opposed you and who, in his arrogance, was looking everywhere for you on the battlefield, and offering a magnificent chariot made of gold along with a number of elephants, bulls and horses to anyone who would point you out?

Have you really killed that sinner who, intoxicated with pride about his valour, would brag incessantly in the Kuru sabha and who was exceedingly dear to Suyodhana? Does he lie on the field today, his limbs mangled with your shafts and all steeped in blood? Have Duryodhana's two arms at last been broken? Does his foolish boast, 'I will kill Phalguna!' in the midst of the kings to gladden Duryodhana, remain unfulfilled?

O son of Indra, have you killed that foolish Karna, that Sutaputra who swore an oath that he would not wash his feet as long as Arjuna lived?

In the Kuru sabha, vile Karna had said to Panchali, ‘Why don’t you abandon the Pandavas, who have lost their power, and are weak and fallen?’

Tell me, does the foolish and sinful Karna who vowed that he would not return from battle without killing Krishna and Partha, lie dead on the field, his body pierced with arrows? You know about the battle between the Srinjayas and the Kauravas in which I was brought to this plight. Have you slain that Karna today?

O Savyasachi, have you today, with your relucent shafts from the Gandiva, cut his resplendent head from his neck? When he mauled me with his dreadful shafts, I prayed fervently that you would kill him. Have you answered my prayer, Arjuna?

Counting on Karna’s protection, the vain Suyodhana disdained us. Have you today destroyed that refuge of our evil cousin?

Have you slain the Sutaputra of unbridled wrath, who once, in the presence of the Kauravas and in the midst of the Kuru court, called us sesame seeds without kernels?

Have you killed the malignant Sutaputra, who laughingly told Dusasana to forcibly drag Yajnasena’s daughter into the Kuru sabha after Sakuni had won her in game of dice?

Have you today slain that witless Karna who rudely upbraided that our Pitama Bhishma, for counting him as only half a maharatha during the enumeration of rathas and atirathas?

Today, finally, you have extinguished, O Phalguna, the fire in my heart that was born of revenge and fanned by the wind of humiliation. Tell me how you made an end of Karna in battle. The news of Karna’s death is more agreeable to me than I can tell you. Tell me, therefore, how he was killed. Like the divine Vishnu waiting for the arrival of Indra with the news of Vritra’s death, I have waited so long for you, O shura!”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna of infinite tejas says to Yudhishtira, "O foremost of kings, while I was battling the Samsaptakas today, Drona's son Aswatthaman suddenly surrounded me with the Kaurava troops and attacked me. I killed full five hundred of their rathikas, before Aswatthaman rushed at me like a prince of elephants against a lion. That Kurupravira raked Krishna and me with arrows like poison or fire. He exhausted thousands of arrows from the eight carts, each drawn by eight bullocks, which bore his shafts. He shot them all at me, with skill, force and determination, all from his bowstring stretched to his very ear, and they were like a black raincloud of the monsoon.

So quickly did he charge about that we could not discern from which direction he shot his arrows, nor could we see when he took up his shafts and when he loosed them from his bow drawn into a circle. He pierced both Krishna and me with five blazing arrows each. I struck back at him with all my prowess and soon he resembled a porcupine with my barbs. He and his troops were bathed in blood and he took refuge with Karna's chariot division.

Seeing his troops overwhelmed and escape with his elephant force and cavalry, Karna attacked me with many seasoned rathikas. I killed them all and, then avoiding Karna, I have flown here to see you, for both Krishna and I feared for your life. All the Panchalas are terrified at the very sight of Karna, like cattle at the scent of a lion. The Prabhadrakas, too, are like men who have entered the open jaws of Death when they approach him. He has already despatched to Yama's abode full seventeen hundreds of those unfortunate rathikas.

You also encountered Aswatthaman, who took his toll of you before Kana attacked you. I hoped that you were not dead but had retreated to our camp to rest, but I had to see you for myself. I have seen the great Bhargavastra of Karna, which he unleashed against us. There is now no other warrior among the Srinjayas who can resist the mighty Sutaputra.

Let Sini's grandson Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna be the protectors of my chariot-wheels, while Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas guard my rear. Then, come and watch me fight Karna, O Bhaarata, like Sakra fighting Vritra. Look there, the Prabhadrakas attack Karna and six thousand princes sacrifice themselves in battle to attain swarga. If I do not kill Karna today, with all his kin, then let that end be mine, which is his who does not fulfil an oath he has sworn.

I beg you bless me so that victory be mine in battle. Yonder, the Dhartarashtras are about to overwhelm Bhima. I will, O lion among kings, slay the Suta's son and his troops and, indeed, all our enemies!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing that the mighty Karna is still alive, already hurting from Karna's arrows, Yudhishtira flashes angrily at Arjuna, "Your army has been routed and set to flight in a way that is scarcely honourable! You were afraid, and you betrayed Kunti when you deserted Bhima. And now you have come here without killing Karna? In the Dwaitavana, Arjuna, you swore to me that you would kill Karna from a single chariot. Why then have you come here after avoiding Karna and deserting Bhima? If you had confessed to me then that you would not be able to face Karna in battle, we could have thought of other ways to deal with him.

You have not kept your solemn word, Arjuna. You have flung us down in the midst of our enemies and shattered us. I have always looked to you for great things and benefits. I have always blessed you. But today you have belied all my expectations, and I am like a man waiting for fruit from a tree that he has nourished but getting only flowers from it. Like a fishhook hidden within a piece of meat, or poison in food, you promised us the kingdom only to betray us in the end.

For these thirteen years, O Dhananjaya, like seeds sown in earth expecting the seasonal showers that the gods send, we have lived in hope relying on you.

O foolish one, a voice from the skies told Pritha on the seventh day after your birth, 'This son of yours will have the prowess of Vasava himself and will overcome all his enemies! Gifted with superior tejas, he will vanquish all the Devas and other beings at Khandava. He will subjugate the Madras, the Kalingas, and the Kaikeyas and he will slay the Kurus. There will be no archer superior to him and no being will ever be able to defeat him. With his senses under control, and having mastered all the branches of knowledge, this son of yours, by merely desiring it, will bring all the world under his sway.

Your noble son, O Kunti, will be as handsome as Soma, quick as Vayu, patient as Meru, forgiving as Bhumi, will rival Surya in splendour, Kubera in prosperity, Sakra in courage and Vishnu in might. Like Aditi's son Vishnu, he will be famous for destroying his enemies and serving his friends. He will, besides, be the founder of a vamsa!'

This was what the voice said from the sky on the summit of the Satasringa Mountains, in the hearing of many Rishis and Munis. However, all that has not come to pass. Alas, it only shows that even the gods may speak untruths.

I have also heard words of praise about you from many of the great Rishis, so I never expected that Suyodhana would find such success and prosperity, or that you would be afraid of Karna. You ride upon a wonderful chariot that the celestial artificer Tvashtri wrought with axles that do not creak and which flies the kapi-dhvaja. Your sword hangs from your belt of gold and silk; your bow the Gandiva is full six cubits long; and you have Kesava as your sarathy. Why, then, are you terrified of Karna and why do you run from battle, Partha? O evil one, if you had given your bow to Krishna and become his sarathy, he would by now have killed the fierce Karna like Sakra, the lord of the Maruts, destroying the Asura Vritra with his Vajra.

If you cannot stand up to the fierce son of Radha today, as he lords it over the field of battle, give your Gandiva to some other king, who is your superior in the knowledge and use of great weapons. And then the world will not find us unhappy, bereft of our sons, wives and kingdom, and sunk, O son of Pandu, in a fathomless hell of misery.

It would have been better for you if you had never been born to Kunti, or been aborted in the fifth month of her pregnancy, O Kshatriya, rather than to escape like this from battle! Shame on your Gandiva, shame on the might of your arms, shame on your inexhaustible quivers, shame on your kapi-dhvaja and shame on your chariot that was Agni's gift to you!"'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna flies into a rage listening to Yudhishtira; livid, he draws his sword to kill him. Krishna quickly intervenes and says, "Why, Partha, do you draw your sword when there is no one here you have to fight? The mighty Bhimasena has the Dhartarashtras at his mercy. You came from the battlefront to see the king. Now that you have found that Yudhishtira is well, why this madness at a time when you should rejoice? I ask you, O son, of Kunti, why do you grasp that formidable sword in anger?"

Looking at Yudhishtira and breathing like an angry serpent, Arjuna says to Krishna, "It is my secret vow that I will sever the head of the man who says to me 'Give your Gandiva to another man.'

This king spoke these words in your presence, O Krishna! I dare not forgive him, especially one who does not allow the slightest fall from dharma. Slaying this Purusavara, I will honour my vow. It is for this that I drew the sword, O Yadusrestha. I will kill the king and pay my debt to truth and dispel my grief and fever. O Janardana, yet, you tell what you think is proper. You know all the past and future of this universe. I will do whatever you tell me."

Krishna says, "Shame, shame! Arjuna, you have yielded to anger at such a time? No one who knows dharma would do what you are doing today! The man who flouts dharma, or does what seems to be dharma but which the shastras condemn, is the worst of men. You do not know the laws of the Rishis, based on the dictates of dharma. The man who is unacquainted with these rulings will be baffled and stupefied, O Partha, even as you are now confused in discriminating between right and wrong.

What should be done and what should not can be ascertained only through the scriptures. You, however, do not know the scriptures and so you are ignorant about dharma. You do not even know, Partha, that the killing of living beings is a sin and abstention from injury to even animals is the highest virtue. One may even speak an untruth, but one should never kill. How then, O Narottama, could you wish to kill your eldest brother, this Dharmaraja, who knows all about dharma? The laws of dharma never permit the killing of a man not engaged in battle, an enemy who has turned his back on a battle, one who escapes from a battle, one who seeks protection, joins his hands, yields himself up or is without a chariot. All these exist now in Yudhishtira.

Foolishly you swore this secret vow of yours, O Partha, which now drives you toward a heinous act. Why do you rush towards your revered brother to kill him, without resolving the most subtle and difficult way of dharma? I will explain this particular mystery of dharma that Bhishma, Yudhishtira, Vidura, and the renowned Kunti have laid on. Listen carefully, Dhananjaya!

One who speaks truth follows dharma and there is nothing higher than that. The essential attributes of truth in pravritti, conduct, is exceedingly difficult to understand. In diverse situations, truth when spoken may become false, and falsehood become truth. One may lie where there is a threat to life, where there is a threat to one's entire property, in marriage, when enjoying a woman and for the sake of a Brahmana. The above five kinds of falsehood have been declared to be sinless. On these occasions, falsehood becomes truth and truth falsehood.

Only a fool practises truth without knowing the real difference between truth and falsehood. One can be conversant with dharma only when one is able to distinguish between truth and falsehood. There is little wonder therefore that, even when he perpetrates a cruel deed, a wise man may obtain great merit as Valaka did when he killed the blind beast. Similarly, there is little wonder that a foolish and ignorant man, from a desire to win punya, commits great sin as Kausika did by living among the rivers."

Arjuna asks, "Holy one, tell me about Valaka and about Kausika living among rivers."

Vasudeva says, "There lived a hunter named Valaka. He killed animals as a means of livelihood for his family and not from any desire to kill for pleasure. Devoted to the duties of his varna and always speaking the truth, he never harboured any malice and supported his parents and other dependents. One day, despite searching long for an animal to hunt with perseverance and care, he found none. Finally, he saw a blind beast of prey, whose sense of smell replaced the defect of his eyes, drinking water. Although he had never seen such an animal before, he killed it immediately and a shower of divine petals fell on him from the skies. A wonderful Deva ratha, filled with the songs of Apsaras and the music of their instruments, came from heaven to take away the hunter.

It emerged that the blind beast that the hunter had killed had practised great tapasya, had obtained a boon and was indiscriminately killing all the creatures of the forest. It was for this reason that the Swayambhu, Brahma, had made him blind. Valaka went to heaven as he had killed that animal which had resolved to slay all creatures. Dharma, O Arjuna, is difficult to understand.

There lived a Rishi named Kausika who had little knowledge of the scriptures, far from any village, at the confluence of many rivers. He took an oath, saying, 'I will always speak the truth.'

He then became celebrated, O Dhananjaya, as a speaker of only truth. Once, some people escaping from robbers entered Kausika's vana. Soon the robbers came in search of them and asked Kausika, that speaker of truth, 'O holy one, where have the fugitives we are hunting for, gone? If you have seen them, tell us in the name of Truth.'

Kausika told them the truth, saying, 'Those men have entered this wood.'

Partha, Kausika told them the truth and those cruel bandits searched out the men in hiding and slew them all. Ignorant of the subtleties of dharma, Kausika committed a great sin by telling the truth and, as a result, he went to hell, just as a foolish and ignorant man, unacquainted with the subtleties of morality, goes to hell when he fails to ask mature persons for answers to his doubts.

You must have discrimination to distinguish virtue from sin. Sometimes, one may acquire that high and unattainable knowledge through the exercise of reason, while many feel that the scriptures lay down what dharma is. I do not contradict this, although the shastras do not provide for every contingency. Thus, they laid down the main principles of morality: that which is not offensive to religion. Dharma protects and preserves the people, so it is the conclusion of the Rishis that whatever conserves, is dharma.

Arjuna, I have told you the signs and indications of dharma. Knowing this now, you decide whether you want to kill Yudhishtira or not."

Arjuna says, "O Kesava, what you say is both intelligent and wise. You are like our parent, and you are our final refuge. Nothing is unknown to you in the three worlds, and you are conversant with the canons of dharma. You know my vow that I will instantly kill the man who tells me, 'Partha, give your Gandiva to someone braver than you.'

Bhima has also taken a similar oath that whoever calls him 'tularak' he will kill that person there and then. Yudhishtira has repeatedly said 'Give your bow to someone else' to me in your presence. O Pravira, if I kill him, I will not be able to live in this world for another moment. I have sinned for entertaining the thought of killing my king through folly and the loss of my discrimination. O Dharmatman, tell me how I can keep my vow, known throughout the world, and at the same time ensure that both Yudhishtira and I live."

Krishna says, "The king was fatigued, grieving, and Karna's arrows lacerated him, even while he left the battle. He laboured under a burden of sorrow when he spoke harshly to you in anger. He knows that no one can face the wretched Karna other than you. It was for this, O Arjuna, that the king provoked you: so that you would kill Karna. The wager in the game of today's battle is the ever alert and invincible Karna. The Dharmarajan reasoned that if Karna is killed today, the Kauravas would inevitably be defeated. For this he does not deserve death.

I agree, Arjuna, that you should keep your vow. I will tell you how, without actually killing Yudhishtira, he may yet be considered dead. As long as a respected man continues to receive respect, one may say that he is alive in the world of men. If, however, such a man meets with dishonour, one may consider him dead even though he lives. Dharmaputra Yudhishtira has always had your respect, as well as that Bhima and that of the twins, as well as of all Kshatriyas and venerable men. So, show him disrespect in some trifling matter. Address Yudhishtira as 'you' when the usual form of addressing him is ‘your honour’ or ‘your majesty’, and this insult will in effect kill him without depriving him of his life. Both Atharvan and Angiras have declared this way to be the best in such a situation.

Men who desire good should always act in this manner without any scruple. Conversant with dharma as you are, address Yudhishtira Dharmaraja in the manner I have indicated. He will never regard this death at your hands as an offence. After you address him in this manner, you must then touch his feet and speak words of respect to him, and soothe his wounded honour. Your brother is wise, serene and will never be angry with you. Freed from falsehood as well as from fratricide, Arjuna, you can happily go forth to face Karna!”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna lauds Krishna's advice and then accosts Dharmaraja Yudhishtira in harsh language the like of which he has never used before.

Arjuna says, "O Rajan, do not upbraid me when you are resting a full two krosas away from the battle. Bhima, who is fighting alone against some of the greatest warriors in the world, has a right to scold me for he has routed his enemies, killed many kings and maharathas, great elephants, heroic horsemen, countless brave warriors, and in addition, has killed another thousand hill elephants and ten thousand Kamboja mountaineers. He accomplishes the most difficult feats, the like of which you can never hope to achieve.

Fighting on foot with his gada, sword, bow and broken parts of his chariots, he has destroyed numberless horsemen, chariots and elephants. Mighty as Kubera and Yama, and powerful as Indra, he kills many enemies with his feet and his bare hands and destroys hostile armies single-handedly. Such a Bhimasena has the right to reproach me, but not you who uses friends for protection. Bhima is now in the midst of the Dhartarashtra forces, holding their foremost chariot-warriors, elephants, cavalry and foot-soldiers at bay, slaughtering them all the while. That Paraviraha has the right to rebuke me, not you.

He annihilates the Kalingas, the Vangas, the Angas, the Nishadas, and the Magadhas, and vast numbers of elephants that look like masses of blue clouds. Riding on a worthy chariot and brandishing his bow, holding his arrows in his other hand, he unleashes arrows like thunderstorms over his enemies. I have seen eight hundred elephants that Bhima slew, lying mangled and lifeless. That hero may indeed speak harsh words to me.

The learned say that the Brahmana's strength lies in speech, and that the Kshatriya's strength is in his arms. You, O Bhaarata, are strong in words, especially heartless ones, and think that I am like you. I always strive to do you good with my soul, life and my family. Yet you wound me with words more terrible than arrows, and it is evident that we can expect no happiness from you. Lying on Draupadi's bed you dare insult me, although I have slain the mightiest of maharathas for your sake. You are indifferent and cruel, O Bhaarata, and I have never received any joy or love from you.

It was for your benefit that our Pitama Bhishma, that Dharmatman, told you how he could be killed and Drupada's son, the noble Sikhandi, achieved it with my protection. I am not at all happy to think that you will be restored as king for you are addicted to gambling. You sinned grievously against us all, including Panchali; you gambled us away as only the vilest of men do, and you now want to vanquish your enemies with our help? You heard from Sahadeva about the great evils of gambling and yet you did not abandon the depraved game of dice. That was the reason that all of us are now in this hell.

Since you began gambling, none of us has had any joy from you. O son of Pandu, you brought this calamity down our heads and you now dare speak harshly to me? You are the reason why millions of brave and noble men lie dead and wounded on this horrible Kurukshetra, the wounded among them crying out piteously. It was because of you that the Kauravas became offenders and are now being destroyed. Great warriors of both sides, from the nations of the north, the west, the east, and the south maim and kill one another, after incomparable feats on the battlefield. It was you who gambled away our kingdom. All our misfortunes arose from you, O Rajan! Do not provoke us now with the cruel goad of your vicious words."

After he speaks thus in the most harsh and bitter tone to his eldest brother, and thereby commits a sin, Arjuna, who is innately calm, wise and who never wanders from the path of dharma, is terribly dejected, remorseful and, breathing heavily, draws his sword. Seeing this, Krishna asks him,

“What is this? Do you again unsheath your sword, blue as the sky? Tell me why, Partha.”

In great sorrow Arjuna says to Kesava, “I will kill myself for this evil thing that I have done.”

Krishna, best of all men of dharma, says to Dhananjaya, “Why are you dejected for saying what you did to the king? O Pravira, the tenets of dharma do not sanction your intention to take our own life. If, from fear of committing sin, you had slain the Dharmarajan today, what would have been your remorse and what would you not have done then?

Dharma is subtle, inscrutable and transcendent, O Bhaarata, especially to the ignorant. Listen while I explain it to you. By destroying your own self, you will sink into a more horrible hell than if you had killed your brother. If you want to expiate your sin and punish yourself, now proclaim your own greatness and merit. You will then, O Partha, have slain yourself.”

Arjuna understands the import of what Krishna says. “I will do so, O Krishna.”

He lowers his bow and says to Yudhishtira, “Listen, O Rajan, there is no other archer like me, other than Pinakadhari Rudra, who also holds me in high esteem. I can destroy this universe of mobile and immobile creatures in the blink of an eye. I vanquished the whole world with all its sovereign kings, and brought them to your subjection. The Rajasuya yagna that you performed and completed with dakshina and the celestial palace that you own are both due to my prowess. I bear the scars on my hands of sharp arrows and of a great bow and on the soles of both my feet, the imprint of rathas. No one can vanquish a hero like me in battle.

Nations from the north, the west, the east and the south, have been struck down and destroyed, and only a small remnant of the Samsaptakas remain. By myself I have slain half of the enemy army. I slaughtered the Bhaarata host that was like the army of the Devas and it now lies on the field as carrion for scavengers. I only fight those who have powerful astras and know how to use them, and this is reason why I have not reduced the three worlds to ashes.

Be of good cheer now, for, riding forth upon my fearsome and victorious chariot, Krishna will soon go forth and surely kill the Sutaputra. Either I will make the Suta’s mother childless today, or Karna will end the life of one of Kunti’s sons. I vow that I will not take off my armour until I have killed Karna.”

Saying these words to Yudhishtira, Partha throws down his weapons and his bow, quickly thrusts his sword back into its sheath and, his head hung in shame, and with folded hands, says abjectly to his brother and king, "Be of good cheer, O Rajan, and forgive me! You will soon understand why I have said all this to you and sinned. I bow down to you, O Dharmaputra."

Arjuna says again, "This task cannot be delayed and will be accomplished soon. Karna comes towards me and I will meet him. I will first go and help Bhima before I kill the Suta's son. I assure you of this and devote my life to your cause. Know this for the truth, O Rajan."

Saying this, Arjuna of blazing splendour touches the king's feet and rises to go and return to battle.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira listens to these harsh words of his brother Phalguna, rises up from his bed and, his heart full of sorrow, says, "Partha, it is indeed because I sinned during the game of dice that this calamity has overwhelmed you. So, strike off my head, because I am the worst of men, and the exterminator of my race. I am evil, an idle fool and a coward. I am cruel and one who reviles the old. Obedience to a brutal man like me will gain you nothing.

Wretch that I am, I will this very day retire into the forest and may you live happily without me. A eunuch that I am, what will I do with sovereignty? The noble Bhimasena is fit to be king; let him ascend the throne. I cannot bear your harsh and angry words, most of all because they are true. After you have slighted me in this manner, O Arjuna, I have no use for my life."

Saying this, the king suddenly leaves his bed, truly intending to retire into the jungle and take sannyasa. Now, Krishna prostrates before him, and says, "O Rajan, you are aware of the celebrated vow of Arjuna, who is a man of dharma. He had sworn to kill anyone who would ask him to give up his Gandiva to another. You, unfortunately, said those words to him. And it was at my instance, O Bhumipala, that Partha insulted you—so he would not violate his vow, for to insult a superior is considered to be as good as killing him. O Rajan, you must forgive me. I bow my head to you for this transgression, for both Arjuna and I are committed to maintain dharma. Both of us throw ourselves at your mercy. The earth will today drink the blood of the despicable son of Radha. I swear to you that we will kill the Sutaputra. I, Krishna, swear to you that he whose death you desire will lose his life today."

In great anguish, Yudhishtira raises the prostrate Hrishikesha up and, with folded hands, says quickly, "It is as you say! I have been guilty of a sin and, O Govinda, you have awakened and saved me. O Madhava, O Achyuta, you have rescued both Arjuna and me from a sea of death. Indeed, today, our relatives, our allies and we have sailed over an ocean of grief on the raft of your intelligence. With you, O Achyuta, we are never without a protector and saviour."""

"Sanjaya says, 'When he hears the delight in Yudhishtira's voice, Krishna, Yadusreshta, turns to Arjuna who stands downcast after speaking so harshly to his brother. Krishna says smilingly to him, "If you are heartbroken after saying a few harsh words to your brother, what would your condition have been, O Partha, if in pursuit of dharma you had killed the son of Dharma with your sword?

Dharma is so inscrutable, especially to men who are of insufficient understanding. Without doubt, your grief would have been unbearable from your fear of sin and you would have sunk into a most dreadful hell if you had actually killed your brother. I want you to make this Mahatman, this Kurudhvaha, happy. After the Dharmarajan has been gratified with your devotion, we will go forth to fight the Suta's son. Kill Karna today and you will give Yudhishtira great happiness, O Mahabaho, and the greatest purpose of your life will have been achieved."

Then Arjuna, O Rajan, in shame, touches king Yudhishtira's feet with his head and repeatedly says, "Be pleased with me. Forgive me all that I said to keep dharma and from fear of sinning."

Seeing Dhananjaya prostrate and weeping at his feet, Yudhishtira lifts up his brother and embraces him. They weep together for a long while, until they are freed from grief and become calm and cheerful again. Then embracing Arjuna once more with great love, and sniffing the top of his head, a happy Yudhishtira praises his brother and says, “Mahabaho, in the very sight of all the troops, Karna destroyed my armour, standard, bow, spear, horses and arrows. Thinking of my humiliation and seeing his feats in battle, Phalguna, I feel weak with grief. My very life holds no meaning for me any longer. If you do not kill him today, I will cast away my life’s breath. What use have I for my wretched life?”

Arjuna says, “Rajan, I swear by Truth, by your grace, by Bhima, and by the twins, that today I will either kill Karna or be killed by him. I touch my weapons to sanctify my oath.”

Arjuna then says to Krishna, “With your help, O Govinda, I will kill Karna today.”

Kesava replies, “You can, O Pravira, indeed kill the mighty Karna. I have been thinking how we can best achieve this.”

Krishna says again to Yudhishtira, “O Dharmaputra, you must comfort Arjuna and command him to kill the Suta’s son. We heard that you had been gravely wounded by Karna, and we came here to ascertain your health. Fortunately, you are alive and were not taken captive. Comfort Arjuna, and bless him that he may prevail.”

Yudhishtira says, “Come here, Arjuna, and embrace me, my brother. You have given me good advice and said what you needed to, and I have forgiven you. I command you, Dhananjaya, go forth and kill Karna. Do not be angry for the harsh words that I spoke to you.”

Arjuna prostrates before his brother and fervently seizes his feet. The king raises him, hugs him closely, sniffs his head again, and says, “O Dhananjaya, O Mahabaho, you have honoured me. Go forth and win greatness and victory.”

Arjuna says, “Today, I will kill Radheya, who is proud of his might, along with all his kinsmen and followers. I vow that he, who bent his bow and wounded you with his arrows, will taste the bitter fruit of what he did. After killing Karna, I will return to pay you my homage and walk behind you. This I vow that I will not return from the battle without killing Karna. Truly do I swear this by touching your feet!”

Yudhishtira says joyfully to the Kiritin, “Go and obtain everlasting fame, victory, the destruction of your enemies and then live your life as you wish. Let the gods grant you prosperity, and may you have and enjoy anything you wish for in the measure that you desire. Now go quickly into battle, and kill Karna, even as Purandara slew Vritra for his own aggrandisement.”’”

CANTO 72

"Sanjaya says, 'After he has calmed Yudhishtira and brought some hope and cheer to his heart, Arjuna says to Krishna, "Let my chariot be prepared afresh and furnished with all manner of weapons. The horses are fit and have been trained well. Deck them in their trappings and yoke them to my chariot. Let us go swiftly, Krishna, and fight the Suta's son."

At this, Krishna commands Daruka, "Do everything that Arjuna has asked."

After Daruka yokes the horses to the amazing chariot covered with tiger-skins and readies it for battle, Arjuna takes Yudhishtira's leave and blessing and, after the Brahmanas perform propitiatory rites and utter their blessings over him, he climbs onto his ratha. Great Arjuna, with Krishna for his sarathy, drives off to confront Karna. Seeing him go in such splendour, all those watching regard Karna as already slain.

All the cardinal points of earth and sky, O Rajan, become serene. Kingfishers, parrots and herons wheel around the son of Pandu and a large flight of rare, beautiful and auspicious birds, called pungs, arrive and fly around him with joyous cries that make Arjuna go faster. The prospect of fresh flesh to feast on fetches fearsome kankas, vultures, cranes, hawks and ravens, and they fly in advance of his chariot, an auspicious omen foreboding the decimation of the enemy army and the killing of Karna. As Arjuna flies along, he perspires profusely as his anxiety about how he can fulfil his vow increases.

Krishna notices this and says, "O Gandivi, no one but you could have vanquished all the maharathas whom you have slain with your bow. We have seen many heroes, each gifted with Sakra's very prowess, attain the other world after encountering you in battle. Who other than you, O Vibho, would still be alive after facing Drona, Bhishma, Bhagadatta, Vinda, Anuvinda of Avanti, Sudakshina, the chief of the Kambojas, the mighty Srutayudha and Achyutayudha in battle? You have devastras, great power and skill and you are never confounded in battle. You also have humility that is born of knowledge. You always strike unerringly, with perfect aim, and have immaculate presence of mind in battle. Truly, you can destroy all the mobile and immobile creatures, including the very Devas and the Gandharvas.

On this earth, there is no human warrior who can face you in battle. Amongst all the invincible Kshatriyas and even among the gods, I have not seen or heard of any archer who is your equal. Brahma himself created the great bow Gandiva that you wield. And for this as well, there is no man who is your peer, O Partha.

However, I must caution and warn you about the duel into which we are riding: do not underestimate Karna, that ornament of war! Karna is a maharatha, a mighty, proud and accomplished warrior. He is a master of every aspect of the astra shastra; he knows better than anyone exactly what is needed with regard to time and place. I will be brief, O son of Pandu.

I regard Karna as being at least your equal, and possibly, your superior. Only with the greatest care and resolve can you vanquish mighty Karna. In energy, he is equal to Agni, in speed, he is equal to tameless Vayu, in wrath he is like Yama. Endowed with inordinate prowess, he resembles a lion in the formation of his body. He is exceptionally radiant and handsome; he is eight ratnis tall, with magnificent arms and a deep chest. He is invincible. He is sensitive. He is not only a hero, Arjuna; Karna is the greatest of all heroes.

With every endowment of a warrior, he is a dispeller of the fears of friends. He wants the good of Dhritarashtra's son, and he has always hated the sons of Pandu. That is why I think that no man of flesh and blood, other than you, why, not even the Devas with Vasava at their head, can kill Radheya. And so, Arjuna, kill him today.

He is the inveterate enemy of the Pandavas and his hatred for you is not out of any consideration of his own interests. So kill Karna, that first among maharathas; fulfil the final purpose of your birth and prove your love for Yudhishtira.

Truly, I know, O Partha, that even the Devas and Asuras cannot resist your prowess. From overweening pride, the evil Sutaputra is always dismissive of the sons of Pandu. Kill him today, Dhananjaya, he who is the root of all the other sinners and depending on whom, the wretched Duryodhana regards himself as invincible.

Slay that Naravyaghra, the proud Karna, who has a sword for his tongue, a bow for his mouth, and arrows for his teeth. I know your abilities well; so kill Karna like a lion killing an elephant. O Partha, slay Vaikartana, because of whom Duryodhana is dismissive of you.”””

"Sanjaya says, 'Once more, as they ride into battle, Krishna says to Arjuna, "Today is the seventeenth day, O Bhaarata, of this unspeakable massacre of men, elephants and horses, which has so reduced your vast army. The Kauravas, too, O Partha, have nearly all been slain. Under your lead, these lords of the earth, these Srinjayas, and the Pandava troops, yet hold their ground on the battlefield. Also, under your guidance, the Panchalas, the Matsyas, the Karushas, and the Chedis have fetched great destruction to your enemies.

Who is there that can vanquish the assembled Kauravas in battle? On the other hand, who is there that can vanquish the mighty Pandava maharathas that you lead? You alone can subdue the three worlds, consisting of the Devas, the Asuras and the Manavas, united together. What need I say then of the Kaurava army? Save you, O Naravyaghra, no one, not even if he resembled Vasava himself in prowess, could have vanquished king Bhagadatta. Partha, all the lords of earth, united together, cannot stand up to this vast force that you command.

It is because of your protection that Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandi succeeded in bringing down Drona and Bhishma. Otherwise, who could have vanquished those two maharathas, both of whom were equals of Indra himself?

Other than you, O Naravyaghra, which man in this world can defeat those fierce lords of aksauhinis, the invincible Vaikartana, Kripa, Aswatthaman, and Duryodhana himself, all masters of weapons and united. You have annihilated innumerable fierce Kshatriyas, hailing from diverse provinces, as well as teeming divisions of soldiers, their horses, chariots and elephants. Vast numbers of diverse Kshatriya clans, like the Govasas, the Dasamiyas, the Vasatis, the Easterners, the Vatadhanas, and the Bhojas who are very sensitive of their honour, along with their cavalry and elephants, have met with destruction at your hands and Bhima's.

The extraordinarily ferocious Tusharas, Yavanas, Khasas, Darvabhisaras, Daradas, Sakas, Kamathas, Ramathas, Tanganas, Andhrakas, Pulindas and the Kiratas, the mighty and powerful Mlecchas, the mountaineers, and the races from the seaside, all hardened soldiers armed with gadas, fight for Duryodhana. And only you have their measure, O Paraviraha!

Who could dare advance against the vast and swollen Dhartarashtra force arrayed in battle order? With your protection, the Pandavas penetrated into the enemy host shrouded with dust and resembling a swollen sea, and decimated it. Seven days have elapsed since Abhimanyu killed Jayatsena, the mighty ruler of the Magadhas, in battle. After that, Bhimasena with his mace massacred Jayatsena's ten thousand war elephants, and hundreds of other war tuskers as well, and countless rathikas in an awesome demonstration of his might. Thus, O Partha, during the progress of this horrific war, the Kaurava forces encountered Bhimasena and you, and departed for the realm of Yama.

The Pandavas overran the van of the Kaurava army, but with his fiery fusillades of arrows, Bhishma shrouded the Chedis, the Panchalas, the Karushas, the Matsyas, and the Kaikeyas and massacred them. He filled the sky with gold-winged, deadly shafts, and slew thousands of rathikas, one hundred thousand other warriors and mighty elephants, in all slaughtering the Pandava host for ten days without let. He assumed the form of Rudra or of Upendra and, fighting singlehandedly, inflicted a great carnage among the Pandava, the Chedi, the Panchala and the Kaikeya divisions in the evil Suyodhana's cause.

Every day, Bhishma rose over Kurukshetra like the sun during the pralaya. With your protection, Sikhandi felled that Naravyaghra. It is because he made you his enemy, that the Pitamaha now lies on a bed of arrows, even like Vritra when he made Vasava his enemy.

The savage Drona also slaughtered our army for five days. With his impenetrable vyuhas, riding against which many maharathas lost their lives, he protected Jayadratha for a good while. The son of Bharadwaja, fierce as Yama himself, caused an unprecedented carnage during the war at night; he consumed warriors past count with his astras until he finally met his end at the hands of Dhrishtadyumna. If, on that day, you had not contained the enemy's entire chariot division that Karna led, we could never have killed Drona. Which other Kshatriya, save you, could have achieved such incredible feats as you did and on the day you killed Jayadratha? Killing so many valorous kings, facing the teeming Kaurava host by yourself, you found your way to Jayadratha and killed him. Everyone speaks of what you did as being awesome and incomparable. I, however, do not regard it so; you are a great maharatha and you did what you had sworn you would.

If all these assembled enemy Kshatriyas can stay alive against you even for a day, I would regard them to be truly mighty. With the death of Bhishma and Drona, the Dhartarashtra host, O Partha, with all its foremost warriors slain, with its horses, chariots, and elephants dead, has lost all its heroes and looks like the firmament bereft of the sun, the moon and the stars. This prodigious enemy host has been shorn of its splendour today, even as the dark Asura host in the old days, after Sakra ruined its magnificence.

Only five great chariot-warriors remain—Aswatthaman, Kritavarman, Karna, Salya and Kripa. Kill them all today, O Naravyaghra, and make a gift of the earth, with all her islands, cities, waters, and the Patalas and the sky above to Yudhishtira. Destroy finally this army as Vishnu in the days long ago slaying the Daityas and the Danavas, and bestow Bhumi on the king as Hari gave the three worlds to Sakra.

Let the Panchalas rejoice today that their enemies are dead, like the Devas rejoicing after Vishnu decimated the Danavas. Even if you do not kill your Acharyas, those great men Drona and Kripa, out of your respect for them, or Aswatthaman out of compassion, or Kritavarman because of the honour that you bear for your mother's kinsman, or your uncle Salya, the ruler of the Madras out of affection, do not spare Karna today but kill that evil one who cherishes the fiercest hatred for you. This is your highest duty and there is nothing in it that would be against dharma.

I approve of it, and there is no blemish in the deed. Karna was the cause of the attempt made to immolate your mother and all of you at night in the palace of lac, and of Suyodhana's behaviour towards you after that game of dice. Suyodhana has always depended upon Karna as his main strength, and has been bold enough to try to injure even me. It is his firm belief that Karna will annihilate all the Prithas in battle. Though he knows very well how mighty you are, O Kuntiputra, he has still chosen to go to war with you, relying entirely on Karna.

Karna always maintains, 'I will vanquish the Parthas and that maharatha Vasudeva of the Dasarhas.'

Always extolling Duryodhana, Karna has successfully had his way in the Kuru sabha. Kill him today, for in all the injuries and humiliations inflicted upon you, Karna has ever been the leader.

Six mighty and ruthless maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army killed your heroic son Abhimanyu, whose eyes were like those of a bull. He fought against Drona, Aswatthaman, Kripa and other great Kshatriyas; he deprived elephants of their riders and maharathas of their chariots. Abhimanyu, that spreader of the fame of both the Kurus and the Vrishnis, shot down horsemen and foot-soldiers, and routed their divisions; he quelled many mighty chariot-warriors, and sent innumerable men, horses and elephants to Yama.

I swear to you, O friend, that my body burns at the thought that while the noble son of Subhadra was consuming the enemy army with his arrows, Karna was plotting to bring him down through base treachery. Unable to face Abhimanyu, Karna, bathed in blood and nearly unconscious, was forced to draw deep breaths of rage and to turn his back on the battle. Demoralised, afraid, stunned and exhausted from his wounds, finally, at the clever Drona's instructions, Karna broke Abhimanyu's bow from behind him. Then five great maharathas slew that unarmed child with dark storms of arrows. At Abhimanyu's death, even his enemies grieved, except the evil Karna and Suyodhana who laughed with joy.

Do you remember the vile words that Karna said to Draupadi in the Kuru court, in the presence of the Pandavas and Kurus, 'The Pandavas, O Draupadi, are dead! They have sunk into eternal hell, O you of the large hips.

Choose other lords for yourself now, O you of the sweet voice. Enter the palace of Dhritarashtra as a serving woman, O you of curving eyelashes, for your husbands are no more living men.

O Panchali, the Pandavas will not be of any use to you anymore, since you are the wife of men who are now slaves and so are you also a slave! Today Duryodhana is the only king on earth; all other kings of the world will abide by whatever he says. Look how all the sons of Pandu have fallen! Dhritarashtra's son has overwhelmed them and they can only look mutely and helplessly at one another. It is plain that they are all sesame seeds without kernels, and have sunk into hell. They will have to serve Duryodhana, that king of kings, as his slaves.'

These were the foul words that that wretched Karna then spoke in your hearing, O Bhaarata. Quench the fire of those words with your arrows today, and all the other wrongs that evil one has done to you, along with his life.

Let Karna feel the touch of the arrows from the Gandiva and remember the words of Bhishma and Drona.

Let your deadly cloth-yard shafts, effulgent like lightning, pierce Karna's limbs, plunge into his vital organs, drink his blood and despatch him to Yama's abode.

Let all the kings of the earth, sorrowful and uttering wails of sorrow, watch Karna fall from his chariot, slain by your arrows.

Let his kinsmen, with sorrowful hearts and faces, see Karna stretching his length on the ground, dipped in gore, unbreathing, and with his weapons loosened from his grasp.

Let the lofty standard of Adhiratha's son, bearing the device of the elephant's rope, fall fluttering onto the earth, cut down by your broad-headed arrows.

Let Salya flee in terror, abandoning his gold-decked chariot, shattered by hundreds of your shafts, upon seeing its warrior and horses killed.

Let your enemy Suyodhana, beholding Adhiratha's son slain, despair of both his kingdom and his life.

O Partha, there stands Karna, equal to Indra or perhaps even Sankara in tejas, razing your troops with his endless rivers of arrows. There the Panchalas, though being massacred, yet stand firm in the cause of the Pandavas. Know, O Arjuna, that Karna by himself prevails over the Panchalas, the five sons of Draupadi, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, the sons of Dhrishtadyumna, Satanika, the son of Nakula, Nakula himself, Sahadeva, Durmukha, Janamejaya, Sudharman and Satyaki!

Hear the loud uproar your allies the Panchalas make, as his arrows rake them. The Panchalas are neither afraid nor do they run from the battle. Those mighty bowmen were utterly fearless of death even when they faced Bhishma who enveloped the Pandava army with a great cloud of arrows.

They always earnestly attempted to vanquish their great enemy, the invincible Drona, that Acharya of all archers, that shura who haughtily massacred his enemies in battle. They have never turned their backs on Karna although he is decimating them in their hundreds as they charge him, like a blazing fire incinerating swarms of insects. You must, O Kaunteya, become a raft and rescue those brave warriors who have resolved to lay down their lives for their allies, and drown in the Karna ocean.

That awesome astra that Karna had from Maharishi Parasurama has been used, consuming our troops with its unworldly energy. Karna's arrows, flying thick as swarms of black bees, are still mowing down your troops. Our men who do not have their souls under control, cannot resist Karna's firetides of arrows; the Panchalas, O Bhaarata, flee in all directions.

And look there, Bhima, in a towering rage, at the head of the Srinjayas, gives battle to Karna, although gashed and bleeding from the Sutaputra's shafts. If left alone, Karna will exterminate the Pandavas, the Srinjayas and the Panchalas, like an untreated disease whose germ has invaded the body.

Other than you, Arjuna, I see no one in Yudhishtira's army who can hope to return alive after meeting Karna in battle. Kill him today with your keen shafts, O Bharatarishabha; fulfil your vow, and win great fame. Truly, O Paraviraha, only you and no one else can vanquish the Kaurava host led by Karna. Achieve this great feat now. Kill Atiratha Karna, attain your objective and, crowned with success, become joyful, O Arjuna!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'Listening to Krishna, all Arjuna's gloom and doubts are dispelled. He rubs the Gandiva's string, stretches it, and holds up the great bow, ready to kill Karna. Arjuna says, "With you to protect me, O Govinda, you who know the past and the future, and who are pleased with me, victory is sure to be mine today. When I can destroy the three worlds with your help, what challenge does Karna pose? I see the Panchala army fleeing, O Janardana, and Karna ranges fearlessly across the field. I also see Karna's Bhargavastra flying everywhere, like Shakra's Vajra.

This is the battle in which I will kill Karna, the battle of which all men will speak as long as the Earth lasts. Today, arrows loosed from the Gandiva will drink Karna's blood and life, and take him to Yama.

Today, Dhritarashtra will curse his own foolish decision to install the undeserving Duryodhana on the throne.

Today will divest Dhritarashtra of sovereignty, happiness, prosperity, kingdom, city and sons.

I tell you truly, O Krishna, that today, after I kill Karna, Duryodhana will despair of both life and kingdom.

Today, when he sees me kill Karna as Indra once did Vritrasura, Duryodhana will recall your efforts to bring peace, which he then mocked.

Today, let Sakuni know that my arrows are the dice, my Gandiva the box for casting them, and my chariot, the chequered cloth.

O Govinda, I will dispel Yudhishtira's long sleeplessness when I kill Karna. After this day, my brother will be cheerful and happy for ever. Today, I will unleash an inexorable arrow that will take Karna's life.

Karna vowed, O Krishna, 'I will not wash my feet until I slay Phalguna.'

I will prove his vow false, O Madhava, and fell him lifeless from his chariot, and the earth will drink the blood of him who in battle brings certain doom to all other men in this world.

With Dhritarashtra's approval, the Sutaputra boasted, 'You have no husband now, O Draupadi!'

My arrows will prove him false. They will drink his life-blood like angry serpents. Cloth-yard shafts, bright as lightning and shot from the Gandiva, will send Karna on his last journey. Today the son of Radha will repent those cruel words that he said to the princess of Panchala in the Kuru sabha. They who were then like sesame seeds without kernels, will today again become seeds with kernel after the fall of the wretched Vaikartana.

Karna bragged to the sons of Dhritarashtra, 'I will save you from the sons of Pandu!' My arrows will prove his assurance false.

Today, in the very sight of all the warriors, I will kill Karna who said, 'I will slay all the Panchalas with their sons.'

Today, O Madhusudana, I will kill Karna, and the panic-stricken Dhartarashtras with their king will flee in all directions, like deer from a lion. Then Duryodhana will repent for everything he has said and done, with his sons and relatives.

O Krishna, seeing Karna slain, Dhritarashtra, that weak man of wrath, will know me to be the foremost of all archers. I will make that king along with his sons, grandsons, counsellors and servants shelterless today.

Cranes, vultures and other birds of carrion, O Keshava, will dance over the limbs of Karna that my arrows will cut into pieces today.

Today, Madhusudana, before the eyes of all the great bowmen, I will behead the evil Sutaputra, and sever all his limbs with keen vipathas and razor-faced arrows.

Today, I will make the Dharmaraja Yudhishtira happy so that he will cast off the great pain and sorrow that he has borne in his heart all these heavy years, when I kill the son of Radha, with all his kinsmen.

Today, I will annihilate Karna's soldiers with astras like fire or the poison of a serpent. Today I will spread the earth with the bodies of kings cased in their golden armour. O Krishna, I will desiccate the bodies and cut off the heads of Abhimanyu's cowardly killers.

Today, I will either make a gift of the earth, taken back from the Dhartarashtras, to my brother, or perhaps you will walk the Earth without an Arjuna.

Today, O Krishna, when I kill Karna, like Maghavat slaying Sambara, I will free myself from the debt I owe all archers, to my own wrath, to the Kurus, to my arrows, and to this Gandiva. That death will free me from the grief that I, too, have carried for thirteen years. After I have killed the Suta's son, let our allies, the mighty chariot-warriors of the Somakas, consider their task accomplished.

I do not know, O Madhava, what the measure of Satyaki's joy will be after I kill Karna and win victory for our side. I will destroy the Sutaputra and his maharatha son, and bring joy to Bhima, the twins and Satyaki and pay my debt to the Panchalas, Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandi!

Today, let everyone see an angry Dhananjaya annihilate the Kauravas and the Suta's son. There is no one as powerful as me in the world. There is no one who can equal me in wrath or compassion. With my bow and with my strength, I can vanquish the Asuras, the Devas and all other beings united. Know, Krishna, that my prowess is higher than the highest. Alone, I will attack all the Kurus and the Bahlikas and with the fire of the astras from my Gandiva, I will burn them like a heap of dry grass at the close of winter. My palms bear the scars of arrows beyond count and of this great bow. On each of the soles of my feet are the marks of a chariot and a standard. There is no one who can defeat me in battle."

After saying this to that Varapurusha Krishna, Arjuna with blood red eyes, rides into battle, to support Bhima and to cut Karna's head from his trunk.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'What happened in that dreadful and fathomless battle of Kurukshetra, between the warriors of my army and the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, when Dhananjaya took the field, O Sanjaya?'

Sanjaya says, 'The combined divisions of the Pandava army, swelling with pride and prowess, their tall standards flying, march to the beating of drums and blasts from other instruments, like masses of clouds thundering at the close of summer. The battle that ensues is like a baneful, unseasonable shower, cruel and destructive. Huge elephants are its clouds; weapons are the water they shed; the peal of musical instruments, the rattle of chariot-wheels, and the noise of their palms clapping and slapping against bowstrings are their roar; weapons decked with gold form the flashes of lightning; arrows and swords and astras are the lashing, lethal torrents of rain. The incessant strokes of swords, the impetuous flow of blood in streams and the great carnage of warriors renders the encounter brutal past describing.

In the general mayhem, chariot-warriors, horsemen, elephants and foot-soldiers fight, singly or jointly and send one another to Yama's presence. Partha, with clouds of arrows, despatches enemy chariots, charioteers, cavalry, horses, elephants and foot-soldiers to the realm of Yama. Kripa and Sikhandi face each other; Satyaki battles Duryodhana; Srutasravas engages Aswatthaman, and Yudhamanyu duels with Chitrasena. The Srinjaya maharatha Uttamaujas fights Karna's son Sushena, while Sahadeva battles Sakuni, king of the Gandharas, like a hungry lion against a mighty bull.

The youthful son of Nakula, Satanika, and Karna's young son Vrishasena, shoot torments of arrows at each other. Madri's son Nakula assails Kritavarman, while Dhrishtadyumna, king of the Panchalas and Senapati of the Pandavas, attacks Karna, king of Anga and Senapati of the Kauravas, with all his forces. Dusasana, leading a large force of Samsaptakas, fiercely attacks the formidable Bhima.

The daring Uttamaujas, fighting vigorously, decapitates Karna's son Sushena and the head falls down on the ground with an uncanny and loud sound. A stricken Karna destroys Uttamaujas' horses, chariot and his flag in terrible fury. Uttamaujas turns on Kripa and kills his horses and the warriors who guard his flanks, and then quickly takes refuge in Sikhandi's chariot. Finding Kripa without a chariot, Sikhandi hesitates to shoot at him, allowing Aswatthaman to ride up quickly and to shield him with his own chariot, and to rescue him.

Meanwhile, Vayuputra Bhima, his golden mail shining and slick with blood, truly begins to burn your son's troops with his arrows, like the mid-day sun burning all the world at the height of summer.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'During the savage melee, enemies surround Bhima who, fighting alone, says to his sarathy, "Ride into the midst of the Dhartarashtra army as fast as these horses will take us. I mean to send all these enemies to Yama."

The charioteer whips the horses and they race recklessly to where Bhima wants to fight your army. A seething host of Kaurava troops, with elephants, chariots, cavalry and foot soldiers attack Bhima's splendid ratha but he easily repels their barrages of arrows and spears, and mows them down with his golden arrows. The Kshatriyas, the elephants, the chariots, the horses and the foot soldiers, whom Bhima's arrows strike set up a deep and echoing bewailing, O Rajan, like the sound made when a mountain is cloven by lightning, they attack Bhima from every side, like new-fledged birds flying towards a tree, but they cannot withstand him at all. Like Death with jaws agape, who devours all creatures at the end of the yuga, he consumes them. Like masses of clouds that a tempest scatters, the mangled and burnt Bhaarata host breaks and flees in all directions.

Mighty Bhimasena once more cheerfully says to his charioteer, "Ascertain, O Suta, whether those assembled chariots and standards that advance towards me, are ours or the enemy's, for I cannot distinguish them. Let me not kill our own troops.

O Visoka, seeing these hostile warriors, chariots and their standards that surround me, I am concerned about the king's injury and also because Arjuna has not yet returned to battle. I am worried that Dharmaputra Yudhishtira may have left this world, leaving me in the midst of the enemy. I do not know whether Arjuna and he are still alive. Yet, though anxiety and sorrow tear at my heart, I will destroy these hostile troops and rejoice with you today. Inspect all my quivers and tell me, O Suta, how many arrows I still have left and of what sort."

Visoka says, "You have sixty thousand iron arrows, ten thousand razor-faced shafts and an equal number of broad-headed ones left, O Shura. Of cloth-yard shafts you have two thousand, and of pradaras you still have three thousand. Why, your remaining astras amount to more than a cartload drawn by six bullocks. Shoot them and hurl them, for of gadas, swords, lances, scimitars, javelins, spears and other weapons used in close combat, you have thousands upon thousands. Have no fear that your weapons will be exhausted."

Bhima says, "O Suta, today my arrows sped fiercely from my bow will shroud everything and turn Kurukshetra into the domain of Death! All Kshatriyas, including the youngest, will discover whether Bhimasena has succumbed in battle or if he has subdued all the Kurus. Today, the world will applaud all my feats as I will singly overthrow the lot of them, or let them strike me down.

Let the Devas who aid good deeds, bless me. Let that Paraviraha, Arjuna, join me now like Sakra, who when duly invoked, comes quickly to a yagna. Look, O Visoka, my brother is coming! The Bhaarata standards flee, along with their elephants, horses and foot-soldiers. Savyasachi has them on the run with his thunderbolt shafts fitted with wings of gold and peacock feathers. Ah, chariots, horses and elephants run in panic with loud cries, crushing their own foot-soldiers. Arjuna is here and the Kaurava army is in full flight!"

Visoka asks, "Are you deaf, O great Bhima, that you do not hear the twang of Partha's yawning Gandiva stretched in wrath? All your wishes have come true for I can see the kapi-dhvaja in the midst of the enemy's elephant force terrifying the enemy's divisions. Why, even I am struck with fear when I look at that dreadful banner. Behold, the Gandiva's string flashes repeatedly like lightning amid blue clouds. Look, Arjuna's beautiful diadem sparkles brilliantly and the precious jewel on it blazes like the sun, and beside him is his white sankha, the Devadatta, with the blare like thunder.

And right beside Arjuna is Janardana, reins in hand, and they scythe through the enemy army. Look at Krishna's effulgent chakra, its nave hard as adamant, and its edge sharp as a razor, and which the Yadus worship.

Look where massive elephants and their hastikas, pierced and split open by his arrows, their trunks like trees, struck by the Kiritin, fall onto the earth, like hills riven by thunder.

And behold Krishna's sankha, the Panchajanya, so utterly beautiful and of the hue of the moon, and the blazing red mani, the Kaustubha, on his breast and his triumphal, exotic vanamala. What doubt is there that it is none other than Arjuna flying towards us, decimating the hostile army on his ratha drawn by cloud white gandharva horses and driven by Krishna? Look how your younger brother, the Vijaya, whose prowess is Indra's own, annihilates enemy chariots, horses and legions of foot-soldiers.

Behold, they fall like a forest uprooted by a storm stirred by Garuda's wings. Ah, look, mighty Bhima! Arjuna cuts down four hundred chariot-warriors with their horses and charioteers, seven hundred elephants, innumerable foot-soldiers and horsemen, and he flies toward us like the great constellation of Chitra. O Pandava, your enemies are being exterminated and all your wishes are coming true. Long may you live and your power ever increase!"

Bhima says, "O Visoka, you delight me with what you say and I will give you four and ten populous villages, a hundred female slaves and twenty chariots!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'Hearing the rumble of their chariots and the shouts of the enemy warriors, Arjuna says, "Let our steeds fly more swiftly still, O Govinda!"

Krishna replies, "I am going as swiftly as I can to where Bhima is."

They race towards the heart of the battle, even like the Vajradhari flying at the Asura Jambha. The fearsome Kshatriyas of the Kaurava army, supported by a large force of chariots, cavalry, elephants and foot-soldiers all move against Arjuna, and make the earth resound with their chariot wheels, the thunder of their horses' hooves, and the great susurrus of their arrows. Such a battle erupts between them, reminiscent of the encounter between the Asuras and Vishnu for mastery of the three worlds.

Alone, Partha destroys the mighty astras they loose at him; he cuts off their heads and arms with his razor-faced, crescent-tipped and wedge-headed arrows. Chattras, yak-tail chamaras, flagstaffs, horses, chariots, thick bands of foot-soldiers and elephants, all fall before his searing onslaught. Elephants, caparisoned in gold, with triumphal standards and ferocious warriors on their backs, are resplendent as arrows with golden wings strike them; they are like so many mountains ablaze with light. Dhananjaya cuts a path through the enemy to Karna, a makara in that ocean of men. Your army, O Rajan, do their best to stop Partha, leaving all fear of death and the resultant din is like that made by the ocean when lashed into fury by the tempest.

Arjuna, however, routs them and despatches to Yama's abode—thousands of chariot-warriors, elephants and horses. He kills four hundred maharathas and as the arrows from his bow strike them, they seem to vanish one after another from their chariots. The Kaurava army founders and escapes from Arjuna and the uproar from your men sounds like a surging sea breaking upon a rocky shore.

Arjuna now turns his attention to Karna's division and the sound with which he faces his enemy is like that which Garuda made in the olden days when swooping down for serpents. Bhimasena hears the sound with joy, and he is eager to catch sight of his radiant. The valiant son of Vayudeva falls on your troops, entirely reckless of his life. Your stricken army, O Rajan, reels like a wrecked ship in the embrace of the sea. Displaying his lightness of hands, Bhima mangles your forces with his fierce arrows, and despatches vast numbers to Yamaloka. Your warriors, O Bhaarata, quake with fear on seeing the superhuman fury of Bhima, who is like Rudra at the end of the yuga.

Duryodhana quickly marshals his men and commanders, O Bharatarishabha, and attacks Bhima, for if Bhima falls, he knows that they could then easily kill the other Pandavas. Exhorted and encouraged by your son, they renew their assault on him with showers of arrows. They surround him with innumerable elephants, soldiers, chariots and cavalry. Vrikodara is handsome and luminous like the full moon within his coronet and surrounded by the stars. His enemies attack him viciously, their eyes red with wrath, determined to kill him in any way they can.

Bhima flashes out of the press like a fish coming escaping from a net and covers that mighty host with torrents of arrows. He kills ten thousand advancing elephants, two hundred thousand foot-soldiers, five thousand horses and a hundred rathikas.

Bhima lets flow a river of blood, whose eddies are chariots, elephants the crocodiles that fill it, men its large fish, horses its sharks; the hair of dead men and animals form its plants and moss, arms lopped off from trunks are its water snakes. Thighs constitute its gravel, marrow its mire, the floating heads its rocks and countless jewels and gems float along with the current on crowns, armlets, earrings and other ornaments. Bows and arrows are the rafts by which men seek to cross that frightful river, and maces and spiked bludgeons are its serpents. Royal white parasols and flags are the swans, headgear its foam, necklaces its lotuses, and floating dust forms its froth.

Noble men cross the gory river with ease while the timid stand frozen on its ghastly banks. Warriors are its swimming, wading crocodiles and it flows straight towards the kingdom of Yama.

Wherever dreadful Bhima goes he slaughters the enemy in their thousands, quick as thinking, easy as breathing. Seeing Bhima on the rampage, Duryodhana says to Sakuni, “Uncle, stop the mighty Bhimasena quickly! The fate of the Pandava army and the result of this war both depend on him.”

The doughty son of Subala takes up the challenge and, surrounded by his brothers, attempts to contain the fearsome Bhima, like the continent resisting the ocean. He pierces the left side of Bhima’s chest with a sizzling volley of cloth-yard shafts fitted with golden wings. The fierce arrows, O Rajan, fletched with kanka and peacock feathers, pass through Bhima’s armour and sink deep into his body. Bhima strikes back with a single deadly shaft, also decked with gold, but the nimble Sakuni cuts it into seven pieces as it courses towards him. This enrages Bhima, who destroys Sakuni’s bow with some ease. Sakuni seizes up another bow and shoots six and ten wedge-headed arrows at him, two of which strike Bhima; one destroys his standard, two his regal parasol and the remaining four pierce his horses.

A red-eyed, furious Bhima flings an iron javelin with a golden shaft and restless as the tongue of a serpent at Sakuni’s chariot, but the Gandhara catches it in flight and hurls it back, and it ploughs right through Bhima’s left arm to strike the earth like a shaft of lightning from the sky. The Dhartarashtras set up a loud and jubilant roar and begin to fight wildly, reckless now of their lives. Bhima cannot bear that triumphant shout and, snatching up another bow, in a moment, smothers the enemy soldiers with his arrows.

He kills Sakuni’s four horses, his charioteer, and destroys his standard. Abandoning his useless chariot, Sakuni jumps down onto the ground, his eyes blood-red, breathing heavily, and shoots dense dark swaths of arrows at Bhima. Bhima wards off these shafts, rives Sakuni’s bow and deeply pierces his powerful antagonist with flights of burning arrows that make him collapse, almost lifeless. An anxious Duryodhana sweeps his uncle into his own chariot from under Bhimasena’s nose and rides away like the wind.

Seeing the king himself retreat, his troops turn their faces from battle and flee from Bhimasena in terror.

Bhima chases them remorselessly, shooting thousands of arrows after them. Slaughtered by Bhima, the retreating Dhartarashtras find refuge with Karna, O Bharatarishabha, and stand relieved, supporting one another like shipwrecked mariners when finding an island. They take courage once more and prepare to renew the war for everything.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'When Bhimasena breached our ranks, what, O Sanjaya, did Duryodhana and Subala's son Sakuni say? What did Karna, the Paraviraha, the warriors of my army, Kripa, Kritavarman, and Drona's son Aswatthaman say? I think that the prowess of Bhimasena Panduputra is past wonderful, since singlehandedly he fought off all the warriors of my army. Did Karna keep his vow? He, O Sanjaya, is the prosperity, the armour, the fame and the very hope for life of the Kurus. Seeing the terrible Bhimasena rout our army, what did Karna, son of Adhiratha and Radha, do? What did they do, my insuperable sons, the other kings and the maharathas of our army? Tell me all this, O Sanjaya, for you are a skilled narrator indeed!'

Sanjaya says, 'In the afternoon, O Rajan, the intrepid Karna attacks the Somakas in the very sight of Bhimasena who meanwhile decimates the Dhartarashtra troops. Seeing Bhima mercilessly pound his army, Senapati Karna tells Salya, "Drive me to the Panchalas!"

Salya urges the white chargers, fleet as thought, towards where the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Karushas are, and penetrating that mighty host, confidently drives the chariot to where Karna wants to go. Finding the chariot cased in tiger skins and looking like a cloud, rolling into their midst with a sound like the peal of thunder or of a mountain splitting into fragments, the Pandus and the Panchalas are terrified. Karna looses hundreds upon hundreds of arrows from his bowstring drawn to his ear and ravages the Pandava army.

In counter attack, many great archers and maharathas of the Pandava army, including Sikhandi, Bhima, Dhrishtadyumna, Nakula, Sahadeva, the five sons of Draupadi, and Satyaki surround and pour showers of arrows upon him, intent on finishing him. Satyaki strikes him with twenty shafts in the shoulder-joint, Sikhandi with five and twenty shafts, Dhrishtadyumna finds him with seven, the sons of Draupadi with four and sixty, Sahadeva with seven and Nakula with a hundred and a raging Bhimasena drills him in the torso with ninety perfect barbs.

Karna, laughing in scorn, and drawing his wonderful bow in a circle, slashes each of them with five arrows. He destroys Satyaki's bow and battle flag, O Bharatarishabha, and bloodies his chest, and next pierces Bhimasena. With flat-headed arrows, he next cuts off Sahadeva's standard and gashes his sarathy. In the twinkling of an eye, he deprives the five sons of Draupadi of their chariots, shattering them.

I saw the exceptionally wonderful feat, O Bhaarata, of the valiant Karna, fighting alone and unsupported, holding off all those bowmen who do their utmost to overpower him. With lethally accurate archery he forces those maharathas back and then begins to massacre the Panchalas and many rathikas among the Chedis, gratifying all the Devas, the Siddhas, the Charanas and the great bowmen among the Dhartarashtras.

Then Karna achieves an extraordinary feat, as he sets the Pandava troops to flight, so they scatter in all directions screaming in panic. All the Pandavas united together cannot contain him, and like a cataract breaking against a mountain, the Pandava army is shattered when it meets Karna. That shura tirelessly cuts off the arms and heads of his redoubtable enemies, their ears decked with resonant kundalas. Swords with hilts of ivory, battle flags, spears, horses, elephants and chariots of diverse kinds Karna destroys in a myriad of ways, but strictly observes Kshatriya dharma.

The earth soon becomes impassable and mired with flesh, blood and detritus. The thick darkness caused by Karna's devastras makes it impossible for the combatants to distinguish friends from enemies. The mighty Pandava maharathas, O Rajan, fight valiantly but Karna repeatedly savages them, like an angry lion a herd of deer in a forest or like a wolf hunting smaller animals. The Dhartarashtra archers further beset them, uttering dreadful roars as they retreat. An overjoyed Duryodhana orders diverse drums and musical instruments to be beaten and blown in all parts of the army.

Though beaten, the great Panchala archers return heroically to the fight, but to no avail as the son of Radha continues to rout them. He kills twenty Panchala rathikas and more than a hundred Chedi warriors and empties the platforms of chariots, the backs of horses and the necks of elephants of their warriors and looks resplendent like Death himself at the end of the yuga. The heroism that the Panchalas display is remarkable, for they refuse to back down from that impossible assault.

Duryodhana, Dusasana, Kripa, Aswatthaman, Kritavarman, Sakuni, and the two sons of Karna slaughter the Pandava warriors in hundreds of thousands. So, too, the Pandava heroes Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi and the five sons of Draupadi decimate your host. Thus, even as a great slaughter takes place among the Pandavas everywhere on the field, your army also suffers great loss at the hands of the mighty Bhima and other Pandava heroes.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, O Rajan, Arjuna catches a glimpse of Karna as he continues to destroy the four kinds of enemy forces. The Sutaputra causes a tawny river of blood to flow, choked with flesh, bones and marrow of heroic warriors, where human heads are its rocks and elephants and horses form its banks, and which resounds with the cries of ravens and vultures. White parasols are its swans or rafts and as that river runs, it bears away Kshatriyas like trees along its current. Necklaces form a bouquet of lotuses, helmets are its foam, bows and arrows are its fish; and the crowns of mangled men float on its surface. Shields and armour are its eddies, and chariots are the rafts with which it teems. While men wanting victory easily cross it, cowards find it unfordable.

Arjuna says, "There, O Krishna, the standard of Karna is visible where he is locked in battle with Bhimasena and the others. Look, Duryodhana with the sovereign white parasol held over his head, fights alongside him as they put the Panchalas to flight. There Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman shield Duryodhana, while Karna protects them all. Salya, expert charioteer, looks so dashing as he guides Karna's ratha. Take me there, O Krishna, for I will not return without killing Karna. Quickly now, Govinda, for otherwise he will annihilate all the maharathas of the Parthas and the Srinjayas in my very sight."

Krishna drives his chariot swiftly towards Karna to begin the duel between Arjuna and the Suta's son, and the Pandava troops are all reassured. The rumble of Arjuna's ratha as it flashes forward is like the tremendous sound of Vasava's thunder. Seeing Shwetavahana and Krishna advance under the kapi-dhvaja, Salya tells Karna, "There he comes, the one after whom you were asking, brandishing his Gandiva and massacring our greatest warriors. Fight him today Karna, and if you can kill him great will be our gain and advantage. Judging by his mien, Partha will not battle anybody other than you, especially when you have Vrikodara cornered.

Learning that Yudhishtira has suffered at your hands, and seeing the plight of Sikhandi, Satyaki, Dhrishtadyumna, the five sons of Draupadi, Yudhamanyu, Uttamaujas and Nakula and Sahadeva, Arjuna comes straight toward you, avoiding all the other warriors. Accept his challenge, O Karna, for there is no one else among us who can stand up to the two Krishnas in battle. He is alone and there is no one to protect either his flanks or his rear. You are the equal of Bhishma, Drona, Aswatthaman and Kripa, so accept his challenge and kill Savyasachi who darts at us like a serpent flicking its tongue, a roaring bull, or a tiger in the forest.

There, those kings, those maharathas of the Dhartarashtra army, back away from him in fear. Only you can dispel the fears of our fleeing warriors who now all look to you as their refuge in this battle. Muster your great prowess, O Naravyaghra, and let us ride against the Krishnas."

Karna says mildly, "You now seem to have regained your composure and seem to be well disposed towards me again. Do not, O Mahabaho, entertain any fear of Dhananjaya. Today, you will see my might and skill, and single-handedly I will destroy the great Pandava army and those two Krishnas as well. Victory in battle is uncertain so I vow that I will not return from the field today without killing them and achieving my purpose, or dying and sleeping forever on this Kurukshetra."

Salya says, "All great maharathas, O Karna, swear that Arjuna, even when he is alone, is invincible. Now, when he has Krishna's protection, who can match him?"

Karna says, "As far as I know, such a great maharatha has never been born on earth! So, judge my prowess as I contend with that same Partha in battle. This prince of Kuru's line, this foremost of maharathas, drives into war borne on white horses. Perhaps he will send me to Yama today. And if Karna dies, the war will be lost and all our army wiped out.

Arjuna's two arms are massive, scarred, they never falter or perspire. Great are his skills and lightness of hand and he is aggressive past imagining when he fights. Indeed, there is no warrior equal to this prince. He can unleash a thousand arrows as if they are one. Fitting them to his bowstring quicker than the eye can see, he can unerringly find a target that is two yojanas away. Which warrior can equal Arjuna?

This Atiratha, with Krishna, pleased Agni deva in the Khandava vana. It was there that the noble Krishna obtained his chakra, and Savyasachi his bow, the Gandiva. It was there that invincible Mahabaho also acquired his chariot yoked to white horses, his two celestial and inexhaustible quivers, and many devastras. In the realm of Indra he received his conch, the Devadatta, and slew innumerable Daityas and all the Kalakeyas. Who is there on earth that is superior to Arjuna?

Mahadeva himself once fought the noble Arjuna and pleased him. The Pandava gratified the Lord Siva and had the awesome Pasupatastra from him, which can destroy the three worlds. The Regents of the world, the Lokapalas, all gifted him their astras of immeasurable energy, with which he destroyed the Kalakhanjas. In Virata's city, fighting from a single chariot, he defeated all of us. He wrested back Virata's great herd and, for a trophy, took parts of their capes from all our greatest maharathas, and gifted them to the princess Uttaraa.

O Salya, I think of myself as being the bravest man in the world today that I dare challenge the very greatest of Kshatriyas, Arjuna Parantapa, who is gifted with such tejas and with every virtue. And besides, Krishna, who is the unrivalled Narayana himself, that noble Vasudeva, that ever-victorious Vishnu, armed with the sankha, chakra and gada, whose attributes the entire world cannot finish narrating in ten thousand years of the gods, protects the awesome Pandava.

Seeing the two Krishnas together on the same chariot, both fear and courage enter my heart together. Partha is the greatest of all archers, while Narayana is unrivalled if he uses his chakra. The mountains of Himavat may be moved from their places but not the two Krishnas. Both the praviras possess untold proficiency in the use of astras, both are Atirathas, and their bodies are as hard as adamant. Who else but I, O Salya, would dare ride into a battle against Phalguna and Vasudeva?

Salya, my long cherished desire for a duel with the third son of Pandu will soon be satisfied. Soon a fierce and matchless battle will occur, in which either I will overwhelm the two Krishnas or they will conquer me."

Paraviraha Karna then lets out some deep roars like those of thunderheads, as he drives up to your son and salutes him respectfully. He then addresses Suyodhana, as well as all the assembled warriors including Kripa and the Bhoja king Kritavarman, the ruler of the Gandharas with his son, the Acharyas of his own younger brothers, and all the foot-soldiers and horsemen and elephant-riders.

He says, "Attack Achyuta and Arjuna. Seal all the gaps in our forces through which they might escape. Wear them down, wound them sorely, and then I will finish them with some ease."

The assembled warriors readily acquiesce and swiftly set about executing the plan. They begin to shoot Dhananjaya with innumerable arrows but Arjuna meets their attack like an ocean receiving all rivers and their tributaries. Such is the speed with which he shoots his arrows that his enemies cannot discern when he draws the bowstring and when he looses his shafts. All that one can see are men, horses and elephants falling dead. Like men with infected eyes who cannot look at the sun, the Kauravas are unable to gaze at Jaya who is like the all-destroying sun that rises at the end of the yuga, with arrows for its rays, and the Gandiva, always drawn into a circle of flames for its glorious disc. Partha, effortlessly, marvellously, cuts down every enemy arrow shot at him, and quicker than the mind kills the bowmen who shot them. Smiling and radiant, dark Arjuna negates the missiles of his enemies and consumes your troops, O Vibho, like the blazing Sun drying up the land between the months of Jyeshta and Ashadha.

Ah, with consummate ease, he wards off the most ferocious volleys of Kripa, Kritavarman, Duryodhana and Aswatthaman, who attack him with veritable torrents of arrows.

Aswatthaman and Dhananjaya exchange some torrid fire, during which Krishna, the four white horses and the kapi-dhvaja are struck, while Arjuna destroys his adversary's full drawn bow, decapitates his charioteer, his four horses, his standard and finally fells him from his chariot. Aswatthaman, enraged, takes up another priceless bow, chased with gold and studded with diamonds, bright as the body of Takshaka, and which indeed resembles a mighty Naga caught from the foot of a mountain. Stringing that bow as he stands on the ground now, Drona's terrific, stalwart son unleashes a towering gale of shafts, which draws copious blood from his great adversaries whom he strikes from close range. Then Kripa, Bhoja and your son Duryodhana, from the van of your army, envelop Savyasachi with further showers of shafts, which are like clouds shrouding the sun.

But, with prowess equal to that of the thousand-armed Kartavirya of old, Arjuna strikes back, quick as lightning, and destroys Kripa's bow, his standard, and kills his horses and charioteer, like the Vajradhari in days of yore assailing the Asura Bali. Thousands of Arjuna's arrows engulf Kripa, just as Ganga's son Bhishma found himself beset by the same Kiritin on the fatal day of his fall.

Arjuna kills Kritavarman's handsome horses and destroys his standard. He then begins to rapidly eradicate the elephants of the enemy, its chariots with their horses, charioteers, bows and flags. Thereupon, your vast army breaks into a hundred parts like an embankment washed away by rushing waters. Now, Krishna manoeuvres Arjuna's chariot so he places all his enemies on his right, and races away at great speed like Indra flying to kill Vritra. Sikhandi, Satyaki and the twins bar their enemies from chasing Dhananjaya, and give vent to tigerish roars.

The Kuru Kshatriyas and the Srinjayas fall upon each other with immaculate arrows shot with great force, and the conflict between them is like the one between the Asuras and the Devas in the elder days. Elephant-warriors, horsemen and rathikas, fighting for victory or death and heaven, fall on the field. All the directions of the sky, cardinal and subsidiary, are enveloped in gloom from their great gusts of arrows and the very light of the sun is entirely shrouded.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'O Rajan, in an attempt to rescue Bhima, who is under critical attack by the Kuru warriors, Arjuna turns his attention from Karna's troops and begins to thin the enemy ranks opposing Bhima. Successive fusillades of Arjuna's broad, flat-headed and razor-sharp shafts fall incessantly from the sky like dense flights of birds, and he is like the very Destroyer to the Kurus as he mangles their bodies and cuts off their heads, his every arrow finding a target among them. Like the great Vaitarani, which separates the regions of the living from those of the dead, the field grows ugly, horrible, uneven and impassable from the blood and debris of the battle.

Arjuna kills four hundred highly trained and fierce elephants, with warriors cased in golden mail and grim hastikas on their backs, and they fall like populated mountain crests. Like the sun piercing through clouds, Arjuna's chariot passes through the dense mass of dead tuskers with copious secretions flowing down their bodies. Heaps of dead leviathans, horses, broken chariots and lifeless warriors stripped of their weapons and armour, litter the trail he blazes on the field of horror.

The twang of the Gandiva is the peal of thunder in the sky. Varied kinds of fatal astras that resemble burning brands, meteors and thunderbolts, shot from the Gandiva, burn your army like a forest of bamboo on a mountain in the night. Crushed, burnt, maimed, massacred and thrown into absolute disorder, they break and run, and are like a fleet of boats on a tempest-lashed ocean. The Kuru army that had assailed Bhimasena till then abandon him and escape with their lives.

After he routs the Kurus, the unvanquished Arjuna rides up to Bhimasena, to inform him that Yudhishtira's wounds have been treated and dressed and to reassure him that their brother is well.

Leaving Bhimasena, Dhananjaya moves once more against his enemies, making the earth and the sky, O Bhaarata, resound with the rumble of his chariot. Ten of Dusasana's sons, all daring warriors wearing golden armour, surround and attack Arjuna with stretched bows, almost dancing on their chariots, like hunters cornering an elephant with burning brands. Krishna manoeuvres the chariot to place all of them to his right, expecting Arjuna to quickly send them all to Yamaloka. Seeing Arjuna's chariot moving away, they rush towards him. Partha first destroys their battle flags, horses, bows and, then, with some flat-headed arrows, he cuts off their heads with bitten lips and eyes blood-red with battle lust, like striking the blooms of a corsage of lotuses. Having killed those ten Kaurava princes, Arjuna's chariot rolls inexorably on.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Ninety Kaurava chariot-warriors charge Arjuna as he advances under his kapi-dhvaja, his ratha harnessed to those fleetest of horses decked with golden ornaments and covered with pearl filigree. Those Naravyaghras attempt to surround Arjuna. Krishna ignores them and makes for Karna's chariot, chased by those ninety Samsaptakas, shooting storms of shafts at him. They force Arjuna to stop, and quick as thinking kill all his ninety assailants along with their charioteers, and they fall dead like Siddhas falling down with their vimanas from heaven upon the exhaustion of their punya.

Next, a large force of Kauravas, with chariots, elephants and horsemen, fearlessly besiege Phalguna, shower him with spears, maces, throwing swords and thousands of arrows and stop his progress. However, like the sun destroying the darkness with his rays, he arrests their attack on him, killing many, until an army of Mlecchas, riding thirteen hundred excited elephants, under your son Duryodhana, falls on Partha from a flank. They harry him with barbed arrows, nalikas, cloth-yard shafts, javelins, kampanas and short arrows, some of which the elephants hurl with their trunks.

Phalguna stops them in their tracks and blasts that elephant force like Indra striking mountains with thunderbolts. His gold-winged arrows excoriate the elephants decked with golden necklaces and they fall dead, like mountains ablaze with volcanic fires. O Rajan, we hear the thunderous twang of the Gandiva, above the pandemonium of shouts and screams of dying men, elephants and horses. Slashed elephants, horses and chariots, with their riders dead, flee on all sides. So prodigious is Arjuna that, fighting alone, he razes horsemen, elephants and chariot-warriors in thousands, indeed all that attacked him from every side.

Seeing the still great Kaurava army corner Phalguna, Bhima turns away from the small force he had been fighting, and dashes up to support his brother, and he demolishes those that remain alive with his gada. Without let, in frenzied brutality, Bhima's awesome, magical gada flies and falls incessantly on men, elephants and horses cased in steel armour and strikes them down, spraying the air with jets of crimson. Biting the earth with their teeth, and bathed in blood, with the crowns of their heads and bows and lower limbs crushed, they fall and become food for the waiting carrion eaters. Covered with blood, flesh, marrow and pieces of bone, Bhima's occult mace is like the night of death, difficult to look at. Bhima prowls the battlefield in rage with that mace and massacres ten thousand horses and numberless foot-soldiers, while your troops think that Yama himself, armed with his bludgeon, is in their midst.

He next breaks into the enemy's elephant division, like a makara into the ocean and, within a short time, despatches it to Yama's abode. Elephants in their spiked body armour, with their hastikas and standards, fall everywhere like winged mountains. After he destroys the elephants, the mighty Bhimasena once more follows Arjuna on his chariot.

Arjuna, finding your great army harried, slaughtered, on the verge of flight, and standing paralysed, sends relentless torments of arrows at it and men, horses, chariots and elephants die, emitting loud screams. The remnants huddle together and turn tail to flee. The battle, however, continues between the Kurus and the mighty Pandavas and there is not a single chariot-warrior, horseman, elephant-warrior, horse or elephant that is unscathed. The soldiers, bathed in blood, their armour riddled with arrows, blaze like a forest of flowering asokas.

Seeing Savyasachi's valour, the Kauravas despair for Karna's life and they flee the field, deserting their Sutaputra Senapati, even while calling desperately for his help. Arjuna pursues them, hundreds of arrows flaring from the Gandiva and swelling the morale of the Pandava warriors under Bhimasena.

Your sons, O Rajan, then ride towards Karna's chariot, sinking, as they seem to be, in a fathomless sea, where Karna is the sole island of safety for them. Your sons, like serpents defanged, and driven by fear of the noble Arjuna, take shelter with him, like those who seek the protection of dharma from fear of death.

Karna, always unafraid, reassures them, "Do not fear! Come to me!"

Looking at your shattered army, Karna stretches his bow, draws deep breaths and prepares himself to kill Arjuna and have revenge and victory. Bending his formidable bow into a circle, he once more assails the Panchalas in the very sight of Savyasachi. Soon, many kings of the enemy army counterattack and pour their arrows on him like a deluge upon a mountain. However, Karna fights for his friends and his arrows kill many Panchalas and they scream as they are struck, just before dying.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'While Shwetavahana puts the Kurus to flight, O Rajan, Karna decimates the Panchalas with his powerful, ineluctable arrows, truly like a tempest chasing massed clouds across the sky. He fells Janamejaya's charioteer with broad-faced shafts called anjalikas and then kills his horses. He rakes both Satanika and Sutasoma with many broad-headed arrows and shatters their bows. He drills Dhrishtadyumna with six arrows and, not losing a moment, kills his horses. He kills Satyaki's horses and then despatches Visoka, son of the king of the Kaikeyas.

At this, Ugrakarman, commander of the Kaikeya division, shoots Karna's son Prasena with a score of arrows, making him tremble; but, with three crescent-tipped arrows, Karna cuts off the arms and the head of his son's assailant and fells him from his chariot like a sala tree with its branches lopped off.

Prasena, fairly dancing upon his chariot, covers Satyaki, fighting on foot without his chariot, with a slew of arrows; Satyaki kills him with a single shaft that bursts his heart apart. Karna, red-eyed seeing this, tells Satyaki, "You are dead, O grandson of Sini!" and shoots a deadly arrow at him. However, Sikhandi cuts it down in flight and strikes Karna with three arrows of his own. Karna shatters Sikhandi's bow, rends his banner, strikes him with another six arrows and finally beheads Dhrishtadyumna's son in his fury. He seamlessly follows this up by wounding Sutasoma deep with a long shaft.

Seeing the fierce battle progress and the death of Dhrishtadyumna's son, Krishna says, "The Panchalas are being slaughtered, Partha. We must stop the terrible Karna."

Arjuna smiles in anticipation and they ride again towards Karna's chariot. Stretching and fiercely strumming his bow, he creates a darkness with his arrows and destroys large numbers of men, horses and chariots that come in his way, as the echoes of the Gandiva's bowstring reach up into the sky. Birds no longer finding room in their own element, take shelter in mountain caverns. The magnificent Kiritin, holding his full-drawn bow, falls upon the enemy forces while Bhimasena protects his rear. Those two princes drive furiously towards Karna, demolishing their enemies along the way.

Meanwhile, Karna also covers the sky with his shafts. He mows down a vast number of chariot-warriors, horses and elephants, and grinds down the Somakas. Soon Uttamaujas, Janamejaya, an enraged Yudhamanyu and Sikhandi, uniting with Dhrishtadyumna, attack Vaikartana with loud shouts and roars, but they make no impact on him, like the objects of the senses failing to entice a man of purified soul from abstinence. He quickly smashes their bows, horses, charioteers and banners, and strikes each of them with five arrows and then gives a booming roar of triumph himself.

While he razes his enemies, everybody is terrified and they think that the earth, with her mountains and trees, might split at the twang of Karna's bow, the mighty Vijaya, which resembles Indra's dhanusha. The son of Adhiratha is like the sun within his corona, resplendent with blazing rays. He carves Sikhandi with a dozen keen barbs, Uttamaujas with half a dozen, Yudhamanyu with three, and Janamejaya and Dhrishtadyumna with three each. O Rajan, those five powerful maharathas stand as if frozen, beaten by the Suta's son even as the objects of the senses are by a man with a purified soul.

The five sons of Draupadi quickly ride up with other rathikas and rescue their uncles who are sinking in the Karna ocean, like shipwrecked merchants being rescued from the real ocean. Satyaki cuts down Karna's ceaseless cataract of arrows, and strikes the Sutaputra with a clutch of scathing shafts; he then plunges eight heavy iron arrows into Duryodhana's majestic body. Kripa, the Bhoja lord Kritavarman, your son and Karna strike back at the brilliant Satyaki. However, with shafts flowing incessantly from his bow stretched to its fullest, Satyaki is as irresistible as the meridian sun in the autumn sky; he stops those four warriors like the king of the Daityas battling the Lokapalas, the Regents of the four quarters.

Soon some Panchala maharathas come to his support, like the Maruts protecting Sakra in battle.

The battle that now breaks out again resembles the Devasura yuddha of old. Wounded, bleeding rathikas, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers stagger about with arrows protruding, or utter wails of final distress and fall dead. Your younger son Dusasana fearlessly attacks Bhima who happily turns on him like a lion springing towards a large ruru deer. The battle between them is fierce as the one between Sambara and Sakra in the days of old. They lacerate each other with arrows shot with great force; they are like two bull elephants in musth with ichor streaming down their bodies, goring each other near a she-elephant in season. Vrikodara destroys your son's bow and standard with another winged arrow, he pierces his antagonist's forehead and then decapitates his charioteer.

Dusasana retaliates with a fresh bow, gashing Bhimasena with a dozen virile shafts. Holding his horses' reins himself, he yet pours torrents of arrows over Bhima. Dusasana then unleashes a fulgurous astra, bright as the sun, and decked with gold, diamonds, and other precious gems, irresistible as Indra's Vajra. That blazing weapon finds Vrikodara and he collapses with languid limbs and outstretched arms, as if dead upon his chariot. But, he soon recovers and begins to roar like a whole pride of lions.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Prince Dusasana fights intensely and rives Bhima's bow with a perfect arrow; with six more shafts he pierces his charioteer and then finds Bhima himself, first with nine and then with many more barbs, all shot with ferocious power. Bhimasena casts a deadly spear at your son, who, seeing it fly at him like a burning brand, cuts it down with ten arrows. Dusasana drills Bhima deep with a single violent shaft, which plunges deep into the great Pandava's body, drawing a spout of blood and applause and cheers from your troops.

A livid Bhima says levelly, "You have hit me swift and deep, vile Dusasana. Now endure a blow from my gada."

Titanic Vrikodara picks up his great mace and says, "O evil one, today I will drink your blood on this battlefield."

Dusasana flings a short spear like death itself at Bhima, who whirls his gada around and hurls it like lightning at his most loathed enemy, who tried to strip the precious Panchali naked in the Kuru sabha. That mace breaks Dusasana's fiery spear, flares on to strike him on his head and flings him ten bow lengths from his chariot. Dusasana finds all his horses, his chariot pulverised, his armour, ornaments, attire and garlands all broken or askew, and himself writhing in agony on the ground. Bhimasena, perspiring like an elephant with thick juices trickling down his body, standing on the battlefield amidst many great warriors of the Kuru army, again remembers all the vile deeds of hostility and the humiliation that your sons heaped on the Pandavas. He clearly remembers how Panchali was hauled into the Kuru court by her tresses, how Dusasana tried to strip her of her single garment in the midst of that august and ancient court, even while she was in her period, and all, all the other wrongs inflicted on that peerless princess while her husbands sat with their faces turned away. His wrath flares up like a fire fed with libations of ghrita.

He addresses Karna, Suyodhana, Kripa, Aswatthaman and Kritavarman in a ringing voice, "Today I will make an end of this beast Dusasana. Let all your warriors protect him if they can."

Bhima suddenly springs at Dusasana like a lion rushing towards a mighty elephant, and attacks him before the eyes of Suyodhana and Karna. He jumps down from his chariot and, with bloodshot gaze fixed on his fallen enemy, draws his sword. Trembling with rage, he sets his foot upon the throat of Dusasana, and ripping open the breast of his supine, bends down and drinks his warm blood as if it was amrita to him. He then throws him down, cuts his head off and, keeping the vow he swore in the Kuru sabha, again sips his enemy's blood, little by little, as if there was nothing to rival its taste in any of the worlds.

Then he looks at him with wrathful eyes and says, "I find the taste of my enemy's blood to be superior to that of my mother's milk, honey, ghee, or the finest wine made from honey. It is better than the purest water, milk, the best curd, or all kinds of drink in this world, sweeter than amrita."

Once more, looking at Dusasana's dead body he laughs softly and says, "What more can I do to you? Death has rescued you from me."

Rajan, those who see Bhimasena stalk the battlefield filled with joy and drink his enemy's blood, either fall down in terror or their weapons drop from their nerveless fingers. Many cry out feebly and look at Bhima in horror. Indeed, all those that stand around Bhima and see him drink Dusasana's blood, flee with Chitrasena, overwhelmed by fear, and saying to one another, "This is no human being! This Bhima has to be a Rakshasa!"

Then the Panchala prince Yudhamanyu, at the head of his troops, pursues the fleeing Chitrasena and pierces him with seven keen arrows shot swiftly, one after another. Chitrasena, like a trampled serpent repeatedly darting out its tongue and ready to use its venom, turns back and shoots his pursuer with three shafts and his charioteer with six. Then, in a flash, with a shaft fitted with large wings and an exceptionally sharp point, and shot with great care from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch, Yudhamanyu decapitates Chitrasena. Upon the fall of his brother Chitrasena, a raging Karna puts the Pandava host to flight until Nakula attacks and stops him.

After killing the vindictive Dusasana in full view of Karna, Bhima drinks some more of his blood, and gifted with stentorian lungs, shouts, "O wretch, here, I drink your life-blood from your throat. Abuse us again as you once did, crying, 'Beast, beast!'

We will dance and repeat the words of those who once called us 'beast'. We remember our sleep at the Pramanakoti palace, the mixing of deadly poison in our food, the bites of black cobras and the setting fire to the house of lac. We cannot forget our suffering—the theft of our kingdom at a game of dice, our exile in the woods, the cruel seizure of Draupadi's shining tresses, the sting of arrows and the cuts of weapons in battle and all our other miseries. We endured all other kinds of hurts in Virata's palace through the evil counsels of Sakuni, Duryodhana, Karna and you. We were never allowed a moment's peace or happiness, and it was the evil designs of Dhritarashtra and his son that was the cause of all our suffering."

Drenched in blood flowing from his wounds, the victorious Vrikodara, his face red and filled with great anger, then says to Krishna and Arjuna, "Praviras, what I had vowed to do to Dusasana in battle, I have accomplished today. I will soon accomplish my other vow and kill that second beast, Duryodhana, in this yagna of war. Only after I stamp on his evil head in the presence of the Kauravas, will I find peace."

Then, filled with great joy, Bhima finds happy release in loud roars, just as the mighty and the noble Indra of a thousand eyes roared after slaying Vritrasura.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After the killing of Dusasana, O Rajan, ten of your sons, Nishangin, Kavachin, Pasin, Dundadhara, Dhanurgraha, Alolupa, Saha, Shanda, Vatavega and Suvarchasas, great maharathas who have never retreated from battle, and now wanting revenge, shroud mahabaho Bhima, red-eyed with rage, his lips bloody, like the raging Destroyer, with arrows. But with ten broad-headed shafts, fitted with golden wings and shot with great force, Bhima despatches those ten Bharata princes to Yamaloka.

Seeing your ten sons slain in a flash, your army breaks and flees, despite Karna's presence, overwhelmed with terror of the Pandavas. A great fear enters Karna's heart on watching Bhima's might like Yama's himself. Salya understands Karna's state of mind, and consoles him, "This is not the time for grief, O son of Radha. These kings are all running from fear of Bhimasena. Duryodhana is stricken after seeing Bhima kill Dusasana and drink his blood. Kripa and others, and those of the king's brothers that are still alive, their hearts heavy, their rage dimmed by sorrow, surround Duryodhana to comfort him, while Dhananjaya and the Pandavas advance against you for battle. So, collect yourself and face Arjuna with courage.

Dhritarashtra has given you the entire responsibility for this war. O Mahabaho, bear that burden to the best of your prowess and ability. In victory there will be great fame, while in defeat heaven is certain. Look,

Karna, your son Vrishasena sees the stupor that has come over you and bears down on the Pandavas.”

Hearing what Salya says, Karna rides furiously towards Vrikodara, who meanwhile decimates your troops with his mace, like Yama wielding his danda. Nakula attacks Vrishasena like the victorious Maghavat rushing against the Asura Jambha and destroys his proud standard decked with gems; he then splits his bow with a golden strap attached to it. Wanting to avenge Dusasana, Vrishasena snatches up another bow and strikes fiercely back at Nakula. The duel rages and Nakula and Vrishasena harry each other with the many devastras they possess.

From rage as well as from his own brilliance and the natural energy of his weapons, Vrishasena blazes like a fire fed with libations of ghee. He kills Nakula’s beautiful white horses of the Vanayu breed, decked with trappings of gold. Nakula jumps down from his ratha and, taking up a bright shield decked with golden moons and a sword blue as the sky, he wheels across the field like a great bird, performing diverse exquisite movements through the air. He kills many warriors, horses and elephants and they fall on the earth like animals being sacrificed in an Aswamedha yagna. Nakula singly kills two thousand seasoned warriors from diverse realms with their bodies smeared with fragrant sandalwood paste.

Karna’s son suddenly attacks Nakula again and pierces him from every side with countless arrows, determined to have his life. Nakula strikes back and, with the support of his brother Bhima, spreads terror through the field, and as if in sport, slaughters warriors, horses and elephants. The duel continues with both shuras stalking each other like hawks with outstretched wings to snatch a piece of meat. Negating his antagonist’s showers of arrows, Nakula wheels about in different intricate movements until Vrishasena demolishes his shield adorned with a thousand jewel stars.

Not losing a moment, he rives Nakula’s polished blue sword, keen as a serpent’s poison, even while Madri’s son whirls it over his head. Vrishasena stabs his enemy deep in his chest with some slim shafts and earns the applause of those that watch the duel. Bleeding from Vrishasena’s attack, the noble Nakula runs to Bhimasena’s chariot and jumps onto it like a lion springing upon a mountain summit.

The heroic Vrishasena attacks the two sons of Pandu with a relentless gale of arrows and, quickly, many other Kuru warriors join him. Bhima and Arjuna, burning with wrath like two fires fed with libations of ghrita, retaliate powerfully and pour a scathing volley of arrows over Vrishasena and the other warriors around him.

Bhima tells Phalguna, “The son of Karna has Nakula in dire peril. Let us move against him.”

Seeing them, Nakula says, “Kill him quickly.”

Hearing this, Krishna precipitately drives the formidable Arjuna, his kapi-dhvaja flapping in the wind, towards Vrishasena.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Learning that Nakula is in dire straits, wounded, without his ratha, bow, arrows and sword, the five sons of Drupada, the five sons of Draupadi and Satyaki dash to his rescue in their rathas driven by expert charioteers, harnessed to wind-swift horses, and with banners streaming. They destroy your elephants, chariots, men and cavalry with shafts that resemble formidable serpents. Seeing this turn of affairs, the Kaurava maharathas Kritavarman, Kripa, Aswatthaman, Duryodhana, Sakuni's son, Vrika, Kratha and Devavridha swiftly counter attack, their chariots steaming forward with a sound deep as the booming of elephants or clouds, and hold them up. However, the prince of the Kulindas, and his elephants that look like mountains and newly formed clouds, advance with impetuous speed against the Kaurava heroes.

Well-equipped and covered with golden armour, the elephants born in Himalayan regions and which only accomplished and willing warriors ride are like clouds in the sky charged with lightning. They vigorously assail Kripa who brings down the prince from his elephant. The younger brother of the prince besieges Kripa with a dense flight of bright iron spears and loud shouts, but Sakuni cuts off his head even as it still roars. Seeing the fall of the Kulindas, the mighty chariot-warriors of your army, blow their conches with joy, and charge their enemies.

A fierce battle ensues between the Kurus and the Pandavas supported by the Srinjayas. Arrows, javelins, swords, maces and battle-axes fly and fall thickly and chariot-warriors, horses, elephants and foot-soldiers die in their hundreds. Kurukshetra takes on the aspect of the sky where fierce winds billow from all sides, and masses of clouds charged with lightning peal with incessant thunder. Kritavarman of the Bhojas shoots down the huge elephants, rathikas, innumerable foot-soldiers, horsemen and Satanika's horse. Aswatthaman also kills three hulking elephants carrying all kinds of weapons, ridden by masterly warriors, and adorned with lofty standards, and they fall like cliffs riven by thunder.

The third brother of the Kulinda chief bloodies Duryodhana with a sear of arrows through his chest, but your son strikes back at him and his elephant with a plethora of whetted shafts. The elephant with the prince on his back falls with blood leaking from every part of his body, like a mountain of red chalk with red streams running down its breast, split by thunder in the monsoon. The Kulinda prince saves himself in the nick of time, and mounting another elephant, battles the king of the Krathas who fights from his chariot. Both are struck deep and while the prince with his elephant falls like a thunderstruck hill, the king struck by the prince's arrows shot from the back of his elephant, falls with his shattered ratha, like a mighty tree uprooted by a tempest.

The Kaurava warrior Vrika deeply wounds that mountain prince from the Himavat as he fights from his elephant. However, his great beast quickly crushes Vrika underfoot, his chariot and horses and impetuously attacks Babhru's son, the prince of the Magadhas, who already wounded, collapses. The Kulinda prince, on his magnificent fighting elephant, attacks Sakuni until the king of the Gandharas cuts his head off.

About this time, Satanika drills elephants, horses and chariot-warriors, and large bands of foot soldiers with a dazzle of arrows, and they fall paralysed and broken like serpents beaten by a storm stirred by Garuda's wings. Then a Kulinda warrior from the Kaurava army shoots Nakula's son Satanika with a score of shafts but Satanika beheads him.

Vrishasena pierces Satanika, Arjuna and Bhima, Nakula and Janardana with iron quarrels. Seeing his superhuman effort, the Kauravas are filled with joy and applaud him while those conversant with Dhananjaya's prowess regard Vrishasena as a libation already poured on the fire of war. The Kiritin, seeing Nakula deprived of his horses and Janardana slashed with arrows, attacks Vrishasena who stands in front of Karna. Karna's son gashes Partha with an arrow and gives a loud shout of triumph as Namuchi did in the olden days after having wounded Indra. He finds Partha and Krishna repeatedly with his formidable arrows.

An annoyed Arjuna decides to put an end to the brilliant prince. His brow furrowed and eyes red in wrath, that Pravira, who could kill Yama himself if the latter stood against him, laughs terribly and says to Karna and all the other Kaurava heroes fighting under Duryodhana and Aswatthaman, "Today, O Karna, in your very presence, I will despatch the fierce Vrishasena to Yamaloka! Everyone knows that all of you together slew my son, when he was alone in his chariot. I, however, will kill your son before all of you. Let all the Kaurava maharathas protect him if they can.

And after that, I, Arjuna, will kill you, Karna, O fool! You are the root of this enmity and this war and you have become proud as a result of Duryodhana's patronage. I will kill you and Bhimasena will kill this wretch among men, this Duryodhana, through whose evil rule this battle born of a game of dice germinated."

Arjuna strums the string of his bow, takes aim at Vrishasena, and with awful force, O Rajan, looses ten arrows that pierce Vrishasena through all his vital organs. With four razor-headed arrows he breaks his bow, cuts away his two arms and his head, dropping him onto the ground from his chariot like a flowering sala tree falling from a mountain summit. Seeing his son die, a wild and inconsolable Karna rushes up on his chariot against Partha, wanting instant revenge.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The unassailable Karna, whom even the Devas cannot match, charges at Krishna and Arjuna with a deep roar like the surging sea. Krishna says, "Here comes Karna to fight you, Dhananjaya, with his sarathy Salya driving his chariot that looks like a Deva-ratha, harnessed to white horses, streaming with banners and festooned with rows of bells. Look at his battle flag with the device of the elephant's rope that is like Indra's bow which divides the firmament with a rainbow. He comes shooting showers of arrows like the clouds pouring torrents of rain. He comes to win the war for Duryodhana.

There the king of the Madras, the royal Salya, standing at the head of his chariot, guides his horses of immeasurable energy. Hear the roll of their drums and the fierce blast of their conches. Hear, O son of Pandu, the shouts and roars that come from every side and the terrifying twang of Karna's bow, the Vijaya stretched with such force that it drowns every other sound. Look, the mighty chariot-warriors of the Panchalas with their followers give way before him, escaping like a herd of deer at the sight of an angry lion.

You must kill the Suta's son for no one else can withstand his shafts. I know that you can subdue the three worlds with all their mobile and immobile creatures including the very Devas and Gandharvas. What can be said about battling the great Isana Mahadeva, the three-eyed Sarva Kapardin? However, you pleased that god of gods himself in battle: Siva, that Deva called Sthanu, who is the source of bliss for all beings. All the other Devas have also given you their blessings, through the grace of that Devadeva, the Deity armed with the trident.

Slay Karna today, like Indra killing the Asura Namuchi. Let prosperity ever be with you, O Partha, and may you find victory in battle."

Arjuna says, "My victory, O Krishna, is already assured, for you, O Madhusudana, who are the master of all the worlds, are pleased with me. Urge the horses forward, Hrishikesha! Today I will not return from battle without slaying Karna. You will see him killed, cut to pieces with my arrows, or you will see me, Govinda, killed by Karna. The battle that will transfix the three worlds is at hand and as long as the earth exists, men will speak of it."

Saying this to the indefatigable Krishna, Arjuna moves against Karna like an elephant against a rival. Once more he says to Krishna, "Urge the horses, O Hrishikesha, for time flies!"

Kesava wishes him victory, gives free rein to the horses, fleet as thought, and in moments they are face to face with Karna.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Burning with rage at Vrishasena's death, his eyes the colour of copper and shedding tears of grief, Karna prepares to face Dhananjaya, having challenged him to battle. The two chariots yoked to white horses, shining with solar effulgence and covered with tiger-skins, when they come together, look like two suns in the sky. All that watch are wonderstruck when they look at these two warriors who resemble Indra and Virochana's son Bali, as they prepare for the battle for the conquest of the three worlds. All look on in awe as the two maharathas flare at each other with rumbling chariot-wheels, the twang of their bows, the sound of their palms, the whizz of arrows, and loud roars, their battle flags, Karna's bearing the elephant's rope and Partha's the kapi-dhvaja, flying in the wind.

Seeing them, O Bhaarata, all the kings shout aloud and repeatedly cheer them while thousands of warriors slap their armpits and wave their garments in the air. The Kauravas beat their drums and blow their numberless conches to encourage Karna, while the field also resounds with the blare of Pandava trumpets and conches in support of Dhananjaya. The resultant tumult and uproar are deafening, unbearable.

The two Naravyaghras and Atirathas, standing on their chariots, are an awesome sight. They are very alike, exceedingly handsome and are both armed with formidable bows that seem to flash like lightning, fine quivers stocked with arrows, spears and a wealth of astras, and fly a lofty standard each. Both wear armour with swords hanging from their belts; their horses shine dazzling white and both blow on superb conches. Both are great warriors and while one has Krishna for his sarathy, the other has Salya. Both wear garlands of gold, have yak-tails chamaras and white chattras. With their magnificent limbs smeared with red sandalwood paste and their bulging red eyes, they are like infuriated bulls. Both are broad necked like the lion, broad chested, with long arms, and powerful past telling. Each wants to kill the other and they challenge each other, O Rajan, like humped bulls in a cow-pen, like infuriated elephants over a female, like angry mountains, like infant serpents of virulent poison or the all destroying Yama. Full of fury for each other like Indra and Vritra, they are like the sun and the moon in splendour.

Born of celestial fathers, they resemble Devas in beauty and tejas. Full of wrath, they are like two mighty planets sprung up for the destruction of the world at the pralaya at yuga's end. Indeed, they look like the sun and the moon arisen of their own accord on the field of battle. Both powerful warriors glory in their own might as they ready for war.

The troops, O Rajan, filled with great joy at the imminent duel between the two Naravyaghras, Karna and Arjuna, avidly speculate who will be victorious. Both bear every weapon, both are seasoned warriors, both have conquered the world once and they resemble the Asura Sambara and the Deva Indra. They are equal to Dasaratha's son Rama in battle, Vishnu in splendour and Bhava in fathomless might. The bands of Siddhas and Charanas who come to witness the battle look down from their vimanas and are amazed.

The Dhartarashtras support the noble Karna, while the Pandavas under Dhrishtadyumna support Arjuna and thus the two armies cease their fighting and become anxious, rooted spectators. For Karna and Arjuna, like two mighty comets of awesome appearance, either victory or defeat is certain as they face each other in this momentous duel to the death.

Then, O Bharatarishabha, differences and disputes arise in the firmament, among the unearthly beings gathered there, over Karna and Arjuna. All the men and creatures of this world, and all the Devas, Danavas, Gandharvas, Pisachas, Nagas and the Rakshasas, adopt different sides. The sky with all the stars is anxious on Karna's account, while the wide earth worries about Partha, like a mother for her son.

The rivers, the seas, the mountains, the trees, the deciduous plants and herbs take the part of the Kiritin Arjuna, while the Asuras, Yatudhanas, the Guhyakas, the ravens and other birds of the sky are with Karna.

All the gems, precious jewels, the four Vedas and the Puranas, the Upavedas, the Upanishads, with all their mysteries and compilations, Vasuki, Chitrasena, Takshaka and Upatakshaka, all the mountains, all the offspring of Kadru with their children, all the great poisonous serpents, and the Nagas take Arjuna's side as do Airavata and his children, the offspring of Surabhi and Vaisali, and the Bhogins.

The smaller serpents all side with Karna.

Wolves, wild stags and all kinds of auspicious animals and birds wish victory for Arjuna as do the Vasus, the Maruts, the Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Viswedevas, the Ashwinis, and Agni, Indra, Soma, Pavana and the ten directions of the sky.

All the Adityas, the Vaishyas, the Sudras, the Sutas, and those of mixed castes, all favour Karna. The Devas, with the Pitris, and all who are numbered with them and their followers, Yama, Vaisravana and Varuna are with Arjuna as are the Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas, the Yagnas, and Dakshinas. The Pretas and Pishacas, most carnivores and birds of prey, the Rakshasas with all the monsters of the sea, the wild dogs and the jackals are for Karna.

The different tribes of Devarishis, Rishis and Rajarishis are for the son of Pandu as are the Gandharvas led by Tumburu.

With the offspring of Pradha and Mauni, the several kinds of Gandharvas, Apsaras, and many wise Rishis, riding on wolves, stags, elephants, horses, chariots, clouds, the wind, and on foot come there to witness the duel between Karna and Arjuna. The Devas, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, the Yakshas, the Pakshis, the great Maharishis versed in the Vedas, the Pitris that subsist upon dakshina called svadha, Tapasya, the Vigyanas and the Divyausadha come, O Rajan, and take up stations in the sky, making a great noise.

Brahman, with the Dvijas, Maharishis, and the Lords of creatures, and Bhava himself on his chariot, appears in that part of the sky. Seeing the two noble ones, Karna and Dhananjaya, about to fight, Indra himself says, "Let Arjuna vanquish Karna."

Surya Deva, however, says, "Let my son Karna slay Arjuna, and emerge victorious in this battle!" while Vasava says again, "Let my son triumph over Karna!"

Thus, Surya Deva and Indra, the two foremost of the Devas, who are present, adopt opposing views and dispute with each other.

The Devas and the Asuras adopt opposite sides and the three worlds with the Devarishis, the Devas and all other beings, tremble at the sight both above and below. The Devas favour Partha, while the Asuras prefer Karna. All beings are committed and involved in what the result of the duel will be, all without exception siding with either the Kuru or the Pandava hero.

The gods urge Brahman, the Self-born Lord of Creation, who is also present, and say, "O Deva, let these two lions among men have equal success. Let not the vast universe be destroyed by this encounter between Karna and Arjuna. O Svayambhu, say that these two will meet with equal success."

Indra Maghavat bows to the Grandsire and says, "You once said that the two Krishnas will always triumph. Let it now be as you then said. Be pleased with me, O Holy One!"

At this, Brahma and Rudra say to the king of the Devas, "The victory of the noble Vijaya, of the ambidextrous Savyasachi is certain. He gratified Agni in the forest of Khandava and he came to swarga and rendered assistance to you, O Sakra. Karna is on the side of the Danavas and it is appropriate that he should meet with defeat and satisfy the intentions of the Devas.

O lord of the Devas, one's own svadharma must always be important. The noble Phalguna, who is devoted to truth and dharma, will always be victorious. He who has pleased the Holy God with the Bull for his mount, he who has Vishnu, Lord of the universe, for his sarathy—how will he not be victorious?

Partha is a mahatejasvin warrior, a master of arms and has accumulated great punya. He is a master of the entire science of weaponry. Indeed, he possesses every accomplishment. He will be victorious, and that will accomplish the purposes of the Devas. Because of his greatness, Partha can go against destiny itself, favourable or unfavourable, and when he does so, a great destruction of beings takes place. When the two Krishnas are angry, they show little regard for anything. These two are Nara and Narayana, the two ancient and best of Rishis, the Creators of all that is real and unreal, and there is no one to rule over them.

They are perfectly fearless, destroyers of all enemies and rulers over all. In swarga or among Manavas, there is no one equal to either of them. The three worlds with the Devarishis and the Charanas support them. All the Devas and, indeed, all beings follow them. The entire universe exists because of the power of these two.

Let Karna, that Bharatarishabha, obtain the greatest of the regions of bliss here. Let him have identity with the Vasus or the Maruts. Let him, with Drona and Bhishma, be worshipped in swarga, for Vikartana's son is brave and is a peerless shura. Let victory, however, belong to the two Krishnas."

After Brahma and Isana, the greatest of the Devas speak, Indra, deity of a thousand eyes, with reverence to their words, salutes all beings and says, "You have heard what the two Devas have said for the benefit of the universe. What they say will come to pass, so remain calm, remain tranquil."

When they hear these words of Indra, O Rajan, all beings, high and low, are filled with wonder and applaud that Deva. The Devas then shower down diverse kinds of fragrant flowers from the sky and blow their trumpets, and they wait along with the Danavas and the Gandharvas to witness the incomparable duel on Kurukshetra between those two lions among men.

Many maharathas draw near Vasudeva and Arjuna, as well as Salya and Karna, and sound their conches. And then the dreadful battle begins, as they challenge each other like Sakra and Sambara. Their bright flags flutter on their chariots, like the planets Rahu and Ketu in the firmament at the time of the pralaya at yuga's end. The elephant's rope on Karna's banner looks like a great serpent and, embroidered with jewels and resonant gemstones, is extraordinary and resembles the bow of Indra. Partha's kapi-dhvaja with Hanuman's jaws agape is terrifying to look at, like the sun showing his formidable teeth.

The impetuous Vanara, impatient for battle, flies out from his banner, and falls upon Karna's standard and attacks it with teeth and nails, like Garuda pouncing on a serpent. The elephant's rope, decorated with rows of little bells, hard as iron, and which resembles Yama danda or Varuna's paasa, angrily closes with the Vanara and, as predicted during the game of dice, their standards first duel and the horses neigh furiously at each other. The lotus-eyed Krishna and Salya shoot keen glares at each other, with Salya turning his gaze away first; and so it is with Karna, too, as he locks gazes with Arjuna and is the first to avert his eyes.

Then the Suta's son smilingly says to Salya, "If Partha kills me in battle today, tell me truly, friend, what will you do after that?"

Salya says, "If, O Karna, Swetavahana kills you in battle today, I myself, on a single chariot, will kill both Madhava and Phalguna."

Arjuna asks Krishna the same question, but Krishna replies with an inscrutable smile, "The Sun may fall down from his place, the Earth may split into a thousand pieces; Fire may become cold, but Karna will not be able to kill you, O Dhananjaya! And if this impossible thing were to happen, know then that the destruction of the universe is at hand. As for myself, I will tear both Karna and Salya to shreds with my bare hands."

Arjuna smiles at the tireless Krishna, saying, "Salya and Karna, united together, are not a match for me alone, O Janardana! You will see me cut Karna with his proud standard and banners to pieces, along with Salya and his chariot, horses, parasol, armour, spears, shafts and bow, like a tusker trampling a sapling into dust in the forest. Today will see Karna's wives widowed and indeed they must have seen signs of the coming evil in their dreams last night! I cannot restrain my wrath when I remember how this vain fool of little foresight laughed at us and abused us repeatedly in the vilest way when he saw Panchali dragged into the Kuru sabha.

Today, O Govinda, you will see me crush Karna like an infuriated elephant does a tree with its load of flowers. Today, O Madhusudana, you will hear these sweet words after Karna's fall: 'Destiny, O you of Vrishni's race, has decreed victory for you!'

You will comfort Abhimanyu's mother today with a lighter heart for having avenged yourself on the enemy. Today you will joyously comfort your aunt Kunti. Today you will, O Madhava, comfort Draupadi of the tearful face and Dharmaraja Yudhishtira with words sweet as nectar.""

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, the sky, filled with Devas, Nagas, Asuras, Siddhas, Yakshas and with large bands of Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Asuras, Maharishis, Rajarishis, Gauda of bright plumage, assumes a wonderful aspect. All men on the battlefield see the wonderful Devas congregate in the sky, which resounds with the sound of musical instruments, song, adulatory hymns, laughter, dance and various other enchanting sights and sounds.

Then the carnage begins, as both the Kaurava and the Pandava warriors, filled with exhilaration, wade into each other and the battlefield resounds with the sound of trumpets, drums, the blare of conches and loud roars. The ground is soon heaped with lifeless bodies crimson with gore, and looks quite stunning as men, horses, elephants, chariots and weapons, fall to maces, swords, javelins and rapiers. The battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas resembles the one between the Devas and the Asuras, of long ago.

Dhananjaya and Karna, their superb armour shimmering, shroud the ten points of the sky and the army opposing them with storms of arrows. Darkness falls on the field, and neither your warriors nor the enemy can any longer see anything. From fear, all the warriors seek the protection of either Karna or Arjuna like rays of light spread out in the sky converging towards either the sun or the moon. The two Atirathas negate each other's astras, like the east and the west winds blowing into each other, and dazzle like the sun and moon to disperse the darkness caused by the arrow clouds that cover the sky.

They exhort their troops not to flee and the warriors of both armies stand their ground, encircling those two awesome warriors, like the Devas and the Asuras standing around Vasava and Sambara. The men encourage the two heroes with loud shouts, with the sounds of drums and other instruments, like thundering clouds greeting Surya and Chandra. The two armies are the haloes around the sun or the moon.

Arjuna and Karna draw their great bows into complete circles and shoot thousands of arrows like the rays of the two unendurable suns that rise at pralaya at the end of the yuga to destroy the entire universe with its all mobile and unmoving creatures.

Both are invincible, both are redoubtable and both are eager to show their skill and finish the other. Karna and Arjuna close fearlessly with each other, like Indra and Jambhasura. Invoking the mightiest of astras, the two formidable archers slay countless men, horses and elephants, while striking each other at the same time. O Rajan! The troops of both the Kurus and the Pandavas flee like animals in the forest when a lion sets upon them. Then the five maharathas Duryodhana, Kritavarman, Sakuni, Kripa and Aswatthaman the son of Sharadvata's daughter pierce Dhananjaya and Kesava with scathing, accurate shafts. Arjuna destroys all their bows, quivers, horses, elephants, and their chariots with their charioteers, gashes every one of them with perfect arrows, and strikes Karna with a dozen.

A hundred chariots, a hundred elephants, and a number of Saka, Tukhara and Yavana horsemen, and some of the foremost Kamboja warriors launch a murderous attack on Arjuna; he, in a blur, strikes down his attackers along with their horses, elephants and chariots. This evokes applause from the sky as the Devas blow their trumpets and sing praises of Arjuna. Gentle breezes waft down showers of unearthly blooms, fragrant and auspicious on Arjuna's head. All witnesses of that encounter, Devas, Manavas and, indeed, all beings, are awestruck.

Only Arjuna and Karna feel neither pain nor wonder. Then Aswatthaman, suddenly seizing Duryodhana's hand, says, "Be satisfied, O Duryodhana! Make peace with the Pandavas. There is no need to fight on. Shame on war! The Acharya, a master of the mightiest of astras and like Brahma himself, is dead. My uncle Kripa and I are chiranjivis but other great warriors like Bhishma have also fallen. Rule the kingdom forever, sharing it with the sons of Pandu. I can persuade Dhananjaya and Janardana to stop the war. Yudhishtira is always concerned about the welfare of all and Vrikodara and the twins will obey him. Peace between you and the Pandavas will benefit everybody. Let the kings who are still alive go back to their homes and let the troops leave in peace.

If you do not listen to me, Duryodhana, you will only suffer further grief in this war. You and the universe have seen what Arjuna of the diadem and garlands can achieve. Neither Indra, Yama, Prachetas, Kubera or the Yakshas can match him. And if you consider Dhananjaya's punya, it is much greater than his prowess. He will never differ with me and he will always agree with you. Be gratified, O Suyodhana, for the benefit of all the universe. You have always honoured me and I, too, bear a great friendship for you. This is why I say what I do to you now.

I will dissuade Karna from fighting, provided you want peace. Discerning persons say that there are four kinds of friends—those who are naturally so, those who are made through conciliation, those who become friends through wealth, and lastly those who are made by subjugation and the exercise of power. You possess all these elements with regard to the Pandavas and they are your cousins and natural friends. Acquire them again as firm friends through conciliation. If they agree to befriend you, I suggest, O Maharajan, that you do what I say."

Duryodhana reflects for a while and, then drawing a deep breath, says sadly, "It is as you have said, O my dear friend. But what the evil-hearted Vrikodara said after killing Dusasana still burns in my heart. You also heard him, so how can there be peace? Arjuna will not be able to quell Karna in battle, even as a tempest that is weakened when it meets the mighty mountains of Meru. Further, the sons of Pritha have little trust in me thinking of my many hostile deeds towards them. Nor, O Aswatthaman, should you now tell me, 'Let Karna abandon the war!' Arjuna is exhausted today and Karna will soon slay him."

Your son turns to his own troops, and says, "Why do you stand here like spectators? Go, attack your enemies and butcher them!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'And when the blare of conches and the peal of drums are deafening, Karna and Arjuna meet each other in battle, O king, all because of your son's evil heart. Like two infuriated Himalayan elephants, with full-grown tusks, fighting each other for the sake of a she-elephant in season, like a mass of clouds encountering another, those two warriors, both unleashing torrents of arrows, fight, their bows twanging loudly, the wheels of their chariots rumbling and clattering like thunder and lighting. They duel like two mountains, both with lofty cliffs and abounding with trees, creepers, herbs and both teeming with wild beasts that are native to them, moving ever towards each other for fiercer fight.

The duel swells like the one between Indra and Bali in days gone by. No one else can endure what the two shuras, their charioteers and animals suffer as they are wounded and spray blood from all over. Like two lakes full of varied kinds of lotuses, fish and tortoises, and echoing with the sound of different birds that the wind stirs when they approach each other, the chariots of the two warriors advance with fluttering banners. Both resemble the great and powerful Indra, and they strike each other with arrows that resemble his Vajra, and the battle is like the one between that Deva and the Asura Vritra.

Both the armies on the field in their full regalia and those looking down from the sky quake with fear to witness the contention between Arjuna and Karna. Others among the spectators, filled with joy, utter loud shouts, raise their arms, waving their hands or pieces of cloth, when Arjuna charges Karna, like one elephant rushing at another.

The Somakas shout, "Be quick, O Arjuna! Cut off his head and, with that, kill Duryodhana's last hope for the kingdom."

Similarly, many of our warriors cry to Karna, "Fly, fly, O Karna, and kill Arjuna with your inexorable arrows. And then banish the sons of Pritha to the forests forever."

Karna strikes Partha with ten mighty shafts and Arjuna retaliates with ten long shafts that plunge deep into Karna's body. They mangle each other with arrows past count, all the while wary and keened to catch the least lapse in the other.

Rubbing the string of the Gandiva, Arjuna launches showers of cloth-yard shafts, nalikas and arrows with heads like boar's ears and razors, anjalikas, and crescent-tipped arrows at Karna. These spread across the sky and, falling in a storm, riddle Karna's chariot like flights of birds dropping into a tree at dusk with lowered heads, to roost for the night. But, O Rajan, all those showers of arrows that Arjuna, with furrowed brow and angry glances, looses at Karna, the Sutaputra easily destroys with his own tremendous volleys.

The son of Indra then shoots a fiery Agneyastra, which covers earth and sky with its blazing lustre, and the very course of the sun, as it spumes up and falls in blinding incandescence. The robes of all the warriors and soldiers take fire and they scatter. We hear loud crackling, as if a forest of bamboos is on fire. Karna invokes a Varunastra to quench it. In a trice, an uncanny cloud envelops Kurukshetra in unnatural darkness. The cloud, whose extremities look like mountains, spreads out on every side and pouring down a deluge of water, floods the earth and puts out Arjuna's conflagration. Nothing but darkness prevails.

Arjuna unleashes a Vayavyastra, which disperses the clouds of Karna's Varunastra. The indomitable Dhananjaya invokes an Aindrastra, which is like the Vajra in energy and ferocity. Immediately, razor-headed arrows, anjalikas, crescent-tipped shafts, nalikas, cloth-yard shafts and arrows with heads like the boar's ear, issue in tide from the Gandiva, in thousands, with the force of thunder. Fletched with vulture's feathers, these shafts strike limbs, horses, bows, yokes, wheels, and Karna's standard, piercing all like serpents frightened by Garuda burrowing into the earth.

Struck all over and bathed in blood, the noble Karna, his eyes rolling in anger, bends his bow and, with a twang as loud as the roar of the sea, launches the Bhargavastra, which extinguishes Partha's showers of shafts from his Aindrastra. After he puts down Partha's astra, Karna destroys chariots, elephants, foot-soldiers and many great warriors of the Pandava army with immaculate and fierce arrows. The stricken Panchalas and the Somakas, O Rajan, unite and assail the Suta's son with keen barbs from every side. Karna cuts all these down, and ravages the Panchala warriors, elephants and the horses, killing many.

As he routs his opponents, Karna is irradiant as a god, like a golden cloud lashing down torrents of deadly rain. Your warriors see the true valour of mighty Karna, and believe that he has vanquished the two Krishnas; they clap loudly and break into loud shouts of victory.

Seeing Karna foil Dhananjaya's astra, Bhima, the choleric son of Vayu, his eyes blazing, wrings his hands in rage and, drawing deep breaths, says, "How, O Jishnu, can this wretched Sutaputra, fallen from dharma, kill so many great Panchala warriors, in your sight? Till now the very gods or the Kalakeyas could not conquer you. Sthanu himself blessed you. How could this Suta's son pierce you with ten shafts that common rathikas use? It is amazing how he frustrates your astras.

Remember the suffering of Panchali, and the vile abuse that this evil son of a Suta heaped on us, when he called us, 'Sesame seeds without kernels!'

Remember all that, O Savyasachi, and swiftly dispatch the wretched Karna. Why are you so tame and indifferent, Arjuna? Use that same prowess with which you vanquished all the creatures and fed Agni at Khandava, to kill this wretch. And I, too, will use my mace to crush him."

Krishna adds to this, "How is it, Kiritin, that Karna succeeds in negating your astras? Don't you see the Kauravas standing behind Karna rejoice even now and shout for joy seeing you fail? Use that devotion with which, yuga after yuga, you have destroyed those who use darkness for their weapons, as well as Kshatriyas, and Asuras born of pride, to kill Karna today. Use my Sudarsana chakra, keen as a razor, to strike off his head, as Sakra did the head of Namuchi with his Vajra. Summon your dhyana, which once so pleased Mahadeva disguised as a hunter, O Shura, and slay the Sutaputra with all his followers.

After killing Karna, bestow the earth and all her seas, towns, villages and wealth, free from all enemies, upon Yudhishtira Dharmaraja. Through that deed, O Partha, you will also win unrivalled and eternal fame."

Thus exhorted by Bhima and Krishna, Arjuna recalls everything that he, his brothers and the precious Draupadi had suffered, and remembers the very reason for which he had come into this world. He says to Krishna, "With your leave, as well as of Brahma, Bhava, and of all those who are Brahmavadis, I will now invoke a great astra for the good of the world and kill the Suta's son."

Arjuna bows to Brahma and raises the irresistible Brahmastra which he can invoke with his mind and looses it at Karna. Karna quite effortlessly renders that awesome weapon impotent and continues to lash arrows and many fires over Arjuna. An angry Bhima blazes with wrath and asks Arjuna, "Men say that you are a master of the Brahmastra, which inexorably consumes all enemies. But you, O my brother, seem to use another weapon with the same name."

Arjuna releases a second Brahmastra from the Gandiva, which envelops everything around, above and below with arrows that are like fire serpents and blaze like the sun's rays. From this astra, issue hundreds of arrows with golden wings with the effulgence of the yuga fire, as well as battle-axes, chakras and cloth-yard shafts in thousands, killing enemy warriors all around. The severed heads of some fall naked on the field, spouting blood at their necks and terrifying their comrades. The Kiritin wounds, maims and kills the warriors of Duryodhana's army at will with his death-dealing shafts that spew from his second Brahmastra.

Karna responds with thousands of arrows that fall upon the son of Pandu in torrents. Karna finds Bhimasena, Krishna and Arjuna, each with three terrible shafts and lets out an echoing roar of triumph. Arjuna cannot bear to see Karna's arrows gash Bhima and Krishna, and shoots eight and ten arrows in a flash at the Sutaputra. Piercing Karna's beautiful standard with one, he strikes Salya with four and Karna himself with three. With ten other elegant shafts he cuts away the Kaurava warrior Sabhapati's arms and head, kills his horses, charioteer, rives his bow and standard, and fells him, clad in golden armour, from his chariot like a sala tree cut down with an axe.

He once more rakes Karna with a dense volleys of arrows, and massacres four hundred elephants, eight thousand chariot-warriors, a thousand horses with their riders, and another eight thousand foot-soldiers. Partha envelops Karna, his sarathy, chariot, horses and standard in a cloud of arrows. The Kauravas cry out for help, pleading, “O Karna, kill the son of Pandu quickly or he will annihilate us all!”

Karna unleashes a tornado of shining shafts, which spins countless Pandavas and Panchalas into Yamaloka. Thus, the two invincible warriors strike down their enemies and lacerate each other, with mighty astras.

His wounds treated with salves and mantras that expert apothecaries have applied, his golden armour strapped on again, Yudhishtira arrives to witness the duel between Arjuna and Karna. Seeing the Dharmaputra come like the full moon emerging in the sky from the jaws of Rahu, a surge of delight courses through the Pandava army. The onlookers, both terrestrial and celestial, stand motionless.

As the two shuras, Karna and Arjuna, lacerate each other with their fire shafts, the sounds of their bowstrings and striking palms is resounding and their flying arrows also make a deafening, incessant noise.

Suddenly, Arjuna’s bowstring, stretched with immense force, breaks with a loud report. Seizing the chance, Karna strikes Partha with a hundred small arrows, keen and steeped in oil, winged with bird feathers and like serpents freed from their sloughs. He finds Krishna with sixty shafts and then Phalguna again with eight more. He inundates Bhima with thousands of iron barbs, pierces Krishna, Arjuna’s standard, and fells many among the Somakas who follow Partha. However, he is swiftly shrouded in return with showers of straight shafts like masses of clouds hiding the sun.

Yet, the Suta’s son stuns the warriors who assail him with his unearthly prowess, cuts down all the astras they shoot at him, destroys their chariots, kills horses and elephants and many of their foremost warriors, like an angry lion a pack of dogs. The loss of lives among the Panchalas and the Kauravas at the hands of Karna and Dhananjaya is incredible, appalling. Your troops think that Karna has subdued the two Krishnas and victory is theirs and clap furiously, and shout aloud in celebration.

In the face of Karna’s attack, and furious at being struck by his assailant’s arrows, Arjuna strings his great bow in the twinkling of an eye and lays ardent siege to the Kauravas. He strums his bowstring, claps his hands and causes darkness to fall over Kurukshetra with another astra. He pierces Karna and Salya and all the Kurus. As the sky is now dark from the astra, the very birds are unable to fly through it and a fragrant wind blows. Laughing, Partha strikes Salya’s armour with ten arrows and then pierces Karna first with a dozen and again with seven shafts. The whistling winged arrows shot with untellable force from Partha's bow draw spouts of blood from Karna, as he stands magnificent on his ratha, his body bathed in blood, and resplendent like Rudra at the time of pralaya, sporting in the smasana, the burning ground, at noon or dusk.

Karna responds with three arrows which he plunges deep into Dhananjaya's body, then looses five more blazing golden arrows at Krishna, which pass through his armour and body like five serpents, enter the earth, bathe in the waters of the Bhogavati in the Patalas, and then fly back to Karna! Those shafts are in reality five mighty serpents that had chosen the side of Takshaka's son Aswasena, whose mother Arjuna had killed in the Khandava vana. With ten flat-headed arrows, shot with terrific force, Arjuna truncates each of the five serpents into three, and drops them dead on the earth.

Seeing Krishna wounded and bleeding from those serpents, Arjuna blazes up in fury like fire in a heap of dry grass. He blasts Karna through all his vital marmas with sizzling shafts shot from the new bowstring stretched to his ear. Karna trembles in pain, summons all his courage and is just able to stand upright. A belligerent Dhananjaya fills the sky with showers of arrows and soon the very splendour of the sun, and Karna's chariot, O Rajan, all become dim as if a thick forest enfolds them. Savyasachi, that Paraviraha, decimates two thousand Kuru warriors, with their chariots and horses, as well as the maharathas who protect Karna's chariot-wheels, his wings, his van and rear and those who constitute the very pick of Duryodhana's chariot-force.

Your sons and the Kauravas that are still alive flee, deserting Karna and abandoning their dying and wounded, and their wailing sons and sires. Finding himself alone and the field around him empty, Karna, far from becoming agitated, O Bhaarata, attacks Arjuna with renewed vigour and greater force.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The shattered divisions of the Kaurava army look on helpless from a distance as Arjuna's astra, swelling with energy, flies around like a bolt of lightning and consumes them. With showers of deadly astras winged with gold that he had from Parasurama, and which are as powerful as Atharvan rites, Karna blows Arjuna's astra apart and wounds him as well. The duel continues and they gash each other like two fierce elephants. Karna and Partha make the sky one vast expanse of arrows without any space in between and the sun is obscured. In the transcendent battle, which swings one way and then the other, each tries to probe the other's weakness; all the other warriors on Kurukshetra are riveted while those in the sky applaud both Karna and Arjuna.

Many shout words of encouragement like, "Excellent, O Karna!" and some cry, "Uttamam, O Arjuna!"

While the duel rages, the serpent Aswasena, who is hostile to Arjuna, has made his way up from patala to the surface of the earth. He had escaped the conflagration at Khandava, and dived down into darkling patala. The serpent had not forgotten that Arjuna killed his mother and he now rises from the nether world with great speed and, upon seeing the battle between Karna and Arjuna, thinks the time ripe to settle an old score. He darts into Karna's quiver and takes the form of an arrow.

Karna and Partha make the sky one dense mass of arrows, filling the Kauravas and the Somakas with fear for they cannot see anything. Finally, having exhausted themselves, those Naravyaghras, those two greatest archers in the world, stand still and gaze numbly at each other. Now many Apsaras in the sky then fan them with palm leaves and sprinkle fragrant sandal-water over them while Sakra and Surya, using their spectral hands, gently stroke their faces.

When he finds that he cannot prevail over Partha and that his wounds have weakened him terribly, Karna decides to use that lone shaft which lies enveloped in sandal dust in a golden quiver. He has saved the serpent-mouthed and fiery astra to kill Arjuna. He fixes that lethal shaft to his bowstring, and stretching it to his ear, unleashes it at Partha, aiming to behead him. All the surroundings and the sky seem to take apocalyptic flames as meteors and thunderbolts fall everywhere. When that serpent in the form of an arrow is fitted to the bowstring of the Vijaya, the Lokapalas, including Sakra, set up loud lamentations.

Karna does not know that the serpent Aswasena has entered his arrow using yogic power. Seeing Vaikartana aim that arrow, the noble ruler of the Madras says urgently, "This arrow, O Karna, will not succeed in striking off Arjuna's head. Look for another astra."

At this, the Sutaputra, with eyes burning with wrath, says, "O Salya, Karna never aims an arrow twice. Men like me are never crooked warriors.'

Taking careful aim, Karna shoots that arrow which he has cherished for long years, O Rajan, and cries to his rival, "You are dead, O Phalguna!"

Sped from Karna's majestic bow, the arrow, brilliant like the sun, leaves the string with a dreadful echo and burns a line across the sky as if to divide it, like a woman dividing the tresses on her head. Seeing that serpent in the form of an arrow blazing across in the sky, Krishna quickly and easily presses down with his feet and forces the chariot to sink about a cubit into the ground. At this, his horses, white as the rays of the moon and caparisoned in gold, buckle at their knees and prostrate on the earth. There is loud applause and shout from the sky for Vasudeva, and countless celestial voices are heard crying his praises and unearthly flowers shower down upon him.

For what Krishna does, the arrow which Karna had shot with such care merely knocks off Arjuna's coronet from his head, the kirita celebrated throughout the earth, the sky, the waters and the heavens. The Svayambhu himself had wrought that splendid diadem, bright as the sun, the moon, fire or a planet, and adorned it with gold, pearls, rubies, emeralds and diamonds. As priceless as it looks and is, it strikes terror into the hearts of enemies, makes its wearer content, and exudes a divine fragrance. Indra himself had given that ornament to his son when Arjuna went forth to fight the Kalakeyas in Devaloka.

That crown could not be broken by even the greatest among the Devas, not by Rudra, Varuna, Kubera, Yama's paasa, Indra's Vajra and even the most powerful astra of all. Yet, Karna now smashes it into pieces with his serpentine shaft. A great roar arises in all the worlds, O Bhaarata, as if a supernatural disturbance of the very elements has agitated the earth, the sky, the heavens and the waters. Hearing that tremendous noise, the strongest men reel where they stand. Bereft of his kirita, the dark and youthful Partha looks like a blue mountain with a soaring peak. Arjuna binds his locks with a white cloth, and stands perfectly unmoved, like the Udaya hill illumined by the rays of the rising sun.

The astra like fire that Karna shoots with Arjuna's deadly enemy, Aswasena the serpent, in it, breaks Partha's crown, flies back to Karna and asks to be launched once more at the Pandava.

Karna sees him but does not know him, and the serpent says, "You shot me, O Karna, without seeing me. That was the reason that I could not strike off Arjuna's head. Look at me well and quickly shoot me again. This time I will kill your enemy who is also mine."

Karna says, "Who are you that possess such a fierce form?"

Aswasena replies, "I am one whose mother Arjuna killed and for that he is my sworn enemy. If the Vajradhari himself protects Partha, I would still send him to Pitriloka, where Yama rules. Do not ignore me and I will slay your enemy. Do not hesitate, loose me at him once more."

Karna replies, "O Sarpa, Karna never relies on another's might for victory. Even if I have to kill a hundred Arjunas, I will still not shoot the same shaft twice. I will use my other astras and I will finish Partha. Be you content and go away."

Aswasena, that prince of serpents, is enraged, and assuming the form of an arrow, flies forth on his own to attempt to kill Partha, to fulfil the wish that has obsessed him for so long. Krishna says to Partha, "Slay that great Naga who bears you such hatred and enmity."

Arjuna asks, "Who is this serpent who flies at me, as if into the mouth of Garuda?"

Krishna replies, "While you were in the Khandava satisfying Agni's hunger, this serpent was in the sky, his body ensconced within his mother's. Thinking that it was only a single serpent, you killed the mother. He has never forgotten what you did, and comes to seek revenge today, O Shura, even like a meteor falling from the sky!"

In a blink, turning to face the serpent in the sky as it flies towards him, Arjuna kills Aswasena with six arrows and he falls in six writhing pieces onto the earth. After this, the Lord Krishna himself, O Rajan, raises the chariot out of the ground with his mighty arms.

Glancing obliquely at Dhananjaya, Karna strikes Krishna with ten whetted shafts fletched with peacock feathers. Arjuna strikes back from his bow drawn to his ear, first piercing Karna with a dozen arrows with tips like the boar's ear, and next with a cloth-yard shaft, virulent as a snake. The arrow pierces Karna's armour, drinks his blood and enters the earth, its wings drenched in scarlet. Provoked himself like a serpent prodded with a stick, Karna shoots a host of arrows that rake both Janardana and Arjuna, and lets out a triumphant roar.

However, the son of Pandu, whose is Indra's equal, pierces Karna with hundreds of arrows even as Indra had Balasura long ago. He shoots ninety arrows, each like the rod of Death at Karna, who is deeply wounded and trembles like a mountain split by thunder.

Dhananjaya knocks down Karna's helmet of pure gold, studded with costly gems and precious diamonds, as well as his earrings. Arjuna shatters his priceless and bright armour that many great armourers working for a long time had forged with great care. After stripping him of his armour, Partha strikes Karna with four powerfully shot arrows and inflicts such pain on him, which a man direly sick with diseases of bile, phlegm, wind and fever experiences. Never pausing, Arjuna pierces Karna's very vitals with many carefully aimed arrows shot with great force. Bleeding profusely from Partha's onslaught, Karna looks majestic, like a mountain of red chalk with streams of red liquid running down its breast.

Arjuna never stops but, standing like the son of Agni piercing the Krauncha Mountain, bloodies Karna's torso with scores of unerring iron shafts with wings of gold and each one like the Yama danda. Karna drops his bow and his quiver and, in unendurable agony, stands reeling and in great distress. Arjuna, always observant of Kshatriya dharma, does not want to take advantage when his enemy is in such distress, but Krishna says, "Why, O son of Pandu, are you so tardy? The truly wise never spare their enemies even for a moment, however weak they may be. He who is learned earns both punya and kirti when he kills his enemies, even when they are in distress.

Karna has always been your enemy and he is the greatest of warriors. If you do not kill him now, when he recovers, the Sutaputra will attack you with redoubled vigour and ferocity. So kill him now, as Indra did the Asura Namuchi."

Arjuna says, "So be it, O Krishna!" He salutes the Purushottaman Janardana, and drills Karna with several volleys. Partha covers Karna, his chariot and horses with calf-toothed arrows; putting forth all his prowess, he shrouds all the points of the sky with golden-winged barbs. Adhiratha's broad-chested son, with these arrows sticking out of his body, stands glorious like an asoka, a palasa or a salmali tree bowed down with its load of flowers, or like a mountain overgrown with a forest of sandalwood trees or flowering karnikaras.

Karna, too, now somewhat recovered, repeatedly shoots showers of arrows at Arjuna, and looks like the glorious sun coursing towards the Asta hills, his arrows like the sun's crimson rays. However, the stronger Arjuna's arrows destroy his shafts in the sky.

Karna recovers his self-assurance and finds Partha and Krishna with half a dozen arrows. Dhananjaya gets ready to unleash a mighty devastra, which burns like fire and flies with a sound that resembles the peal of Indra's Vajra. The hour of Karna's death has come and Kaala, Time, comes to him invisibly to warn him and reminds him of the Brahmana's curse, "The earth swallows your chariot-wheel!"

Indeed, O Purushottama, when death came, Karna forgets the mantra for the great Brahmastra that the illustrious Bhargava had given him, while the earth suddenly opens a deep cleft and traps his chariot's left wheel. Karna's chariot tilts steeply and is stuck in that spot like a sacred tree with its load of flowers standing upon an elevated platform. Seeing his chariot immobilised by the Brahmana's curse, and finding Parasurama's devastra inaccessible to him, and Partha burn up his awesome serpent-mouthed astra, Karna is filled with dejection.

He waves his arms in frustration, and begins to rail at dharma, “Men of dharma always claim that it protects those who follow its path and so we always endeavour, to the best of our ability and knowledge, to cleave to the truth. That very dharma now destroys us instead of protecting us who are devoted to it. Ah, dharma does not always protect its worshippers.”

Meanwhile Arjuna’s arrows rake him, his horses and charioteer, and Karna is frantic. The arrows crash into all his vital organs and he no longer cares what he does but repeatedly curses dharma. He then pierces Krishna in the arm with three arrows, and Partha, too, with seven. Arjuna responds and shoots seventeen thunderbolts, straight, fierce, splendid as Agni and deadly as Indra’s Vajra, which plummet right through Karna’s body into the earth. Trembling with shock, Karna now displays his awesome valour and, with a mighty effort, steadies himself and, remembering its mantra, invokes the Brahmastra.

Seeing the Brahmastra, Arjuna invokes the Aindrastra with the proper mantras, infusing the Gandiva, its string, and his arrows, also, with other mantras, he lets loose a solid swath of arrows even like Purandara pouring down rain in torrents. Those numberless arrows flare out of Partha’s chariot, but Karna destroys them before they reach his ratha.

Krishna says to Arjuna, “Use your astras, Partha! The son of Radha will confound your other shafts.”

Karna now fixes the Brahmastra to his string and shoots it, shrouding all the points of the sky with arrows, and striking Partha with many. Karna follows this up with a slew of searing shafts, and breaks Arjuna’s bowstring, eleven times in quick succession, while each time Arjuna tries to replace it. Karna, who can shoot a thousand arrows in a single moment, does not know that Partha’s bow has a hundred strings. So quickly does Arjuna replace each broken string that Karna could not mark when it was broken and when replaced.

Briefly, Karna appears to have the advantage as he dominates Arjuna with his astras. Seeing Karna begin to dominate Arjuna, Krishna says, “Use your greater astras before he kills you, Partha!”

At this, Arjuna invokes other greater devastras with their mantras. First he summons the astra that is hard like adamant, burns like fire, is as venomous as a serpent and unites the Raudrastra with it. At this very moment, O Rajan, the earth swallows one of the wheels of Karna’s ratha. Alighting quickly from his chariot, Karna seizes the sunken wheel with his massive arms and endeavours to lift it up with a great effort. Karna exerts immense strength, and the very earth, which has his wheel in her clasp, is raised up four fingers' breadth, with her seven islands and her hills and waters and forests.

Radheya sheds tears of anger, and says to Arjuna, "Partha, Partha, wait a moment until I free my sunken wheel. You see the left wheel of my chariot is stuck in the earth. Do not shoot at me now, for only cowards would do such a vile thing. Brave warriors who follow Kshatriya dharma never attack any opponent with dishevelled hair, those who have turned their faces from battle, a Brahmana, or one who folds his hands in supplication, one who yields himself up or begs for quarter, one who has put down his weapon, or whose arrows are exhausted, or whose armour is undone, or an enemy whose weapon has fallen down or been broken.

You are the bravest man in the world and a man of dharma, O Pandava! You well know the dharma for battle. So, Dhananjaya, allow me a moment to extricate my wheel from the ground. It is not just for you to attack me while you are on your ratha and I stand helpless on the ground. I have no fear that either Krishna or you, who are born into the Kshatriya varna and are a perpetuator of a noble race will forget the tenets of dharma. Give me a moment, O son of Pandu!"""

"Sanjaya says, 'But it is Krishna who responds to Karna in a terrible voice, "It is good fortune, indeed, O Radheya, that you remember dharma today! It is only when they themselves are in distress that those who do not live by dharma, complain about fate.

Suyodhana, Dusasana, Sakuni and you, Karna, were responsible for dragging Draupadi, clad in a single cloth, into the Kuru sabha. What happened on that day to the dharma you now speak of?

When in that ancient and noble court, Sakuni, an adept in dice, took everything he owned from Yudhishtira by cheating, where was this dharma of yours?

When prompted by you, Duryodhana served Bhimasena poisoned food and then tried to kill him by pushing him into a river full of venomous snakes, where was this great virtue of yours?

When the agreed period of exile in the woods was over, as well as the thirteenth year, you did not make over their kingdom to the Pandavas. Where was this dharma of yours then?

You plotted to set fire to the house of lac at Varanavrata in order to immolate Kunti and the sleeping Pandavas. Where then, Radheya, was the dharma you speak of today?

You laughed at Panchali when Dusasana hauled her by her hair into the Kuru sabha, and she stood there scantily clad and in shame because she was in her season. Where, O Karna, was this dharma of yours then?

When innocent Draupadi was dragged out from the women's apartments by the bestial Dusasana, you did not protest. Where, O son of Radha, had this dharma of yours gone then?

You addressed the princess Draupadi, whose gait is as dignified as that of the elephant, in shameful words. Karna, you said, "The Pandavas, O Krishnaa, are lost. They have sunk into eternal hell. You must choose another husband for yourself!" You looked on at that tragic, terrible scene with delight. Where then, O Karna, had your dharma gone?

Coveting their kingdom and relying on the king of the Gandharas, you enticed the Pandavas to an unequal game of dice. Where was your dharma then?

When so many maharathas surrounded Abhimanyu, who was a mere boy, and slew him brutally, where, Karna, was your dharma then?

If the dharma that you now speak of was not with you on those occasions, what is the use of prating about dharma now? You want that dharma be observed now, O Suta, but you will not escape alive. Like Nala, whom Pushkara vanquished at dice, but who regained his kingdom through skill, the Pandavas, who are free from deceit, will regain their kingdom through the strength of their arms, supported by all their friends. After they annihilate all their powerful enemies, they and the Somakas will have their kingdom back. The Dhartarashtras will meet with destruction at the hands of the sons of Pandu who are, indeed, always protected by dharma!"

Hearing this from Krishna, O Bhaarata, Karna hangs his head in shame and makes no reply. With lips white with anger, he raises his bow and continues to fight Arjuna with undimmed energy and skill.

Then Krishna says to Arjuna, "O Mahabaho, strike Karna with a devastra, and make an end to him."

Arjuna vividly remembers all the incidents that Krishna described and blazes up in rage so that flames seem to emanate from all the pores of his body. Seeing that uncanny sight, Karna invokes the Brahmastra and again inundates arrows upon Dhananjaya, while he tries again to extricate his chariot wheel from the rut that holds it so fast. Arjuna, also, responds with a Brahmastra and pours a cataract of arrows over Karna. He then shoots another favourite astra of his, the burning Agneya, at Karna, which the Sutaputra douses with a Varunastra; yet again, the clouds of the astra of the Lord cover Kurukshetra over in clouds and darkness falls over the field of death.

Arjuna scatters the clouds of the weapon of water with a Vayavyastra of the wind. Karna takes up an arrow of fire and, as he fixes that shaft to his bowstring, the earth shudders with all her mountains, waters and forests; violent sandstorms blow and the air is thick with blinding dust. Wails of lament, O Bhaarata, arise among the gods in the sky when they see the astra that Karna has set to his great bow and the Pandavas despair and prepare for greater sorrow. Karna looses the astra effulgent as Sakra's Vajra, and it ploughs right through Partha's chest like some mighty Naga going through an anthill.

The noble Arjuna reels on his ratha; he trembles like the prince of all mountains in an earthquake; his grasp on his bow is loosened and the Gandiva drops from his hand. Seeing his chance, Karna jumps down again from his chariot to try and draw out the wheel that is stuck so firmly in the ground. He seizes the wheel with both his mighty arms and attempts to lift it out; despite his godly strength, and as destiny would have it, he fails again.

Meanwhile, Arjuna recovers his senses and invokes an astra called the Anjalika, lethal as the rod of Death. Krishna says to Arjuna in a tone that will not be resisted, "Cut Karna's head from his body before he can free his chariot."

While Karna is still striving to free the stuck wheel, Arjuna shoots a razor-headed, shining arrow and cuts down Karna's standard bearing the device of a priceless elephant's rope, adorned with gold, pearls, rubies, emeralds and diamonds. That standard celebrated all over the world always boosted the morale of your troops and filled the enemy with fear. With that standard, falls the fame, pride, hope of victory, and everything else precious, as also the hearts of the Kurus, and cries of woe arise from the Kuru army. They, O Bhaarata, are convinced that Karna is as good as dead.

Partha now takes out the Anjalikastra from his quiver, astra brilliant as the disc of the sun. The unearthly weapon in the shape of an arrow measures three cubits and six feet in length. It is irresistible as Rakshasas are in the night, resembles the Pinaka or the Sudarshana Chakra, and is so devastating and vicious that not the Devas and Asuras can withstand it. Seeing the Anjalika in Partha's hand, the entire universe trembles and the greatest Rishis cry in alarm, "Peace be upon the universe!"

Arjuna affixes the astra to the Gandiva, unites it with another powerful astra and, drawing his bow into a circle, quickly prays, "If I have ever performed tapasya, gratified my elders and superiors, and listened to the counsels of my well-wishers, let this shaft destroy the body and heart of my enemy. Let that Truth and this weapon that I have worshipped slay my enemy Karna and take him into the presence of Yama."

Then Arjuna looses that great and shining arrow, effective as a rite prescribed in the Atharvan of Angiras, which even Yama cannot endure in battle, at Karna. The ayudha endowed with the energy of the sun causes all the points of the sky to blaze up with light. The Anjalikastra, made into an ineluctable weapon with mantras, flashes at Karna bent over his chariot wheel and strikes his head off like Indra striking off the head of Vritra with his Vajra. Karna's headless trunk and his head fall onto the earth like the bloody disc of the sun slipping from the Asta hills.

Indeed, that head abandons the magnificent body with great reluctance, like a householder leaving his commodious home filled with great wealth. His life fled, the tall and splendid body of Karna, with blood gushing from its every wound, spraying copiously from its severed throat, crumbles like the thunder-riven summit of a mountain of red chalk with crimson streams running down its sides after a heavy rain.

Then, O Rajan, the assembled armies witness a wonderful sight: from the fallen Karna's naked throat, a tremendous light shoots up through the sky into the sun.

Seeing Arjuna kill great Karna, the Pandavas erupt in celebration, loudly blowing their conches, and Krishna and Dhananjaya also embrace each other in joy. The Somakas, seeing Karna dead and lying headless on the field, utter rapturous shouts while the other troops of the Pandava army blow their trumpets and wave their arms and garments. They ecstatically applaud Partha, O Rajan, while others dance and embrace one another, and cheer deafeningly and they say with some fervour, "Through our good fortune, Karna is now stretched out on the earth, headless, and mangled by Arjuna's arrows."

Karna's severed head looks like a mountain top loosened in a tempest, a doused yagna fire, or like the sun after it has reached the Asta hills. The Karna-sun, with arrows for its rays, after it had scorched the hostile army, has at last set. Just as the setting sun takes away all his rays with him, Arjuna's astra beheaded Karna, taking his life breath with it. Karna dies, O

Rajan, at high noon of that day. The handsome Karna, with a face like a lotus of a thousand petals and whose feats were like those of the thousand-eyed Indra, lies on the battlefield like the thousand-rayed sun at the close of day.

Seeing Karna lying dead on the ground, pierced with arrows and bathed in blood, Salya, king of the Madras, drives his chariot away. After the fall of their peerless Senapati, the Kauravas, fear lancing through them, flee the battlefield, frequently casting their eyes at Arjuna's lofty and triumphal standard.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Salya drives Karna's chariot away after Karna's death. His eyes bathed in tears and sighing repeatedly, the very picture of despair, Duryodhana takes stock of his army, now deprived of Radheya, and sees how his troops have been denuded, with its chariots, horses and elephants. Wanting to look at heroic Karna bloodied and stretched out on the earth like the sun fallen from the skies, the warriors come there and stand surrounding that fallen pravira. Some show joy, some fear, some sorrow, some wonder, and some give themselves up to great grief, according to their natures. Others among the Kauravas, hearing that Dhananjaya has killed Karna, flee in fear like a herd of cows in panic at losing its dominant bull.

Bhima is celebrant and shakes the sky with his dreadful and tremendous shouts of joy; he slaps his armpits, jumps up and down, and dances, his antics further terrifying the Dhartarashtras. The Somakas and the Srinjayas loudly blow their conches and all the Kshatriyas who are with the Pandavas embrace one another in joy, knowing that the Sutaputra is dead.

It was after a dreadful duel that Arjuna was able to defeat Karna, like a lion overwhelming an elephant, and to accomplish his vow and to finally lay to rest his long enmity towards Karna.

A stunned Salya quickly reaches Duryodhana, and says with tears flowing down his face, "The elephant force, the cavalry, and the best of your chariot-warriors are dead and your host now looks like Yamaloka. Never before, O Bhaarata, has a battle been fought like the one between Karna and Arjuna today. Karna attacked the two Krishnas and the enemy forces powerfully, but fate favoured Partha today. It appears that Destiny is with the Pandavas and abandoning us, for many of our maharathas have died trying to gain victory for you. Great, brave kings who in energy, courage and might were equal to Kubera, Yama, Vasava or Varuna, and well-nigh immortal, have fallen trying to fulfil your aspirations. Do not grieve, O Bhaarata, for this is Destiny. Comfort yourself. Success cannot be always attained."

Duryodhana hears this and almost swoons; he sighs repeatedly as now, the hour of nemesis arrived, he reflects with a sorrowful heart on his own evil doings.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'What was the state of the Kuru and the Srinjaya armies on that awful day, as it fled from the battlefield, crushed and scorched after the duel on Kurukshetra between Karna and Arjuna?'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen, O Rajan, to the horrific carnage of men, elephants and horses in that battle. When Arjuna lets out a loud roar after Karna's fall, a great terror enters the hearts of your sons and there is no warrior in your army ready to rally your troops or to take charge of them. Karna, their refuge, slain, they are like merchants whose vessels have been wrecked upon the fathomless sea that they wish to cross. After the killing of the Suta's son, the Kauravas, terrified, lacerated, without a leader and desperately seeking protection, are like a herd of elephants chased by lions.

They flee like bulls with broken horns or serpents with broken fangs. Their leading warriors slain, their troops flung into confusion, bloodied and mangled, your sons flee in panic. Dropping their weapons and their armour undone, no longer knowing which way to run, and witless with fear, they flee blindly in all directions.

"It is me that Arjuna is after!" every Kaurava thinks and, then, turning white as ghosts in terror, many fall down even as they run. Maharathas try to escape, some on horses, some on chariots, some on elephants, and some on foot, and the resulting stampede tramples many men. After the fall of the Suta's son, your warriors are like men without protection in a forest full of wild predators and brigands, like elephants without riders and men without weapons.

Seeing his troops run in fear in their thousands from Bhimasena again on the rampage, Duryodhana cries wildly to his charioteer, "This Partha will not vanquish me with the bow. Slow my horses and stay behind the troops. If I fight from the rear of my army, the son of Kunti will not overwhelm me even as the ocean cannot breach the continent. I will kill Arjuna, Krishna, the proud Bhima and the rest of my enemies, and free myself from the debt I owe my Karna."

At this, his charioteer slows down his magnificent ratha. Then twenty-five foot-soldiers of your army, without chariots, cavalry and elephants, prepare to battle Bhimasena and Dhrishtadyumna, who surround them with the four kinds of forces and begin their ruthless onslaught. Some among them challenge the two Kshatriyas by name, and observing the laws of a dharma yuddha, and relying upon the might of his arms, Bhima gets down from his chariot and prepares to fight his enemies on foot. Taking up his massive golden mace, he bludgeons them like Maheswara Himself armed with his gada.

Reckless of their lives by now, the seasoned Kaurava foot-soldiers rush at Bhima on foot like insects towards a blazing fire, and perish like living beings on beholding the Great Destroyer. Like a tornado of his natural father the Wind, mighty Bhima single-handedly annihilates all those twenty-five thousand warriors and, dripping with their blood once more joins Dhrishtadyumna on his chariot.

Arjuna takes on the remnant of the Kaurava chariot-force, while the twin sons of Madri and Satyaki attack the Gandhara legion, slaughter his cavalry and elephants and then bear down on their king Sakuni. Meanwhile, Dhananjaya pulls like thunder on the bowstring of his celebrated Gandiva as he faces your remaining chariot-force. Seeing Partha on his chariot with white horses and Krishna for its sarathy, your troops run from him in terror. Equally do they flee, seeing Dhrishtadyumna with Bhimasena riding with him on his familiar and formidable chariot, whose lofty standard is made of the trunk of a kovidara.

After swiftly putting the king of the Gandharas to flight, Nakula, Sahadeva and Satyaki rejoin the main Pandava force. Chekitana, Sikhandi and the five sons of Draupadi, O Rajan, decimate your vast army, blow their conches and pursue your troops who are in full flight, like bulls chasing away defeated challengers. Arjuna is quick to attack the part of your chariot-force that still stands on the field, and shrouds them in a deadly cloud of arrows. The dust raised darkens the landscape, and nothing can any longer be seen and again your troops flee in abject terror.

When the Kuru army is thus being mowed down, Duryodhana comes rushing to their rescue and challenges all the Pandavas to battle, even as the Asura Bali in olden days challenging the Devas. A pitched battle breaks out with the Pandava warriors who unite to cover your fearless son with invective and missiles, but Duryodhana, alone and unsupported, and full of untold grief and rage at Karna's death, slaughters his enemies in their thousands.

He succeeds in rallying his troops, which have not fled too far and cries to them, "I do not see a place on earth where you can be safe from the Pandavas! What use is there then in fleeing like cowards? The Pandavas now have only a small force and the two Krishnas are sorely wounded. If all of us stand and fight, victory will surely be ours, but if we shamefully run, the Pandavas will pursue us and kill us all. It is better that we should die bravely in battle for that will lead to swarga. Fight by the Kshatriya's dharma. He that is dead knows no misery and enjoys eternal bliss thereafter.

Listen, all you Kshatriyas assembled here! When Yama the destroyer spares neither the brave nor the coward, who that knows Kshatriya dharma as we do, would be foolish enough not to fight? Would you place yourselves under the power of an angry enemy like Bhimasena? It is disgraceful for you to abandon the dharma of your ancestors. There is no greater sin for a Kshatriya than to turn his face away from battle. There is no more blessed path to heaven, O Kauravas, than the dharma of war. Slain in battle, you will find yourselves instantly in swarga, enjoying every felicity and bliss."

Even as your son delivers this inspiring speech, the savagely beset Kaurava warriors flee in all directions.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing your son attempt to rally the troops, Salya, with fear writ large on his face and his heart numb with grief, says to Duryodhana, "Look at this horrible battlefield, O Shura, strewn richly with dead men, horses and elephants, past all count. Dead elephants big as mountains, their vital organs pierced with cruel arrows, their armour and caparisons dislodged, lie like hills split by thunder, their bodies bathed in blood. Fallen horses, mangled with shafts, moaning and neighing in pain, vomit blood, some biting the earth and rolling their stark eyes. Elsewhere, the carnage is too awful to look at, with horsemen, rathikas and elephant-warriors fallen from their animals, dead or dying, lying immersed in the river of blood that flows, which is like the great Vaitarani in the domain of Yama.

The earth looks as if she is strewn with blazing planets fallen from the sky, or like the nocturnal firmament itself shining with planets of serene light. The shafts sped from the arms of Karna and Arjuna pierced elephants, horses and men and, quickly stilling their lives, entered the earth like serpents sliding into their holes with bent heads. Fine chariots shattered along with their warriors, weapons and proud standards, lie about piquantly, as if in bizarre sorrow. Spiked maces with golden bells, battle-axes, lances, heavy clubs, mallets, unsheathed swords and maces covered with cloth of gold, lie abandoned on the ground. Golden bows and arrows fitted with golden wings, bright naked swords of superb temper, aureate lances, scimitars, royal parasols, chamara fans, conches, bright caparisons of elephants, standards, chariot fences, heavy necklaces, brilliant crowns, and yak-tails lie scattered everywhere, O Rajan.

Garlands, luminous with corals and pearls, chaplets for the head, bracelets for both the wrist and the upper arms, collars for the neck with threads of gold, diverse kinds of priceless diamonds, rubies and pearls, bodies raised and cared for in great luxury, and heads handsome and lambent as the moon, also lie broken and severed across the grim field. Abandoning their bodies, their robes and all kinds of pleasures, along with the ability to enjoy them, acquiring great punya for the devotion they showed to the svadharma of their varna, the heroic Kshatriyas have gone in blazes of glory to the realms of bliss.

Turn back, O Duryodhana! Let the troops retire. O king, retreat towards our camp. Look, the sun hangs low in the sky. Ah, remember that you are the cause of all this brutal destruction!"

Salya, with his heart bursting with grief, chokes and cannot go on. Duryodhana, however, is a man who has lost his very mind from grief. Tears flow incessantly from his eyes, and his white lips utter only one name, over and over. Your son weeps for the Suta's son, crying, "Karna! Oh Karna!"

Aswatthaman and all the kings repeatedly try to comfort Duryodhana, and then they retire towards their camp, frequently looking back at the lofty standard of Arjuna that seems to be on fire with his fame. At that hour, when everything around looks so resplendent, the features of the Kauravas, all of whom have resolved to kill or die, are unrecognisable for the blood, still flowing and caked, covers them. They cannot see the earth, drenched and covered with a patina with blood flowing from the bodies of men, horses and elephants, so she looks like a courtesan attired in crimson robes and floral garlands and ornaments of gold, O Rajan! Filled with grief at the death of Karna, they all lament loudly, crying, "Alas, Karna! Alas, Karna!"

The sun turns crimson, sinking, and all of them return to their camp. Karna, though, lies dead on hallowed Kurukshetra, still shining like the sun at his zenith, his body pierced by gold-winged shafts dyed in blood, shot from the Gandiva. It seems as if illustrious Surya Deva, ever kindly to his worshippers, has lovingly touched the gore drenched body of his child, and left, crimson with grief, to the ocean for a bath. The throngs of Devas and Rishis, who came to witness the battle, entertain the same thought and leave for their respective homes. The crowd of other beings also return to their abodes both in swarga and bhumi. The Kuru warriors, too, having witnessed that duel without comparison between Arjuna and Karna, retire to their camp, filled with the rarest wonder and in their hearts applauding what they had seen.

Though slain in that duel, his armour gone, neither Karna's lustre nor magnificence abandon him, even in death. Everyone who sees his body feels that it looks like molten gold. He seems to be alive and radiant like fire or the sun. All the warriors, O king, are awestruck and frightened at the sight of Karna lying dead on the battlefield, like small animals at the sight of the great lion. Why, though dead, that Naravyaghra seems about to bellow out his commands; so little in him seems changed. His body clad in regal attire, and his severed head with its mighty neck, the Sutaputra's face resembles the full moon in majesty. Wearing ornaments and angadas made of bright gold, Vaikartana, though slain, lies like a gigantic tree, like a heap of pure gold, or like a blazing fire extinguished by the water of Partha's arrows. Arjuna's prowess stilled that Naravyaghra along with his sons, and he left the world, taking away with him his incomparable nobility, lustre and glory, which he had earned always in fair fight on earth.

He scorched the Pandavas and the Panchalas with the energy of his astras; his storms of incendiary arrows had burnt the enemy's divisions to ashes and, after heating the universe like the thousand-rayed Surya, Karna left the world, with his sons and followers. Thus died that shura who was a refuge to all that who came to him for help, like a kalpa vriksha is a haven to swarms of birds. He always said, "Take" but never, "I cannot give, for I have not."

All men of dharma always regarded him as one of their own. Such a warrior was Vrisha who fell in single combat with Arjuna Parantapa. All the wealth of that noble warrior had been dedicated to Brahmanas. There was nothing, not even his life that he would not give away to holy Brahmanas. He was always the favourite of his queens, exceptionally liberal, and a mighty Atiratha. Burnt by Partha's astras, he attained the highest end. He, relying upon whom your son had gone to war, has attained swarga, taking with him the last hope of victory, the happiness, and the sanctuary of the Kauravas.

When Karna falls, rivers stand still, the sun sets with a pale hue, the planet Mercury assumes the colour of fire and moves through the firmament in a strange orbit, why, the very sky seems torn in two. The earth utters abysmal and sorrowful rumblings from her very core; dread and violent winds begin to blow. All the points of the horizon, covered with smoke, seem to be on fire. The oceans are agitated and howl awfully. The mountains with their forests begin to quake, and all living creatures, O Rajan, feel great anguish.

Jupiter enters the nakshatra Rohini and assumes the colour of the moon or the sun. Upon the fall of Karna, the entire battlefield is alight with spirit fires while darkness envelops the sky. The earth trembles again and again, meteors fall from the sky and Rakshasas and other wanderers of the night celebrate. When Arjuna's Anjalikastra takes off Karna's head with the face as luminous and handsome as the moon, all beings in swarga, akasa and bhumi cry in lamentation.

After his victory over Karna, Arjuna, the favourite of the Devas, the Gandharvas, and Manavas, is magnificent in his tejas, as Indra was after his conquest of Vritra. The two Krishnas ride on their chariot with its rumble like the roar of thunderheads, and brilliance like the meridian sun in an autumn sky. The ratha flies banners and a standard with the great Vanara and other spirits, the banner incessantly creating bloodcurdling sounds, that chariot among chariots whose effulgence resembles that of Himalayan snow, the moon, the conch or crystal, and whose horses are like Indra's own.

The two paravirahas, Arjuna and Kesava, mahatejasvins whose ornaments of gold, pearls, rubies, diamonds and corals glow and sparkle, even being flecked with blood, wheel fearless and swift as the wind triumphantly across all Kurukshetra, and they look like Vishnu and Vasava mounted on the same chariot. With the twang of the Gandiva and the slaps of their palms, they continue to massacre the Kurus at will. Then Arjuna of the kapi-dhvaja and Krishna of the garuda-dhvaja raise their unearthly conches white as moonbeams and chased with gold, and setting them to their lips, blow a single note together, which fills the earth, the sky and the heavens, and pierce the hearts of their enemies with that sound.

O Kuruvarya, the forests, mountains, rivers and the sky reverberate with the sound of their conches which puts all the Kauravas in a panic, fills your son's army with fright, and gladdens Yudhishtira. As soon as the Kauravas hear the blast of those conches, all of them leave the field with alacrity, deserting Salya and Duryodhana. Then diverse beings unite and, together, congratulate Krishna and Arjuna. Pierced with Karna's arrows, Achyuta and Dhananjaya are glorious like the many-rayed moon and sun risen, after dispelling darkness. Removing the countless arrows stuck in them, the two mighty ones, with well-wishers and friends around them, happily enter their own camp, like the lords Vasava and Vishnu when invoked by sacrificial priests.

Upon the death of Karna, the Devas, Gandharvas, Manushas, Charanas, Maharishis, Yakshas, and great Nagas worship Krishna and Arjuna with great reverence and wish them victory in all things. The two heroes receive all their friends, each according to his age, and rejoice with them their incomparable feats, like Indra and Vishnu after the overthrow of Bali.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Upon the fall of Karna, the defeated Kaurava army runs looking for places to hide. Their kings and commanders too, O Bhaarata, are anxious to withdraw their troops and your son is unable to check their flight. Duryodhana understands this and, acting on Salya's advice, withdraws the army. Kritavarman leads the remaining part of your Narayana troops and quickly retreats towards the encampment followed by Sakuni and one thousand Gandharas. Kripa, at the head of his large elephant force that resembles a mass of clouds, and Aswatthaman, drawing deep angry breaths at the Pandavas' victory, do the same. Susarman leads the Samsaptakas, which is still a large force despite their considerable decimation, back to their camp.

Mourning the loss of everything, Duryodhana withdraws, his heart broken, and a prey to many desperate thoughts. Salya drives Karna's chariot without its standard sorrowfully towards the camp. The other maharathas of the Kaurava army, though still numerous but afraid and filled with shame and almost deprived of their minds, quickly melt away, some applauding Arjuna, some Karna. Amongst those thousands of warriors of your army, there is not a man who still has any wish for war but all of them only long for their homes. The Kauravas despair of life, kingdom, wives and wealth. Recognising the need to console and guide them with care, your son, himself full of grief, is nevertheless determined to rest them for the night and fight on the next day.

His warriors, O Rajan, accept his orders with bent heads and retire from the battlefield shattered and with pale faces.'"

CANTO 96

"Sanjaya says, 'After Karna is slain and the Kaurava troops run, Krishna joyfully embraces Partha and exults, "From this day men will always speak in the same breath of the death of both Vritra and Karna. Indra, the Deva king, killed Vritra with his Vajra and Karna you killed with your Gandiva. Go, O son of Kunti, and tell Yudhishtira Dharmaputra about your prowess that has made you famous throughout the three worlds. When he knows that you have killed Karna and accomplished that which you have been trying to for a long time, you will be freed from the debt you owe your king and brother. During your duel, he came once to watch, but he could not stay long because of his grievous injuries and returned to his tent."

Partha says, "So be it!" and they then turn the ratha back.

Krishna addresses the soldiers, and says, "Bless you all. Stand firm, be wary and face the enemy!"

To Dhrishtadyumna, Yudhamanyu, the twin sons of Madri, Vrikodara and Yuyudhana, he says, "Great Kshatriyas, be vigilant and hold your positions until we return after we inform the king of Karna's death."

They then set out for the king's tent and find Yudhishtira, that tiger among kings, resting on a comfortable bed of gold. With great joy, they touch the Dharmarajan's feet. Seeing their joy and the extraordinary wounds on their bodies, Yudhishtira knows that the son of Radha is dead and rises quickly from his bed, repeatedly embraces Krishna and Arjuna and then asks Krishna how Karna died.

A smiling Vasudeva, with joined palms, tells Yudhishtira exactly how Karna was killed. "It is through good fortune that Arjuna, Bhima, Madri's two sons, and you are all safe, in this war where great shuras have died. The Suta's son Karna, the mighty Vaikartana, is dead, so do whatever should be done next. Destiny has ordained your victory, and your reputation grows in stature. The earth today drank the blood of the Sutaputra, that wretch among men, who laughed at Draupadi when they won her at the game of dice.

Come and look, Bharatarishabha, your enemy lies today on bare ground, pierced all over with this Partha's arrows. O Mahabaho, now rule with love and care this earth that is free of all your enemies, and enjoy with us all the benefits that accrue!"

With inexpressible joy, Yudhishtira salutes Krishna in return and says, "Good fortune, great fortune! It is not surprising, Devakinandana, that Partha should achieve superhuman feats when he has you for his sarathy."

Yudhishtira takes Krishna's right arm adorned with angadas, and says, "Narada told me that you two are the ancient Nara and Narayana, those ancient Maharishis who are the protectors and preservers of dharma. The sagacious Krishna Dwaipayana, the most blessed Vyasa has also repeatedly told me this Deva Purana. O Krishna, it is through your power that Dhananjaya has vanquished all his enemies. We were certain of victory from the day you agreed to become Partha's sarathy."

Dharmaputra Yudhishtira mounts his majestic chariot, harnessed to ivory white horses with black tails and fleet as thought, and with a troop of Pandava soldiers for his escort, sets out, conversing pleasantly with Krishna and Arjuna, to survey the battlefield where so much has happened. He sees Karna lying on Kurukshetra, pierced all over with arrows like a kadamba flower with filaments all around its body, and with thousands of golden lamps filled with perfumed oil illuminating him.

Seeing Karna with his son dead from the shafts shot from the Gandiva, at first Yudhishtira cannot believe his eyes and then, knowing his own long dread has in truth finally ended, lauds the Naravyaghras Madhava and Phalguna, and says, "O Govinda, today my brothers and I have become kings of the earth, because you are our Lord and our Protector. When the vile Duryodhana learns of the slaying of Karna, the ignoble son of Dhritarashtra will despair about his life and kingdom. Through your grace, O Krishna, we have achieved our ends. Through good fortune, victory has been yours, O Govinda! Through great good fortune, we have annihilated the enemy. Through destiny, Arjuna has been crowned with victory. We passed thirteen years in exile and great sorrow. O Mahabaho, now through your grace, we will sleep happily this night."

In this way, O Rajan, does Dharmaraja Yudhishtira praise Krishna and Arjuna.

Seeing Karna and his son dead, Yudhishtira regards himself as being reborn. The warriors and commanders of the Pandava army, all filled with joy, approach Yudhishtira and congratulate him. Nakula, Sahadeva, Vrikodara, Satyaki, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, and others among the Pandus, the Panchalas, and the Srinjayas, seasoned warriors, great shuras and praviras salute the son of Kunti at his victory over Karna. Extolling Yudhishtira, they shower their praise over the two Krishnas. Then, celebrating their great victory, those great maharathas all turn back towards their own encampment.

Thus, O Rajan, did this profound carnage come to pass because of your evil policy! Ah, why do you grieve now?' says Sanjaya."

Vaisampayana said, "The Kuru king Dhritarashtra, on hearing the evil tidings, fell on the ground from his throne. Similarly, the farsighted queen Gandhari also collapsed, weeping and lamenting the death of Karna. Vidura and Sanjaya both raised up the fallen monarch and began to console him. Similarly, the royal Kuru women helped Gandhari up and comforted her as best they could. Thinking destiny to be ineluctable and all-powerful, that blind Rajarishi Dhritarashtra, ravaged by deathly grief, seemed he might leave his body. His heart filled with anxiety and sorrow, the king, however, did not swoon again. Comforted, he remained still and silent, sunk deep in some abyss of despair.

He who reads an account of this great battle, which is like a yagna, between the noble Arjuna and Adhiratha's son Karna, or those who listen to an account of that duel, both obtain, O Bhaarata, the rewards of a great yagna properly performed. The learned say that the holy and the eternal Vishnu is Yagna, as well as each of those other Devas—Agni, Vayu, Soma and Surya. Therefore, he that listens to or recites this Parva without malice will be happy and attain every region of bliss. Filled with devotion, men of dharma always read this sacred and first of Samhitas. They that do, rejoice, obtain wealth, every felicity and great fame, and gain the favour of Vishnu Narayana, that foremost of Purushas, of the illustrious Brahma, and of Bhava Mahadeva.

A Brahmana who reads it obtains the benefits of having studied all the Vedas; a Kshatriya gains strength and victory in battle; Vaishyas acquire immense wealth, and Sudras have health, happiness and freedom from disease. Then, again, the illustrious Vishnu is eternal and since it is that Deva who has been glorified in this Parva, the man reading or listening to it will be blissful and acquire all the objects of his heart's desire.

These words of the great Rishi Vyasa can never be untrue! The punya that a person earns from listening to the recitation of the Karna Parva is equal to his who makes gifts of the finest cows with their calves continuously for a whole year."

The End of Karna Parva

Salya Parva

Janamejaya said, “O Maharishi, what do the remnants of the beaten Kaurava army do after Arjuna kills Karna? What strategy does Suyodhana adopt towards the rampaging Pandavas? Tell me in detail for I am eager to listen to the great exploits of my ancestors.”

Vaisampayana said, “O Bharatasattama, reduced by grief and despair, Dhritarashtra’s son Suyodhana staggers back to his camp with the remnants of his army, lamenting, ‘Alas, oh Karna!’ His commanders try to comfort him with advice from the Shastras but he finds no peace of mind. He contemplates his destiny and the need to perpetuate his sovereignty and firmly resolves to continue the war. Making Salya his senapati, he leads his remaining forces to battle.

Another terrible battle erupts between the Kurus and the Pandavas, like the one of long ago between the Devas and the Asuras. In the massacre that follows, Yudhishtira finally kills Salya at midday. With all his friends and kinsmen dead, Duryodhana flees the field and hides at the bottom of a lake. Bhimasena surrounds the lake with many maharathas, challenges Duryodhana and, after forcing him to come out and confront him, uses his great strength to kill him.

Only three Kuru maharathas—Aswatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman—are still alive after Duryodhana’s death. Burning with revenge, they slaughter the Panchala troops in a stealthy night attack. The next morning,

Sanjaya the Suta sets out from the camp and reaches Hastinapura, sombre and sorrowing; his limbs trembling, he enters the palace of the king. He weeps and wails, 'Alas, Rajan! Alas, the death of that noble king has ruined all of us. Alas, Kaala is all powerful and unpredictable, for the Pandavas have killed all our allies whose combined might was equal to that of Sakra himself.'

All the people who watch Sanjaya come back to the city in distress, O Janamejaya, they weep loudly and lament.

When the city hears of Duryodhana's death, the citizens are like a people demented. A deeply agitated Sanjaya enters Dhritarashtra's palace and finds him seated, surrounded by Gandhari, Vidura, his grieving daughters-in-law, kinsmen, friends and other well-wishers. In a voice choked with tears, he says, 'I am Sanjaya. I bow to you, O Bharatarishabha. Salya, the king of the Madras and our senapati, is dead. So, too, are Sakuni the gamester, and his son Uluka. Also annihilated are the Samsaptakas, the Kambojas, the Sakas, the Mlecchas, the Yavanas the Mountaineers, along with the Easterners, the Southerners, the Northerners and the Westerners. All the kings and all the princes are dead. Bhima has killed Duryodhana in the manner he vowed to. Suyodhana now lies in the dust, with his thighs and manhood smashed and covered in blood.

Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, Uttamaujas and Yudhamanyu along with the Prabhadrakas, the Panchalas, and the Chedis died in the war. Also ended are the lives of the five sons of Draupadi, and Karna's son, Vrishasena. All the troops that you mobilised, all the elephants as well as all the chariot-warriors and all the horses, have fallen. Very few are left alive. The influence of Kaala is such that because of the feud between the Pandavas and the Kauravas, the world now consists only of women.

Only seven of the Pandava forces still live—the five Pandava brothers, Krishna and Satyaki. On your side, Kurudvaha, only three survive—Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman. Fate has used Duryodhana and his hatred for the Pandavas as the means to destroy the world.'

Hearing this, Dhritarashtra swoons. Vidura, Gandhari, the royal Kuru family and the entire royal household all fall on the ground, some senseless and others raving deliriously. Finally, slowly and with difficulty, Dhritarashtra regains his wits and, with trembling limbs and sorrowful heart, he looks around and says, 'O wise Vidura, you are now my only support for I am destitute with no sons left alive.'

He faints again and revives only when they sprinkle cold water on him and fan him. He remains silent, sighing heavily like a snake imprisoned in a jar. Seeing his king suffer, Sanjaya also weeps loudly. All the royal women too, including the renowned Gandhari, do the same. After a long while, during which Dhritarashtra repeatedly revives and swoons, he tells Vidura, 'Let Gandhari, the women and all these friends, retire to their homes and chambers. My mind is greatly unsettled.'

A trembling Vidura dismisses the women, O Janamejaya. Then Sanjaya looks sadly at Dhritarashtra, who is wracked with sobs, and with joined hands, comforts him with kind words."

Vaisampayana said, "After the royal women leave, King Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, plunged into grief greater than what he has ever suffered, begins to lament, exhaling audibly and flailing his arms. He says, 'Alas, Sanjaya, dreadful is your news. You tell me that the Pandavas are all safe while my sons are dead. Alas, my hard heart must be made of the essence of adamant, since it does not break when I think of my sons, their age, and the games they played in their childhood. Although, being blind, I have never seen them, I loved them more than my life. I attended on their lives and rejoiced at their growth from childhood to youth and then to early manhood.

Hearing now that they lie dead, grief overwhelms me. Ah, come to me, Duryodhana! I am blind, old and defenceless, and without you what will become of me? Why have you abandoned all your allies, your kinsmen and friends and lie pitifully dead on bare ground. Where is your compassion, your love and your regard for me?

How did the Parthas kill you when you were invincible? When I wake up in the mornings, who will now lovingly and respectfully call me, "O Father," or "O Maharajan," or "O Jagatguro," and affectionately embrace me with love in his eyes, and seek my orders, saying, "Command me, O Kurudvaha."

Speak to me in that sweet voice once more! O my dearest son, I heard you say, "This wide earth is as much ours as it is of Pritha's son. Bhagadatta, Kripa, Salya, the two princes of Avanti, Jayadratha, Bhurisrava, Sala, Somadatta, Bahlika, Aswatthaman, Kritavarman, Brihadbala, Sakuni and many thousands of Mlecchas, Sakas and Yavanas have taken up arms for my sake. Sudakshina the king of the Kambojas, and the king of the Trigartas, Pitamaha Bhishma, the Acharyas Drona and Kripa, Srutayus, Ayutayus, Satayus, Jalasandha, Rishyasringa's son, the Rakshasas Alayudha and Alambusa, Subala, these and countless other kings were ready to cast away their lives in this great war. O Naravyaghra, I will fight, with their support and with my brothers around me, against all the Parthas, the Panchalas, the Chedis, Draupadi's sons, Satyaki, Kuntibhoja and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha.

Each of my allies can repel any Pandava attack. Why, Karna and I alone are a match for them. All my ally kings are eager to avenge the wrongs of the Pandavas and to accept my sovereignty. Moreover, Krishna has assured me that he will not put on armour or use weapons against us, Rajan."

Listening to what Duryodhana so often told me, I believed that the Pandavas would be defeated in this war. Now that the enemy has killed my sons and all the shuras who fought gallantly for us, what can I believe but that this must be destiny?

When Pitamaha Bhishma fell at the hands of Sikhandi, like a lion brought down by a jackal, what can it be but destiny?

When the Pandavas could quell Drona Acharya, that master of all weaponry, what can it be but fate?

When the enemy could kill Bhurisrava, Somadatta, Bahlika, Jayadratha and Bhagadatta, who were masters in fighting from elephant back, what can it be but providence?

When they could destroy Sudakshina, Jalasandha, as well as Srutayus and Ayutayus, what can it be but fate?

When the Pandavas could defeat and kill maharatha Pandya, what can it be but destiny?

When the enemy could kill Brihadbala, the king of the Magadhas, the valiant Ugrayudha, the two princes of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda, the king of the Trigartas, as well as numberless Samsaptakas, what can it be but fate?

When the Pandavas could kill king Alambusa, the Rakshasas Alayudha and Rishyasringa's son, what can it be but destiny?

When the enemy could massacre the Narayanas, as well as the Gopalas, fighters that were invincible in battle, and many thousands of Mlecchas, what can it be but fate?

When the Pandavas could slay Sakuni and his son Uluka, what can it be but fate?

When the war claimed innumerable Kshatriyas, all-powerful as Sakra himself, when the war claimed great warriors from so many different kingdoms, Sanjaya, what can this be but destiny?

It must be fate that killed my valiant sons and grandsons, as well as my friends and brethren.

Without doubt, man is subject to destiny. I am an unfortunate whose children are all dead. Old as I am, how can I now submit to my enemies? As I am without relatives and kinsmen, I will take sannyasa and seek exile in the vana. How will I be able to stand the triumphant shouts of Bhimasena, who by himself butchered my hundred sons? He will now frequently refer to the killing of Duryodhana in my hearing and I, burning with grief and sorrow, will not be able to suffer his savage words.'

Dhritarashtra alternately swoons and weeps, thinking about the death of his sons. Overwhelmed, he once more enquires of his charioteer Sanjaya about the details of the battle.

Dhritarashtra asks, 'Whom did my warriors choose as their senapati, after Bhishma, Drona and Karna had fallen? The Pandavas have killed all our generals: Bhishma, Drona and now the valiant Karna. Long before this war started, the noble Vidura told me that Duryodhana would be the cause of the decimation of the population of the earth. I am a fool not to have seen the truth of his prediction. Fate decreed then that I would ignore his words. The results of that evil course are now clear to behold.

Explain once more to me, O son of Gavalgana, who led our army after Karna's fall? Who were the Kshatriyas who challenged Arjuna and Vasudeva? Who protected Salya's flanks and his rear on the battlefield? How could the Pandavas kill the powerful Salya as well as Duryodhana, when all of you were present?

Tell me all the details of the destruction of the Kauravas and of my son Duryodhana. Tell me how Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, the five sons of Draupadi, and all the Panchalas with their followers died. Tell me how the five Pandavas, Kripa, Kritavarman, Aswatthaman and the two Satwatas, Krishna and Satyaki, escaped with their lives. You are a skilled narrator, Sanjaya, so tell me everything.'"

CANTO 99

"Sanjaya says, 'Hear, O Rajan, of the great slaughter of the Kurus and the Pandavas in the Kurukshetra war. The enemy repeatedly routs your troops after Arjuna kills Karna, but they return to fight each time. A great fear enters the hearts of your sons as they hear Partha rejoice with shouts of triumph. There is no warrior in your army to stand firm and to galvanise the Kaurava troops. They look like shipwrecked merchants adrift without a raft upon the fathomless ocean. They retire as dusk falls, disheartened and demoralised. Finding their commanders dead, your sons flee in fear, bloodied and without weapons or armour. In panic, they even strike each other, afraid that Arjuna and Bhima may be hunting them down."

Many great maharathas flee, some on horses, some on chariots, and some on elephants leaving their foot soldiers to their fate. The melee results in broken chariots, slain elephants, horsemen and the massacre of foot soldiers.

"I will take up my post at the rear of the army, where Arjuna will be unable to either surround me or to attack me directly. Today, I will kill Arjuna, Krishna, Bhima and the rest of my enemies, and free myself from the debt I owe Karna. Quick, whip the horses, Suta," Duryodhana commands his charioteer.

Elsewhere on the battlefield, many of your warriors who had lost their elephants, horses or chariots along with another twenty-five thousand foot soldiers, march to the battlefront. Leading four kinds of forces, Bhimasena and Dhrishtadyumna encircle and cut down your soldiers, despite vigorous resistance. Many challenge the two by name and attempt to attack them. Since the rules of fair combat require that one should not fight from a chariot when the opponents are on foot, an enraged Bhima leaps down from his chariot. Effortlessly wielding his heavy iron gada stamped with gold, he fells all your warriors with crushing blows that spray blood everywhere, even like the Destroyer at the end of the yuga, before he joins Dhrishtadyumna.

A powerful force led by Madri's twin sons and Satyaki engages Sakuni's large cavalry in a fierce battle and easily decimates it.

Meanwhile, drawing his celebrated Gandiva, Arjuna scythes into the Kauravas' chariot-division. Your troops run on seeing Arjuna's ratha, driven by Krishna, racing towards them. A division of twenty-five thousand foot-soldiers unsupported by chariots and cavalry, tries to surround Arjuna but Bhimasena and Dhrishtadyumna annihilate them in no time. The sight of Dhrishtadyumna on a chariot with a lofty Kovidara flagstaff and drawn by horses white as doves, fills your troops with terror.

Satyaki, Nakula and Sahadeva pursue Sakuni, while Chekitana and the five sons of Draupadi blow their conches after destroying a large cohort of your troops. Arjuna notices some of your men still holding their ground, and shrouds them with a barrage of arrows. The dust of battle envelops the scene, and nothing is visible. Soon, darkness falls and your troops flee in disarray.

Seeing his army broken, O Kurupravira, Duryodhana attacks friend and foe alike in fury at Karna' death. He challenges all the Pandavas, like the Asura Bali challenging the Devas in battle long ago. The Pandavas upbraid him and try to subdue him but he fearlessly holds them off in a mighty exhibition of skill. Some way off, he sees some of his battered troops in panic. He rallies them saying, "I do not see where you can find shelter from the Pandavas. What use then in flight? The Pandava army is greatly reduced and the two Krishnas are exhausted. If all of us make a stand here, we will surely prevail, while if you break ranks, the Pandavas will overrun you.

Death is welcome if it is in battle and by Kshatriya dharma, for it bestows eternal happiness in the other world. Listen to me, all you Kshatriyas. It is better to submit to the power of an angry Bhimasena than to abandon your Kshatriya dharma. You Kauravas, there is no better path to swarga than a dharma yuddha. A warrior acquires in a day regions of bliss in the other world that would otherwise take long years to obtain."

At this, the Kshatriya maharathas, led by Duryodhana, once more charge the Pandavas firmly resolved to fight to the last. A ferocious battle erupts again, like the one between the Devas and the Asuras.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The stricken Kaurava army, with its broken chariots and dead warriors, elephants and foot-soldiers, Rajan, looks like Rudra's playground. After the retreat of your grief-stricken son Duryodhana, Partha mows down thousands of hapless Kshatriyas. Their screams fill the Kaurava command with despair.

The venerable Acharya Kripa says angrily, "Listen to me, Duryodhana. Having committed oneself to the path of war, he who observes Kshatriya dharma must be prepared to fight his father, sons and close relatives. One earns great punya if one dies in battle and great sin if one flees. The life of a man aspiring to live by Kshatriya dharma is exceptionally difficult.

Let me give you some advice, O Kurupravira. After the fall of Bhishma, Drona, Karna and Jayadratha, after the death of your brothers and your son Lakshmana, our hopes of retaining sovereignty are all but over. We are alive only to mourn their deaths.

Even while they lived, we could never have hoped to vanquish Arjuna. With Krishna for his eyes, even the Devas cannot defeat him. The sight of his kapi-dhvaja, lofty as Indra's stambha, fills the vast Kaurava army with stark fear. Our hearts fail hearing Bhima's leonine roars, the blare of the Panchajanya and the twang of the Gandiva. Moving like lightning and blinding our eyes, Arjuna's golden bow is a circle of fire that shoots forth bolts of light as he shakes it. His white horses are marvellous as the moon and they fly as if devouring the skies. With their reins in Krishna's hands, they bear Arjuna to battle like the wind driving cloud masses. He raged through your great army like a conflagration consuming dry grass in the forest in winter. Magnificent as Indra, Dhananjaya is like the four-tusked Airavata when he assails us. Those maharathas, the two Krishnas, are beyond being awesome.

Today is the seventeenth day of this dreadful war, O Bhaarata, and Arjuna has your army reeling like a tempest-tossed boat on the bosom of the sea. Where was Karna, where was Drona, where was Kritavarman, where were Dusasana and your other brothers, where was I, where were you, when Arjuna killed Jayadratha? What then is there for us to do now? The very twang of the Gandiva robs us of our courage, so who remains among your warriors who can stop Arjuna and his devastras?

Your army without a senapati is like a night without the moon, or like a dried up river bed that elephants have dug up with their tusks. Like a great flame in a heap of grass, Arjuna will easily incinerate your headless army.

The valour of Satyaki and Bhima can split the mountains or dry up all the oceans. Bhima will soon accomplish the vow that he swore in the sabha. You have committed many unpardonable wrongs against the Pandavas and the results of your evil deeds have now come to haunt you. You and the sparse remnants of your army, O Suyodhana, are both in mortal danger. Save yourself, for everyone else alive depends upon you. Without your asylum, everything is over.

The strategy advocated by Brihaspati is that he who is losing should seek peace and reconciliation, while he who is winning should opt to fight. Our army is now lesser and weaker than the Pandava army, and so wisdom lies in making peace. He who does not know what is good for him, or knowingly disregards it, will soon lose his kingdom and never achieve anything worthwhile in this world. If submission to Dharmaraja Yudhishtira is the price to pay for retaining our sovereignty, it is preferable to complete defeat at his hands. They will allow you to continue as king if Vidura and Krishna ask Yudhishtira to.

None of them can deny Dhritarashtra anything. I have no ulterior motives and my advice is only for your benefit. If you do not listen to me now, Rajan, you will remember my words when you are taking your last breath."

The venerable Acharya, Kripa son of Saradwat, is in tears by now and he almost swoons.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Breathing heavily, Duryodhana silently listens to Kripacharya. He thinks a while and says, "You have said to me whatever a friend is duty bound to say. You have fought for me without a thought for your life. The world has seen you penetrate into the midst of the Pandava divisions and fight their maharathas valiantly. However, O Mahabaho, like bitter medicine that ill pleases a dying man, your valuable and reasonable advice does not please me.

In the past, we took away Yudhishtira's kingdom by defeating him at a game of dice, so why should he trust me now? We deceived Krishna when he came to us as an envoy for the Parthas. Why then, O Maharishi, should he believe me now? He will never forget that we once dragged the princess Draupadi, weeping piteously, into the sabha and that we deprived Yudhishtira of his kingdom.

Today we have confirmed with our own eyes the popular belief that the two Krishnas share the same heart. From the time he heard of the death of his sister's son, Abhimanyu, Krishna has passed his nights in grief. We have offended him greatly so why should he forgive us? Arjuna, too, is bitter after we killed Abhimanyu, so why should he give me a care?

Bhima swore a terrible oath. He may die but he will never break that vow. Madri's twins breathe animosity towards us, and in battle, they resemble a pair of Yamas.

Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandi have drawn their blades against me so why will they, O best of Brahmanas, desire my good.

Dusasana viciously hauled princess Draupadi into the Kuru sabha, when she was in her season and clad in a single cloth. Burning for revenge, she, born for a yagna fire, performs the most stringent tapasya for the success of her husbands and for my destruction. She sleeps every day on bare ground, intending to do so until the end of the war. Remembering the near naked Draupadi in distress, who will now dissuade the Pandavas from war?

Abandoning all pride, Krishna's sister Subhadra serves Draupadi as her sakhi. It is later than you think, O Kripa—everything is ablaze and no one can put out that fire. Once we killed Abhimanyu, peace with the Pandavas became impossible.

I enjoyed ruling over all this earth, by myself. How can I now reign at the pleasure of the Pandavas? I once shone like the sun over the heads of all the kings of the world. How can I now walk behind Yudhishtira like a wretched slave? I cannot accept your mild and benign counsel, for this is not the time for peace.

I regard fighting the dharma yuddha to be good policy. This is not the time to act like a eunuch. I have performed many yagnas and given generous dakshina to Brahmanas; I have listened to countless Vedic recitations, and I have helped anyone who came to me in distress. I have conquered foreign lands, stamped on the heads of my enemies, ruled my own kingdom wisely, and enjoyed diverse pleasures. My servants are all well looked after and I have fulfilled all my desires. Acharya, how will I now humble myself before the Pandavas?

I have pursued dharma, artha and kama. I have paid my debt to the Pitris and to Kshatriya dharma. Certainly, there is no happiness left for me here. My honour means more to me than my kingdom or my life.

Fame is all that one should acquire in this world and one can have it only through war. For a Kshatriya to die at home in his bed is shameful and sinful. Only the man who, after performing yagnas, casts away his body in the forest or in battle wins glory. He is no man who dies miserably, weeping in pain, afflicted by disease and decay, and in the midst of crying relatives. Abandoning all objects of enjoyment, I will now, through dharma yuddha, go to the realms of Sakra and find the companionship of others who have attained that highest end.

Beyond doubt, swarga is the habitation of warriors of dharma-neeti, who never retreat from battle, who are gifted with intelligence and devoted to truth, who perform yagnas, and who have been sanctified in the final yagna of war. The different tribes of Apsaras will undoubtedly smile at them, while their Pitris in swarga, seeing them worshipped in the sabha of the Devas, will rejoice. We should walk down the path, which the Devas and our venerable Pitamaha, our Acharya Drona, Jayadratha, Karna and Dusasana have all taken.

So many brave kings who fought for me in this war now lie dead on the battlefield. They discharged their Kshatriya dharma in battle, after performing yagnas as ordained in the Shastras, and now live in bliss in Indra's abode. They paved the way to that blessed region, a road that will be difficult to travel on because of the throngs of warriors that hurry along it to reach that goal. I remember with gratitude the efforts of those heroes and desire to pay off the debt I owe them, instead of fixing my heart upon my kingdom.

If I save my own life after causing the death of my kith and kin, the world will censure me. What kind of sovereignty can I enjoy without relatives, friends and well-wishers, and yielding to the son of Pandu? I, who have lorded over the Earth, must now acquire Heaven though fair fight. It cannot be otherwise."

All the assembled Kshatriyas signify their approval by applauding and cheering the king.

Without grieving about their defeat and filled with enthusiasm, they decide to display their courage and fight on. They are delighted at the prospect of battle and, after they groom their animals, withdraw to their tents for the night. They bathe in the red waters of the Saraswati on the sacred and beautiful tableland at the foot of Himavat, and quench their thirst with that water. Their spirits now raised, and urged by fate, they wait and rest, giving courage to one another.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Happy at the prospect of battle Rajan, Salya, Chitrasena, Sakuni, Aswatthaman, Kripa, Kritavarman, Sushena, Aristasena, Dhritasena, Jayatsena and all the kings and their warriors, spend the night at the foot of Himavat. It is for the first time, after Karna's death, that your sons find peace in the mountains. Now determined to fight, they salute the king and request him in the presence of Salya to name another senapati and assure him that they will conquer their enemies under that new General.

Duryodhana drives up to that seasoned warrior Aswatthaman. He has muscular limbs, a full head of hair, sweet speech, eyes like the petals of a full-blown lotus, a face with the dignity of Meru, and a neck with three lines like those of a conch shell. His arms are massive and well joined; he has a broad and deep chest, and his neck, eyes, tread, and voice are like those of Mahadeva's bull Nandin. In speed and strength, he is like Garuda or Vayu. Radiant like the sun, he rivals Usanas in intelligence and the moon in beauty, form and countenance. His body, made as if from a number of golden lotuses, consists of strong joints, powerful thighs, waist, hips, and elegant fingers and fingernails. Apparently, the Creator made him with care after collecting all the beautiful and goodly attributes in creation.

Drona's son bears every auspicious mark; he is clever; he is an ocean of learning and invincible in battle. He knows, in all its details, the astra shastra, the science of weaponry consisting of four padas and ten angas. He has complete knowledge of the four Vedas as well as of the fifth, the Akhyanas. After worshipping Trilochana and observing many vratas, his father Drona, who possessed great punya and who was not born of a woman, begot him upon a wife also not born of a woman.

Your son Suyodhana says to him, “Today you are our greatest strength. Tell us who is to be our senapati who will lead us to victory against the Pandavas.”

Aswatthaman says, “Let Salya be our senapati. In ancestry, in ability, in energy, in fame, in beauty of person, and in every other accomplishment, he is our superior. Grateful for the services rendered to him, he fights for us abandoning the sons of his own sister. He leads a large army of his own, and is like a second Kartikeya, the Deva-Senapati. If he leads us, we will be victorious as the Devas were when Kartikeya was their leader.”

All the kings surround Salya, loudly acclaim him as their senapati, and wish him victory. Alighting from his ratha, Duryodhana joins his palms and, addressing Salya, that rival of Drona and Bhishma in war, says, “The time has come for everyone to distinguish between true and fair weather friends. When you lead our army into battle, the Pandavas, Panchalas and their allies will be demoralised.”

Salya says, “I will do all that you expect of me. Everything that I possess—my life breath, my kingdom, and my wealth—is at your service.”

Duryodhana says, “I offer you the leadership of my army, Uncle. Protect us and lead us just as Kartikeya commanded the Devasena. Obliterate our enemies in battle even as Indra killed the Danavas.””

CANTO 103

"Sanjaya continues, 'Salya asks Duryodhana, "Why do you consider the two Krishnas to be the greatest of maharathas? Why, even together they cannot equal me! When roused, I can confront the whole world, with all the Devas, Asuras and Manavas. I accept your offer to command your army. I assure you that I will form such a vyuha that our enemies will not be able to overrun us and then I will vanquish the Parthas and the Somakas."

Without losing any time, Duryodhana pours sanctified water over Salya, performs the rites ordained in the Shastras and invests him with the command of the Kaurava army. Loud shouts arise from the now optimistic Kaurava and Madrakas warriors who beat and blow diverse musical instruments.

They shout, "Victory and long life to you, Rajan! With your support, let the Dhartarashtras rule the wide earth. You can vanquish the three worlds with all their Manavas, Devas and Asuras. The Somakas and Srinjayas are only mortal!"

Hearing their praise, Salya experiences the joy that only men with pure souls can feel. He says, "Today I will either annihilate all the Panchalas and the Pandavas, or die on the field and go to swarga. The Pandavas, Krishna, Satyaki, the sons of Draupadi, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, all the Prabhadrakas, Parthas, all the Siddhas and the Charanas and the entire world will see my prowess, the might of my bow, my dexterity, the strength of my arms and the wealth of astras that I possess. Whatever tactics they adopt will be of no avail to them and I will put an end to the Pandava maharathas today. I will surpass Drona, Bhishma and Karna, and I will fulfil your wishes and make you happy."

After they see Salya receive command of the army, no one among your troops, O Bharatarishabha, any longer grieves over Karna's death. They are happy and consider the Parthas as already defeated and slain. Your troops sleep contentedly that night in their newfound peace.

Hearing the shouts of your army, Yudhishtira tells Krishna in the hearing of all the Kshatriyas, "Salya, king of the Madras, the great archer whom all the warriors highly regard, O Madhava, has been made the Kuru senapati. Tell us what we must do now."

Krishna says, "I know Salya intimately, O Bhaarata. He is a formidable, renowned and seasoned warrior, and knows all the modes of warfare. Why, I think he is equal to Bhishma, Drona or Karna, or perhaps, superior to them all. I can think of no warrior who can match Salya in battle. Strong as a lion or an elephant, he will range fearlessly on the field like Rudra at the end of the yuga. Only you, O Yudhishtira, can vanquish him. Kill him quickly just as Vasava did the Asura Namuchi. He is well nigh invincible and only upon his fall will you be able to overrun the Dhartarashtra army.

Do not show him any compassion, thinking that he is your maternal uncle; only observe Kshatriya dharma. You have crossed the fathomless oceans that were Bhishma, Drona and Karna, so do not drown now with your followers in the print of a cow's hoof that Salya is. Display in battle all the power of your tapasya and your Kshatriya tejas and kill the Madra king."

Krishna withdraws to his tent for the evening, with the Pandavas' salutations. Yudhishtira dismisses his brothers and the Somakas, and retires for the night in some contentment, knowing that Karna is no more. He is like an elephant from whose body its keepers have plucked out a thousand spears and arrows. All the great archers and maharathas of the Panchalas and the Pandavas, happy at the fall of Karna, sleep peacefully that night, their fears dispelled.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Next morning, king Duryodhana exhorts his warriors as they prepare for war. They put on armour and ready the elephants and chariots. The sound of musical instruments reverberates in the camp and swells the martial fever of the soldiers. Soon, the Kaurava maharathas form themselves in battle array and, with their divisions, stand ready for war under the command of Salya.

All your commanders, with Kripa, Kritavarman, Aswatthaman, Salya, Sakuni and the remaining kings, meet your son and take counsel on their strategy. They decide that anyone who fights the Pandavas alone and unsupported, or he who deserts a comrade, they will consider stained with the five grave and all the minor sins. They then sally forth to fight.

Similarly, the Pandava troops come out in battle array to face the Kauravas. O Bharatasattama, the noise of the advancing army with its chariots and elephants sounds like the agitated ocean breaking on rocky shores.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'You have told me about the fall of Bhishma, Drona and of Karna. Tell me now, Sanjaya, how Yudhishtira killed Salya and how Bhimasena killed my son Duryodhana.'

Sanjaya says, 'I will describe the last battle to you, Rajan, which caused such great destruction of human lives and those of elephants and horses. Your sons had strong hopes that, although Bhishma, Drona and Karna had fallen, the Parthas would meet their conqueror in Salya. Your son Duryodhana draws comfort from the thought that in Salya he has finally found a protector, a victor.

A grand vyuha Salya forms, in every aspect. His very presence inspires your sons with confidence. Mounted upon his chariot, brandishing his mighty bow and leading Karna's sons and the brave Madrakas on the left flank of his vyuha, Salya comes into battle. He positions Kritavarman and Kripa on the right flank, as well as the Sakas and the Yavanas. Aswatthaman defends his rear and the Kambojas, while Duryodhana and the Kuru warriors march in the centre along with Sakuni and Uluka. Throwing a rough ring around the troops are Trigartas, a large force of cavalry, and other troops.

The Pandava archers divide themselves into three segments. Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi and Satyaki dash ahead and strike swiftly while Yudhishtira and his troops try to corner Salya. Arjuna selects Kritavarman and the Samsaptakas for himself, Bhimasena and his Somaka maharathas attack Kripa, while the two sons of Madri and their troops charge Sakuni and Uluka. Your warriors, thousands upon thousands of them, armed with diverse weapons and filled with battle lust, rush at the Pandavas.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'When the battle commences, what, Sanjaya, was the strength of each of the armies?'

Sanjaya says, 'O Bharatarishabha, eleven thousand chariots, ten thousand seven hundred elephants, two hundred thousand cavalry and three million foot soldiers is the strength of your army, while six thousand rathas, six thousand elephants, ten thousand cavalry, and one million foot soldiers are all that remain of the Pandava forces.

The Kauravas and the Pandavas come to war on another dawn, determined to make an end of each other. And a pitched and bloody battle breaks out between them.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The encounter between the Kurus and the Srinjayas, Rajan, is as dreadful as the one between the Devas and the Asuras. Great chaos holds sway as warriors on elephants and chariots kill each other with spears, lances and cloth-yard shafts, while foot soldiers are trampled underfoot. The battlefield presents a stunning sight, like a flowering forest with hundreds of headless trunks and chatras and yak-tail fans. The earth resounds with the tramp and shouts of soldiers, the rumble of chariots, the grunts of elephants, the booming of drums, the blasting of conches and the blare of other instruments. In the resultant confusion, nothing is clear. Littered with mangled heads and crimson with blood, the earth looks as if in bloom with golden lotuses. The thudding of falling heads sounds like falling fruits of palmyra trees. The lopped off thighs of warriors like elephant trunks, arms like tusks smeared with sandalwood paste and wearing costly keyuras, jerk and writhe in strange frenzy.

A river of blood forms again on the field, flowing towards the nether world, carrying with it broken chariots, standards and banners, severed limbs and other body parts, arms, armour and armaments, and dead elephants and horses. Filled with all manner of debris, Kurukshetra looks as if it is covered by swarms of chakravakas, trivenus and dandas. The sight, while it exhilarates the brave, fills the timid with fear.

That savage battle, in which no quarter is asked for or shown, results in an appalling devastation of all the four kinds of forces. Many warriors loudly call out for help from their relatives and friends—in vain, as those called upon turn away in fear.

Arjuna and Bhima shatter your still sizeable army and make your soldiers collapse like drunken women. They blow their conches and give echoing roars of triumph. Hearing this, Yudhishtira leads Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, and the two fierce and invincible sons of Madri, to assail Salya and your legions. Loud cries of distress arise from your troops, as your commanders try to hold the troops together. For all that, they cannot rally your men, who break ranks and run, whipping their horses and elephants, deserting their relatives and comrades, worried only about their own safety.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Finding his army fleeing, Salya tells his charioteer, "Quick, take me to where Dharmaputra Yudhishtira fights under the sovereign white chatra held over his head! I will show them what I can do and the Parthas will not stand up to me."

Falling upon the Pandava host, Salya stops it like the continent checking the surging sea. The fleeing Kauravas seeing the turnaround, return to battle with new impetus, and another bloody engagement results.

Nakula and Karna's son Chitrasena assail each other with relentless flights of arrows. Equally matched, they carefully look for the other's weaknesses. Rending Nakula's bow at the grip, Chitrasena first buries three golden arrows in his forehead and then fells his horses, his standard and charioteer. Picking up a sword, Nakula charges his antagonist like a lion, while his opponent continues to shoot at him. Deflecting the arrows with his shield, he reaches Chitrasena's chariot and in full view of the troops, hacks off Chitrasena's handsome, diadem-decked head with a swing of his blade. All the maharathas present give loud cries of praise and approval.

Meanwhile, seeing their brother killed, Sushena and Satyasena, the two other sons of Karna, sweep on Nakula, like a pair of tigers attacking an elephant in the deep forest. Though wounded by their arrows, the Pandava swiftly climbs into another chariot, takes up a new bow and stands ready, like a furious Yama. The two brothers, O Bhaarata, smash his new ratha but Nakula retaliates by killing Satyasena's four horses and ruins his bow. The intense battle continues, with each destroying the other's bow a number of times, and injuring each other severely with well-aimed arrows. Finally, Nakula picks up a bright spear, with a golden shaft steeped in oil, which resembles a female serpent incessantly flicking its tongue. He hurls it at Satyasena, and it plunges cleanly through that prince's chest and drops him dead from his chariot.

Insensate with rage, Satyasena's brother Sushena destroys Nakula's chariot and covers him in a solid swath of arrows. Seeing Nakula in trouble, Sutasoma, his son by Draupadi, races up to rescue his father. Like a lion springing onto a mountaintop, Nakula leaps into Sutasoma's chariot and again engages Sushena. With a crescent-headed shaft, he decapitates his opponent; like a lofty tree on the bank of a river, undermined by the current, Karna's son collapses. Your demoralised army streams away from the field, O Bharatarishabha, until Salya arrives on the scene.

With tigerish roars and strumming his bow, Salya rallies his forces. He fills your troops with courage, and they flock to him once more and stand ready to face the enemy. Also roaring and loosing cataracts of arrows that fill the air with a thick buzzing as of swarms of black bees, Yudhishtira, Satyaki, Bhima and the twins launch a vicious attack on your troops and another bloody battle ensues.

After razing many Samsaptakas, Arjuna, his kapi-dhvaja flapping in the wind, turns on another wing of the Kaurava army. Along with Dhrishtadyumna and his warriors, they launch a combined attack, shooting tirades of arrows. Utterly overwhelmed, the Kaurava army is petrified, not knowing which way to turn. Soon after, they lose their leading warriors, then waver and fall apart, and the Pandava warriors decimate them.

Similarly, your sons also slaughter the Pandava soldiers in their thousands. The two armies, like two streams in the monsoon, agitate and massacre each other and a great fear enters the hearts of your warriors, Rajan, as well as those of the Pandavas.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'A terrible bloodletting occurs on Kurukshetra, as Kaurava and Pandava soldiers maul each other. Warriors flee, elephants trumpet in pain, foot-soldiers scream, horses run wildly in panic, and another carnage follows. The battle begins at about the hour of sunrise and, slowly but surely, the Pandavas led by Yudhishtira gain ascendancy as the Kuru army weakens and grows frantic like a herd of deer frightened by a forest fire.

Seeing his army struggle helplessly like a cow sunk in a quagmire, Salya rushes to their rescue and the Pandavas turn to face his attack. They see various portents and omen on the field as the earth with her mountains trembles and groans and bright meteors flash through the sky and crash into the ground. Deer, bison and birds in large numbers escape from dreadful Kurukshetra, with your army to their right. The planets Venus and Mars, in conjunction with Mercury, appear behind the Pandavas and in front of the Kauravas. Glowing flames issue from the points of astras, dazzling warriors' eyes. Crows and owls perch upon the heads of the combatants and on their flagpoles.

A fierce skirmish breaks out as, mustering all their strength, the Kauravas charge the Pandava army. An ebullient Salya pours dense showers of arrows over Yudhishtira, like the thousand-eyed Indra lashing the earth with torrential rain. He wounds Bhima, the five sons of Draupadi, Dhristadyumna, the two sons of Madri, Satyaki and Sikhandi, each with ten gold winged arrows. In endless swarms, Salya's shafts fall like thunderbolts from the clouds, and maim and kill elephants, horses, and warriors. He decimates the Prabhadrakas and the Somakas and yells in exultation. The Pandava army is in a panic and looks to Yudhishtira for protection.

With another downpour of arrows, Salya strafes Yudhishtira who, with some startling archery of his own, checks the Madra as an ankush does an infuriated elephant. Then Salya drills an arrow like a snake right through Yudhishtira and into the earth. This enrages the Pandavas, and Bhima, Sahadeva, Nakula and the five sons of Draupadi target Salya with their sizzling shafts. Racing to support him, come Kritavarman, Kripa Uluka, Sakuni, Ashwatthaman and all your sons. A hail of shafts from Kritavarman's bow stops Bhimasena in his tracks.

A rampaging Kripa rakes Dhrishtadyumna with multiple arrows while Sakuni confronts the sons of Draupadi, and Aswatthaman faces the twins. Duryodhana confronts Krishna and Arjuna and strikes them both with several shafts. Hundreds of individual duels break out between your men and the enemy on different parts of the field. Kritavarman, king of the Bhojas, kills Bhimasena's brown horses, forcing Bhima to jump down from his chariot and fight on foot with his mace.

Salya kills Sahadeva's horses and his opponent retaliates by killing Sahadeva's son with his sword. A cautious duel unfolds between Kripacharya and Dhrishtadyumna while Aswatthaman calmly bloodies each of Draupadi five sons with ten arrows, two for each prince. Bhima mounts a fresh chariot but Kritavarman kills his horses again, once more forcing him to spring down from his chariot and to rush at Kritavarman with his awful gada. Kritavarman escapes narrowly with his life.

Salya massacres many Somakas and Pandava troops and lacerates Yudhishtira with many barbs. Bhima, biting his lower lip in anger, attacks Salya with his iron mace with which he has destroyed elephants, horses and enemy soldiers. It resembles Yama's bludgeon, and wrapped in a cloth of gold, glows like a meteor. Terrible as a she-snake, it is hard as the Vajra, and, smeared with sandalwood paste and other liniments it is like a desirable woman. Greased with marrow, fat and blood, it produces harsh sounds from the bells attached to it, filling the enemy troops with terror. That weapon, as famed all over the world as Indra's Vajra, can rive mountain summits.

This is the gada with which once Bhima challenged an enraged Kubera, Maheswara's friend and Lord of Alaka and the Nine treasures, on Kailasa. Once, when Bhima went to Gandhamadana to fetch saugandhika flowers for Draupadi, he used it to kill a host of proud and mighty Guhyakas gifted with powers of maya. Hefting his hexagonal mace, Bhima rushes at Salya and, with a blow, smashes down his four horses to the ground.

Salya flings a javelin into Bhima's massive chest and gives a shout of triumph as it pierces the titan's armour and lodges in his body. However, calmly drawing the spear from his body, Vrikodara skewers Salya's charioteer with it. Salya jumps down from his chariot and gazes bleakly at Bhima, dumfounded by the Pandava's feat. Salya also takes up his mace and speculatively eyes his enemy. Witnessing Bhima's fearsome exploit, the Parthas are jubilant and applaud the indefatigable son of Vayu.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'With his charioteer dead, Salya stands still on the field like the blazing yuga-fire; like the Kailasa Mountain with its formidable crest; like Vasava with his Vajra; like Mahadeva with his trisula. The sound from thousands of conches, trumpets, and exultant shouts and roars inspire the warriors. The watching combatants of both armies applaud them, and say, "Wonderful! Other than Salya or Balarama there is no one who can match Bhima in a gada yuddha. And only Bhima can dare to face Salya, the illustrious king of the Madras, in a mace fight."

Evenly matched as they are, they warily circle each other with frequent leaps into the air, bellowing like bulls. Salya's mace with a resplendent cloth of gold wound around it, looks like a sheet of fire, while Bhima's gada flashes like lightning in the midst of clouds. When the two maces clash, sparks fly like showers of embers, and appear to set the sky ablaze. Like two gigantic elephants locking tusks and goring each other, they begin to pound each other. Soon they are bathed in blood and look like two flowering Kinsukas.

The sound of the blows from their maces resounds like successive peals of thunder. They stop momentarily to catch their breath before they close again and belabour each other. Finally, battered and exhausted, they both fall down at the same moment. Seeing this, the warriors of both armies exclaim in concern and apprehension.

Sweeping in on his chariot, Kripa arrives just in time and takes Salya to safety. Still reeling as if drunk, Bhimasena staggers up and, with uplifted mace, shouts a deep challenge to Salya to return and face him.

To the sound of musical and booming drums, Duryodhana leads your warriors against the Pandavas. He singles out Chekitana from the enemy forces, and impales him on a spear through his chest, killing him on the terrace of his chariot, spouting blood from his wound. Seeing him fall, the Pandava maharathas ride around your divisions and pour continuous torrents of arrows upon them. In the fight that follows, Salya leads Kripa, Kritavarman and Sakuni against Yudhishtira, while Duryodhana confronts Dhrishtadyumna. Your son sends three thousand chariots under Aswatthaman to contain Arjuna. All the men fight fearlessly, determined to win at any cost and, indeed, they succeed in penetrating the Pandava army like swans swimming into a large lake. A dust storm engulfs that fierce and bloody battle, turning everything invisible. The identities of the soldiers can be established only when their names are called aloud by their enemies. During that dreadful battle, not one man among either your warriors or those of the enemy takes a step back.

Spurting, spraying blood soon disperses the dusty darkness and the warriors vie with each other to display their skills, trying to attain swarga and even Brahmaloka through dharma yuddha. They fight either to repay their hire, or to fulfil the objectives of their friends and allies. Invoking and loosing all kinds of astras, maharathas shout encouragements to each other.

The fevered duel between Salya and Yudhishtira and their exchange of arrows leaves both wounded. Also struck by multiple arrows are Salya's side riders Chandrasena and Drumasena. When Salya finds his two wingmen killed, he first kills twenty-five Chedi warriors and then strikes Satyaki, Bhimasena and Madri's twin sons with numerous shafts.

While Salya thus charges about on the field, Yudhishtira shoots many serpentine shafts at him and knocks down his adversary's standard. An enraged Salya looses a scathing volley and his arrows pierce Satyaki, Bhimasena, Madri's twins, and, most of all, draw blood from Yudhishtira. Spreading a net of arrows across Yudhishtira's chest, Salya then mantles him with searing shafts, like a mass of rising clouds. Yudhishtira is sorely wounded and feels weak and powerless, just as the Asura Jambha had when facing Indra, the slayer of Vritra.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Seeing Dharmarajan Yudhishtira stricken, Satyaki, Bhimasena and Madri's twins try to blockade Salya with their chariots, shooting storms of shafts at him. But the towering Madra repels their combined onslaught. From above, the watching Siddhas and the Rishis applaud delightedly and declare it a remarkable sight and feat.

Anxious for Yudhishtira, Bhima and Satyaki strafe the irresistible Salya with flurries of arrows and soon Nakula and Sahadeva join the attack. Salya defends himself resolutely against those maharathas, and shoots at each of them from his formidable bow. He splits Sahadeva's bow and pierces him with a hot clutch of shafts. Hastily stringing another bow, Sahadeva gashes his great maternal uncle with five blazing arrows. The duel between the Pandavas and Salya intensifies and soon Salya is bleeding profusely: a mountain of red chalk with crimson streams running down its breast.

As the battle progresses in frenzy, Satyaki, Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva assail Salya with arrows, lances, darts and every other possible weapon, but with little success. With two recondite arrows, Salya even destroys the Satagni that Yudhishtira casts at him and gives a deafening yell of triumph. O Bhaarata, he comprehensively outdoes the Pandavas and they just cannot withstand him. Spellbound by Salya's prowess, Duryodhana is convinced that the Pandavas, the Panchalas, and the Srinjayas are as good as dead.

Yudhishtira finally succeeds in killing one of the Salya's side riders. Salya responds with a torrid swath of barbs, which cover all the Pandava troops. Yudhishtira is in a quandary and wonders, "Truly, how will what Krishna said come true? I pray that Salya does not annihilate my army."

With chariots, elephants and horses, the Pandavas renew their attack on Salya. However, that Paraviraha easily dissipates their showers of arrows and astras. He scathes them with a burst of gold-winged shafts that flies up like a swarm of locusts and falls like swarms of hunting eagles. The Devas and the Gandharvas are wonderstruck to see Salya's arrows cast a heavy gloom over the field, and beset the Pandava host. Salya pounds the Pandava warriors with his shafts shot from every side, envelops king Yudhishtira and repeatedly lets out echoing simhanadas.

The Pandava maharathas flounder against his incredibly violent onslaught. Some, however, like Bhima and king Yudhishtira, manage to hold their ground against him.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Meanwhile, with a solid swath of arrows, Aswatthaman and his warriors target Arjuna but the Pandava maharathas strike back to defend him. Blanketing your troops with flaring showers of golden arrows, Arjuna turns them into strange porcupines with his quills sticking out of them, but they respond vigorously, and fill his chariot with their shafts and missiles. The Kaurava troops are excited to see the unprecedented success that your warriors achieve against Arjuna. Soon, his chariot blazes as if with hundreds of torches, and it resembles a Devaratha fallen from heaven.

Arjuna retaliates with flaming volleys of arrows inscribed with his name and shot with unearthly precision, and quickly the Kaurava warriors feel that he is everywhere. The blazing Partha-fire, fanned by the loud twang of the Gandiva, consumes your troops like dry fuel. Broken chariots, piles of arms and armaments, dead warriors and body parts, diadems, crowns, and assorted jewellery litter the path of Partha's ratha. Rapidly, the track mired with blood and flesh becomes impassable, O Kurudvaha, like Rudra's playground.

Like the apocalyptic Agni at the end of the yuga, Partha destroys two thousand chariots. His banners streaming on his chariot, Aswatthaman attempts to stop Arjuna and those two Naravyaghras, both regarded as the foremost maharathas of the time, clash and their intense duel carries on for a long time. The son of Drona strikes both Arjuna and Krishna with gold-winged arrows shot with great force. Though he had initially shown some regard for his Acharya's son, now with a little smile, Arjuna stretches his bow Gandiva into a circle and shatters his adversary's chariot, kills his horses and charioteer, and almost casually sinks three arrows into him.

Aswatthaman remains standing on his crippled chariot and in quick succession, flings two heavy maces with iron-spikes, and decked with cloth of gold, at the Vijaya; Arjuna smashes those gadas flying towards him into fragments, riving the hearts, as it were, of the Kaurava commanders. He slashes his fierce opponent with three more arrows; though grievously hurt, Drona's stoic son shows no sign of fear or anxiety.

Aswatthaman next targets Suratha, the Panchala maharatha, and strikes him deep. Riding on his peerless chariot, Suratha valiantly charges Aswatthaman and, drawing his great bow to its fullest, burns him with arrows like tongues of fire. Aswatthaman, incensed and furrowing his brow into three lines and licking the corners of his mouth, glares at Suratha in rage and then shoots a cloth-yard shaft, which passes through the heart of the Panchala and burrows into the earth. Suratha falls dead like a mountain summit split by lightning.

Quickly commandeering the chariot of his slain foe, Aswatthaman supported by the Samsaptakas renews his assault on Arjuna. That battle between them, at the hour of noon, with Partha fighting alone, kills thousands of your men. Similar to the battle between Indra and the vast host of the Asuras in the eldest days, their duel is wonderful to witness.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Using arrows and spears, Duryodhana and Dhrishtadyumna are involved in a brutal contention in which both are severely wounded. Duryodhana's brothers, with a large force, come charging up to help him. They surround Dhrishtadyumna, but in an astounding display of skill, the Panchala fire prince staves off those Atirathas.

Sikhandi leads the Prabhadrakas against the two Kuru warriors, Kritavarman and the great Kripacharya, in a lethal attack.

Meanwhile, with his relentless torrent of arrows from all sides, Salya inflicts heavy losses among Satyaki's and Vrikodara's forces. With patience and great strength, he simultaneously takes on Nakula and Sahadeva, each of whom is skilled like the Destroyer. Salya's shafts mangle the Pandava maharathas, as they fail to find anyone to protect them. Nakula sees Yudhishtira hard pressed by Salya, and flies to confront his uncle and they duel savagely bloodying each other with arrows and darts. Then Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Satyaki, and Sahadeva, all furiously engage Salya but, in another astonishing exhibition of archery, he holds the four maharathas at bay.

Switching to another ratha and noticing that the Pandavas are making no headway against Salya, Satyaki rides up to face him. Salya turns to receive his charge and the duel between Satyaki and Salya is fierce and awesome, like the one in the olden days between the Asura Sambara and Indra. Soon the twins join the battle against their maternal uncle. In the general melee, there is copious bloodshed and the scene is reminiscent of a confrontation between snarling lions over a kill. Blanketed with dense showers of arrows fletched with kanka and peacock feathers, there is darkness all around as if cast by a passing cloud. However, their golden winged and glimmering serpentine shafts light up the sky as if it is on fire. Salya's feat is all the more incredible since he fights alone and yet manages to hold up and denude the Pandava forces, while he prowls the battlefield like Sakra when he destroyed the Asuras, long ago.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Your troops under Salya, Rajan, once more savagely assail the Parthas. Although dreadfully beset, your fierce warriors not only hold their own against the enemy, but also put them to flight despite Bhima's best efforts to rally them. A furious Arjuna envelops Kripa, Kritavarman and their troops with a hurricane of arrows. Sahadeva overwhelms Sakuni and his troops, while Nakula tries to burn Salya's flanks. Meanwhile, Draupadi's five sons confront various commanders of the Kuru army and Sikhandi fights Aswatthaman. Armed with his mace, Bhima confronts Duryodhana, and Yudhishtira leads his men against Salya. Another vicious encounter erupts between all these, none of whom has ever turned his back on a battle.

Truly, my king, Salya achieves a remarkable feat when he contains and desiccates the Pandava army by himself. Like the planet Saturn near the moon, he skirmishes with Yudhishtira. Using arrows that are like venomous nagas, he assails Yudhishtira and Bhima, shrouding them with gales of arrows and earning the applause of all the soldiers. The mangled Pandava troops take to their heels despite Yudhishtira's cries to them to stop. He is incensed and attacks Salya, resolved to either win the day or meet with death.

He summons all his brothers and Krishna and says to them, "Bhishma, Drona, Karna and the other kings who fought for the Kauravas have all perished in this war. You have all done your best courageously and accomplished the tasks given to you. Only my task to kill Salya remains unfulfilled. I am determined to kill him today so listen to what I want you all to do for me, to help me succeed.

Nakula and Sahadeva whom even Vasava cannot defeat will protect my flanks. I am confident that all three of us will adhere to our Kshatriya dharma and fight our maternal uncle. Today, either Salya or I will survive.

Prepare my chariot according to the astra shastra and pack it with arms in a measure larger than Salya's. Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna will protect my flanks, Arjuna will secure my rear, and Bhima will safeguard my front today. And I will surely be superior and better prepared than Salya in my duel with him."

All Yudhishtira's warriors accept his strategy and, once he has prepared himself, he rides against Salya and boosts the flagging spirits of the Panchalas, the Somakas and the Matsyas. Blowing conches and beating drums, the Panchalas charge, uttering loud shouts. The earth resounds with the noise of the elephants' bells as Duryodhana and Salya meet the attack. Demonstrating the full range of the archery that Drona had taught him, Salya shoots volley after blinding volley at Yudhishtira.

Like a couple of tigers fighting over a kill, Salya and Yudhishtira, both seasoned warriors with great battle skills, maul each other. Bhima confronts Duryodhana while the Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, and Madri's twin sons engage Sakuni and the other Kuru fighters.

Remember, it is because of your evil policy, Rajan, that yet another bloody battle erupts between your warriors and those of the enemy.

Aiming an arrow at Bhima's beautiful, gold-decked standard, festooned with silver bells, Duryodhana knocks it down before splitting Bhima's beautiful bow shaped like an elephant's trunk. Bhima responds with a barb that pierces your son's chest so he swoons on the terrace of his chariot. Then with a razor-faced shaft, Bhima beheads Duryodhana's charioteer and his horses run away wildly, dragging the chariot behind them, and Aswatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman rush forward to rescue your son.

Seeing this, your troops are frantic, and loud cries arise from the Kuru army. Seizing the opportunity, Arjuna draws his bow and begins to annihilate them. An energized Yudhishtira dashes forward to confront Salya, the Dharmaputra's horses white as ivory and fleet as thought. It is surprising to see the mild and soft Yudhishtira change into someone fierce as, with glaring eyes and his body trembling in rage, he decimates thousands of enemy warriors. He is relentless as he wades into the enemy forces, Rajan, like thunder splitting mountains. Felling chariots, horses, charioteers, standards and rathikas in large numbers, Yudhishtira seems to sport on the field. The rampaging and suddenly violent Pandava king troubles all your warriors and, after he empties the field on all sides with his arrows, he turns his attention on Salya.

Salya races forward eagerly to meet him and both of them roar and blow their conches in challenge as they close and swathe each other with dark swarms of arrows. Quickly covered in blood, they look like salmali and kinsuka trees in bloom. O Bhaarata, no one can tell who will prevail: whether Yudhishtira will kill Salya and rule the earth, or if Salya will slay the Dharmaputra and gift the earth to Duryodhana.

Yudhishtira sets his foe to his right during that battle and they shoot a hundred immaculate arrows at each other, quicker than the mind. They lose a bow each in the encounter, but Yudhishtira gains ascendancy when he kills Salya's four horses, his two Parshni charioteers and finally fells the Madra king's standard. At this, the Kaurava army breaks ranks and flees.

Seeing Salya's plight, Aswatthaman darts in and removes him to safety, followed by Yudhishtira's dreadful roar of triumph. Salya climbs into another chariot that is ready and fully equipped with weapons.'"

"Sanjaya continues, 'Now wielding a stronger bow, Salya strikes Yudhishtira squarely and lets out a simhanada as he unleashes vicious flights of deadly arrows at the enemy's other Kshatriyas. He rakes Satyaki, Bhima, Sahadeva and Yudhishtira with his shafts and mows down countless enemy archers and soldiers. Soon the earth is scattered with dead warriors like a sacrificial altar strewn with blades of Kusa grass.

The Pandus, the Panchalas, and the Somakas, led by Bhimasena, Satyaki, and Madri's twins all strike Salya with winged arrows and Yudhishtira buries one in the centre of his chest with huge force. Seeing Salya at bay, Duryodhana sends a thousand armoured troops and chariot-warriors to protect him. Salya now quickly takes the attack to Yudhishtira and the two shuras cover each other with oiled arrows loosed from bowstrings pulled to their ears. They carefully look for each other's weaknesses, and then shoot to draw blood, to wound grievously. The sound of their bowstrings reverberate all over the field. They stalk each other like two young tigers in the deep forest fighting over a prey; swelling with the pride of their own strength, they bloody each other like a couple of infuriated tuskers.

Struck through the chest with a fiery arrow, Yudhishtira responds with a perfect blazing shaft that burns into Salya's breast. The duel intensifies with powerful flurries of arrows exchanged, until the Dharmaputra has his bow broken. Weeping up another more formidable one, Yudhishtira drills Salya with ten terrific shafts. Salya cuts away the golden armour of both Yudhishtira and Bhima, slashes Yudhishtira's arms and rives his bow again, and draws fonts of blood from his charioteer and his horses. The Madra then turns on the Pandava troops and begins to massacre them.

Finding his brother cornered, Bhima rushes to his defence and shatters Salya's bow and deeply wounds that king with a brace of tremendous shafts. He severs the head of Salya's sarathy, kills his horses, and covers the lord of the Madras with a hundred keening barbs. Sahadeva follows his brother and savagely attacks Salya, so their combined assault leaves him dazed. His armour ruined by Bhima, an enraged Salya picks up a sword and a shield decked with stars and jumps down from his ratha.

He hacks the axle rod of Nakula's chariot and runs headlong towards Yudhishtira, like Yama himself in wrath. Dhristadyumna, Sikhandi, Draupadi's five sons and Satyaki rush to defend the Dharmaraja.

Bhima demolishes Salya's magnificent shield, and breaks his sword at the hilt with a deep and echoing roar. All the Pandava maharathas are delighted, and they laugh, utter fierce roars and blow their moon white conches. Miserable and covered with sweat and blood, your warriors are benumbed, lifeless. Despite the attack by the Pandava warriors led by Bhimasena, Salya continues his charge towards Yudhishtira, like a lion hunting a deer. Without horses or charioteer, Yudhishtira finds himself in dire straits when Salya appears before him. He grimly remembers Krishna telling him that Salya's death was his task and picks up a bright golden spear embossed with radiant gemstones.

Rolling his eyes, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira of the pure soul, glares at Salya, his heart filled with rage. His very gaze should have reduced the king of the Madras to ashes but, strangely Rajan, that does not happen. He hurls that candescent spear at Salya with all his might, the long dart, which, like a Brahmana's curse, nothing can stop. It flares through the air like a comet falling from the skies at the end of the yuga.

The sons of Pandu have always worshipped this astra with perfumes, garlands, and the rarest offerings of food and drink. The weapon is like the Samvartaka fire, as powerful as a dark curse pronounced according to the Atharvan of Angirasa. Forged for Rudra himself with great care by the celestial artificer, Tvashtri, it is inexorable and can destroy the bodies and very prana any enemy, why, even the earth, the sky, all the water bodies, all haters of Brahma and creatures of every kind.

Yudhishtira now infuses it with powerful mantras and casts it at Salya like a bolt of lightning, just as, long ago, Rudra unleashed his own astra to kill Andhaka. His always gentle eyes unaccustomedly aflame, Yudhishtira roars, "Die, wretched Salya!"

With a yell, Salya tries to catch the lance as it flies at him, even as a fire leaps up to catch a jet of clarified butter poured on it. But the long, flaming astra plunges through his fair and wide chest and into the earth. Covered in the blood that spurts from his nostrils, eyes, ears, mouth, and that which flows from his wound, he looks like the Krauncha Mountain when Skanda pierced it. His armour destroyed, the illustrious Salya, strong as Indra's elephant, falls onto the earth, his arms outstretched, his face turned towards Dharmaputra Yudhishtira. Like a beloved wife advancing to receive her dear lord, the earth seems to rise a little in love to receive him, as he dies embracing her with all his limbs.

Slain in a dharma yuddha, Salya is like a large yagna fire extinguished on the sacrificial hearth. Though spread-eagled without his weapons and standard, and though the astra has pierced his very heart, beauty and radiance do not abandon the lifeless king of the Madras.

Yudhishtira now takes up his bow, splendid as Indra's, and begins to raze his enemies like Garuda killing serpents. With transcendent showers of arrows, he routs your troops who, overcome by panic, begin to attack one another with their eyes shut in terror. With blood gushing from their bodies, they lose their weapons and fall in their thousands.

Upon the fall of Salya, his youthful younger brother, a maharatha of almost equal accomplishment, takes the field against Yudhishtira. Determined to pay the last dues of his brother, that Madra Kshatriya lashes the Pandava king with numberless shafts. Yudhishtira destroys his opponent's bow and standard with an arrow of fire and decapitates him. O Rajan, I saw that head adorned with earrings fall from the chariot like a jiva falling from swarga after exhausting his punya. On his death, the Kurus wail aloud and run from the Pandavas.

Satyaki chases the fleeing Kauravas but encounters Kritavarman, who comes fearlessly to the rescue of your beaten army. These two illustrious heroes of Vrishni's race confront each other like furious lions. They shoot multitudes of arrows at each other and at the end of the exchange, Kritavarman finds himself without his chariot, horses and his two Parshni drivers. Seeing him in danger, Kripa rescues him in his chariot. Duryodhana's entire army melts away once more.

A dust cloud shrouds the army from view. However, it is evident that the greater portion of your army has perished and that the survivors are trying to escape. Soon, the cloud of dust settles as the blood from the battle drenches it. Seeing from his vantage point that his army is broken, Duryodhana defies the advancing Parthas alone. He covers all of them—Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, and their chariot-warriors—with his arrows and the enemy dare not close with him, as mortals fear to approach Yama. In a fresh chariot, Kritavarman rides up to support him. With six broad-headed arrows shot with great force, Yudhishtira kills his four horses, and wounds him deep. Ashwatthaman rescues Kritavarman, and whisks him away from Yudhishtira. Kripa, left to face Yudhishtira, rakes him and his horses with his masterly shafts. Thus, here and there, the fire of battle still glows.

O Bhaarata, all this is a result of you and your son's evil policy. After the death of Salya at Kurukshetra, the Parthas, filled with great joy, blow their conches, beat their drums and applaud Yudhishtira, just as the celestials once greeted Indra after he defeated Vritra in time out of mind.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After the death of Salya, Rajan, his chariot-warriors numbering seventeen hundred take to the field with great determination. Riding an elephant big as a hill, with a royal parasol unfurled over his head, and fanned with yak-tails, Duryodhana tries to stop the Madraka warriors, crying, "Stop. Do not go any further."

They pay him no heed and, pulling loudly on their bowstrings, attack the Pandava host. Hearing that Yudhishtira has killed Salya and was himself wounded by the Madraka maharatha, Arjuna races up to the spot, where, along with Bhima, the two sons of Madri, Satyaki, the five sons of Draupadi, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, the Panchalas and the Somakas, throw a defensive ring around the Dharmaputra. Like makaras agitating the ocean, they urge each other on, jostling one another's chariots.

The enemy shouts, "Where are king Yudhishtira and the Pandavas? Where are Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, Sikhandi, and the sons of Draupadi?"

Provoked, the warrior sons of Draupadi begin to cut down the Madraka soldiers. Your warriors, O Bhaarata, though forbidden by your son, continue to attack the Pandavas. Then Sakuni says to Duryodhana, "How is it that we stand impotent while the Madraka host is being slaughtered before our eyes? The understanding was that all of us should fight unitedly. Why then do you allow our enemies to kill our troops?"

Duryodhana says, “Though I expressly forbade it, they do not obey me. Together, they have penetrated the Pandava host.”

Sakuni says, “In battle, brave warriors are often carried away by their rage and do not obey their commanders. Do not be angry with them and this is not the time to stand indifferently by. Let all of us go forth together and, with our chariots, horses and elephants, try to rescue the heroic Madra soldiers. With care, Rajan, we can protect one another.”

The Kauravas agree with Sakuni and Duryodhana leads a large force to support the Madraka warriors, making loud shouts and causing the earth to resound with that noise.

Meanwhile, the Pandavas have adopted the vyuha called Madhyama. In the hand-to-hand fighting that follows, and before Duryodhana and his army could come to their rescue, the Madraka warriors perish. Broken chariots, dead men and lifeless horses cover the earth. Panic-stricken horses, still harnessed to rathas, careen wildly everywhere with their rathikas, dead and a few alive, while steeds drag broken or wheel less chariots, hampered by their traces. We see headless forms rise all around and meteor showers come flaring down from the sun.

Then the Partha army sees the advancing Kurus and, scenting final victory, turn to face them. They ride swiftly, shaking their bows, the sound of their charge mingling with the blare of their conches and their battle cries. Demoralised by the annihilation of the Madraka forces and the death of their heroic king Salya, Duryodhana’s troops once more turn their back on the battle in fear.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Upon the fall of Salya, your disheartened and frightened troops look vainly for a leader. Defeated by Yudhishtira, they flee the field at midday.

No one among your troops is prepared either to rally the army or to stand firm. We once again experience that fear and that grief that we felt upon the fall of Bhishma, Drona and Karna. The surviving Kuru army, confused, bewildered and in despair, is easily cut down by the enemy. Two thousand experienced war elephants thunder away, urged on by their hastikas with hooks and feet. Seeing them attempt to escape, the Panchalas and the Pandavas pursue them hotly with loud shouts of triumph.

They say to one another, "Today Yudhishtira has vanquished his enemies. Today Duryodhana has lost his splendour and kingship. Today, king Dhritarashtra will lie prostrate on the earth, and feel the most terrible anguish on hearing of the death of his sons. Let him know the power and great might of Kunti's son, and recollect Vidura's advice and censure himself. Let him, from this day on, wait upon the Parthas as their slave and experience the grief that they have felt for so long.

Let king Dhritarashtra know today the greatness of Krishna. Let him hear today the terrible twang of Arjuna's bow in battle, know the strength of all his astras and the might of his arms.

Today, king Dhritarashtra will recognize the awesome strength of the unrivalled Bhima when he slaughters Duryodhana, just as Indra once killed the Asura Bali.

When he hears of the death of Salya, the invincible king of the Madras, he will know the prowess of Yudhishtira. After they kill Sakuni and all the Gandharas, he will know the strength of the two sons of Madri.

Why should victory not be theirs, who have in their ranks king Yudhishtira, Arjuna, Satyaki, Bhima, Dhrishtadyumna, the two sons of Madri, the five sons of Draupadi, and Sikhandi?

Why should victory not be theirs who enjoy the protection of Krishna, Guardian of the Universe?

Why should victory not be theirs whom dharma protects? Who else but Yudhishtira, who has Krishna, the refuge of dharma for his protector, can vanquish Bhishma, Drona, Karna, Salya and hundreds of other kings?"

The Srinjayas ruthlessly pursue your shattered troops while Arjuna moves against the enemy chariot-division, and Satyaki and the two sons of Madri corner Sakuni.

Finding his troops running away in fear of Bhimasena, Duryodhana wryly tells his charioteer, "Look at the remains of my once vast host pursued by the Pandavas and the pall of dust that hangs over the battlefield. Arjuna, standing there with his great bow, bars my way. Drive carefully and take me to the rear of the army so that just as the ocean cannot overrun its continents, Dhananjaya will not be able to overpower me. If I stay and fight the Pandavas, my army will rally and return to battle with vigour."

Duryodhana's sarathy carefully guides his horses to where his master wants to position himself.

Twenty-one thousand foot-soldiers, without the help of elephants, cavalry and chariot-warriors, still stand ready for battle and prepared to lay down their lives. Bhimasena and Dhrishtadyumna besiege them with the four kinds of forces. Your foot-soldiers surround Bhima with fierce yells and the slapping of armpits. They shoot at him from all sides and block all the efforts of the Pandava forces to rescue him. Finally overcome with fury, Bhima alights from his chariot and charges them on foot, wielding his massive gada and roaring like a thundercloud. Like Yama armed with his club, the raging Bhima smashes down every last foot soldier. They fall, covered in blood, like stands of flowering karnikaras laid low by a tempest of Vayu, and present an awful and piteous sight. After annihilating that division of twenty-one thousand, Bhima rejoins Dhrishtadyumna to continue fighting from his chariot.

Yudhishtira's forces fail to contain or hem Duryodhana in. His ability to hold them off proves prodigious. Addressing his army, which has not fled too far, he says again to them, “There is no place where the Pandavas will not pursue and kill you. Of what use then is flight? The army of the Pandavas is small and the two Krishnas are sorely wounded. If all of us make a united stand, victory can still be ours. Listen to me, noble Kshatriyas. When Yama always takes heroes and cowards alike, what man who calls himself a Kshatriya will not fight? Death in battle according to Kshatriya dharma will lead to happiness. If we die, we will enjoy great felicity in the other world. O Kauravas, there is no better path to heaven than that offered by battle.”

The Kuru commanders applaud his words and once more take the field against the Pandavas. Led by Arjuna, the Parthas arrayed in battle order and sensing imminent victory, charge them. The two sons of Madri and Satyaki attack Sakuni, and the other Pandava shuras charge your army with final ferocity.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'The fleeing Kuru army turns and makes a stand and Salwa, king of the Mlecchas, leads the attack against the Pandava force. He rides a hulking elephant oozing ichor, big as Indradeva's Airavata. Bred from a high and noble strain, this beast is well trained; it can trample enemy troops to a pulp and is held in high esteem by Duryodhana. Seated on that magnificent elephant, Salwa attacks the Pandavas with fearsome shafts that resemble Indra's Vajra.

Neither the Kauravas nor the Pandavas see any weakness in his defences, as he decimates the enemy warriors with his arrows. The Pandavas, the Somakas, and the Srinjayas see that massive elephant thundering down at them and run in terror, crushing their own ranks as they do. All the warriors of your army blow their conches in triumph.

Dhrishtadyumna, the senapati of the Pandava and Srinjaya forces, hears the Kaurava shouts of joy and the blare of their conches, and rides to block the elephant's charge. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna racing towards him, Salwa quickly turns his great beast to confront him. His opponent sinks three flaming arrows into the elephant's lofty forehead and then five more. Blood streaming, the beast trumpets in pain and runs wildly, but Salwa manages to control it with hooks and goads and to turn back and charge his opponent. A terrified Dhrishtadyumna jumps out of his chariot just in time, and the mastodon crushes his gold-decked chariot with its horses and charioteer, and lifting it up into the air with his trunk, dashes it to the ground. Seeing this, Bhima, Sikhandi and Satyaki dash up and with some quicksilver archery manage to stop the advancing beast. Meanwhile, Salwa continues to rain down his arrows and soon puts the attacking Pandava maharathas to flight. The Panchalas, Srinjayas, and the Matsyas, who bear the brunt of his assault, finally surround the animal.

Dhrishtadyumna pounds the elephant with his great mace and splits open the elephant's head; with a dismal cry, it falls like a mountain crumbling in an earthquake. Even as the leviathan falls, Satyaki decapitates king Salwa with a broad-headed shaft. Like a mountaintop struck by Indra's Vajra, Salwa falls dead with his magnificent animal.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After the death of the heroic Salwa, your army is like a great tree broken by the force of a tempest, and only Kritavarman fights on. The Kuru warriors, who had earlier fled, rally and come back on seeing the Satwata warrior stand firm like a hill pierced with arrows, and another bloody contention takes place between the two armies. Encouraged and resolute, the Kauravas give vent to roars that seem to reach into the very heavens and now the Panchalas are afraid.

Storming the battlefield, Satyaki despatches king Kshemakirti to Yamaloka with seven shafts that pierce his body deep and strike off his head. Kritavarman immediately challenges him and a furious duel ensues between the two heroes of the Vrishni-Andhaka vamsa. Manoeuvring their chariots in different tracks, the son of Hridika and the bull of Sini's race soon strike each other with showers of arrows that soar into the sky like locust swarms and fall like gashes of lightning. Soon Satyaki has his bow destroyed and Kritavarman loses his charioteer, horses and his standard. They continue to bloody each other with javelins and arrows. The Kaurava troops see the great Kritavarman without his chariot and cornered by Satyaki. Kripacharya comes charging in and spirits Kritavarman away from the press of battle and mortal peril.

The Kuru army once more retreats from the field. The enemy, however, does not see this, for a dust cloud shrouds the Kaurava forces. Only Duryodhana, who singly counterattacks the victorious Pandava army, is still fighting. Fearlessly, he assails all the Pandus—Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, the Panchalas, the Kaikeyas, the Somakas, and the sons of Draupadi. Your son is like a blazing yagna fire sanctified with mantras. His foes make no impression on him, like living beings who cannot approach the Great Destroyer. Then Kritavarman returns to the field riding another chariot.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'King Duryodhana, riding on his chariot and filled with the courage of despair, stands resolute on the field, like the valorous Rudra himself. The arrows he shoots completely cover the earth and there is not a man among the Pandavas, not a horse, an elephant, or a chariot that his arrows did not find. Your son's prowess is wonderful, and even a united Pandava army cannot contain him. His shafts find all the Pandava shuras—Yudhishtira, Bhima, Sahadeva, Nakula, Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki and the sons of Draupadi. They target him from all sides but Duryodhana does not waver. His quickness, skill and prowess amaze the watching troops.

Meanwhile, the Dhartarashtras who had not fled too far unite and surge back to support Suyodhana against the Pandavas. The noise made by them is like the roar of the ocean in the season of rains. Arrows shroud the sky and the fighting men can barely see each other. Aswatthaman and Bhimasena, their forearms scarred from their bowstrings, duel ferociously, frightening the whole universe.

With a shout, Sakuni attacks Yudhishtira and kills his four horses, as the Pandava troops tremble. Sahadeva rescues his brother and the Dharmaraja soon returns on another chariot to renew his battle with Sakuni. Fervid is their fight and wonderful to behold; it wins the applause of the Siddhas and the Charanas.

Shooting showers of arrows from all sides, Sakuni's son Uluka and Nakula duel and these two evenly matched maharathas also fight ferociously. Magnificent like Sakra battling the Asura Bala, Satyaki battles Kritavarman.

Duryodhana splits Dhrishtadyumna's bow and slashes him with his sharp arrows. Dhrishtadyumna takes up another formidable bow and the battle between them intensifies, O Bharatarishabha, like a contention between two wild and infuriated elephants with ichor trickling down their limbs.

Acharya Kripa fights Draupadi's five sons, engaging them like a man battling his five senses. Both sides show no mercy and the battle between them is awe-inspiring.

The general conflict, O Rajan, is appalling with many bloody duels. A dense cloud of dust raised by the chariots and the horses hangs over the battlefield and the wind carries it from place to place. It dims the sun and covers the earth and all the warriors become invisible. Shortly, when the ground is soaked with the blood of the combatants, the cloud of dust disappears and everything becomes visible. I can once more clearly see the different brutal single combats around me and hear the strange sound of thousands of flying arrows, like that made by a vast forest of burning bamboo.'"

Sanjaya says, 'Despite the setbacks suffered by your army at the hands of the Pandavas, your sons manage to gather your maharathas and they continue to battle the enemy, disregarding the darkness everywhere. Savagely they fight, using guesswork and by identifying the enemy from the names they shout. The devastation is immense.

First turning on Kripacharya and then on Kritavarman, Yudhishtira kills the Bhoja's four horses. Rescuing him from the battlefield, Aswatthaman drives Kritavarman away in his chariot while Kripa easily holds his own against his old pupil. Duryodhana sends reinforcements of seven hundred chariots to join the attack on Yudhishtira and these maharathas surround and rain arrows over him. Sikhandi sees Yudhishtira hemmed in and leads a squadron of Pandava chariots to his rescue.

In a fearful bloodbath, Sikhandi's forces butcher the seven hundred enemy chariot-warriors of the Kuru army. Awful portents appear on the field, presaging the destruction of the world. The earth, with her mountains and forests, quakes violently. Meteors like blazing brands fall from the sky, Rajan, as if from the sun. A hurricane springs up, whipping away rocks and stones along its fringes. The elephants shed copious tears and tremble with fear.

Disregarding all these omens, the fighting Kshatriyas consult one another and stand prepared on the sacred field of Kurukshetra, just ready to find swarga. Then Sakuni says, "Advance the enemy from the front. I will attack the Pandavas from behind."

The remaining Madraka warriors, followed by others, surge forward with enthusiasm and shout out their defiance. The invincible Pandavas shake their bows and greet the Madrakas with searing volleys of arrows. This disheartens Duryodhana's troops and, once more, they waver.

Then, O Bharatarishabha, the full contingent of ten thousand Madraka lancers led by Sakuni makes a surprise attack on the Pandava's from their rear, and puts them to flight. Yudhishtira, who is watching the battle from a slight remove, says to Sahadeva, "Look, the son of Subala attacks our rear and is slaughtering our forces. Take Draupadi's sons, all our elephants and cavalry and some three thousand foot-soldiers, and hold him while I lead the Panchalas against his chariot force."

Seven hundred war elephants, five thousand cavalry, and three thousand foot-soldiers, led by Sahadeva and the sons of Draupadi, ambush Sakuni who is attacking the Pandava forces from the rear. The Pandava cavalry penetrates Sakuni's division and overruns his chariot-warriors. These horsemen combine with their elephant division and overwhelm the enemy host with a great barrage of arrows.

Rajan, this terrible battle, also, is the consequence of your evil designs.

The twang of bowstrings is no longer heard, for all the maharathas stand as mere spectators. The opponents are evenly matched and the lances and javelins they furiously hurl at each other fly like locust swarms or meteor showers through the sky and present a beautiful spectacle. Again, a dust cloud covers the troops and a thick gloom falls on the battlefield. We see many of those brave warriors move away while others fall down on the earth, vomiting blood. Wounded horses, with limbs streaming blood, fall in their thousands. Many fighting men stagger about wounded and deranged, or, their weapons lost, weakly wrestle with each other. Thousands of dead warriors in blood-stained armour and still clutching weapons, elephant-riders, horses and horsemen, and foot-soldiers litter the earth and lie huddled together in that gory carnage. The battlefield is impassable and no warrior can take his horse or chariot forward in any direction for any distance.

After fighting for a while, Sakuni retires from the battle with his remaining six thousand cavalry. The Pandava maharathas, still determined to lay down their lives, say, "When we can no longer fight here on chariots, how much less will it be possible to fight on elephants. Let chariots move against chariots, and elephants against elephants. Sakuni has left with his Gandharas and is unlikely to come again to fight."

The sons of Draupadi lead the elephant division to join Dhrishtadyumna's forces, while Sahadeva joins Yudhishtira. Then suddenly, Sakuni erupts out of nowhere and falls upon the Panchala prince's division, and another vicious and bloody skirmish follows. In the hair-raising bloodletting, close relatives strike each other and fight like hawks fighting over pieces of meat. The noise of neighing horses, of shouting men, and of spears striking home and swords clashing is thunderous.

Rajan, all this is the result of your evil policy.

Finally, overcome with exhaustion, parched with thirst, spent with rage, their animals fatigued and they themselves wounded, your men turn away from the mayhem. Many maddened by the scent of blood kill friend and foe alike. Wolves and jackals howl and scream. Your army suffers great losses.

Bodies of men and horses are scattered over the earth and cover it with rillets of blood. When the deafening noise of war somewhat subsides, Sakuni once more attacks the main host of the Pandavas with his remaining cavalry and yet again a crimson conflict breaks out.'"

"Sanjaya continues, 'Subala's son Sakuni leads his remaining seven hundred horsemen to attack the Pandavas. Looking around for their king, they identify him, standing under a large sovereign parasol, splendid like the full moon and surrounded by his mail-clad warriors.

Sakuni moves to meet Duryodhana standing amidst his chariot-force, and cheerfully says, "Destroy the Pandavas chariot divisions. I have overcome his cavalry but Yudhishtira himself cannot be slain unless one is ready to lay down one's life. After we annihilate his chariot force, we will overwhelm his elephants, foot-soldiers and the rest!"

Encouraged by this news and eager for victory, your warriors jubilantly forge ahead, with war cries and shaking their bows, to attack the Pandava army. Once more, we hear the fierce twanging of bowstrings and the slapping of palms and the rush of arrows. Seeing them come, Arjuna says, "O Krishna, delve into this sea of troops and I will end this war today, the eighteenth of this mahayuddha. Duryodhana's once oceanic army is now so small that it resembles the mark of a cow's hoof. Look at the horrible course of Destiny! If we had made peace after Bhishma's fall, everything would have been well. Indeed, there was no reason why the war should have continued after our Pitama fell. Bhishma pleaded for sanity even then but the foolish Duryodhana would not listen to him.

When Drona, that great Brahmana, fell and when we killed Karna and his sons and only a small remnant of the Kaurava army was left alive, the madness and slaughter still continued! Why, even after the death of Srutayush, of Jalasandha of Puru's race, of king Srutayudha, after the fall of Bhurisrava, of Salya, and of the Avanti heroes, the killing did not cease. After the death of Jayadratha, of the Rakshasa Alayudha, of Bahlika, and of Somadatta, the war went on. Even after the fall of the heroic Bhagadatta, of Sudakshina the Kamboja lord, and of Dusasana, the battle did not stop. Despite the death of their great kings, each a ruler of vast lands, even after Bhimasena destroyed a full aksauhini of troops, O Krishna, the war did not end because of the folly and the greed of the Dhartarashtras.

What king born into a noble race, a vamsa especially like that of Kuru, other than the foolish Duryodhana, would continue this dreadful and fruitless war? Which sane and wise man, capable of discriminating good from evil, would wage war, knowing his enemy to be superior to him in merit, strength, and courage? How could he listen to the counsels of another and ignore your wise words to make peace with the Pandavas? What specific can be palatable to that man today, who disregarded the Pitamaha, Drona and Vidura, when they urged him not to make war?

How can he accept good advice, Janardana, when he insolently disregarded his own aged sire as well as his own well-meaning mother when they sought to give him sage advice? It is evident from his conduct and policy that Duryodhana was born to exterminate his very race.

It is my opinion that he still does not intend to give us back our kingdom. The noble Vidura warned me of this many times and said, "As long as Dhritarashtra lives, that evil man will never give us justice. You can vanquish Duryodhana only in battle!"

When Duryodhana was born, many Rishis foretold that he would become the cause of the extermination of all Kshatriya kind. I will decimate all his warriors today and Duryodhana will have to fight us alone for his own destruction. Only thus will this war end.

I have come to this conclusion after much thought of my own, reflection on everything Vidura said, and taking into account the evil deeds of the vile Duryodhana, who has no trace of nobility in him. Ride through the Kaurava army, O Purushottama, for I will finish Duryodhana and his army today and do what will benefit Yudhishtira."

Reins in hand and resplendent on his wonderful ratha, Krishna rides deep into the enemy ranks. His white horses seem to cavort, as the ratha rolls forward and thousands of gold-winged arrows, steeped in oil, polished by the hands of expert smiths, and marked with Arjuna's name, issue from it and cover the sky. Struck by these shafts, the Kauravas wilt like elephants when hunters chase them with burning brands, and they fall like dying locusts. Like a roaring fire that consumes forests full of dry trees and creepers, Arjuna incinerates your son's troops. No armour can keep out his gold-winged arrows shot with superhuman accuracy and force. He does not need to shoot a second arrow at anyone. Like the Vajradhari striking down the Daityas, Arjuna destroys the enemy's chariot-warrior division.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The Kaurava forces, O Kurudvaha, turn tail, deserting their relatives and comrades, unable to face Dhananjaya and his Gandiva. However, after they slake their thirst, some indomitable warriors groom their animals, change their armour, comfort their injured kinsmen and take them to the camp and, obedient to your son's command, once more advance against the Pandavas.

They attack Dhrishtadyumna's forces amidst the Pandava divisions, as well as Sikhandi, Satanika and the son of Nakula. Then your son joins the attack and looses dense swarms of arrows at the Panchala prince. In a fiery duel between the two, Duryodhana loses his four horses and charioteer and he has to run to Sikhandi's division for safety.

With the Kaurava chariot division destroyed, their three thousand elephants surround the five Pandavas. Arjuna takes to the great beasts and every polished shaft he unleashes claims an elephant's life. Taking up his formidable gada, Bhima jumps down from his chariot, like Yama with his cudgel, and rushes at the hulking beasts. Seeing him come with mace aloft, your soldiers are terrified. The elephants run in panic with cries of pain, their temporal globes split open by his flying, uncanny gada, all their grand limbs bathed in blood; and they collapse like the wingless mountains of old. Yudhishtira and the two sons of Madri join the horrible fray and massacre the elephant-warriors with arrows fletched with vulture's feathers.

After routing the Kuru king and seeing him flee on horseback, Dhrishtadyumna sees the Pandavas still surrounded by the Kaurava elephants. He arrives quickly to give them support.

Meanwhile, Ashwatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman, are worried not at seeing Duryodhana in that havoc, and fear that he is dead. With sorrowful faces, they enquire about him until some men tell them that he has taken refuge with Sakuni. Other Kshatriyas there say, “Do look if he is still alive. But what need have we for Duryodhana? You fight all united. What will the king do for you?”

Other Kshatriyas, who have lost many of their relatives and who are still targeted by the arrows of the enemy, say, “Let us deal with these forces that confront us. Look, the Pandavas are coming at us after despatching our elephants!”

Aswatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman scythe through Dhrishtadyumna’s force and meet up with Sakuni in search of Duryodhana. Meanwhile, the Pandavas, led by Dhrishtadyumna, attack our troops. Although I had only two kinds of forces left, I, too, decide to risk my life, join the five leaders of our army and put my troops at Kripa’s disposal. We are immediately attacked by Arjuna but we launch a fierce onslaught on Dhrishtadyumna’s division. However, he is indomitable and forces us to retreat.

It is then that Satyaki attacks me with four hundred chariots. I had managed to escape from Dhrishtadyumna only because his horses were tired, but now I fell among Satyaki’s forces even as a sinner falls into hell. A brief but brutal skirmish ensues, and I lose my armour and Satyaki captures me when I fall insensible on the ground.

Then, within a short while, Bhima with his mace and Arjuna with his arrows destroy our elephant force. The bodies of the dead beasts, big as hills, entirely clog the field until the mighty Bhima drags them away bodily and makes a path for the Pandavas’ rathas to roll out.

Ashwatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman, not finding Duryodhana among the chariot-division, continue to search for your royal son and join Sakuni, anxious to catch a glimpse of the king after that horrific carnage of the great and noble elephants.’”

"Sanjaya says, 'Arjuna and Bhimasena between them destroy your army and elephant-division, O Bhaarata. Your remaining sons, Durmarshana, Srutanta, Jaitra, Bhurivala, Ravi, Jayatsena, Sujata, Durvisaha, Durvimochana, Dushpradharsha and Srutarvan, join forces to counter Bhima. All of them, equally brave and able warriors, surround him from all sides and wildly assail him.

Mounted once more on his chariot, a berserk Bhimasena first decapitates Durmarshana with a razor-headed arrow and, in quick succession, kills Srutanta and Jayatsena. Srutarvan shoots Bhima with a hundred arrows winged with vulture feathers but, indifferent to his attack, Bhima strikes down Jaitra, Ravi and Bhurivala. With another broad-headed shaft, he kills Durvimochana and then sends Dushpradharsha and Sujata to Yamaloka. Seeing your other son, Durvishaha, rushing towards him, Bhima cuts him down in full view of all the bowmen. With so many of his brothers dead, Srutavan attacks Bhima with his formidable golden bow, in anger and despair. He breaks Bhima's bow and wounds him, but in the savage battle that follows, like the one between Vasava and the Asura Jambha long ago, Bhima beheads him.

Upon his fall, your troops, though terrified, still maintain their siege on Bhimasena and attempt to surround him. Like Indra smiting the Asuras, he destroys five hundred maharathas and kills seven hundred elephants, ten thousand foot-soldiers and eight hundred horses. After killing most of your sons, Bhima is satisfied that he has accomplished the purpose of his birth. He then slaps his armpits and terrifies the huge elephants with that awful sound. By now, your army, Rajan, which has lost a countless number of men, is completely demoralised.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Only two of your sons still live, Duryodhana and Sudarsana, who are leading the Kaurava cavalry.

Krishna tells Arjuna, "Many of our kinsmen and allies are dead but our enemy has suffered greater losses. Here comes Satyaki with Sanjaya as his captive. Both Nakula and Sahadeva are exhausted, and Dhrishtadyumna, after decimating Duryodhana's troops, leads the Prabhadrakas. Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman have left Duryodhana's side and taken up their positions elsewhere. There, Partha, is Duryodhana at the head of his cavalry, with the royal chatra held over his head and casting keen glances all around. He has created a new vyuha with the remnants of his army.

Having slain a large number of your troops, he wears a proud look as if he believes that he has vanquished the Pandavas. Destroy his troops and then he will certainly come to battle himself. The sinful Duryodhana should never escape and you must try and kill him."

Arjuna replies, "Bhima has killed almost all the sons of Dhritarashtra. Only these two are alive and they also, Krishna, will die today! Bhishma lies on his bed of arrows and Drona, Karna, Salya and Jayadratha are dead. Barely five hundred horsemen of Sakuni's troops and two hundred chariots remain. A hundred formidable elephants and about three thousand foot soldiers are still alive on the field. There remain Aswatthaman, Kripa, the king of the Trigartas, Uluka, Kritavarman and a few others from Duryodhana's army. Truly, there may be no escape from death for anybody on earth, but look, Duryodhana is still alive!'"

Today Yudhishtira will be free of all his enemies. I will win back all the possessions that the evil Sakuni took from us at the game of dice."

The chariot driven by Krishna moves towards Duryodhana's division and, together with Bhimasena and Sahadeva, they launch an attack on him. Seeing this, Sakuni and Susarman fly up to obstruct them while your son Sudarsana confronts Bhimasena, and Duryodhana, on horseback, confronts Sahadeva.

Duryodhana strikes Sahadeva in the head with a spear forcing him to sit down on the terrace of his chariot, his blood streaming and sighing like a snake. Regaining his senses, Sahadeva gets up and strikes back at Duryodhana with a towering gale of arrows. Arjuna first mows down the Kaurava cavalry, then takes on the Trigartha chariot-warriors led by Satyakarman. He destroys his adversary's ratha before he casually strikes his head off in a scarlet burst. Next, like a hungry lion pouncing on a deer in the forest, he kills Satyeshu.

Venting an anger nurtured over so many long years, Arjuna attacks Susarman, the lord of Prashthala, with a hundred arrows and kills all his horses. Then, with a thin smile, Partha buries an arrow like Yama's danda into Susarman's heart and, at last, the king of the Trigartas dies. Not pausing a moment, Arjuna despatches that Samsaptaka's five and thirty sons, maharathas all, and all of dead Susarman's warriors that still remain alive.

A raging Bhima beheads your son Sudarsana with a razor-faced arrow. The dead prince's followers surround Bhima and rain arrows over him but he kills them all, O Bharatarishabha, snarling like a mythic lion out of lost times. Soon there is a general battle as many Kaurava commanders charge up and engage Bhima and his men. Thousands die on both sides. The rills of blood flow again, though they are so much thinner than they were earlier.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'During the mayhem of that battle, Sakuni attacks Sahadeva while Uluka does Bhima and they target each other with their golden arrows fletched with kanka and peacock feathers and sped from bow strings drawn to their ears. Bhima and Sahadeva cover the sky with their arrows, covering the sun; when the arrows fall on enemy ranks, blood gushes free everywhere. Dead horses, riders and the other detritus of battle clog the zones of battle across the field. The earth presents another fearsome sight where headless and bleeding bodies rise up and seem to dance as carnivores of diverse kinds swarm Kurukshetra to feast. Full of heart now, the Pandavas despatch the Kauravas in dense throngs to Yama.

Meanwhile, Sakuni stuns Sahadeva again with another spear to his head, driving him onto his knees on the terrace of his chariot. Bhima lets out a shattering roar to see this and sets about the whole Kuru army with his cloth-yard shafts. All Sakuni's soldiers with their horses and elephants flee in terror of Vayu's son.

King Duryodhana tries to stop them, roaring, "Stop, you cowards without Kshatriya dharma! Fight! What use of flight? The warrior who dies without turning his back on battle will have fame in this world and enjoy realms of bliss in the next!"

Hearing this ringing exhortation, Sakuni's warriors turn back against the Pandavas, with a sound like that of an angry sea. Meanwhile, Rajan, Sahadeva recovers and a duel between him and Sakuni develops. Sakuni dares to face both Nakula and Bhimasena and his son Uluka comes swiftly to support his father. The battle between the three Kshatriyas becomes feverish as they decant showers of arrows on each other. Until, with a broad-headed arrow, Sahadeva decapitates Uluka and he falls out of his chariot, his naked throat spouting blood. Drawing deep breaths, his eyes red and teary, Sakuni bitterly remembers what Vidura once said in warning, and renews his attack on Sahadeva, who promptly breaks the Gandhara king's bow in his hands. At this, Sakuni hurls, in quick succession, a formidable sword, a fearsome mace, and finally a vicious dart at Madri's stormy son. Sahadeva destroys all these with utmost ease as they fly towards him.

Seeing his son killed and his attack repulsed, Sakuni and all your troops take to their heels with Sahadeva and the Pandava forces in hot pursuit.

Sahadeva soon catches up with Sakuni fleeing with the Gandhara cavalry. Aware that killing Sakuni was his task, Sahadeva strings his bow and drawing it with great force, rakes the gambler with arrows fletched with vulture feathers. Sahadeva says, "Observe Kshatriya dharma and fight me. How you enjoyed gambling with the ivory dice, Sakuni. Now reap the fruits of your evil deed just as the others have. Only the wretch, your nephew Duryodhana, and you are still alive. And now I will take your head like plucking a fruit from a tree with a stick!"

Sahadeva rushes wildly at Sakuni to consume him with his anger; forcefully drawing his bow, he wounds Sakuni and his horses and cuts down his royal parasol, standard and cleaves his bow. Sakuni raises a golden lance to fling at Sahadeva. However, with three wedge-headed arrows, in a single moment, Madri's son breaks that uplifted weapon as well as hacks away both Sakuni's rounded arms and lets out a simhanada. Then, with another flat-headed shaft with wings of gold, Sahadeva cuts the vile gambler's head from his neck in a scarlet flash and drops his body onto the earth. Thus is that clever, scheming, ruthless head, which was the source, the font of the Kuru's evil policy, finally removed. Seeing Sakuni lying headless and bleeding on the ground, your warriors are paralysed with fear, and run in all directions.

The Pandavas, O Bhaarata, are delighted at their success. Rejoicing with Kesava among them, they blow their conches and bring cheer to their troops. They hail and congratulate Sahadeva with joy and say, "It is fate that has allowed you to kill the evil Sakuni and his son today!"""

HRADA-PRAVESA PARVA

"Sanjaya says, 'After the slaying of Sakuni and his son, his soldiers, O Rajan, mad with rage, launch a suicidal attack on the Pandavas. They come up against Arjuna and Bhimasena who have ridden hard to bring reinforcements for Sahadeva. Arjuna serenely cuts down all the weapons with which they shower him and makes short work of them, every last man of them, with his Gandiva. Gathering his remaining chariot force, which still numbers many hundreds, his elephants, cavalry and foot soldiers, Duryodhana sends them against Dhrishtadyumna's forces. With no one to lead or protect them, they are easy prey for the Pandavas who repulse their attack, while inflicting heavy losses on them.

The dust of battle completely obscures the sky as the Pandus and the Srinjayas annihilate all your akshauhinis.

Finally, among the thousands of noble kings on your side, only a severely wounded Duryodhana remains alive. Stupefied, he sees the earth empty of his troops and contemplates retreat from the battlefield while the Pandavas, filled with joy, loudly celebrate their success.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me the strength of the Pandavas troops at that time. What does my only surviving son, the wicked Duryodhana, do when he sees his army exterminated?'

Sanjaya says, ‘Of the mighty Pandava host led by Dhrishtadyumna, only two thousand chariots, seven hundred elephants, five thousand horses, and ten thousand foot-soldiers remain. Very few warriors from the eleven akshauhinis of the Kaurava army are left alive on that eighteenth day of the Great War.

Duryodhana abandons his horse, which indeed dies under him from exhaustion, and taking his gada, escapes eastwards on foot, towards the Dwaipayana lake. As he goes, the whole world spins around him and he remembers the dire warnings of the wise and virtuous Vidura, who, with clairvoyant vision, foresaw this great carnage of Kshatriyas on Kurukshetra. His heart burning with grief, Suyodhana takes refuge in the depths of the lake, submerging himself.

The Pandavas led by Dhrishtadyumna try to cut him off and attack his small escort. Arjuna stands glorious on his chariot, as he picks them off with a flurry of arrows from the Gandiva.

After the annihilation of Sakuni and his forces, your army is like a large forest laid low by Vayu himself. Save Aswatthaman, Kritavarman, Kripacharya, and your son Duryodhana, not another maharatha remains alive.

Seeing me, Dhrishtadyumna laughingly asks Satyaki, “What is the use of capturing him and keeping him alive?”

Satyaki raises his sword to kill me, but just then, Vyasa, the Island-born Maharishi Dwaipayana arrives there and says, “Let Sanjaya go. Do not kill him!”

At once Satyaki joins his palms together in reverence, and sets me free saying, “Peace, Sanjaya. You are free to go.”

I then take off my armour, surrender my weapons, and with my limbs bathed in blood, set out for the city. After I travel some two yojanas, I see Duryodhana, wounded, bleeding and standing with mace in hand. His eyes are full of tears and he looks blankly at me without recognition. I, too, was overwhelmed and for a little while could not speak a word. Then I tell him about my capture, and my release through the intervention of Vyasa. He composes himself, inquires about his brothers and his troops. Since I had witnessed everything, I tell him that his brothers are all dead and his troops exterminated. I tell the king that the Rishi Vyasa had confirmed that we now have only three maharathas left alive.

Sighing deeply, your son touches me with his hand and says, "Except you, Sanjaya, everyone else from my army is dead, while the Pandava and their allies are alive. Without friends, sons and brothers, seeing my kingdom taken by the Pandavas, who would want to live on? Tell my father, the blind king Dhritarashtra that, though badly wounded, I have escaped alive from this dreadful war and have entered the depths of Dwaipayana lake to rest and heal myself in its sacral waters."

With these words, he walks into the lake and using his power of illusion, charms the waters to make space for him and disappears. Soon after, I see Kripacharya, Aswatthaman and Kritavarman drive up, wounded and weary, on their tired animals. They greet me saying, "You are fortunate, Sanjaya, to be alive. Is Duryodhana also alive?"

I then tell them that the king was alive and everything that Duryodhana had said to me. I point out the lake that the king had entered. At this Aswatthaman cries, "The king does not know that we are still alive! With him among us, we can still fight our enemies."

Those maharathas stand there and lament until they see the Pandavas approaching. Then Kripa takes me up on his magnificent chariot and we drive to the Kuru camp. The sun has already set and the troops guarding the outposts of the camp weep on learning of the death of all your sons and the destruction of the whole army. Then the old men, whose responsibility it was to look after the women of the royal household, take the weeping princesses to Hastinapura. They rend their bodies with their nails, strike their heads with their hands, beat their breasts and, untying their hair, sob, wail aloud and shriek dementedly. Their ceaseless cries, like those of a flock of female ospreys, overwhelm the earth with the sound of their sorrow.

The friends of Duryodhana strike camp and set out for the city, taking the women of the royal household with them. Others take their wives and worldly possessions on mule carts, and hurry towards the city. Those very delicate women, O Rajan, who have never bared themselves to even the sun, find themselves now exposed to the gaze of the common people. The people, filled with panic and fear of Bhima and the Parthas, flee towards the city.

A grief-stricken Yuyutsu, the son of Dhritarashtra's Vaishya wife, thinks about what he should do in this crisis. He thinks, "Duryodhana and eleven akshauhinis of troops have been defeated by the Pandavas. All his brothers and all the Kauravas, led by Bhishma and Drona, have perished. Destiny has ordained that only I should survive. The entire Kuru camp, including the women of the royal household, enervated, lord less, and deranged with grief, is running like a herd of deer. Ah, no one has seen such a sight ever before. I think that the time has come when I, too, should take refuge in the city with them."

He presents himself before Yudhishtira and Krishna to seek their permission; the compassionate king embraces him affectionately and lets him go. He leaves to supervise the journey of the women of the royal Kuru household to the city. Just as the sun sets, Yuyutsu enters the city of Hastinapura with the widowed, weeping women.

He sees the wise Vidura, who had just left Dhritarashtra, sitting with tearful eyes and his heart a stone of grief. He bows to him and stands waiting, as Vidura, the dharmatma, says, "It is fortunate, son, that you are still alive after the great carnage of the Kurus. But tell me why you have come without king Duryodhana?"

Yuyutsu replies, "After the fall of Sakuni, my lord, with all his kinsmen and friends, Suyodhana escaped on foot towards the east while all the rest in the Kaurava encampment, and the royal women under escort, fled to the city. To protect these people, I myself set out for Hastinapura with Yudhishtira and Kesava's leave."

Vidura lauds Yuyutsu and says, "You have acted very properly under the circumstances and maintained the honour of your race. You are now, in every sense, the sole staff of the blind king bereft of foresight. Afflicted by calamity, buffeted by Destiny, and despite all good advice, he continues to pursue his evil designs. Rest here today. Tomorrow you may return to Yudhishtira."

Vidura returns to the sorrowing palace of the king, which has lost all its magnificence; comfort, lustre and every happiness seems to have deserted it. It is empty and in utter disorder. Seeing this, Vidura's grief increases and sighing deeply, he enters the once hallowed halls.

Yuyutsu passes that night in untold sorrow and finds no joy at the praises of the vabdhis and magadhis that greet him in the morning. He can only think about the complete and unthinkable destruction of the Bharatas at each other's hands.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'After the Pandavas kill all the Kaurava troops, what do those survivors of my army do—Kritavarman, Kripa and Aswatthaman and my evil son Duryodhana?'

Sanjaya says, 'After the noble Kshatriya women flee and the Kaurava camp becomes empty, the surviving three maharathas grow anxious about the safety of the king. As they drive anxiously towards the lake, they can hear the shouts of the victorious Pandavas. Meanwhile, Yudhishtira and his brothers prowl the battlefield in search of Duryodhana. They fail to find him since he has already ensconced himself at the bottom of the lake. The Pandavas search for him until their mounts are tired, and then retire to their camp for the night.

When all is quiet, Kripa, Aswatthaman and Kritavarman slowly approach the lake where the king lies hidden and resting within the waters, and say, "Arise, O Rajan, and join us in our fight against Yudhishtira! We will either find victory and rule the earth, or die and find swarga for ourselves. The Pandavas have suffered heavy losses, and the survivors have grievous wounds. They will not be able to stand up to you, especially when we are there to support you."

Duryodhana says, "It is my good fortune that I see you shuras return alive from this vicious war. Your exhortations are not surprising, for your hearts are noble and your devotion to me is great. We are all tired and wounded while the Pandavas are swelling with triumph. Let us not be peremptory but rest for this one night and tomorrow go forth and finish the enemy."

Aswatthaman replies, "Bless you, Duryodhana. Arise and we will yet vanquish the enemy. I swear by all my punya, by all the dakshina I have given and by dharma itself, that I will kill the Somakas today! Let no rewards that come from performing yagnas accrue to me, if I do not kill the Pandavas this night. I swear that I will not take off my armour without slaying all the Panchalas."

While they are thus conversing, some hunters who regularly supply Bhima with wild game come there to slake their thirst. As they sit on the banks of the lake, they hear every word of that conversation between Duryodhana and the three maharathas. They realise that the king is hiding in the depths of the lake, unwilling to fight. A little while earlier, they met Yudhishtira searching for the Kaurava king, and he had asked them about his cousin's whereabouts. The hunters decide to tell the Pandavas about Duryodhana's location and are sure that the Dharmaraja would reward them generously.

The hunters make their way to where the Pandavas are resting in their camp. The Pandavas' spies and soldiers had made a futile search of the surroundings and reported that they could find no trace of Duryodhana. Yudhishtira is worried when the hunters arrive with their news. Though they are not allowed to see the king, they tell Bhima whatever they have seen and heard at the lake. Vrikodara, O Rajan, rewards them bounteously and rushes to Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, saying, "The vetalas have discovered Duryodhana. He has hidden himself in the Dwaipayana lake with sorcery."

Led by Krishna, Yudhishtira, the Pandavas and the Panchalas hurry to the lake, shouting, "The evil son of Dhritarashtra has been found!"

The noise made by their chariots touches the heavens. Although their animals are tired, all of them, Arjuna, Bhimasena, the two sons of Madri, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, Uttamaujas, Yudhamanyu, Satyaki, the five sons of Draupadi, and the other Panchalas who are still alive, with all their elephants and foot-soldiers, come to the lake. The lake is wide as a small sea and its waters are cool and transparent. Your son Duryodhana rests submerged and invisible in it, armed with his mace.

Hearing the noise of the Pandavas' approach, Kritavarman, Kripa and Aswatthaman say to Duryodhana, "The jubilant Pandavas are coming! We must leave this place for now."

Duryodhana submerges again with his mayic powers, and remains hidden within. The three maharathas led by Kripa sorrowfully take his leave, and go some distance away and sit down under the shade of a banyan tree, exhausted and anxious about how the king would deal with the sons of Pandu.

Kripa and the others free the horses from their chariots and rest, hidden, under the spreading tree.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'No sooner have the three maharathas left, that the Pandavas reach lake Dwaipayana. Yudhishtira says to Krishna, "Look, Dhritarashtra's son has cast a devamaya over the lake and has hidden himself beneath its waters. But, Madhava, even if Indra comes to help him, I will still kill Duryodhana today."

Krishna says, "One who uses maya should be killed with maya. Use your own powers, O Bhaarata, and dispel Duryodhana's illusion that makes the water seem like solid ground. This is how Indra himself killed the Daityas and the Danavas. The noble Vishnu captured Bali and killed the great Asuras Hiranyaksha, Hiranyakasipu and Vritra using maya shakti. Rama killed the Rakshasa Ravana of Pulastya's race and his relatives and followers, with the powers of sorcery.

The Devas used maya long ago, to kill Danavas, Rakshasas and the two Daityas, Taraka and Viprachitti, as well as and the Asuras Vatapi, Ilwala, Trisiras, Sunda and Upasunda. Indra rules as the lord of heaven, with the help of his maya shakti. Yudhishtira, you must also use maya today to kill your evil cousin."

Yudhishtira taunts your son hidden in the lake, "O Suyodhana, coward, you now hide in these waters after you have caused the destruction of your own race and of all Kshatriya kind! Where is your sense of honour? I never thought you were a coward but I am convinced today that your renown as a great hero is unfounded.

Come out and fight, if you are a Kshatriya. How can you, a scion of the Kuru race, hide in the depths of this lake after running away from battle? Flight is not the way of men of dharma, nor does it lead to swarga.

How can you hide now after causing and witnessing the slaughter of your sons, brothers, uncles, relatives, other kinsmen and your dearest friends and allies?

You have boasted in the hearing of all men about your courage, but you are no Kshatriya! If you are a man of the slightest dharma, how can you even think of saving your own life after being the cause of the extermination of all your brothers and your entire army?

Relying on Karna and Sakuni, you considered yourself immortal. You were a fool who did not understand himself. After committing such grievous sins as you have, causing a carnage such as this world has not seen before, how can you hide now? You must come out and fight. Where is that manliness of yours, Suyodhana, which nobody could deny, and where is the pride that you so cherish? Where is your great prowess as a warrior?

Come and fight as the Kshatriya dharma dictates. Either rule the world after defeating us, or lie dead on the ground as food for scavengers. This is your highest dharma, as laid down by the illustrious Brahma himself. Be a king and conduct yourself as the shastras say that all Kshatriyas, even the least, let alone a great king like you, must, O Maharatha!"

From beneath the water, in a ghostly voice, Duryodhana says, "It should be no surprise, Yudhishtira, that fear enters the hearts of all beings. However, I did not flee for fear of my life or from grief. I had no chariot, my arrows were exhausted, my Parshni charioteers were dead and I was alone, without a single soldier to stand by me in battle. I was also exhausted and wanted a little rest. You too, O son of Kunti, rest a while and, when I rise from this lake, I will certainly fight all of you."

Yudhishtira replies, "We need no rest. We have been searching for you for a long time, so come out and give us battle. Either kill us or die!"

Duryodhana says in a choking voice, "My brothers, for whose sake I wanted sovereignty, are all dead and there are no great Kshatriyas left alive. I am like a widowed woman who has no wish to enjoy this barren earth. Yet, I still hope to vanquish you and curb the pride of the Panchalas and the Pandavas. Further, there is no longer any need for battle when Drona and Karna are dead and our Pitamaha Bhishma has fallen. Who wants to rule a kingdom without friends and allies? So, this desolate earth now exists for you. I will put on deerskin and take sannyasa in the forest. You can rule this earth as you please, without kings, without warriors, bereft of wealth, and without any glory or grandeur."

Hearing these poignant words of grief, the illustrious Yudhishtira says with unusual harshness, "Do not rave, Suyodhana, from within the waters. I am like Sakuni now, and your words do not evoke any compassion in me. Accepting a gift is not the duty laid down for a Kshatriya. Moreover, how can you give me the earth that you no longer own? Why did you not offer this gift when, observing the laws of dharma and wishing the welfare of our race, we begged you only for our share? Then you said you would not give me even as much land as could be covered by the point of a needle.

You will not escape me with your life! I will rule this earth only after vanquishing you in battle. Either kill us and rule the earth, or die and go to swarga.

If both of us are alive after this war, then all beings will remain in doubt about who was the final victor. Your life, fool, now depends upon me. If I like, I might allow you to live, but you do not deserve that. In the past you tried to kill us with fire, water, serpents and other kinds of poison. You wronged us by stealing our kingdom, with your savage words in the Kuru sabha, and most of all by humiliating Draupadi. And today, for these reasons, O wretched Duryodhana, your life is forfeit. Come out of the water and fight us!"

In this way, O Rajan, those Praviras, the Pandavas, flushed with victory, repeatedly rebuke and mock Duryodhana.'"

Gada-yuddha Parva

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Sanjaya, how does Duryodhana, who is so choleric by nature, react when admonished? He is used to receiving the respect due to a king. You saw with your own eyes, how the whole earth, with her Mlecchas and nomadic tribes, depend upon him. He regrets the need to take shelter of any kind, even from the sun. Now, without any supporters, what reply does he give to the bitter and repeated taunts of the Pandavas?'

Sanjaya replies, 'When Duryodhana hears Yudhishtira's angry words of rebuke, from under the lake, he is unhappy. Sighing deeply, he flexes his arms and says, "You Parthas now have friends, chariots and animals. However, I am alone, without horses or even a charioteer, so how can I challenge you? Will you fight me one at a time, for it is not Kshatriya dharma for all of you to attack me together? I have not the least fear of either you, or Bhima, or Arjuna, or Vasudeva, or the twins, or Yuyudhana, or all the Panchalas, or all your other troops. Singly, I can match you all.

Remember, for all Kshatriyas, fame depends on dharma. Like the year that gradually meets the seasons, one by one, I will rise from this lake and destroy all you Pandavas. Thus I will free myself from the obligation I owe Bahlika, Drona, Bhishma, Karna, Jayadratha, Bhagadatta, Salya, Bhurisrava, Sakuni, to my sons, my friends and well-wishers, kinsmen and to the many illustrious Kshatriyas who have died for me."

Yudhishtira replies, "It is fortunate, O Suyodhana, that you know Kshatriya dharma and are ready to battle all of us. Choose your weapon and fight any one of us. The rest of us will not participate."

Duryodhana says, "You are a brave man to allow me to select any one of you to fight. The gada that I hold in my hand is my choice of weapon. Any one of you may come forward and fight me on foot. We have seen many exciting single combats fought from chariots. Let this be a duel with maces, and so suitably modify the rules for the purpose. O Yudhishtira, with my mace I will vanquish you, all your younger brothers, as well as all the Panchalas, the Srinjayas and your other troops. I do not fear even Sakra himself."

Yudhishtira says, "Get up, O Mahabaho, and fight us one at a time with your gada. Fight cautiously, for today you will lose your life, even if Indradeva becomes your ally."

Goaded beyond endurance, your son can no longer stomach Yudhishtira's taunts and, with a long and heavy sigh, rises with great force from within the lake. Shining in his effulgence, he emerges like a mountain oozing water, shouldering his adamantine golden mace and his body bathed in blood. Seeing him, the Panchalas and the Pandavas rejoice. Duryodhana sees this as an insult, rolls his eyes in wrath, contracts his brow into three furrows and, repeatedly biting his lower lip, he challenges the Parthas to battle in his deep voice, "You Pandavas will suffer for your taunts. I will send you and the Panchalas to Yamaloka today. Fight me one at a time, for it is not Kshatriya dharma to attack a lone warrior without armour, who is fatigued, covered in water, injured, without a chariot, horses and troops. Let the Devas be the judge of dharma and adharma."

Yudhishtira says, "How is it, O Duryodhana, that you did not have this knowledge when many of you shuras together killed a lone Abhimanyu? All beings when in trouble forget dharma and then think that the gates of the other world are closed. Put on your armour and tie up your locks. Take anything else that you need. I also agree that if you can kill any one of us five Pandavas in a duel, you shall then be king again. Except for your life, tell us what other boon you want."

Then your son, O Rajan, dons gilded armour with a casque and stands glorious as a golden cliff. He then tells the Pandavas, "I am ready to fight any one among you—Bhima, Arjuna, Nakula, Sahadeva or you, O Bharatarishabha—with a gada and I will certainly win. Today with my gada wrapped in a cloth of gold, I will finally end these interminable hostilities when I kill all of you one by one. It is not proper for me to boast about my prowess but within this very hour, I will prove these words either true or false. Let any one among you take up the mace and fight me.”””

CANTO 129

"Sanjaya says, 'While Duryodhana, O Rajan, repeatedly boasts in this manner, an angry Krishna tells Yudhishtira, "You have made a reckless promise by agreeing to make him king if he kills one of us. I do not see the man in the world today, why not even a Deva, who can defeat Duryodhana in a duel with the gada. None of you can match him in a fair fight. Duryodhana has always wanted to kill Bhima and has practised with the gada upon an iron statue for the last thirteen years. At this moment, I do not see anyone who can match him, except possibly Bhima, and he has not practiced enough. You have once again gambled everything on a wretched game of chance, like the one you lost to Sakuni.

Your oath, Yudhishtira, has placed our enemy in a strong position and made your own untenable. Who relinquishes sovereignty when it is within his grasp, and when he has but one enemy to vanquish? How then, O Bhaarata, can you offer him a choice of weapons and the kingdom to the victor? Without a doubt, the offspring of Pandu and Kunti are born to live in exile in the vana, as sannyasis."

Bhima says reassuringly, "O Madhusudana, do not despair. However difficult, I will end these hostilities today when I kill Suyodhana. My mace is one and a half times heavier than Duryodhana's and I will challenge him to fight me. Why, I could quell the three worlds, including the very Devas, with my gada, even if they come armed with every kind of weapon."

Vasudeva is pleased and lauds him, saying, "Dharmaputra Yudhishtira will undoubtedly win back his kingdom after you slay all his enemies, O Mahabaho. You have already killed all the sons of Dhritarashtra and innumerable kings, princes and elephants. You have obliterated the Kalingas, the Magadhas, the Kauravas, the Westerners and the Gandharas. You will certainly accomplish your vow and break all Duryodhana's bones. Gift the earth with her oceans to Yudhishtira, even as Vishnu once conferred the sovereignty of three worlds upon the Lord of Sachi. Remember to fight him with care for he possesses both skill and strength and always revels in a fight."

Satyaki, Yudhishtira, the Panchalas and the Pandavas all applaud these words. Bhima responds, "Today I will purge my heart of the anger that I nurse in my bosom against Suyodhana. Like Arjuna who set fire to the Khandava forest, I will today pluck out the barb that lies buried in my heart for so long. O Vibho, today he will abandon his life's breath, his prosperity and his kingdom, and I will recover your crown for you. Today Dhritarashtra will hear of his son's death and remember all the wrongs the Kauravas have inflicted on us at Sakuni's instigation."

With this, Bhima stands ready for battle, like Sakra challenging Vritra. Your son springs like a lion to face him for he has no fear, no worry, no pain, and no anxiety. Bhima tells him, "Remember all those wrongs that king Dhritarashtra and you have visited on us. Recollect what happened at Varanavata. Recall how Draupadi, while in her season, was humiliated in the Kuru sabha and how Sakuni, through his machinations, cheated Yudhishtira at dice. Face now, O evil one, the consequences of these actions, as well as of the other wrongs that you inflicted on us. It is because of you that the illustrious lord of the Bharatas, the son of Ganga, our Pitamaha, lies dying on a bed of arrows; and Drona, Karna and Salya are dead along with Sakuni the root of this horrific war. We have exterminated your brothers, your sons and all your troops. The battle has taken the lives of other great kings, many shuras and Kshatriyas, as well as the wretch Dusasana who dragged Draupadi into the Kuru court by her open hair.

O you exterminator of your race, you vilest among men, now you alone remain alive. I will kill you today, destroy your pride, your hopes of sovereignty, and have my revenge for all your sins against us."

Duryodhana replies, "What is the use of words? Fight, O Vrikodara, and I will beat the very desire for battle out of you. Do you not see me standing here to fight you with the gada? In a fair fight, not even Purandara can vanquish me when I wield this formidable mace.

So far, you could not do me the slightest injury. I, however, forced you to live in the forest, to work as another's servants, and to conceal yourselves in disguises. We have killed many of your friends and allies. Our losses are equal. So if I lose this duel, it would indeed be remarkable. Perhaps, Kaala will be the cause if such a miracle were to occur.

I have never been defeated in a fair fight. If you vanquish me by deceit, your infamy will last forever. Do not bellow fruitlessly, Bhima, but show me what you can do."

The Pandavas with the Srinjayas, both sensing victory, applaud the contestants. Like men goading an infuriated elephant with clapping of hands, all of them then encourage king Duryodhana with accolades and cheers. The elephants begin to trumpet and the horses to neigh. The weapons of the Pandavas blaze forth of their own accord.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Just as their duel is about to begin, Balarama arrives there. His banner bears the device of the palmyra tree and his weapon is the plough, the halayudha.'

Balarama looks at Krishna, the Pandavas, and at Duryodhana and Bhima armed with maces, and says, "I set out in the month of Pushya and have come back in Sravana. Two and forty days have passed since I left home and I am eager, O Madhava, to watch this duel." Yudhishtira warmly embraces Balarama and welcomes him respectfully, as do the two illustrious Krishnas. Similarly, the two sons of Madri and the five sons of Draupadi, and the other kings reverentially salute Rohini's mighty son.'

Baladeva embraces the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, and all of them greet and welcome him. He snuffles the heads of Krishna and Satyaki and they greet him joyfully, like Indra and Upendra worshipping Brahma, lord of the Devas. Then the Dharmaputra says, "Witness, O Rama, this clash between the two cousins."

Clad in brilliant blue robes, the fair, handsome and powerful elder brother of Kesava sits down among them. He is like the moon in the firmament, surrounded by multitudes of stars. Then, O Rajan, ensues that duel to bring to a conclusion the enmity that had raged for so long.'" Janamejaya said, "On the eve of the great battle of Mahabharata, lord Balarama left Dwaraka accompanied by many of the Vrishnis and telling Krishna, 'I am leaving and will help neither the son of Dhritarashtra nor the sons of Pandu.'

O Brahmana, tell me in detail how Rama happened to arrive there in time to witness the duel."

Vaisampayana said, "O Mahabaho, after the noble Pandavas began living in Upaplavya, they send Krishna to Dhritarashtra to sue for peace. Krishna met Dhritarashtra in Hastinapura and spoke to him gravely about what would be beneficial for all concerned. However, the king, as I told you before, did not listen to him. Krishna returned to the Pandava camp, and said to them, 'It was Fate that forced the Kauravas to disregard my advice. We go to war, O sons of Pandu, in this month of Pushya.'

Later, while the Pandavas and the Kauravas muster their armies, Balarama suggests to his brother Krishna that they side with the Kurus. Krishna however, refuses and an angry Balarama, accompanied by all the Yadavas, sets out in Maitra, on a pilgrimage to the Saraswati accompanied by all the Yadavas. The Bhoja chief Kritavarman joins Duryodhana while Krishna and Yuyudhana take the side of the Pandavas.

Rama leaves from Dwaraka, carrying all things necessary for a pilgrimage, including the sacred fire, priests, hundreds of leading Brahmanas, gold, silver, robes, horses, elephants, chariots, mules, camels, cattle and other draft animals, for a tirtha-yatra to the sacred waters of the Saraswati.

He sets out towards the Saraswati, O Bharatarishabha, and visits all the sacred places, the tirthas, along her course. He distributes varied wealth and gifts in large measure in diverse countries to the needy, the old and to children. At his command, men at different points along the journey store food and drink in large quantities. Balarama gives Brahmanas and Kshatriyas everywhere whatever they desire—costly garments, fine bedsteads and coverlets. Wherever his party journeys, they leave happy and satisfied people and their path is like swarga itself. That Yadusreshta gives away thousands of milch cattle in excellent trappings, with their horns cased in gold; many horses of different breeds he gives, many carriages and chariots, and many beautiful slaves. The noble Rama gives away wealth as he travels along the Saraswati visiting various tirthas, until he finally reaches Kurukshetra."

Janamejaya said, "Tell me, O Purushottama, the features, the origin, and the merits of the many tirthas on the Saraswati and the rules to be observed while visiting these."

Vaisampayana said, "O Rajan, I will describe to you in detail, the features and the origin of all the various tirthas. Baladeva and his followers first visit Prabhasa where Soma the Lord of the constellations found a cure for phthisis, a wasting disease he acquired through a curse. He regained his lustre and energy, and now illuminates the universe. The tirtha is therefore called Prabhasa."

Janamejaya asked, "O Mahamuni, how did the adorable Soma contract consumption? How did he regain his tejas after bathing in that sacred water?"

Vaisampayana said, "Daksha Prajapati had seven and twenty daughters, unrivalled in beauty whom he gave in marriage to Soma. These daughters were associated with the constellations that help men in calculating time. The most beautiful was Rohini and an enraptured Soma lived exclusively with her. His other wives complained to their father Daksha and threatened to leave Soma and to perform tapasya.

Daksha advised Soma to treat all his wives equally and then told his daughters to return to their husband. However, Chandrama continued to live exclusively with Rohini and the other wives complained again to Daksha, who once more warned Soma to behave equally towards all his wives or face his curse.'

This too had no effect on Soma and an angry Daksha cursed Soma with the disease of phthisis. Soon, the Lord of the stars began to slowly waste away. He performed many yagnas but could not free himself from that curse. As a result, trees and plants failed to grow without the nourishment of moonlight; their sap and juices dried up, they become tasteless and lost their potency; indeed, soon all living creatures began to decay. The Devas learned of the reason for Soma's decline, rushed to Daksha and pleaded with him to take back his curse for all living beings, trees and plants were withering away and the gods, too, were starving. They request him to forgive Soma for the world was turning into a vast desert.

Daksha told the Devas, 'I cannot revoke my curse. However, if henceforth Sasin treats all his wives equally and bathes in that tirtha where the Saraswati mingles with the western Ocean, and there worships Mahadeva, he will shine forth once more. Nevertheless, for half the month Soma will wane every day, and for the other half he will wax. At that time, he will regain his former lambency and beauty.'

At this command of the Devarishi Daksha, Soma visited the Prabhasa tirtha on the Saraswati and bathed there on the day of the new moon, and regained his cool rays and once more illumined the worlds. The Devas went to Prabhasa and escorted Soma to Daksha.

Daksha was pleased and once more said to him, 'Do not, O son, disrespect women, and never ignore Brahmanas. Go now and conscientiously obey my commands.'

Soma went back to his own abode and all creatures, filled with joy, continued to live as before.

This is the story of Chandrama and the curse that he suffered, and how Prabhasa became the greatest of all tirthas. On every day of the new moon, O Rajan, Soma bathes in this tirtha and regains his effulgence.

Next, Baladeva spends one night at the tirtha called Chamasodbheda, duly performs his ablutions and gives away many costly gifts.

He then visits Udapana where the Saraswati disappears and flows through the bowels of the earth."

CANTO 132

Vaisampayana said, "At the next tirtha called Udapana, Baladeva gives away his wealth as dakshina, worships the Brahmanas, bathes there and is filled with ananda, bliss. It was here that the two brothers of the illustrious Rishi Trita cast him into a hole and incurred his curse. It was also there that the Rishi drank the Soma rasa."

Janamejaya said, "Tell me the story of Maharishi Trita and the origin of Udapana."

Vaisampayana continued, "In a former yuga, there lived three brothers called Ekata, Dwita and Trita, all three Mahrishis with tejas like the sun's. They had progeny, punya from their tapasya, and acquired the privilege of attaining swarga after death.

Their sire Gautama, who was devoted to dharma, was pleased with them for their tapasya, vratas and niyati and found great joy in them. Gautama, after a long life, finally left for a transcendent realm. The kings who conducted yagnas and were the Yajamanas of Gautama continued to respect his sons after his death. Amongst the three, Trita, through his actions and study of the Vedas, became the foremost; all the Rishis and Munis began to look up to him even as they had his father Gautama.

His two brothers Ekata and Dwita were avaricious for wealth and decided to perform a yagna. They took Trita with them and collected the necessary sacrificial cows and other animals from their Yajamanas for their yagna. They travelled east with Trita leading the way and with Ekata and Dwita following with the animals. Seeing that large herd of kine, they became greedy and decided to appropriate them without giving a share to Trita.

They said, 'Trita is skilled in assisting at yagnas, is devoted to the Vedas, and is capable of earning more cows on his own. So let us take this herd with us and leave Trita to his own devices.'

When night fell, they were frightened to see a wolf barring their way and ran away in fright. Trita fell into a fathomless well on the bank of the nearby Saraswati. He shouted in panic but his two brothers, although they heard his cries, deserted him, partly from fear of the wolf and partly out of greed for the cows.

Trita, O Rajan, thought that he had plunged into hell as a sinner. He was afraid to die since he had not earned the punya of drinking Somarasa. A wise man, he began to plan how he could achieve this from the depths of the well. He noticed a creeper growing in the deep hole although the pit was dry. Using the power of his imagination, the sage conjured up water and a yagna fire there. He imagined himself the Hotri and the creeper to be the Soma plant. He then mentally recited the Riks, the Yayuses and the Samans that were necessary for the performance of a yagna and converted the pebbles lying at the bottom of the well into grains of sugar. Then, in his mind, he performed his ablutions, conceived the water to be the ghee allotted to the Devas, their respective shares of the yagna offerings, and drank the Soma. Then he began to make a reverberantly loud noise.

The sound he made after performing the yagna penetrated swarga and Trita completed that yagna in the manner laid down by worshippers of the Brahman. His yagna agitated the whole of Devaloka and no one knew the cause. Brihaspati, the Acharya of the Devas, heard that sound and told the Devas, 'Trita is performing a yagna. We must go there, Devas. He has acquired great punya and, if angered, he can even create other Devas.'

All the Devas hurried to where Trita was performing the yagna, greeted him and said, 'We have come for our share in your offerings.'

Trita duly apportions them their shares with proper mantras and the gratified Devas gave him all the boons he desired. He begged that they rescue him from the well and asked that all those who bathe in that well receive the end that persons who have drunk Soma rasa attain.

At these words, the river Saraswati appeared within that well and raised Trita to the surface where the Devas blessed him, saying 'Tathaastu—so be it,' and returned to Devaloka.

Trita went back to his own home and cursed his two brothers, saying, 'Since you deserted me, you will suffer for your sin and roam the forest as wolves. Your offspring will become leopards, bears and apes.'

Baladeva bathes in the waters of Udapana, gives away wealth and worships many Brahmanas. He then moves on to Vinasana, another tirtha along the Saraswati."

CANTO 133

Vaisampayana said, “Then Baladeva, O Bharatasattama, visits the place where the Saraswati once again becomes invisible. The Rishis named this tirtha Vinasana because of her dislike for Sudras and Abhiras. After he bathes in that tirtha, Baladeva next visits Subhumika.

This Tirtha, appropriately named Subhumika, is the resort of Brahma and many fair and beautiful Apsaras sport innocently here. Every month, the Devas and the Gandharvas visit this place and sacred and auspicious flowers rain on them.

Baladeva bathes in that tirtha, and sees shadows of Devas, Gandharvas, and Rakshasas there. He distributes more of his wealth to the Brahmanas, and enjoys the songs and music of those gods on earth.

The son of Rohini then moves on to the tirtha inhabited by Viswavasu, a great punyavan, and his Gandharvas who pass their time in dance and song. Here Baladeva gives away all kinds of riches to the Brahmanas, as well as goats, sheep, kine, mules, camels, gold and silver.

Baladeva next visits the tirtha eponymously called Gargasrota. It was here that the venerable Garga, his soul cleansed by tapasya, acquired knowledge of Kaala, of astronomy, and the meaning of all portents. Rishis came here to acquire knowledge of Kaala from Garga. Smeared with white sandalwood paste, Balarama duly gives away wealth to many sannyasis and Brahmanas.

He the visits a gigantic pipal tree called Mohasankha, on the bank of the Saraswati. Tall as Meru and visited by Rishis, this vriksha is famous throughout the world as a sacred tirtha. Yakshas, Vidyadharas, and immensely strong Rakshasas, Pisachas and Siddhas, in their thousands, live here. All of them, abandoning other kinds of food, observe vratas and niyamas, eat only seasonal fruits from that tree for their sustenance, and wander unseen by men, in separate bands. Baladeva gives away as dakshina, milch cows, vessels of copper, iron, and other diverse kinds of gifts. He worships the Brahmanas who bless him in return.

He then goes to the Dwaita Lake, where he bathes in its waters, and pays his reverences to the Brahmanas and gives them generous dakshina. He travels along the southern bank of the Saraswati and visits Nagadhanwana tirtha, the abode of the Nagaraja Vasuki. Vasuki was once installed there with all due rites by the Devas and there is no fear of snakes here. Fourteen thousand Rishis live here permanently and Baladeva duly gives away dakshina to them.

He then sets out eastward and visits, one after another, thousands of famed tirthas along the way. He bathes at all these tirthas, observes upavasas and other vratas as directed by the Rishis. Here, too, he distributes wealth generously, salutes the Rishis, and once more sets out to reach the spot where the Saraswati turns in an easterly direction. The great river changes her course here for a darsana of the noble Rishis dwelling in the forest of Naimisa, and viewing the spectacle, Balarama is filled with wonder."

Janamejaya said, "Why, O best of Adharyus, does the Saraswati bend her course there in an easterly direction?"

Vaisampayana said, "In the Krita yuga, O Rajan, the Rishis dwelling in Naimisa performed a mahayagna extending for twelve years after which they set out to visit the tirthas. Because of the large number of the Rishis, the tirthas on the southern bank of the Saraswati all turned into towns and cities. Those Brahmanas, in order to enjoy the punya of tirthas, began dwelling on the bank of the river up to Samantapanchaka. The river was stunning to behold with blazing homa fires, and the whole region resounded with loud Vedic recitations, as those Rishis poured libations of ghee. Also present were Balakhilyas, Asmakuttas, Dantolakhalinas, Samprakshanas and other Rishis and Munis who were observing diverse kinds of vratas.

They sanctified and beautified the place with their presence, like the Devas adorning the heavenly stream Mandakini.

However, those Rishis failed to find sufficient room to live on the banks of the golden river. The Saraswati saw that large body of Rishis despairing for the want of a broad tirtha where they could perform their rites. Then, in a wonderful gesture, she turned her course to form those great pools and tanks at Naimisa so that Rishis could perform even Mahayagnas there; then she flowed again in a westerly direction. A wonderstruck Rama bathed in those tirthas and duly gifted away wealth and other gifts to the Brahmanas. Blessed by those regenerate ones, he then set out from that greatest of all tirthas on the Saraswati called Sapta-Saraswat, where the great ascetic Mankanaka had successfully performed his most profound tapasya.

Numerous birds have their nests there and it is full of Badari, Inguda, Kshamarya, Plaksha, Aswattha, Vibhitaka, Kakkola, Palasa, Karira, Pilu, and other kinds of trees. Forests of Karushakas, Bilwas, Amratakas, Atimuktas, Kashandas, Parijatas and banana plantations adorn it. Various groups of Rishis, some called Vaneyas, live there, and it reverberates with the chanting of the Vedas, and swarms with varied kinds of animals and is the favourite abode of men without malice and devoted to dharma.”

Janamejaya said, “O Maharishi, tell me about the tirtha Sapta-Saraswat. Who was Rishi Mankanaka? What were his vratas and how did he fulfil them?”

Vaisampayana replied, “Rajan, seven Saraswatis cover this universe and she appears wherever persons of great tejas summon her. The seven forms of the Saraswati are Suprava, Kanchanakshi, Visala, Manorama, Oghavati, Surenu and Vimalodaka. Once, Brahma performed a great yagna to bring prosperity to everyone. The yagnashala resounded with the recitation of sacred hymns and the chanting of the Vedas by many Dvijas conversant with dharma and artha. Gandharvas sang and Apsaras danced and played upon many celestial instruments all the while. The wealth of provisions procured for that yagna satisfied even the Devas and filled them with wonder.

Then the Rishis, O Rajan, said, ‘This yagna cannot be said to possess great merit, since that foremost of rivers, Saraswati, is not present here.’

Hearing this, the divine Brahma joyfully thought of Saraswati and summoned her to Pushkara and she appeared there as Suprava, gratifying all the Munis.

At another time, many Munis gathered in Naimisa to discuss the Vedas. They thought of Saraswati and that foremost of rivers came there as Kanchanakshi.

Again, while king Gaya was engaged in the performance of a great yagna at Gaya, Saraswati, too, was invited. She appeared and the Rishis gathered there named her Visala.

Auddalaka performed a yagna on the sacred plain north of Kosala. Before he began his yagna, he thought of Saraswati, and she, sacred river, appeared there and the Rishis called her Manorama.

Again, while the noble Kuru was conducting a yagna at Kurukshetra, Vasishta, who was assisting him, summoned Saraswati and she appeared as Oghavati.

A yagna was once performed at the source of the Ganga by Daksha and Saraswati appeared there as the fast-flowing Surenu.

Once, while Brahma was engaged in a yagna in the sacred forest on the Himavat Mountains, he summoned Saraswati, and she appeared there, too, as Vimalodaka.

Baladeva finally visits the Sapta-Saraswat tirtha where all these seven forms of Saraswati manifested together.

I will now tell you about the great Rishi Mankanaka, the son of Vayu Deva and Sukanya, who led the life of a Brahmachari from his childhood. Once while bathing, he saw a beautiful woman sporting naked in the river. At this sight, the Rishi could not control himself and ejaculated into the Saraswati. He scooped up his sperm and placed it within an earthen pot where the fluid separated into seven parts. From those seven portions, the seven Rishis, Vayuvega, Vayuhan, Vayumandala, Vayujata, Vayuretas and Vayuchakra of great tejas were born. From them sprang the nine and forty Maruts.

Once Mankanaka cut his hand on a blade of Kusa grass and vegetable juice came out of the wound instead of red blood. Seeing this, the overjoyed Rishi danced about in that place in seemingly mad ecstasy. All mobile and immobile beings who witnessed this began to dance too, stupefied by his energy. The Devas with Brahma at their head, and all the Tapasvin Maharishis, went to Mahadeva, and told him of the strange antics of Rishi Mankanaka and implored him to stop the Rishi.

Mahadeva went to Mankanaka, and asked, ‘What is the cause for such joy, O Maharishi, that an ascetic like you walking along the path of dharma, should act in this strange way?’

The Rishi replied, ‘Why, do you not see, O Brahmana, that vegetable juice is flowing from my wound? Seeing this I am dancing in great joy.’

Laughing at the Rishi confused by excitement, the Devadeva said, ‘I do not wonder at this at all. Behold!’

Saying this, Mahadeva cut his thumb with the nail of one of his fingers, and ashes, white as snow, came pouring out of that wound. Seeing this, the Rishi was mortified, O Rajan, and understood that it was Mahadeva and fell at his feet. Filled with wonder, he said, ‘I know that you are none other than Rudra, that great and Supreme Being. O Sulin, you are the refuge of this universe of Devas and Asuras, which you create. At the universal destruction, the Mahapralaya, everything will once more enter you. Even the Devas cannot know you so how then can I? Brahma and the Devas worship you, O sinless one. It is through your grace that the Devas pass their time in joy and perfect fearlessness.’

Then the Rishi bowed and said, ‘I pray that this ludicrous lack of gravity that I displayed, O Deva, does not destroy my punya.’

Mahadeva cheerfully said, ‘Let your punya increase a thousand fold, O Brahmana, through my grace. Also, I will always dwell with you in this asrama. For the man who worships me in this tirtha Sapta-Saraswat, nothing will be unattainable here or hereafter. Without doubt, such a one will go to the blessed realm called Saraswat in heaven after dying.’” Vaisampayana said, “Baladeva worships the Munis living at Mankanaka, duly distributes large dakshinas to the Brahmanas, and after spending one night there and receiving their blessings, he sets out for other tirthas.

He visits Usanas at the Kapalamochana tirtha. The noble Kavi Sukra performed his tapasya there and meditated upon the war between the Daityas, the Danavas, and the Devas. The whole science of politics and morals, named after him, appeared embodied to him by inward light. Baladeva arrives at that holy tirtha, and duly gives dakshina to the Brahmanas there.”

Janamejaya then asked, “Tell me about the tirtha called Kapalamochana.”

Vaisampayana said, “Once upon a time, the noble Dasarathaputra Rama lived for some time in the forest of Dandaka to rid it of Rakshasas. At Janasthana, he cut off the head of an evil Rakshasa, which fell from the sky into the deep forest and on to the thigh of the Rishi Mahodara while he was wandering through the vana. The head fell on his thigh and stuck there. In great pain and with putrid matter flowing from his thigh, Mahodara yet visited all the tirthas on earth, went to all the rivers and to the ocean and, not finding any relief, he spoke of his sufferings to many Rishis. They suggested that he visit the tirtha Usanas on the Saraswati, for it was an excellent place to attain success in tapasya. Accordingly, he came and bathed in its currents and the Rakshasa's head left his thigh, fell into the water and was lost. Mahodara, freed from the Rakshasa's head, returned to his asrama with cleansed soul and with all his sins washed away. He spoke of what happened to other Rishis and they named the tirtha Kapalamochana. The great Rishi Mahodara returned once more to that tirtha, drank its water and acquired great punya. Here, too, Baladeva worships the Brahmanas, gives them much wealth, and then travels to the next tirtha, Rushangu.

Here, O Bhaarata, was where the great Muni Viswamitra, who was earlier a Kshatriya, became a Brahmana, and Arshtishena once undertook the most austere of tapasyas. That tirtha, capable of granting every wish, has always been the home of Munis and Brahmanas. Baladeva visits the place where Rushangu, in an earlier time, cast off his body.

Rushangu was an old Brahmana, always engrossed in tapasya. Endued with great punya, he reflected for a long while and decided to cast off his body. He then summoned all his sons and told them to take him to a place where water was abundant. They took him to a tirtha on the Saraswati. He bathed there with due rites, and then cheerfully said to all his waiting sons, 'He who casts off his body on the northern bank of the Saraswati while mentally chanting sacred mantras, will never again suffer death.'

Baladeva bathes in that tirtha and gives away considerable wealth to the Brahmanas. His next destination is the tirtha where the Grandsire once created the mountains called Lokaloka. Here, through austere tapasya, that foremost of Rishis, Arshtishena of rigid vratas, the royal sage Sindhudwipa, and the great Rishi Devapi, and the illustrious Muni Viswamitra of great tejas acquired true Brahmanatva."

Janamejaya said, “Why did Arshtishena undergo the austerest of tapasyas? I am curious to know how Sindhudwipa, Devapi and Viswamitra acquired the status of Brahmanas.”

Vaisampayana said, “In the Krita age, O Rajan, there lived a regenerate Rishi called Arshtishena. Despite living for many years in his Acharya’s house, and studying assiduously, he could not master any branch of knowledge or the Vedas. In great disappointment, he performed a very austere yagna, and just by his tapasya, he acquired the complete understanding of the Vedas. In gratitude, he bestowed three boons on that place. He said, ‘From this day, a man who bathes in this tirtha will obtain all the great benefits of an Aswamedha yagna. No one will have any need to fear snakes and wild beasts here. Even small exertions will result in great results here.’

With these words, mahatejasvin Arshtishena ascended into swarga.

In that very tirtha, in the Krita yuga, Devapi and Kusika’s son Sindhudwipa, O Rajan, acquired the lofty condition of Brahmatva after performing an arduous tapasya. There also lived a celebrated Kshatriya called Gadhi, the King of Kausika, who became a great Rishi and went to swarga after he set his son Viswamitra on his throne. However, despite his best efforts, he could not protect his kingdom. Once he took his four kinds of forces to meet a threat from some Rakshasas in his kingdom.

On the way, Viswamitra reached the asylum of Vasishta. His troops, O Rajan, caused great mischief there and when the Brahmana saw the extensive destruction of his vana, he became angry. He commanded his own homa cow to create a number of terrible Savaras. The cow obediently created a horde of frightful men who confronted the army of Viswamitra, and caused a great carnage among them.

A determined Viswamitra sat in tapasya in this very tirtha, and began to emaciate his own body through vratas and fasts prescribed for Rishis. He lived on water, air and the fallen leaves of trees and slept on bare ground. The Devas made repeated attempts to stop him but Viswamitra never veered from his vows. Because of his tapasya and great devotion, he became like the Sun himself in effulgence.

Pleased, Brahma agreed to grant Viswamitra's boon to make him a Brahmana. The illustrious Viswamitra then wandered the earth like a Deva, giving away all kinds of wealth at that tirtha.

Balarama also gives as dakshina the best kinds of milch cows, carts, beds, ornaments, food and drink to many Brahmanas, after having duly worshipped them."

CANTO 137

Vaisampayana said, “The Yadusreshta then goes on to the asrama of Vaka which resounded with the chanting of the Vedas. It was here that the great Sage Dalvyavaka, in great anger, once poured Vichitravirya’s son Dhritarashtra’s kingdom as a libation on the yagna fire.

Once upon a time, the Rishis living in the Naimisa forest performed a yagna extending for twelve years. During the course of that yagna, after the completion of an exalted ritual called Viswajit, the Rishis set out for the country of the Panchalas to ask the king for one and twenty strong and healthy calves as dakshina for their yagna. Sage Dalvyavaka, however, offered them his own animals and said that he would go and ask the great king for some more.

Vaka then went to Dhritarashtra and begged some animals from him. The king was in an ill temper for some of his cattle had died without any apparent cause, and angrily offered him his dead animals. The Rishi resented the words spoken to him in the sabha and decided to teach the king a lesson. He cut the flesh from the dead animals, and fed those pieces as libations in a yagna fire he built on the tirtha of the Saraswati.

When that fierce yagna began, according to the due rites, the kingdom of Dhritarashtra, O Rajan, began to waste away, like a large forest cut down with axes. Overtaken by calamities, the kingdom began to lose its prosperity and very life. Seeing his kingdom thus afflicted, the king consulted the Brahmanas, but to no avail. He then asked his counsellors what he should do and they reminded him of the way he had behaved towards Vaka.

They said, ‘The Muni Dalyavaka is pouring your kingdom as a libation on the yagna fire using the flesh of the dead animals you gave him. Go, O king, and pacify that Rishi by the side of lake on the bank of the Saraswati.’

The king went to the bank of the Saraswati, fell at Vaka’s feet and touching them with his head, joined his hands and said, ‘Forgive my offence! I am a senseless fool, a greedy wretch. You are my sanctuary and protector. Forgive me.’

Feeling compassion for him, Vaka forgot his angry feelings, poured libations on the yagna fire, freed the kingdom from all calamities, and pleased at heart, returned to the Naimisa vana. King Dhritarashtra also returned to his own capital, once again prosperous.

Brihaspati, too, held a yagna at that tirtha for the prosperity of the Devas, and poured libations of flesh on the sacrificial fire and destroyed the Asuras.

After offering ample dakshina with due rites there, of horses, elephants, carts with mules yoked to them, jewels of great value, immense wealth, and much corn to the Brahmanas, Balarama leaves for the tirtha called Yayata.

Here King Yayati once performed a yagna and, seeing his nobility and his immutable devotion, the Devi Saraswati gave the Brahmanas invited to the yagna everything that each one of them cherished in his heart. The Devas, the Gandharvas and the Manavas were overjoyed and filled with wonder at the profusion of wealth at that yagna. The Brahmanas thought that the king had made the dakshinas and happily praised and blessed him.

The noble Baladeva, distinguished by his devotion to dharma and generosity, next visits the tirtha called Vasishtapavaha where the current is very swift.”

Janamejaya said, "Why is the current so rapid at Vasishtapavaha? Tell me the cause of the dispute between Vasishta and Viswamitra?"

Vaisampayana replied, "A great enmity arose between Viswamitra and Vasishta, O Bhaarata, due to their differences over tapasya practices. Vasishta lived at the tirtha called Sthanu on the eastern bank, so called because Mahadeva once practised the austerest tapasya here. On the opposite bank was the asrama of Viswamitra, where the Devas once installed Skanda as their senapati.

The two sages, Viswamitra and Vasishta, challenged each other daily, each claiming the superiority of their respective forms of tapasya. Viswamitra burned with jealousy at the evidence of Vasishta's tejas and decided that he would cause the river Saraswati to bring Vasishta to him through the force of her current and then kill him.

Rishi Viswamitra concentrated on the river Saraswati and soon she became exceedingly agitated. She appeared before him, pale and trembling and with joined hands, ready to do his bidding.

He said, 'Bring Vasishta here at once so that I may kill him. Do not be afraid.'

Knowing the unrivalled prowess of Vasishta, she went to him and informed him of Viswamitra's command. She stood in terror of both of them and shook with fear thinking of the grievous curse that either of them might pronounce on her. Seeing her pale and anxious, the Dharmatma Vasishta, told her, 'O Devi, bear me away with your rapid current, otherwise Viswamitra will curse you. Have no fear.'

Hearing these words of that compassionate Rishi, Saraswati began to consider what course would be best for her to follow. 'Vasishta showed me great compassion so it is proper for me that I should serve him.'

She saw Vasishta engaged in silent recitation of mantras on her bank and saw Kusika's son Viswamitra also engaged in homa and felt that she had found the perfect opportunity. She used her swift current to wash away one of her banks and bore Vasishta away. While being swept away, Vasishta praised her saying: 'From the Grandsire's lake you were born, O Saraswati and your waters fill this whole universe as your waters charge the clouds, and through you, we exercise our faculties of thought. You are Pushti, Dyuti, Kirti, Siddhi and Uma. You are Vak, and you are Svaha. You dwell in all creatures, in four forms.'

Saraswati speedily bore him towards Viswamitra's asrama and reported the arrival of Vasishta to him. While an angry Viswamitra was looking for a weapon, Saraswati, fearful of witnessing and aiding in a Brahmahatya, once more carried Vasishta away to her eastern bank. She thus obeyed the orders of both, although she deceived Viswamitra in the process. The vindictive Viswamitra cursed Saraswati, 'Since, O Devi, you have gone away after deceiving me, let your waters change into blood that Rakshasas relish.'

Cursed by Viswamitra, Saraswati flowed for a whole year with her waters mixed with blood. Great sorrow filled the Devas, the Gandharvas, and the Apsaras, seeing the golden river reduced to that plight. For this reason, O Rajan, they call the tirtha Vasishtapravaha."

Vaisampayana said, "Cursed by Viswamitra, O Bhaarata, the river Saraswati flowed with blood in her current, attracting many Rakshasas who came happily to drink the blood and to sing, dance and celebrate there, like souls who have attained heaven. After some time, some Maharishis, who were abroad on a yatra to bathe in all the tirthas, arrived there and saw the water of the Saraswati mixed with blood and innumerable Rakshasas drinking from it.

They learnt from her about the curse that had reduced her to that state. Then all those Brahmanas invoked Mahadeva, that Lord of the universe and protector of all creatures, with tapasya, vratas, fasts and diverse kinds of abstinences and painful observances, and finally cleansed and freed the divine Saraswati, through the grace of Siva.

Finding the water of Saraswati purified, the Rakshasas living there pleaded to the compassionate Rishis, 'All of us are hungry. We have swerved from eternal virtue but it is not out of our free will that we are sinful. Through the absence of your grace and through our own evil deeds, as well as through the sexual sins of our women, our paapa increased and we have become Brahma-Rakshasas. Among Vaisyas, Sudras and Kshatriyas, those who hate and injure Brahmanas became Rakshasas. O best of Brahmanas, we beg you to help us.'

At this, the Rishis requested the great river to provide relief for those Rakshasas and she created a new distributary called Aruna. Bathing in it, the Rakshasas cast off their bodies and rose into heaven. Hearing of this, Indradeva of a hundred yagnas bathed at that tirtha and was cleansed of a grievous sin."

Janamejaya asked, "What was Indra's sin and how was he cleansed by bathing in that tirtha?"

Vaisampayana said, "The Asura Namuchi, from fear of Indra, once entered a ray of the sun. Indra lulled him into a false sense of security and assured Namuchi, saying, 'O foremost of Asuras, I swear that I will not kill you with anything that is wet or with anything that is dry. I will not kill you in the night or during the day.'

However, lord Indra one day conjured up a fog at twilight to cut off Namuchi's head using foam for his weapon. The severed head of Namuchi thereupon pursued Indra from behind, shouting, 'O slayer of a friend, O wretch.'

Chased relentlessly by that head, Indra went to Brahma and sorrowfully informed him of what had happened. The Supreme Lord said, 'Perform a yagna with due vratas at the sacred confluence of the Saraswati and Aruna. Distribute dakshina generously and you will be freed of your sin.'

Accordingly, Sakra performed various yagnas there, gave away great dakshina and plunged into the Aruna. He then became free from the sin and returned to swarga with a joyful heart. The head of Namuchi also fell into that stream and the Asura obtained many eternal regions that granted every wish.

Baladeva bathes in that tirtha, and gives away many kinds of dakshina and obtains great punya. He then moves on to the great tirtha of Soma.

In olden days, Soma himself performed the Rajasuya yagna there, in which Atri, that noble and wise Brahmana, was the Hotri. Upon the conclusion of that yagna, a great battle took place between the Devas and the Danavas, the Daityas and the Rakshasas. Skanda commanded the army of the Devas and slew the Asura Taraka. In that tirtha there is a mighty Aswattha tree under which Skanda resides forever."

Janamejaya said, "You have described the merits of the river Saraswati, O best of Brahmanas. You must now tell me how the Devas invested Skanda with the command of the Devasena. Describe the actual rites that were performed, and how the Deva Senapati made a great carnage of the Daityas."

Vaisampayana said, "Once, long ago, Maheswara spilled his seed into a blazing fire. However, Agni could not bear its tremendous energy and, at Brahma's instructions, Agni cast it into the river Ganga. Ganga, too, was unable to contain it and cast it onto the beautiful breast of Himavat where the Devas worshipped. Agni's son began to grow there, overwhelming all the worlds with his tejas. Meanwhile, the six Krittikas seeing the child of fiery splendour lying on the heath and wanting a son flew down from the sky and adopted him.

The adorable Skanda understood the state of the minds of his multiple mothers, assumed six mouths and allowed all of them to suckle him. The beautiful Krittikas were wonderstruck. Since the river Ganga had cast the child onto the summit of Himavat, that mountain was stunningly transformed, O Kurusrestha, and from then on began producing gold. The energetic child was called Gangeya or Kartikeya. At first, he acquired the high ascetic powers of a Rishi. Gifted with self-restraint, asceticism and great tejas, Kartikeya grew up into a handsome man like Soma, loved and praised by Gandharvas and Rishis. Thousands of beautiful Apsaras admired him and danced before him. The foremost of all rivers, Ganga, waited upon him and the Earth held the child in her lap, while Brihaspati performed his jatakarma, the postnatal rites. The Vedas, assuming a fourfold form, approached the child with joined hands. The Astra Shastra, the science of arms, with its four divisions and all the astras and all kinds of weapons, came to him.

One day, this child of great lustre saw Mahadeva seated with Uma and a crowd of unearthly beings, ganas with emaciated bodies and ugly features, surrounding them. The faces of some were like those of tigers, lions, bears, cats and makaras. Others had the features of scorpions, elephants, camels, owls, vultures, jackals, cranes, pigeons and kurus. Many among them had bodies like those of dogs, porcupines, iguanas, goats, sheep and cows. Some resembled mountains and some oceans, and some carried chakras and gadas as weapons. Many looked like masses of antimony and others like white mountains. Also present were the seven Matris, the Sadhyas, the Viswedevas, the Maruts, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Siddhas, the Danavas, the self-born Brahma with his sons, Vishnu and Sakra. All had gone there to see that child of unfading glory. Many Devas and Gandharvas, led by Narada and other Devarishis and Siddhas led by Brihaspati, and the fathers of the universe, the Prajapatis, Lokapalas, the Yamas and the Dharmas, were all present there.

The child approached Maheswara. Seeing the boy coming, Siva, Uma, Ganga and Agni each expected that he would come and honour them first. Understanding that this was the expectation of those four, the child used his Yogic powers and divided himself into four different forms. The three forms that stood behind him were Sakha, Visakha and Naigameya and they marched on towards the four Divine Ones who sat expectantly. The form called Skanda went towards Rudra; Visakha went to Uma, Sakha, which is Kartikeya's Vayu form, walked towards Agni, and Naigameya, that child of fiery splendour towards Ganga.

It was wonderful to see all those radiant forms, identical in appearance, walk calmly towards the four Divinities. All the present Devas, Danavas and Rakshasas, made a loud noise of appreciation at the wonderful sight. Then Rudra, the goddess Uma, Agni, and Ganga, all bowed to Brahma, the Lord of the Universe, and said, 'You must grant to this youth, for our happiness, some kind of sovereignty that is suitable for him and which he desires.'

At this, the revered Pitamaha thought of the charge that he might possibly bestow upon Skanda. He had already distributed to the Devas all kinds of wealth over which the Devas, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Pretas, Bhutas, Yakshas, Garudas and Nagas have dominion. After he had reflected for a moment, O Bhaarata, he conferred upon Kartikeya the status of Deva Senapati and ordered all the Devas and other formless beings to wait upon him.

The Devas led by Brahma took that youth with them to a place on the bank of the sacred and divine Saraswati, flowing down from Himavat, the river which at Samantapanchaka is celebrated throughout the three worlds. There, the Devas, the Gandharvas and the others sat down with satisfied and happy hearts for the investiture of Kartikeya."

Vaisampayana continued, "After all articles as laid down in the shastras for the ceremony of investiture were collected, Brihaspati poured libations on the blazing fire. Himavat brought a richly decorated throne and seated Kartikeya on it while the Devas brought all kinds of auspicious offerings, with the rites and mantras that were necessary for the ceremony. The various Devas—Indra, Vishnu, Surya, Chandramas, Dhatri, Vidhatri, Vayu, Agni, Pushan, Bhaga, Aryaman, Ansa, Vivaswat, Rudra, Mitra, the eleven Rudras, the eight Vasus, the twelve Adityas, the twin Ashvinis, the Viswedevas, the Maruts, the Saddhyas, the Pitris, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Pannagas, innumerable Devarishis, the Vaikhanasas, the Balakhilyas, those Rishis that subsist only on air and those that subsist on sunlight—all attended the ceremony.

Also present were the descendants of Bhrigu and Angiras, many high-souled Yatis, all the Vidyadharas, all Rishis and Munis, the Grandsire, Pulastya, Maharishi Pulaha, Angiras, Kasyapa, Atri, Marichi, Bhrigu, Kratu, Hara, Prachetas, Manu, Daksha, the Seasons, the Planets, and all the luminaries.

In attendance O Rajan, were all the rivers in their embodied forms, the eternal Vedas, the Seas, the diverse tirthas, the Earth, the Sky and the Firmament. All the trees, Aditi the mother of the Devas, Hri, Sri, Swaha, Saraswati, Uma, Sachi, Sinivali, Anumati, Kuhu, the Day of the new moon, the Day of the full Moon, the wives of the denizens of heaven, were present there.

Himavat, Vindhya, Meru, Airavata with all his followers, the Divisions of time called Kala, Kashta, the Fortnight, the Seasons, Night and Day, the prince of horses Ucchaisravas, Vasuki the king of the Snakes, Aruna, Garuda, the Trees, the deciduous herbs, and the divine Deva Dharma—all came there. Also in attendance were Kala, Yama, Mrityu, and the followers of Yama.

I do not mention the other divinities who arrived there to witness Kartikeya's installation ceremony, for they were past enumeration. They brought with them all necessary and every auspicious requisite and offering needed for the ceremony.

Filled with joy, the Devas poured upon Skanda's head the sacred water of the Saraswati from golden jars, and made that noble youth the Senapati of the Deva forces. Pitamaha Brahma, and Kasyapa of great tejas, and all the others poured water upon Skanda just as the Devas had once poured water on the head of Varuna, at his investiture as the Lord of seas. A pleased Brahma appointed four mighty companions for Skanda, who were swift like the wind, who were Mahatapasvins, and gifted with great tejas. These were Nandisena, Lohitaksha, Ghantakarna and Kumudamalin.

Lord Sthanu gave Skanda a companion who had the power to create a hundred mayic illusions, and endued with might and energy that he could increase at will. In fact, in the great battle between the Devas and the Asuras, this one, with his bare hands, slew fourteen million fierce Daityas.

The Devas then handed charge of the measureless Devasena, invincible and capable of destroying forces powerful as Vishnu, to the six-headed Sanmukha. Thereupon the Devas and all else present hailed him, shouting, 'Jaya Skanda!'

Yama gave him two companions, Unmatha and Pramatha, both of whom resembled Death and possessed great energy and splendour. Surya gave him Subhraja and Bhaswara: Soma gave him Mani and Sumani; both huge like the summits of the Kailasa Mountain and always decked with white garlands and smeared with white unguents.

Agni gave him Jwalajihbha and Jyoti while Ansa gave him five ferocious and powerful companions, Parigha, Vata, Bhima, Dahati and Dahana. Vasava gave him Utkrosa and Panchaka, who were armed respectively with a thunderbolt and a cudgel. They slew innumerable enemies of Sakra.

Vishnu gave Skanda three companions—Chakra, Vikrama and the mighty Sankrama while the Ashvinis, O Bharatarishabha, gave him Vardhana and Nandana who was the master of all the sciences. The illustrious Dhatri gave him Kunda, Kusuma, Kumuda, Damvara and Adamvara.

Tvashtri gave him two powerful warriors as companions—Chakra and Anuchakra. The lord Mitra presented him with two celebrated and handsome companions, Suvrata and Satyasandha, both Tapasvins, learned, and able to granting boons.

Vidhatri presented him with the noble Suprabha and Subhakarman while Pushan gave him Panitraka and Kalika, both masters of maya. Vayu gave him Bala and Atibala, while Varuna gave him Ghasa and Atighasa, all powerful warriors with gaping mouths.

Himavat gave him two companions, Suvarchas and Ativarchas while Meru gave him Kanchana and Meghamalin. Manu gave him Sthira and Atisthira while Vindhya gave him Uschrita and Agnisringa.

The Ocean gave him two mighty companions named Sangraha and Vigraha, both armed with maces. The beautiful Parvati gave him Unmada, Pushpadanta and Sankukarna while Vasuki, the king of the snakes, gifted him two Nagas named Jaya and Mahajaya. Similarly, the Saddhyas, the Rudras, the Vasus, the Pitris, the Seas, the Rivers, and the Mountains, all gave him commanders of forces armed with lances and battle-axes, all of them wearing diverse kinds of ornaments.

Listen now to the other warrior companions that Skanda received. They were Sankukarna, Nilkumbha, Padmai, Kumuda, Ananta, Dwadasabhuja, Krishna, Upakrishnaka, Ghranasravas, Kapiskandha, Kanchanaksha, Jalandhama, Akshasantarjana, Kunadika, Tamobhrakrit, Ekaksha, Dwadasaksha, Ekajata, Sahasravahu, Vikata, Vyaghraksha, Kshitikampana, Punyanaman, Sunaman, Suvaktra, Priyadarsana, Parisruta and Kokonada.

He also obtained the services of Priyamalyanulepana, Ajodara, Gajasiras, Skandhaksha, Satalochana, Jwalajibha, Karala, Sitakesa, Jati, Hari, Krishnakesa, Jatadhara, Chaturdanshtra, Ashtajihva, Meghananda, Prithusravas, Vidyutaksha, Dhanurvaktra, Jathara, Marutasana, Udaraksha, Rathaksha, Vajranabha, Vasurprabha, Samudravega, Sailakampin, Vrisha, Meshapravaha, Nanda, Upadanka, Dhumra, Sweta, Kalinga, Siddhartha, Varada, Priyaka, Nanda, Gonanda, Ananda, Pramoda, Swastika, Dhruvaka, Kshemavaha, Subala, Siddhapatra, Govraja, Kanakapida, Gayana and Hasana.

Some other of his companions were Bana, Khadga, Vaitali, Atitali, Kathaka, Vatika, Hansaja, Pakshadigdhanga, Samudronmadana, Ranotkata, Prashasa, Swetasiddha, Nandaka, Kalakantha, Prabhasa, Kumbhandaka, Kalakaksha, Sita, Bhutalonmathana, Yajnavaha, Pravaha, Devajali, Somapa, Majjala, Kratha, Tuhara, Chitradeva, Madhura, Suprasada, Kiritin, Vatsala, Madhuvarna, Kalasodara. The others were Dharmada, Manma, Thakara, Suchivaktra, Swetavaktra, Suvaktra, Charuvaktra, Pandura, Dandavahu, Suvahu, Rajas, Kokilaka, Achala, Kanakaksha, Valakarakshaka, Sancharaka, Kokanada, Gridhrapatra, Jamvuka, Lohajvaktra, Javana, Kumbhavaktra, Kumbhaka, Mundagriva, Krishnaujas, Hansavaktra, Chandrabha, Panikurchas, Samvuka, Panchavaktra, Sikshaka, Chasavaktra, Jamvuka, Kharvaktra and Kunchaka.

Besides these, the Grandsire gave him many other noble and strong companions, devoted to tapasya and deferential to Brahmanas. Some of them were very young in years, some mere youths, while some were old. Thousands upon thousands of similar companions joined Kartikeya, all different in their looks and appearance. I will describe them to you, O Janamejaya.

Some had faces like those of tortoises, others like cockerels, dogs, wolves, hares, owls, asses, camels and hogs. Some had human faces and some like those of sheep or jackals. Some were dreadful and had faces like those of makaras and porpoises. Some had faces like those of cats others like stinging flies, mongooses, owls and the crow. Some faces were like those of mice, peacocks, fish, goats, sheep and buffaloes. The faces of some were like bears while others resembled tigers, leopards, lions, elephants, crocodiles, rhinocerii, wolves, cows, mules, camels, cats, while some resembled Garuda.

Some possessed protruberant stomachs, great legs and other limbs, while others had eyes like stars. The faces of some were like those of pigeons and bulls and others like those of kokilas, hawks, tittiras, lizards, snakes and porcupines.

Indeed, some had frightful and some very agreeable faces; some wore snakes for their clothes. The faces as also the noses of some resembled those of cows while some tapered like the bodies of snakes. Some had large limbs, bulging stomachs, while others were very lean, attenuated; some had large limbs but gaunt bellies while the necks of some were very short and their ears very large.

Some were clad in white robes and others in snake skin, elephant skin or deer skin. The mouths of some were on their shoulders, some on their stomachs, some on their backs, some on their cheeks, some on their calves, some on their flanks, and many on other parts of their bodies. The faces of many leaders of troops were like those of insects and worms while the mouths of many were like those of beasts of prey.

Some sported multiple arms and heads while the arms of some resembled trees, and the heads of some were on their loins. Many amongst them had their abodes on diverse kinds of plants and trees. Some were clad in rags, some in diverse kinds of bones, some were diversely attired, and some wore garlands and liniments. Dressed so variously, some had skins for their robes. Some had headgear; the brows of some were furrowed into lines; the necks of some bore marks like those on conch shells, some were possessed of great effulgence.

Some wore diadems, some grew five tufts of hair on their heads, some had two, some three, and some seven, and the hair of some was as hard as iron wires. Some had feathers on their heads, some had heads that were perfectly bald, some had matted locks while the faces of some were covered with hair.

Some were dark complexioned, and the faces of some had no flesh on them. Some had very long backs, and some had no stomachs. The backs of some were large while those of others were short and squat. The arms of some were long while those of some were short. Some were dwarfs, some were hunchbacks, and some had short hips. The heads of some were like those of elephants, some had noses like those of tortoises, and some like wolves. Some had long lips and some had frightful faces facing downwards. Some had monstrously large teeth, some tiny ones, and some had only four teeth.

Thousands among them, O Rajan, were exceedingly terrible like infuriated elephants. Some had symmetrical limbs and possessed great splendour, and were adorned with ornaments. Some had yellow eyes, some had ears like arrows, some had noses like ghariyals, O Bhaarata, while some had broad teeth, some pendulous lips, and many had green hair. They possessed all kinds of feet, lips, teeth, arms, and heads.

Clad in varied kinds of skins, they spoke diverse kinds of languages. Skilled in all provincial dialects, the dominant ones conversed with one another and joyously gambolled about, cutting capers around Kartikeya.

The eyes of some were yellow, the throats of some blue, the ears of some long, and the stomachs of some were like masses of antimony. The eyes of some were white, the necks of some red, some had eyes of a tawny hue and many were dark in colour or of many colours. Several had ornaments on their persons that looked like yak-tails, some bore white streaks on their bodies, some red streaks; many were vari-coloured, while some had golden complexions, and some were brilliant like peacocks.

These noble companions in arms delighted in battle, and all of them were invincible to even the foremost ones amongst the Devas. They had great strength, speed and great impetuosity and had various kinds of dreadful and magical weapons in their hands. Some wielded Sataghnis and Chakras, some carried heavy and short clubs, some brandished swords, mallets and bludgeons, while many gigantic ones wielded lances, scimitars, maces, bhusundis and spears. Some came from Devaloka, some from the aerial realms, and some from the regions of the earth and all of them were quick like the wind. Commanded by the Devas, those brave and mighty ones became the companions and confederates of Kartikeya.

At the installation of Kartikeya, these motley and powerful warriors, all wearing rows of tinkling bells danced around him in joy. These and many millions of mighty others, O Rajan, came to join the noble and illustrious Kartikeya and stood surrounding him."

Vaisampayana said, "I will now list the names of these auspicious ones: the many mothers, who also became the companions of Kumara. They were Prabhavati, Vishalakshi, Palita, Gonasi, Shrimati, Bahula, Bahuputrika, Apsujata, Gopali, Brihadambalika, Jayavati, Malatika, Dhruvaratna, Bhayankari, Vasudama, Sudama, Vishoka, Nandini, Ekachuda, Mahachuda, Chakranemi, Uttejani, Jayatsena, Kamalakshi, Shobhana, Shatrunjaya, Shalabhi, Khari, Madhavi, Shubhavaktra, Tirthanemi and Gitapriya.

They included Kalyani, Kadrula, Amitashana, Meghasvana, Bhogavati, Subhru, Kanakavati, Alatakshi, Viryavati, Vidyujjihva, Padmavati, Sunakshatra, Kandara, Bahuyojana, Santanika, Kamala, Mahabala, Sudama, Bahudama, Suprabha, Yashasvini, Nrityapriya, Shatolukhalamekhala, Shataghanta, Shatananda, Bhagananda, Bhamini, Vapushmati, Chandrashita, Bhadrakali, Samkarika, Nishkutika, Bhrama, Chatvaravasini, Sumangala, Svastimati, Vriddhikama, Jayapriya, Dhanada, Suprasada, Bhavada, Jaleshvari, Edi and Bhedi.

They were Samedi, Vetalajanani, Kanduti, Kalika, Devamitra, Lambasi, Ketaki, Chitrasena, Bala, Kukkutika, Shankhanika, Jarjarika, Kundarika, Kokalika, Kandara, Shatodari, Utkrathini, Jarena, Mahavega, Kankana, Manojava, Kantakini, Praghasa, Putana, Khashaya, Churvyuti, Vama, Kroshanatha, Taditprabha, Mandodari, Tunda, Kotara, Meghavasini, Subhaga, Lambini, Lamba, Vasuchuda, Vikatthani, Urdhvavenidhara, Pingakshi, Lohamekhala, Prithuvaktra, Madhurika, Madhukumbha, Pakshalika, Manthanika and Jarayu.

And also there were Jarjaranana, Khyata, Dahadaha, Dhamadhama, Khandakhanda, Pushana, Manikundala, Amogha, Lambapayodhara, Venuvinadhara, Pingakshi, Lohamekhala, Shasholukamukhi, Krishna, Kharajangha, Mahajava, Shishumaramukhi, Shveta, Lohitakshi, Vibhishana, Jatalika, Kamachari, Dirghajihva, Balotkata, Kaledika, Vamanika, Mukuta, Lohitakshi, Mahakaya, and Haripindi. Ekakshara, Sukusuma, Krishnakarni, Kshurakarni, Chatushkarni, Karnapravarana, Chatushpathaniketa, Gokarni, Mahishanana, Kharakarni, Mahakarni, Bherisvanamahasvana, Shankhakumbhasvana, Bhangada, Gana, Sugana, Bhiti, Kamada, Chatushpatharata, Bhutirtha, Anyagochara, Pashuda, Vittada, Sukhada, Mahayasha, Payoda, Gomahishada, Suvishana, Pratishtha, Supratishtha, Rochamana, Surochana, Naukarni, Mukhakarni, Sasira, Stherika, Ekachakra, Megharava, Meghamala and Virochana.

These and thousands of other matrikas, O Bharatarishabha, of diverse forms, became the followers of Kartikeya. Some had long nails, large teeth, and protruding lips while others were youthful, lean, with sweet features. Others had green eyes, some were tawny, and many had golden complexions. Many of them were dark like thunderclouds or smoke, while others were brilliant like the morning sun. Many wore their tresses long, and were clad in robes of white and wore ornaments. They had the merit of punya and could assume any form at will.

They could grant boons and travel wherever at will and were always cheerful. Physically very strong, some of them were like Yama, some like Rudra, several were like Soma, some like Kubera, some like Varuna, some like Indra, and some like Agni. Many had the temperament of Vayu, some of Kumara, some of Brahma, some of Vishnu, several of Surya, and many of Varaha.

They were charming and delightful to look at and beautiful like Apsaras. Their voices resembled the kokila and they were prosperous like Kubera. They were brilliant like fire, and in battle, they were ferocious like Sakra and filled their enemies with terror. Able to assume any form at will, they were swift like the wind and their prowess was inconceivable.

They lived on trees, open plains, crossings of four roads, in caves, crematoriums, mountains and springs. Wearing various kinds of ornaments, clothes, and speaking myriad languages, these and many other tribes of mothers, all of whom could strike fear into enemies, followed Kartikeya at the command of the chief of the Devas.

Indra, the conqueror of Paka, gave Kartikeya a banner effulgent as the morning sun and a blazing spear adorned with large bells, to fight the enemies of the Devas.

Siva gave him a vast and invincible army named Dhananjaya, exceedingly fierce, armed with all kinds of weapons and endued with great energy attained through tapasya. Protecting it were thirty thousand warriors, each powerful like Rudra.

Vishnu gave him a garland that enhanced the might of the wearer. Uma gave him two pieces of brilliant cloth. Ganga gave Kumara a celestial water-pot, born from amrita, and Brihaspati gave him a sacred staff. Garuda gifted him his favourite son, a peacock of beautiful feathers. Aruna gave him a cockerel with sharp talons while Varuna gave him a very potent snake. The Lord Brahma gifted him with a black deerskin and blessed him to have victory in all battles.

Skanda stood like a magnificent flame and like the autumnal sky bespangled with planets and stars, at the head of the awesome and terrible Devasena. Much to the joy of all the Devas, he marched his army out while the gathering of Devas and different beings beat their drums, blew their conches, and played loudly their patahas, jharjharas, krikachas, cow-horns, adambaras, gomukhas and dindimas. Led by Vasava, the Devas praised Kumara while the Gandharvas and Apsaras sang and danced.

Pleased by their attentions and love, Skanda swore to destroy all their enemies and the illustrious Devas considered all their enemies to be already dead and a loud sound of joy arose from all those assembled there.

Skanda then set out with that incomparable army to destroy the Daityas and to protect the inhabitants of swarga. Accompanying Kartikeya, in the van of his army, O Rajan, were Karma, Vijaya, Dharma, Siddhi, Samriddhi, Dhairya, and the Shastras in their embodied forms.

Seeing the army advance against them, all the Daityas, Rakshasas and Danavas fled in terror hotly pursued by the Devas. A wrathful Skanda repeatedly hurled the terrible spear that Agnideva had given him. It fell like a comet from the sky and millions of blazing individual darts issued from it. O Bharatarishabha, with his energy like a fire fed with libations of ghee, it was like the pralaya.

Finally, Skanda killed Taraka, the hitherto invincible Asura who was leading a hundred thousand dreaded Daityas as well as Mahisha at the head of eight Daitya padmas. He next destroyed Tripada and a thousand Ajutas and Hradodara, protected by ten nikharvas of Daityas. The followers of Kumara danced, jumped and laughed in joy as they killed thousands of Daityas. Some demons were incinerated, others died of sheer fright. Thus, Kartikeya slew the innumerable enemies of the Devas.

Skanda chased Bali's son, the great Bana, to the Krauncha Mountain, so called because the sound it produced resembled the cry of a crane. Kartikeya struck the mountain with Agni's astra and the apes, elephants, leopards, bears, sharabhas, lions, birds and snakes living there ran everywhere in fear and frenzy. Other forests on it rang with the cries of hundreds upon hundreds of wild beasts. The shock of Skanda's spear frightened the Vidyadharas dwelling on its summits who soared into the air, making the Kinnaras anxious. The Daityas came out of that blazing mountain, in their hundreds of thousands, all clad in beautiful ornaments and garlands.

Kumara's followers massacred them all. A raging Skanda killed Bali's son Bana along with his younger brother, just as Indra had killed Vritra long ago. He pierced the Krauncha Mountain with his inexorable lance, dividing his own self sometimes into many Kartikeyas and sometimes uniting himself into one. Such was the glory and prowess of Skanda that his lance, repeatedly hurled from his hand, came back to him repeatedly, quicker than thoughts.

They beat drums, blew conches and the celestial women rained floral showers to celebrate the successful attack on Krauncha Mountain and the killing of Chanda's son. Auspicious breezes blew bearing unworldly scents. The Gandharvas and great Rishis sang hymns in Skanda's praise. While some referred to him as Sanat Kumara, the powerful eldest son of Brahma, Some spoke of him as the son of Maheswara, and some as Agni's son. Some again described him as the son of Uma or of the Krittikas or of Ganga. Hundreds of thousands spoke of that Lord of yogis of blazing form and great might, as the son of any of them.

I have thus told you, O Rajan, everything about the installation of Kartikeya as the Deva Senapati and how he destroyed the enemies of the gods. Listen now to the history of the greatest of tirthas on the Saraswati. That foremost of tirthas, O monarch, after Kartikeya had killed the enemies of the Devas became a second heaven. The puissant son of Agni gave each of the Devas diverse kinds of dominion and affluence and finally the sovereignty of the three worlds. This was how the Devas installed that adorable exterminator of the Daityas as their senapati.

Taijasa is the other tirtha where in the olden days the Devas created Varuna as the Lord of the waters. After bathing in that tirtha and worshipping Skanda, Balarama gives the Brahmanas gold, clothes, ornaments, and other things as dakshina. He spends one night happily there, praising that foremost of tirthas and worshipping its waters.

I have now told you everything that you wanted to know, and how the divine Skanda was elevated by the assembled gods to be their protector and general."

Janamejaya said, “By listening to your narration of the installation of Skanda and the destruction of the Daityas, I deem myself cleansed. Now I am curious to know how long ago the Devas invested Varuna with Lordship over the waters at this tirtha.”

Vaisampayana replied, “In the Krita yuga, the Devas approached Varuna and said, ‘As Sakra, the Lord of the celestials, always protects us from every danger, will you be the Lord of the rivers? You dwell in the Ocean, the home of makaras. This Ocean and the Lord of rivers will then be under your control and you will then wax and wane with Soma.’

Varuna agreed and all the Devas assembled and performed the rites laid down in the Shastras to make him Lord of the waters. Just as Sakra protects the Devas, Varuna began to protect the seas and lakes and rivers and other reservoirs of water.

Bathing in that tirtha and distributing dakshina generously, the wise Baladeva, the slayer of Pralamba, then travelled to Agnitirtha, the place where Agni, the eater of ghee, had once disappeared from view. Then, the panic-stricken Devas approached Brahma and begged him to quickly find Agni lest all creatures perish. All the Devas, led by Indra and Brihaspati, finally found him hiding in the Sami vana. The fact was that Agni was trying to hide from Bhrigu. Cursed by Brahmarishi Bhrigu, Agni became an eater of everything.

Balarama bathes there and then visits Brahmayoni where, long ago, Brahma and all the Devas bathed after the Pitamaha performed his acts of creation. He also goes to Kaubera tirtha where the great Ailavila, after severe tapasya, once acquired all the treasures of the worlds, which magically came to him of their own accord. Baladeva bathes in these tirthas and gives dakshina to the Brahmanas he finds there.

Balarama also saw the wonderful vana where, aeons ago, the noble Kubera, Lord of the Yakshas, performed tapasya and gained many boons, including lordship over all treasures, the friendship of Lord Rudra, the status of a Deva, the regency over all of the North, and a son named Nakakubara. The Maruts then invested him duly with his sovereignty as the Lokapala of the northern direction. He also acquired the utterly marvellous Pushpaka Vimana for his celestial chariot, fleet as thought, as also all the affluence of a Deva.

Balarama bathes in that tirtha and gives away great wealth.”

Vaisampayana said, "Balarama leaves for Vadarapachana tirtha where all kinds of creatures, flowers and fruits of every kind are always abundant and where many Rishis and Siddhas live. It was here that the beautiful daughter of Bharadwaja, a Brahmacharini named Sruvavati, practised severe tapasya in order to woo Indradeva. She observed many exceedingly difficult vratas until Indra was impressed and he came to that hermitage in the form of Maharishi Vasishta. Sruvavati reverently welcomed him, O Bhaarata, according to the rites observed for Maharishis. She said, 'O adorable Maharishi, tell me how I may serve you. However, I will not give you my hand, for I am courting Sakra, the lord of the three worlds, with stern vrata and tapasya.'

The illustrious Sakra smiled, and said, 'I know that you practise strict tapasya, O beautiful Devi, and I know the desire in your heart. Know that with tapasya one can obtain everything that belongs to the Devas, and all the regions of blessedness. Men who cast off their bodies after practising austere tapasya become Devas. I request you now to boil these five jujubes.'

The purpose of the task was to test her devotion. Sruvavati cleansed herself, and began to cook. Time went by and the day began to wane, but the jujubes showed no signs of cooking. With all her fuel consumed and seeing the fire about to die, she began to use her limbs as fuel and soon Agni consumed her feet. Instead of pain, she felt joy as if she had dipped them in cool water. Seeing this, Indra was pleased and revealed his real form. He told her that he was pleased with her devotion and that he would grant her wish.

He invited her to live with him in swarga and declared, ‘This hermitage will become the greatest tirtha in the world, capable of cleansing every sin, and will hereafter be known as Vadarapachana.’

In this very tirtha, seven Rishis on one occasion left Arundhati, the wife of one of them, when they were on their way to Himavat to gather fruit and roots for their sustenance. However, a twelve-year drought fell upon the land, forcing the Rishis to continue to live on Himavat. Meanwhile Arundhati devoted herself to tapasya. Seeing this, a highly pleased Mahadeva visited her in the form of a Brahmana, and said, ‘I desire alms, O auspicious one.’

The beautiful Arundhati confessed that her store of food was exhausted, and offered jujubes instead. Mahadeva accepted and asked her to cook the jujubes, and while Arundhati did so, Mahadeva expounded on various subjects, sacred and otherwise. The twelve years of drought passed as if it were a single day, without food, and in cooking and listening to Mahadeva’s discourses. Then the seven Rishis returned and Mahadeva, highly pleased with Arundhati, appeared in his own form and said, ‘I am happy with your tapasya and vratas.’

He then told the seven Rishis, ‘The punya that this Devi has earned is much greater than what you have found on the breast of Himavat. Her tapasya was exceedingly austere, for she passed twelve years in cooking, fasting all the while.’

Addressing Arundhati, Siva then said, ‘Ask me for any boon, O auspicious one.’

She replied, ‘If you are gratified with me, then let this place be named Vadarapachana tirtha and let it be the favourite resort of Siddhas and Devarishis. Let him who observes a fast and remains here for three nights after cleansing himself, obtain the fruit of a twelve years’ fast.’

Mahadeva answered her, saying, ‘Tathaastu—Let it be so,’ and returned to swarga.

The Rishis were wonder-struck at the sight of Mahadeva and on finding the chaste Arundhati healthy and so capable of bearing hunger and thirst.

O Sruvavati, this is how Arundhati, like you, acquired punya in the olden days, for my sake. However, you have practised more severe penances so I will grant you a special and superior varam. Whomsoever stays in this tirtha for just one night and bathes here with soul fixed in dhyana, will after death, obtain many regions of blessedness that are otherwise most difficult to acquire. Having given this blessing to Sruvavati, the thousand-eyed Sakra then went back to swarga in a shower of celestial flowers of divine fragrance. Everyone heard the sound of kettledrums and smelt the auspicious and perfumed breezes. Casting off her body, the auspicious Sruvavati became the spouse of Indra."

Janamejaya asked, "Who was the mother of Sruvavati and how was she reared, O Brahmana?"

Vaisampayana said, "Unable to control himself, Maharishi Bharadwaja once ejaculated his vital seed at the sight of the large-eyed Apsara, Ghritachi. He kept his seed in a cup made of the leaves of a tree and the girl Sruvavati was born in it. Having performed the usual post-natal rites, the tapasvin Maharishi named her Sruvavati, after the leaf cup in which she was born. She lived in his asrama, while Bharadwaja roamed the forests of Himavat.

Yadusreshta Baladeva bathes in that tirtha and after he gives away generous dakshina to many Brahmanas, leaves for the tirtha of Sakta."

Vaisampayana said, “The mighty Yadu lord bathes at Indra’s tirtha and gives away wealth and gemstones to Brahmanas. Here, Indra, the chief of the Devas, once performed a hundred unstinted Aswamedha Yagnas with the assistance of knowledgeable Brahmanas and gave away enormous wealth to Brihaspati and generous dakshina to the Brahmanas. Having duly completed those hundred yagnas, they named Indra, Satakratu and that auspicious and sacred tirtha, able to purify every sin, Indra-tirtha.

Baladeva next worships at that auspicious tirtha named after Rama of Bhrigu’s race. That Brahmana of great punya repeatedly subjugated the earth and killed all the leading Kshatriyas of the world. With the help of his Acharya, the Mahamuni Kasyapa, Rama performed a Vajapeya yagna and a hundred Aswamedha yagnas at that tirtha. There Parasurama gifted his Acharya the whole earth with her oceans as dakshina, the yagna fee. The Brahmanas also received diverse kinds of gems, kine, elephants, female slaves, sheep and goats.

Baladeva next calls at the Yamuna tirtha and worships the Rishis there. Endued with great effulgence, Varuna, the son of Aditi, once performed the Rajasuya yagna here, as well as the Mahayagna, after subjugating Devas, Gandharvas and Rakshasas. With the start of that great yagna, a battle broke out between the Devas and the Danavas filling the three worlds with terror and, after the completion of his Rajasuya yagna, a terrible war broke out among the Kshatriyas.

Blessed by the great Rishis, Balarama then visits the tirtha called Aditya. It was here that, after performing a yagna, Suryadeva obtained the sovereignty of all luminous bodies in the universe and acquired his great energy. There, at that tirtha, reside all the Devas including Vasava, the Viswedevas, the Maruts, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Island-born Vyasa, Suka, Madhusudhana, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Pisachas, and thousands of others with great punya. Indeed, Vishnu, after killing the Asuras Madhu and Kaitabha, performed his ablutions here. Maharishi Vyasa and Rishi Asita-Devala obtained profound yogic powers and achieved great felicity after bathing here."

Vaisampayana said, "In that tirtha named Aditya, there lived a virtuous Rishi named Asita-Devala, observing his svadharma. He led a life of purity and self-restraint and never injured anyone. He maintained an equal behaviour towards all beings, in word, deed, and thought. He was like Yama, impartial and free from anger. He viewed censure and praise, gold and a heap of pebbles, as the same. He daily worshipped all the Devas, his guests, and Brahmanas who came to him. He always practised the vow of Brahmacharya and was devoted to dharma.

Once, the great Yogi, Rishi Jaigisavya, came to Devala's hermitage to complete his tapasya. While he lived at the asrama, Devala always kept a kindly eye on the Rishi and never neglected him. Once however, Devala lost sight of Jaigisavya and he reappeared at dinnertime, as a Sannyasi soliciting alms. Devala showed him great honour and worshipped his guest in the manner prescribed, for many years. Inevitably, one day a thought occurred to the noble Devala. 'I have spent many years in worshipping this Rishi but this idle fellow has yet to speak a single word to me and is like a block of wood.'

With this thought in mind, the blessed Devala went to the shores of the ocean, journeying through the sky, taking his earthen kamandalu with him. When he arrived at the coast, Devala saw Jaigisavya already there before him and wondered at how the Rishi could reach the ocean and perform his ablutions before his own arrival.

After completing his ablutions and purifying himself, he recited silently the sacred mantras before returning to his asrama, taking with him his earthen vessel filled with water. As he entered his own hermitage, he saw Jaigisavya already seated there. Having seen that Sannyasi complete his ablutions in the sea before his own arrival, and now seeing him back at his asrama before his own return, he was astounded. Then Devala used mantras and soared into the sky, to ascertain who the Sannyasi really was. There he saw crowds of sky-ranging Siddhas rapt in meditation reverentially worship Jaigisavya. This sight filled Devala with anger.

He saw Jaigisavya set out, in quick succession, for swarga, to Pitriloka, to the region of Yama and to the abode of Soma. He saw him fly to the blessed regions of the performers of certain rigid yagnas. From there he visited the land of the Agnihotris and then to the realm of those Rishis who perform the Darsa and the Paurnamasa Yagnas. Devala then saw him go from where men performed yagnas by killing animals to that pure world which the Devas worship. Jaigisavya next visited the place where people perform the Chaturmasya and other similar yagnas, and from there to where the performers of the Agnishtoma yagna, lived. Devala then saw his guest fly to the refuge of those Rishis who perform the Yagna called Agnishutta and then to the worlds of those wise men who perform the Vajapeya, the Rajasuya and the Pundarika yagnas. He then saw him in the regions of those foremost of men who perform the Aswamedha yagna, and where they sacrifice human beings in yagnas.

Devala saw Jaigisavya visit those who perform the Sautramani yagna in which the flesh of all living animals is offered. He saw Jaigisavya where they perform Dadasaha and other similar yagnas. He saw his guest visit the region of Mitravaruna and then in that of the Adityas. He saw his guest pass through the regions of the Rudras, the Vasus and Brihaspati and soar into the blessed region called Goloka, and to those of the Brahmasatris. He also saw him flit to those realms reserved for women who are chaste and devoted to their husbands. At this point, Devala lost sight of Jaigisavya, who vanished from his sight.

Devala now reflected upon the power of Jaigisavya, the excellence of his vratas and upon the unrivalled success of his yoga. Then, with joined hands and in a reverential spirit, he asked those great Siddhas living in the regions of the Brahmasatris where Jaigisavya had gone.

The Siddhas told him that Jaigisavya had gone to Brahmaloka, the eternal world of Brahma. Devala tried to soar aloft to follow him but he fell back down. The Siddhas then told him that he was not competent to follow Jaigisavya to the abode of Brahma. Hearing this, Devala descended from one region to another in due order, until he reached his own asrama.

As soon as he entered his home, he saw Jaigisavya seated there, in quietude. Devala understood Jaigisavya's power derived through the yoga of tapasya, and approaching that great Rishi, with deep humility, said, 'I desire Moksha and emancipation, O Maharishi.'

Jaigisavya gave him lessons and taught him the Yoga Shastra and the Sanatana Dharma. The great Rishi understood that Devala was firmly resolved, and performed all the ordained steps for his admission into that religion. All creatures, with the Pitris, seeing Devala determined to adopt the religion of Moksha, began to weep, saying, 'Alas, who will now give us food?'

Hearing these lamentations of all these beings, Devala thought about renouncing his desire for Moksha. At this, all kinds of sacred fruits and roots, O Bhaarata, and flowers and deciduous herbs, in thousands, began to weep, saying, 'The wicked-hearted and mean Devala will, without doubt, once more pluck and cut us. Alas, having once assured all creatures of his perfect harmlessness, he sees not the wrong that he meditates to do.'

At this, Devala began to reflect about which among the two, Moksha or Grihasta, would be better for him. He abandoned Grihasta for Moksha and obtained the ultimate goal. The Devas led by Brihaspati applauded Jaigisavya and his tapasya.

Then Maharishi Narada told the Devas, 'There is no tapasya in Jaigisavya since he filled Devala with wonder.'

The Devas were shocked at Narada's frightful words, and said, 'No, there is no one superior or even equal to this noble Jaigisavya in force of energy, in tapasya or in yoga.'

Such was the power of Jaigisavya and Devala. This is the place and the tirtha of those two noble Rishis. Balarama bathes there, gives generous dakshina to Brahmanas, earns great punya and then leaves for the tirtha of Soma."

CANTO 147

Vaisampayana said, “There, at Soma tirtha, O Rajan, where the Lord of stars had once performed the Rajasuya yagna, a great war took place of which Tarakasura was the cause. Balarama bathes there and, after distributing dakshina, visits the tirtha of Sarasvata Muni, where, long ago during a drought extending for twelve years, the sage Sarasvata had taught the Vedas to many great Brahmanas.”

Janamejaya asked, “Why did the Rishi Sarasvata teach the Vedas during the twelve year drought?”

Vaisampayana said, “Long ago, there lived a Maharishi of great punya named Dadhicha who led the life of a Brahmachari. His mahatapasya was such that even the offer of every kind of reward could not distract him. This frightened Sakra so much that he sent the Apsara Alambusa to tempt him. Seeing the beautiful Apsara, Dadhicha involuntarily ejaculated into the river, where Saraswati secured his seed with care in her womb. In time, a child was born and she took it with her to the Rishi.

Seeing the Rishi Dadhicha in a gathering, Saraswati handed over the child and said, ‘O Maharishi, this is your son from your seed which you ejaculated at the sight of the Apsara Alambusa, and which I held in my womb through my devotion for you, knowing that your tejas would not be destroyed. Accept this innocent child as your own.’

Dadhicha accepted the child and, feeling great love, held his son in a close embrace for some time. Pleased with Saraswati, Maharishi Dadhicha gave her a boon, saying, 'The Viswedevas, the Rishis, all the tribes of the Gandharvas and the Apsaras, will henceforth, O blessed one, derive great happiness from oblations of your water.'

He then praised her saying, 'You were born long ago, O most blessed one, from Brahma's lake created from his mind, and all Mahatapasvins know you. You have done me great good. The world will henceforth know your child as Sarasvata. He will create new worlds and, during a drought, which will last for twelve years, Sarasvata will teach the Vedas to many great Brahmanas. O blessed Saraswati, through my grace you will always be the greatest of all sacred rivers.'

The River Saraswati went away in great joy, taking the child with her.

Meanwhile, during the war between the Devas and the Danavas, Sakra searched the three worlds in vain for astras to kill the Asuras. He then said to the Devas, 'I cannot kill the Asuras without the bones of Dadhicha. O Devas, go to that great Rishi and request him for his bones.'

Indra was always jealous of Dadhicha's great tejas. The offspring of Maharishi Bhrigu, the son of Lord Brahma, he was born after great tapasya and was the strongest man in the world and tall like the king of the mountains. At the request of the Devas, Rishi Dadhicha unhesitatingly gave up his life and obtained in exchange, many regions of inexhaustible merit. Using his bones, Sakra made thunderbolts, chakras and heavy gadas. With the thunderbolt born of Brahma energy, and infused with mantras, Indra hurled it and slew nine and ninety mighty Daityas.

Then, after a long time, there came a dreadful drought that lasted twelve years, during which, the Rishis and Maharishis went away in order to stay alive. Seeing this, the sage Sarasvata also wanted to leave but the river Saraswati assured him that she would always provide him with food in the form of large fish. He stayed and offered oblations of food to other Rishis and the Devas and thus continued to support both himself and the Devas.

After that period of drought, the Rishis asked each other for instructions on the Vedas, which they had forgotten while wandering in search of sustenance. Indeed, there was no one among them who could understand the scriptures anymore. It so happened that one of them saw Maharishi Sarasvata reading the Vedas with undivided attention. He reported this to the others, as well as about Sarasvata's unrivalled splendour and god-like mien. All the Maharishis went to him and asked him to teach them. He agreed but the Rishis felt that he was too young to be their teacher.

At this he said, ‘I must act in such a way that my religious punya does not suffer a diminution. He who teaches improperly, and he who learns improperly, are both lost in no time and will come to hate each other. It is not upon years, or decrepitude, or wealth, or the number of relatives that Rishis stake their claim to punya. Only he among us who is capable of reading and understanding the Vedas is truly great.’

Hearing this, those Munis became his disciples and obtained from him the knowledge of the Vedas. Though only a boy, sixty thousand Munis became his sishyas and each brought a handful of grass and offered it to him.

The mighty son of Rohini, and elder brother of Kesava, gives away wealth at that tirtha as dakshina, then joyfully continues his yatra to another place where once there lived an old unmarried woman, who undertook an unprecedented tapasya.”

Janamejaya said, “O Maharishi, why did that maiden undertake such a severe tapasya and what was her vrata? Tell me the story, for I am intrigued.”

Vaisampayana said, “There was a Rishi of great tejas named Kuni-Garga who, after practising severe tapasya, created a beautiful daughter entirely through his will. Looking at her, an overjoyed Maharishi Kuni-Garga abandoned his body and rose into swarga. That wonderful maiden, with eyes like lotus petals, began to practise a most severe tapasya. She worshipped the Pitris and the Devas with vratas for a long time and refused to marry, for she did not see a husband who could be worthy of her.

In her devotion, she continued happily to emaciate her body, with austere penance in that solitary forest. Only when she became very old and unable to move even a single step without help, did she wish to depart to the other world.

Seeing her about to cast off her body, Narada said to her, ‘O sinless one, great has been your tapasya but you cannot obtain the realms of blessedness for you have not cleansed yourself through marriage.’

Hearing this, the old woman went to a conclave of Rishis and said, ‘I will give half of the punya from my tapasya to anyone who accepts my hand in marriage.’

Galava’s son, a Rishi named Sringavat, accepted her proposal, with the understanding that he would live with her for only one night. She agreed, and Sringavat duly poured libations on the fire according to the Shastras and married her. On that night, she became a ravishing young woman, robed in deva-vastra, ornaments and garlands and smeared with celestial liniments and perfumes. Seeing her aglow with beauty, Sringavat very happily spent one night with her.

In the morning, she said to him, ‘Our agreement, O Brahmana, has been fulfilled, and I will now leave you. He who passes one night with concentration in this tirtha after having gratified the Devas with oblations of water, will henceforth obtain that punya which is his who observes the vratas of Brahmacharya for eight and fifty years.’

With these words, that chaste woman departed for swarga.

Rishi Sringavat, her husband, became unhappy remembering her beauty and accepted with difficulty the fruits of half her tapasya. Infatuated by her and moved by sorrow, he cast off his body as well and followed her out of this world.

It was while he is at this tirtha that Baladeva hears of the killing of Salya. After giving dakshina to the Brahmanas there, he grieves for the dead Maharatha.”

CANTO 149

Vaisampayana continued, “After Balarama leaves Samantapanchaka, he learns from various Rishis about the outcome of the war at Kurukshetra. They say, ‘O Rama, this Samantapanchaka is said to be the eternal northern altar of Brahma, the Lord of all beings. Here, in the olden days, the Devas performed a great yagna. Maharishi Kuru of great tejas cultivated this field for many years and so was it called the field of Kuru or Kurukshetra.’

Balarama asks, ‘Why did the noble Kuru cultivate this field?’

The Rishis replied, ‘In fact, in the olden days, Sakra, coming down from swarga, asked Kuru this very question. Kuru replied, saying, “O you of a hundred yagnas, those who die upon this plain shall ascend to regions of blessedness after being cleansed of their sins.”

The lord Sakra ridiculed this and went back to swarga. However, without being in the least dejected, the royal sage Kuru continued to till the soil. Indeed, Sakra always received the same reply whenever he came to check, and always ridiculed the Rajarishi. Seeing the king till the soil with unflagging perseverance, Sakra summoned the Devas and informed them of the monarch’s occupation. The Devas were concerned that if by merely dying at Kurukshetra men could go to Devaloka without performing any yagnas to the Devas, it would endanger their very existence. They exhorted Sakra to stop Kuru by granting him a boon.

Sakra went back to Kuru and said, “Do not toil any more, O king. I assure you that those who starve themselves to death, with all their senses awake, and those who die here in battle, will enjoy swarga.”

King Kuru accepted and Sakra, with a joyful heart, returned to his heaven. Brahma, Vishnu, Maheswara, all the Devas, and the sacred Rishis duly sanctioned this word given by Sakra. They agreed that there would be no more sacred place on earth than Kurukshetra, and men who performed tapasya here would go to Brahma’s very loka after death. Further, men of punya, who gave away their wealth here, would have their wealth doubled and those who lived here in expectation of good would never have to visit the land of Yama. Kings who perform great yagnas here would dwell in swarga as long as earth herself lasted.

Listen, O Baladeva, to the hymn that Sakra himself composed and sang here. ‘The very dust of Kurukshetra, borne away by the wind, shall cleanse evil souls and take them to heaven.’

Kurukshetra is the name given to the space between the Tarantuka and the Arantuka and the lakes of Rama and Shamachakra. Samantapanchaka is the northern sacrificial altar of Brahma, the Lord of all creatures; great Devas, Brahmanas and kings like Nriga and others, after performing costly yagnas here, died and went straight to heaven. Auspicious, sacred and much regarded by the Devas, this tirtha possesses all divine attributes. This is why Kshatriyas killed in battle here obtain the sacred realms of eternal blessedness.”

Vaisampayana said, “Baladeva visits Kurukshetra, O Janamejaya, gives away wealth there before going on to a large and beautiful asrama overgrown with madhuka and mango trees, and full of plakshas and nyagrodhas and with many bilwas and excellent jackfruit and arjuna trees. Delighted to see that asrama with so many marks of sacredness, Baladeva asked the Rishis whose it was.

Those Rishis told him, ‘Long ago, Vishnudeva sat in austere tapasya here and performed all the eternal yagnas. Here, a maiden, the noble Sandilya’s beautiful and chaste daughter, who was self-restrained and observed Brahmacharya dharma, who kept austere vratas, performed severe tapasya that women are usually unable to, finally went to swarga, worshipped by the Devas and Brahmanas.’

Baladeva goes to that asrama, performs all the rites and ceremonies of the evening twilight on the side of Himavat, and then begins his ascent of the mountain. Soon he sees the glory of the river Saraswati, as well as the tirtha called Plakshaprasravana.

He bathes and distributes dakshina at another wonderful tirtha called Karavapana and spends a night there with the Rishis before visiting the sacred asrama of the Mitra-Varunas. He then visits that place on the Yamuna where, long ago, Indra, Agni and Aryaman found great happiness. He bathes there and sits down to listen to the discourse between the Rishis and the Siddhas. Maharishi Narada, covered with matted locks and attired in golden rays, holding a golden danda and a kamandalu, arrives here. Accomplished in song and dance and adored by Devas and Brahmanas, Narada carries a beautiful tortoise-shell Veena. Rama respectfully receives the Devarishi who was a renowned provoker of quarrels, and asks him about the details of the war.

Narada relates everything about the awful extermination of the Kurus and says, 'Already, Bhishma, Drona and the lord of the Sindhus have fallen. Vikartana's son Karna along with his sons is no more. Bhurisrava and Salya are dead. These and many other kings and shuras who fought for Duryodhana have all fallen. In Duryodhana's army, only Kripa, Kritavarman and Ashwatthaman remain alive but they have run away in fear. A grieving Duryodhana has sought refuge in the depths of the Dwaipayana Lake. The Pandavas and Krishna have found him and provoked him to fight Bhima. Their terrible duel with gadas, O Balarama, will take place today. Go quickly, if you wish to witness that fight between your two disciples.'

Rama bade a respectful farewell to the Brahmanas. Having listened to the discourse of the sages about the great merits of tirthas, Balarama sang this verse in their midst:

'Where else is such happiness as a home by the Saraswati?
Where else is such punya as in a home by the Saraswati?
Men have gone to heaven, after reaching her.
All should ever remember her.
Saraswati is the most sacred of rivers.
She always bestows the greatest happiness on men.
Men, after reaching the Saraswati, will not have to grieve for their sins either here or hereafter.'

He orders his attendants to return to Dwaraka, and descends from the Plakshaprasravana asrama. Repeatedly looking with joy at the Saraswati, Baladeva then drives swiftly in a ratha to witness the final duel between his two disciples.

O Janamejaya, this was how that terrible battle took place."

"King Dhritarashtra, in great sorrow, asks, 'Seeing Balarama arrive just as the gada yuddha was about to begin, O Sanjaya, what does my son do?'

Sanjaya says, 'Your valiant son Duryodhana is overjoyed to see Baladeva. Yudhishtira stands up to receive Rama, and happily offers him a seat and enquires after his welfare. Rama replies, "I have heard Rishis say that Kurukshetra is a most sacred place, equal to swarga itself, and adored by Devas, Rishis and noble Brahmanas. I say that we repair at once to Samantapanchaka, which the Devas consider the northern Yagnavedi of Brahma, the Lord of all beings. He who dies in battle at that eternal and most sacred of places is sure to find swarga."

With his great gada and tread of an infuriated elephant, Duryodhana strides towards Samantapanchaka, surrounded by Yudhishtira and the Pandavas. The Devas in the sky and the Charanas applaud him. The blare of conches, the loud percussion of drums and the roars of Kshatriyas fill the sky. Moving westward, they reach the sacred tirtha on the southern side of the Saraswati and spread out. The ground there is firm and not sandy and they choose this spot for the final encounter.

Clad in armour and hefting his own great mace, Bhima, O Rajan, assumes the stance of the Garuda. Wearing helmet and armour made of gold, licking the corners of his mouth, his eyes red, and breathing hard, Duryodhana dazzles like the golden Sumeru. Shaking his mace, your son looks at Bhima and dares him like an elephant challenging a rival.

Evenly matched, both are Baladeva's disciples and masters at fighting with the gada. Accomplished like Varuna, powerful like Vasudeva, Rama, or Ravana, they are like Maya and Vasava or Madhu and Kaitabha or Sunda and Upasunda, or Vali and Sugriva or like Kala and Mrityu. Both consider the other a worthy opponent and they stand ready, like two suns at the hour of the pralaya.

Duryodhana now says to Yudhishtira standing with his brothers, Krishna and Balarama, "Sit with the Kaikeyas and the Srinjayas and the high-souled Panchalas and watch my duel with Bhima."

That group of kings and warriors sits down, resplendent like an assembly of Devas in swarga. The handsome elder brother of Kesava, Mahabaho Baladeva, clad in blue robes, sits in the middle and looks like the full moon. All those around him salute him respectfully. Meanwhile, those two shuras, both invincible at mace fighting, close with each other and, goading one another with offensive and bitter words, like Sakra and Vritra of old, begin their battle to death."

Vaisampayana said, “Sanjaya says, ‘At the outset, O Janamejaya, a fierce wordy encounter takes place between the two shuras.’ A grieving King Dhritarashtra says, “Oh, I pity the man who meets such an end. My son was sovereign of the whole world, with kings and eleven chamus of troops under his command. Alas, now he is a lone warrior fighting on foot with his mace. My poor son, who was the protector of the universe, is now himself without protection. This is Destiny! Alas, O Sanjaya, great is the grief that my son must have felt.’ Having said this Dhritarashtra falls silent with sorrow.

Sanjaya says, ‘Duryodhana roars a challenge and provokes Bhima to fight. At once, awful portents appear; a fierce wind begins to blow, driving showers of hard pebbles before it. A pall of dust hangs on the ground and a thick gloom envelops everything. Thunderbolts fall, hundreds of meteors crash into the earth with blasting force, Rahu swallows the sun and the earth, and the forests and trees shake violently. More hot winds blow and the summits of mountains crumble. Wild animals run in all directions, while jackals with blazing mouths howl everywhere, making one’s hair stand on end. The four quarters seems ablaze and many sinister beasts of ill omen appear all around. The water in the wells there swells up of its own accord and disembodied voices, asariris, whisper, chatter, growl and moan from everywhere.

Looking at these portents, Bhima says to Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, "This evil Suyodhana cannot vanquish me. Like Arjuna burning down the Khandava forest, today I will exhaust the wrath that I have carried in my heart for such a long time, and I will also pluck out the burning dart that lies buried in your heart. I will kill this evil wretch and drape the garland of fame around your neck. He will never enter Hastinapura again.

They set snakes on us when we were asleep, attempted to poison our food, to drown us at Pramanakoti on the Ganga and burn us alive while we were in the house of lac. They humiliated us in the great Kuru sabha, robbed us of all our possessions, and forced us into exile and a last year of ajnatavasa. I will settle all our debts today.

The life of this evil son of Dhritarashtra has run its course and reached its end. After today, he will never again look at his father and mother; he will never again look at a woman's beauty. Today, this disgraceful scion of Santanu's line will lie on the bare earth, unbreathing and without his prosperity and kingdom. Today Dhritarashtra will hear of the death of his son, and remember Sakuni's atrocities against us."

The mighty Bhima shoulders his mace and stands ready, like Sakra facing the Asura Vritra. He hisses at Duryodhana, "Remember Varanavata, where you humiliated Draupadi, while in her season, before all the Kuru sabha. Remember how you and Sakuni cheated Yudhishtira in that game of dice. We will never forget our suffering in exile in the forest and subsequently living concealed as servants in Virata's city. I will have my revenge for all that today, vile cousin!

It is my good fortune that you stand before me at last. It is for your sake that Bhishma Pitamaha, struck down by Sikhandi, lies on a bed of arrows. Drona, Karna, Salya and Sakuni, the root of this enmity and the Great War, are all dead. We have killed the wretched Pratikamin, who seized Draupadi's tresses and all your brothers. You are responsible for the death of all these and numberless other kings. And now at last it is your time to die and I will kill you today with this mace of mine."

Duryodhana answers him fearlessly, "As usual, you brag. Fight, Vrikodara, and I will quench your thirst for war. Vermin that you are, know that you cannot frighten me. I have been waiting for this opportunity a long time. Today, fate has brought you within the reach of my gada. Stop bragging and do your worst."

The Somakas and other kings present there all applaud, and boost Duryodhana's morale. He stands ready, like an angry elephant, bristling for fight. Bhima hefts his gada and closes with Duryodhana.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'A confident Duryodhana stalks Bhima and they meet like two bulls locking horns. They spar and their maces collide like thunderbolts. Their duel, like the one between Indra and Prahlada, is hair raising. The Devas, Gandharvas and all the other spectators marvel at the two and no one can be sure who will ultimately triumph.

They brandish their gadas, heavy and lethal like Yama's Danda or Indra's Vajra, and circle each other warily, seeking an opening to strike. Bhima whirls his weapon, producing a loud and appalling sound and presents an amazing sight as he shuffles his feet and prances about, alternately advancing and retreating, dealing and warding off blows with terrific facility. He attacks, feinting right and left, using every subtle and challenging ploy to draw his enemy forward while cleverly avoiding his blows by ducking under them or jumping high over Suyodhana's lightning swings.

He smashes his adversary standing toe to toe with him, and then strikes him with an unexpected backswing as he dances away from him, so amazingly light on his great feet. Both masters of the mace, Bhima and Duryodhana fight long and tirelessly, whirling about on the field, striking and avoiding each other's blows before the transfixed onlookers both on the ground and in the sky.

Duryodhana adopts the right mandala, while Bhima prefers the left. Bhima circles like an immense lion, most warily, O Rajan, but suddenly Duryodhana darts forward like a cobra and strikes him a staggering blow on his side. Bhima attempts to counterattack, but Duryodhana nimbly dodges his blow and strikes him yet again like thunder. The blow is so swift and awesome that it generates a flash of flame and a sickening sound as it lands. To all appearances, Suyodhana is gaining the upper hand. A great fear enters the hearts of the Pandus and the Somakas, as they mark the violence of the very wind that Duryodhana's whirling mace creates.

Displaying titanic prowess, the two shuras strike and both draw blood. The duel intensifies as the day closes under the gaze of thousands of those that watch, holding their breath. The two prodigious maces ring against each other deafeningly and sparks fly copiously, even as when two thunderbolts might collide. Ah, indescribable is the prowess and skill of the two cousins who so despise each other, and so alike are they in the battle of maces.

Bhima recovers quickly from your son's initial blows and beats back his opponent with a flurry of mace strokes so that Duryodhana is taken unawares and is briefly baffled and dazed. Flaring up then in rage, he pivots on his left foot and rising to his full height, strikes Bhima on the head with full, tremendous force. Astonished to see that his opponent neither flinches nor takes a step back, all that watch rise as a man and give him a standing ovation.

Bhima now hurls his golden gada at Duryodhana but your prince uses the manoeuvre called Kausika, leaps up high and strikes the hurtling gada down into the ground like a sparking lightning bolt. Without a moment's pause, Duryodhana rushes at Bhima and crashes a staggering blow squarely into his great chest, winding him. The anxiously watching Somakas and the Pandavas grow more and more alarmed, for Duryodhana appears to gain the advantage with each blow and moment.

Bhima snatches up his mace and runs furiously at Duryodhana, whirling his weapon and he now strikes his enemy in the ribs, knocking him sideways and onto his knees. A cry of dismay rises from the throats of the Srinjayas. This revives Duryodhana and, seething with rage at his humiliation, he staggers to his feet and, breathing like a mighty snake, burns Bhima with murderous glances. He gathers himself and crashes a thunderous swing of his right into Bhima's brow. Though blood spurts from that wound and through his nose, Bhima stands unmoved like a mountain. Swinging his own gada, he fetches Duryodhana a blow that fells him senseless to the ground.

Like a large flower laden sala tree in the forest, uprooted by the violence of a storm, Duryodhana lies sprawled and unmoving. The Pandavas are ecstatic and shout their elation. However, Suyodhana recovers all too soon and, rising like an elephant from a lake, and seemingly quite unaffected, he circles, feints and, with great finesse, plunges forward and deals his titanic cousin a quite murderous blow. Bhima feels his legs turn to water and measures his length on the field.

The ferocity of this last blow fractures Bhima's coat of mail and Duryodhana lets out a yell of victory. There is a great uproar from Devas and Apsaras watching from the sky and a fragrant shower of unearthly blooms rains down on the two mighty, mighty adversaries. Seeing Bhima prostrate and unconscious on the earth and his coat of mail split open, stark terror grips the hearts of the Pandavas. However, Bhima also quickly recovers, wipes his bloodied face and, rising again with rolling eyes, steadies himself with some effort.' "

"Sanjaya says, 'Watching keenly the duel between those two magnificent and peerless shuras of the Kuru vamsa, Arjuna asks Krishna, "Between these two, who, in your opinion, is the superior?"

Krishna replies, "They had the same master Balarama, received the same training, but Bhima is more powerful, while Duryodhana has the greater skill and has practised more. In a fair fight, Bhima can never win. However, if he uses guile, he can vanquish Duryodhana just as the Devas destroyed the Asuras through trickery. We know that Sakra vanquished Virochana and that Indra robbed Vritra of his energy, all through deception. Bhima must do the same. During the game of dice, Bhima vowed to break Suyodhana's thighs, which he lasciviously bared and called Draupadi to sit on, with his mace. Let him accomplish that now. The way to kill the Kuru king, who is full of deceit himself, is only through deceit.

It is again through Yudhishtira's foolishness that we find ourselves in danger once more. After achieving great success by killing Bhishma and the other Kurus, we had almost won the war and attained the end we sought. The noble, naïve Dharmaraja's folly has now set the outcome of the war entirely upon the result of this duel between Suyodhana and Bhima. Long ago, Usanas advised, 'One must always be wary of the survivors of a beaten army who are cornered and fight with their last strength, desperately. For they are urgently motivated and have nothing to lose.'

Even Sakra, O Arjuna, would find it difficult to stand before the desperate fury of those who have abandoned all hope. We routed Suyodhana and his army and, despairing of retaining his kingdom, he ran away to hide in the depths of a lake. What sensible man would challenge such a person to single combat? I am not sure that Duryodhana will not succeed in snatching back the kingdom that he has already lost to us. For full thirteen years, he practised with the gada with great resolution. Look how he leaps and feints and then strikes like a naga, effortlessly, in this duel. If Bhima does not kill him through guile, he will surely remain king."

Understanding the import of what Krishna says, Arjuna catches Bhima's eye and slaps his own left thigh. Bhima, too, immediately understands that signal and begins to look for an opportunity to fulfil his old vow. He knows full well that to strike an opponent below the waist is forbidden in a gada yuddha of dharma; he also knows what is at stake and that he will never prevail over Duryodhana without breaking the law of mace fighting. He circles Duryodhana with his uplifted mace, and shows many kinds of manoeuvres, like the Yomaka, and shifts his mandala from right to left and back again. Sometimes he uses the movement called Gomutraka, to confuse his terrible adversary.

Your son, O Rajan, who is a past master in the art of using the gada, shuffles skilfully to keep his enemy always in front of him. Whirling their frightful gadas smeared with sandalwood paste and other perfumed unguents, the two shuras circle each other like two Garudas wanting to snatch the same snake for their meal. No one appears to gain any advantage and their colliding gadas make peals of thunder.

Finally, fatigue overpowers them both, and they rest for a while before renewing their savage, outrageous encounter. Resuming after a brief rest, they find each other repeatedly with their flashing, stormy mace strokes and all their upper limbs are battered and bruised. Covered with blood from head to foot, they look like a pair of Kinsukas on the breast of Himavat.

And now Bhima sets in motion his devious plan. He deliberately leaves an opening for Duryodhana to strike at him. The befuddled and prevailing Suyodhana is deceived, for he grows more confident of victory by the moment and steps forward with a grim smile—to end it all and claim victory and kingship. Bhima craftily flings his mace at him and your son, O Bhaarata, sidesteps and the weapon passes harmlessly by. Seizing the opportunity, Duryodhana quickly strikes him cleanly with great power. The blow stuns Bhima and he bleeds copiously. Duryodhana does not suspect that a trap has been laid for him; he overestimates the damage his blow has done and goes forward to put an end to his detested cousin, to end it all.

Brave Bhima, meanwhile, braces himself, grits his teeth, summons up his last strength, and suddenly appears unhurt to his opponent and ready to return the blow. Completely deceived, Duryodhana pauses. This moment allows Bhima another few moments to recoup his strength. He catches his breath, picks up his mace and attacks Duryodhana with renewed vigour. Seeing him come, your surprised son decides to use the manoeuvre called Avasthana to meet his charge. This requires him to leap up into the air and, anticipating this perfectly, Bhima gives a triumphant yell and hurls his gada like lightning directly at his thighs even as he leaps. That wondrous and heavy mace hurled by Bhima infused with the force of the wind and thunder crashes into Duryodhana's thighs, breaks them both and smashes his manhood as well.

Your son Duryodhana falls, making the very earth echo with the sound. Fierce winds with thunder and lightning begin to blow, showers of dust fall and the earth, with her trees and plants and mountains, begins to tremble. Meteors in their thousands flare down from the sky, along with lashing showers of blood, all sent by Indra Maghavat. The Yakshas, the Rakshasas, and the Pisachas set up a huge commotion in the sky. At their terrifying yowls and screams, thousands of animals and birds, the surviving horses, elephants and soldiers of the Pandava army let out shrill cries. Conches blare and the peal of drums and cymbals are resounding as the thunder of the apocalypse. A vast and booming roar rises and echoes from within the bowels of the earth.

Upon the fall of your son, O Bharatarishabha, headless and frightful beings, with many legs and arms, begin to dance everywhere. Women seem to take the appearance of men, and men that of women, and even armed warriors begin to tremble. Blood gushes up and breaks the banks of lakes and spumes up in geysers from deep wells, while rivers change their directions and rush back towards their sources. Seeing these portents, anxiety fills the hearts of the Panchalas and the Pandavas. The Devas, Gandharvas, Siddhas, and the Charanas return to their homes, applauding the wonderful duel between your sons, the gada yuddha to end all mace fights, the duel like which even the Great War has seen no other.' "

"Sanjaya says, 'The Pandavas and the Somakas are overjoyed to see Duryodhana lying on the earth like a sala tree uprooted by a storm. Approaching Duryodhana, Bhima taunts him, "Wretch, you laughed at the disrobed Draupadi in the sabha and called her a cow. You bared your thigh and asked her to come and sit on it. Now suffer the consequence of what you did."

Bhima kicks the head of his fallen foe with his left foot. Eyes red with fury, he says, "They who danced and mocked, calling us, 'Cow, cow!' We will now dance and call them, 'Cow, cow.' We have no guile, no fire, no guile at dice, and no deception. We only trust the might of our arms to defeat our enemies."

An exultant Vrikodara once more says deliberately to Yudhishtira, Krishna, Srinjaya, Arjuna and the two sons of Madri, "Those Dhartarashtras who dragged a pleading Draupadi into the sabha and disrobed her, have now been killed by the might of Pandavas and through the tapasya of Draupadi. King Dhritarashtra's base sons, who called us 'sesame seeds without kernels', and all their relatives and followers, are now dead. The consequence of our deeds matters little; we may go to heaven or fall into hell."

Jubilantly brandishing his mace, he again kicks the prostrate Duryodhana's head with his left foot. The Somaka Kshatriyas, seeing Bhima's shameful act, do not approve at all. King Yudhishtira tells him, "You have exhausted your hostility towards Duryodhana and accomplished your vow by a fair or an unfair deed. Stop. Do not kick his head, Bhima. Do not do such an ignoble thing. Remember, Duryodhana is our brother, a king of the Kurus, and commanded eleven Akshauhinis. You should not touch a king and a kinsman with your foot. His brothers, sons, and his kinsmen are dead; his friends and counsellors are gone and his troops exterminated. He is ruined. We have defeated him in battle and in every respect; he deserves our pity and not our abuse.

'Bhima is a man of dharma', people used to say of you. Why then, O Bhima, do you insult the fallen king in this way?"

Yudhishtira, emotional with grief, his voice choked with tears, walks up to Duryodhana and says, "O lord, you should not give way to anger or grieve for yourself. Without doubt, you suffer the dreadful consequences of your sins. Undoubtedly, the Creator has ordained this end for us. O Kurupravira, it was your avarice, pride and folly that brought you to this sorry end. You are the cause of the deaths of your companions, brothers, sires, sons, grandsons and others, and now you too are mortally wounded. All this is the effect of Fate. You deserve no pity, but your death, O Anagha one, is enviable. It is we who are to be pitied in every respect, for now we have a miserable existence ahead of us, without friends and kinsmen. Alas, how will I face the sorrowing widows of my brothers, sons and grandsons! You depart from this world for swarga while we continue to suffer the most poignant grief and can expect only naraka as our reward. The grieving wives of Dhritarashtra's sons and grandsons, those widows crushed by sorrow, will curse us all."

At this point, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira breaks down and sobs helplessly.'"

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Suta, seeing Bhima strike Duryodhana down treacherously, what does Baladeva do, who is an acknowledged master of mace fighting and familiar with all its rules?'

Sanjaya says, 'The Yadusreshta Rama, greatest wielder of the mace, is livid. Raising his arms, he says in an anguished voice, "Shame on Bhima! The rules of gada yuddha combat are clear that no combatant should target any part below the navel. It is a shameful thing that this ignorant wretch Bhima struck Suyodhana a blow below the navel."

An incensed Balarama, looking like the gigantic Kailasa Mountain, rushes towards Bhima with his halayudha, his ploughshare weapon, raised. Just as quickly, Krishna restrains him in his mighty arms. The two great warriors of the Yadu's race are striking; one dark in complexion and the other fair, like the sun and the moon in the evening sky. To pacify his angry brother, Kesava says, "There are six kinds of situations that a person may be faced with: one's own success, one's friend's success, one friends' friend's success, the failures of one's enemy, the failures of one's enemy's friends, and the failures of one's enemy's friends' friends. When one's oneself or one's friends meet with reverses, one should then realise that one's fall is at hand and should look for a suitable remedy.

The Pandavas are our natural friends for they are the children of our own father's sister. It is one's dharma to accomplish one's vratas. Bhima vowed in the midst of the sabha that he would break the thighs of Duryodhana with his gada. Moreover, Maharishi Maitreya once cursed Duryodhana, saying, ‘Bhima will break your thighs with his mace.’

I cannot fault Bhima. Do not give way to wrath, Baladeva. Our births and the attraction of our hearts are the basis of our relationship.”

Hearing Krishna’s words, the noble Baladeva says, “Dharma is practised sincerely by the good but is always the victim of two things—the desire for Artha, by those who covet it, and the desire for Kama by those that are wedded to it. Whoever follows all three—Dharma, Artha and Kama—without injuring Dharma and Artha, or Dharma and Kama, or Kama and Artha, will always find great happiness. Now, as a result of Dharma suffering at the hands of Bhima, this harmony has been disturbed, Govinda, whatever you may say.”

Krishna replies, “You are known as someone free from anger and devoted to Dharma. Calm yourself and do not give way to wrath. Know that the Kali yuga is at hand. Remember also the vow that this son of Pandu made. Accept that he has now paid the debt he owed his hostility and has fulfilled his vow.”

Balarama does not appreciate Krishna’s argument and his anger still burns. He then tells the assembled warriors, “Having unfairly killed the noble Suyodhana, Bhima will henceforth be known in the world as a false warrior, while the noble Suyodhana is a true Kshatriya and will find eternal blessedness. Dhritarashtra’s royal son, so foully struck down, fully prepared himself for the yagna of war. He undertook the initiatory ceremonies on the battlefield and finally poured away his life as a libation. Duryodhana has thus fairly completed his yagna and his final ablution is the attainment of glory.”

Rohini’s son, Balarama, magnificent like the crest of a white cloud, ascends his chariot and drives away to Dwaravati leaving the Panchalas, Vrishnis and the Pandavas, mortified. Krishna approaches a dejected and worried Yudhishtira, who is in a quandary about what to do, and says, “O Dharmarajan, you know the tenets of Kshatriya dharma; why do you allow Bhima to kick the head of the fallen Duryodhana?”

Yudhishtira answers, “I do not approve of Bhima’s angry deed, O Krishna, nor do I rejoice at this extermination of my race. However, remember the sons of Dhritarashtra cheated us of our kingdom, exiled us, and heaped many indignities on our heads. Bhima has not forgotten all that or their many cruel words. This is why I allowed him, after killing Duryodhana, a man enslaved by his passions, to gratify his desire, even if it was adharma."

Krishna listens to Yudhishtira and mildly says, "So be it then."

He secretly, knowingly, approves of what Bhima did to bring Duryodhana down, not only because he has a soft corner for him but because he knows that, otherwise, everything would have been lost. Moreover, it was Krishna himself who told Arjuna the only way in which Bhima could prevail. His heart is full of joy and pride at their victory, as he respectfully salutes Yudhishtira with joined hands. He says, "The earth is today yours, O Rajan, to enjoy in peace. Rule over her and observe the duties of Kshatriya dharma. He who was the cause of this war with his deceit and sins lies on the ground. You have no enemies left alive and the earth with her forests and mountains is once more yours."

Yudhishtira says, "It is because we always followed Krishna's advice that we rule the earth again. Destiny has allowed you to redeem your promise to your mother and to your wrath and blessed you with victory."""

"Dhritarashtra asks, 'O Sanjaya, what do the Pandavas and the Srinjayas do after Bhima strikes Duryodhana down?'

Sanjaya says, 'The Pandavas, Panchalas, Srinjayas and Krishna are jubilant, and their shouts reverberate all over the battlefield. Some stretch their bows; others strum their bowstrings. Some blow their cavernous conches; others beat their drums. It is as if the earth is unable to bear the rapture of those rejoicing warriors.

Many Kshatriyas repeatedly congratulate Bhima saying, "Your achievement in defeating Duryodhana is truly amazing. You were like Indra in his war against Vritra. No other warrior could have achieved as much. Destiny gave you victory and allowed you to quaff the blood of Dusasana, like a lion drinking the blood of a buffalo. Fate has made you Yudhishtira's instrument of revenge. O Bhima, your fame has spread over the whole world. We applaud you now just as bards and eulogists lauded Sakra after he vanquished Vritra."

Then the rejoicing warriors switch to abusing Duryodhana. Krishna intervenes and tells them, "O Kshatriyas, it is not proper to abuse a beaten foe with such cruel talk. This evil man is already half dead. Wise friends like Vidura, Drona, Kripa and Sanjaya begged him to give the sons of Pandu their paternal share in the kingdom, but he laughed at them. This wretch is no longer fit to be either friend or foe. What is the use in wasting your breath upon one who is now just a piece of wood? Mount your chariots, and let us leave this place. Fate has already accounted for him and his counsellors, his kinsmen and friends."

Hearing Krishna's rebukes, king Duryodhana tries to get up. He raises himself on his two arms, and glares venomously at Vasudeva. Indeed, his posture resembles that of a snake shorn of its tail. Ignoring his unbearable pain, Duryodhana bitterly hisses at Krishna, "O son of Kamsa's slave, you are the most shameless one. Have you forgotten that Bhima treacherously struck me on my thighs and manhood, against all the rules of gada yuddha? You are responsible, for it was you who told Bhima to do it. Do you think that I did not notice you telling Arjuna what you did?

It was you, cowherd, who caused the death of thousands of kings through various forms of deceit, including the fall of our Pitamaha by confronting him with Sikhandi. You tricked our Acharya into believing that his son Ashwatthaman was dead while it was actually an elephant with the same name and Drona laid down his weapons. Then again, when he was about to be killed by the vile Dhrishtadyumna, you did not stop the Panchala prince.

You forced Karna to use the Shakti that he had from Sakra against Ghatotkacha, the weapon he had saved for Arjuna, the one your precious Partha would not have escaped. You encouraged Satyaki to kill Bhurisrava, who had lost an arm and while he sat in dhyana observing the Praya vrata. Karna almost killed Arjuna with a shaft in which the snake Aswasena had hidden himself, but you foiled his attempt. When Karna's chariot wheel sank into the ground and he was helpless as he attempted to free it, you told Arjuna to kill him. You would never have won this war if you had fought Karna, Bhishma, Drona and me by fair means. Vile Krishna, you employed the most crooked and evil methods to cause the death of many great kings who observed Kshatriya dharma."

Krishna says, "O son of Gandhari, you, your brothers, sons, kinsmen, friends, and followers are dead only because you chose a path that was not of Dharma. Your evil ways and deeds were the cause of Bhishma, Drona and Karna's deaths. Remember, I implored you to give the Pandavas their paternal inheritance, but you listened to Sakuni instead and your own envy and greed, and refused. You tried to poison Bhima and to immolate all the Pandavas and their mother in the palace of lac.

Once, you urged the evil Jayadratha to abduct Draupadi when the Pandavas were out hunting near the Trinabindu asrama. Then, when you dishonoured her in front of the sabha, you more than earned your death at Bhima's hands.

You used the clever Sakuni to cheat Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, who was a novice at dice. For that, you deserve to die.

You and your warriors surrounded Abhimanyu, who was only a child and alone, and treacherously cut him down. For that, wretch, you deserve to die.

The truth, Duryodhana, is that it was you who perpetrated all these foul deeds of adharma, and not us. You never listened to the counsels of Brihaspati and Usanas. You never honoured the aged and you never sought or listened to anybody's advice at all unless it suited your purposes. Enslaved by ungovernable greed and avarice, you committed countless sins of every kind. And now you suffer the consequences of everything you did, despite being warned time and again by those who wished you well."

Duryodhana replies, "I have studied, given dakshina, ruled this wide earth, trampled over my enemies and enjoyed all pleasures and gratifications worthy of the Devas. Who is more fortunate than I am? Death in battle, the end that all Kshatriyas who observe their svadharma desire, is now mine. With all my well-wishers, and my younger brothers, I am going to swarga. But you, O Varapurusha, will continue to live in this unhappy world, your goals unfulfilled and torn by grief."

A thick shower of fragrant flowers falls from the sky on Duryodhana while the Gandharvas play enchanting musical instruments and the Apsaras and the Siddhas sing the glory of king Duryodhana. A redolent breeze mildly blows and the sky becomes clear and blue like lapis lazuli. Vasudeva and the Pandavas see with consternation the acclaim and worship that Duryodhana receives. Hearing invisible voices say that the deaths of Bhishma, Drona, Karna and Bhurisrava were achieved through adharma, the Pandavas are anxious and aggrieved.

Then Krishna says in a deep and mighty voice, "All these Maharathas were accomplished in the use of weapons, and considered Atirathas in the world. Even the very Regents of the Earth, let alone you, could never have killed them in a fair fight. Therefore, for your good, for your kingdom, I repeatedly used my powers of illusion to effect their deaths in battle.

You should not take it to heart that you killed your enemy by deceit. When one has numerous enemies to quell, it becomes necessary to deal with them through wiles. The Devas used the same strategy to overpower the Asuras and, since, all are now free to adopt their policy, just as we did successfully. Let us retire for the night and rest our horses, elephants and chariots."

The Pandavas and the Panchalas are relieved, and shout their approval. All of them blow their conches and Krishna blows a long, echoing blast on the Panchajanya, Bharatarishabha, happy at the sight of Duryodhana struck down in battle.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'The Pandavas, followed by Satyaki, Dhrishtadyumna, Sikhandi, the five sons of Draupadi and all the kings return to their tents, their spirits now revived. The Parthas enter Duryodhana's palatial tent, shorn now of its splendours, shabby without its lord and resembling an arena after the spectators have left. It contains only women, eunuchs and a few aged counsellors.

Krishna then tells Arjuna, "Take your Gandiva and your two inexhaustible quivers and alight. I will dismount after you, O Bharatasattama."

Arjuna obeys and, as soon as Krishna also steps down, the kapidhwaja, which flew on the top of the chariot and which Drona and Karna had tried in vain to burn with their Devastras, spontaneously takes fire along with the ratha and the Gandharva horses! All these burn down of their own accord.

The Pandavas are amazed to see the magnificent chariot reduced to ashes, and Arjuna, O Rajan, salutes Krishna respectfully and, with bowed head and joined hands, says, "O Govinda, will you tell me why this ratha has been consumed by fire?"

Krishna says, "O Arjuna, the energy of the Brahmastra and other astras had already destroyed the ratha. It did not become ashes only because I sat in it. Now that your purpose has been achieved and I have abandoned it, the ratha is needed no more and has become ashes."

Then, with a little pride, the divine Krishna embraces Yudhishtira, and says, “Destiny has ordained your victory over your enemies, O son of Kunti. It is good fortune that allowed Arjuna, Bhima, the two sons of Madri and yourself to escape with your lives from this war that has claimed so many millions of lives and washed the world in their blood. Now complete what you need to do.

After I arrived at Upaplavya, you approached me with Arjuna and offered me the customary arghya of honey, and said, ‘This Dhananjaya, O Krishna, is your brother and friend. You must protect him from all danger.’

I answered you saying, ‘Tathaastu—so be it.’

I have kept my word and a victorious Arjuna with his brothers has survived this dreadful war unscathed.”

An emotional Yudhishtira replies, “Who else but you, O Mahabaho, including the Vajradhari himself, could have withstood the Brahmastras loosed by Drona and Karna? It was through your grace that we vanquished the Samsaptakas and Arjuna could meet the fiercest challenges and find victory. At Upaplavya, Maharishi Krishna-Dwaipayana assured me that wherever you are there is dharma, and that victory is always with you.”

Then, shouting in exultation, they enter your camp, O Dhritarashtra, and plunder it, looting the war chest of its vast store of gold, silver, jewels, gems, pearls and many costly ornaments, as well as innumerable slaves.

Krishna suggests that it would not be auspicious to remain in the enemy camp that night and the Pandavas and Satyaki, without any enemies left, accompany him and return for that night to their camp on the banks of the sacred stream Oghavati.

Krishna asks Daruka to have his horses, Saibai, Sugriva, Meghapuspa and Balahaka yoked to his chariot, and drives swiftly to Dhritarashtra in Hastinapura. The Pandavas ask him to comfort the helpless Gandhari who has lost all her sons.’”

Janamejaya said, “Why does Dharmaputra Yudhishtira send Krishna to Gandhari? Krishna first went to the Kauravas to broker peace between them and the Pandavas. He failed and the result was the battle of Kurukshetra, which resulted in the destruction of the Kauravas and their forces and a famous victory for the sons of Pandu. Why then, O foremost of all Adharyus, does Krishna once again go to Hastinapura? It must have been an important mission for Krishna to make the journey himself.”

Vaisampayana said, “The reason is that Yudhishtira fears what the blessed Gandhari, who possesses immense powers through her tapasya, might do when she learns how her son Duryodhana was struck down by Bhima who flouted the strict laws of a gada yuddha. He knew that she could consume the three worlds with her anger. By sending Krishna ahead, he hoped that Gandhari would be comforted and her rage cooled somewhat before Yudhishtira’s own arrival.

He wonders, ‘How will Gandhari endure her grief when she hears her son, who always fought fairly with the mace, was slain unfairly by us?’

Filled with fear and grief, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira pleads, ‘Through your grace, O Govinda, my kingdom is now free. This is something that we could never imagine. As in that war of long ago between the Devas and Asuras you supported the Devas, you helped us in in our great battle. By agreeing to be Arjuna’s charioteer, you protected us and enabled us to win this war. For our sake, O Krishna, you have endured harsh words, blows of the mace, and injuries from arrows and spears. Our efforts have not been in vain, and we have finally succeeded in killing Duryodhana. Now do whatever is needful so that we do not lose what we have so painfully won.

Although victory is ours, O Krishna, our heart trembles with fear and doubt. We fear the pure Gandhari's wrath. That blessed queen, with her many austere tapasyas, has the power to reduce us to ashes when she hears of the deaths of her sons and grandsons. You must go there, O Madhava, and pacify Gandhari. You are eternal, the Creator and the Destroyer and the First Cause of all the worlds, and surely you can pacify that great queen in her terrible grief and rage. Our grandsire, the holy Krishna-Dwaipayana, will also be there. O Mahabaho, you must dispel the anger of Gandhari.'

As soon as Daruka gets his ratha ready, Krishna rides swiftly for Hastinapura and seeks audience with Dhritarashtra. He finds Maharishi Vyasa already there. Touching the feet of both Vyasa and Dhritarashtra, he respectfully salutes Gandhari also. He then seizes Dhritarashtra by the hand and begins to weep. After a while, he composes himself, washes his eyes and his face, and says eloquently to Dhritarashtra, 'You know, O Bhaarata, the past and the future and are familiar with the course of Kaala. Out of regard for you, the Pandavas tried to prevent the destruction of their race and the general extermination of Kshatriyas. Yudhishtira and his brothers always tried to live in peace with all.

They went into exile after their defeat at the game of dice and even had to live in lowly disguise, and suffered many indignities. On the eve of battle, I came and in the presence of so many great and noble men begged you for only five villages. Alas, Kaala and greed ensured that you did not grant my request.

You have now become responsible for the extermination of the very Kshatriya varna. Bhishma, Somadatta, Bahlika, Kripa, Drona, his son, and the wise Vidura always advocated peace, but you never listened to them. Alas, it seems that Kaala confounds everybody, O Bhaarata, even you.

Indeed, Fate is supreme, so do not, O wise one, impute any fault to the Pandavas. Judged by the laws of dharma, intellect or affection, they have done no wrong. You know that all this is your own fault, so do not cherish any ill will towards the sons of Pandu. Race, descent, the final tarpana, and everything else that one looks for in our offspring now depend on the Pandavas, for both you and Gandhari. Both of you should not harbour malice towards them. Reflect upon what I have told you, think of your own transgressions, and cherish affection towards the Pandavas.

You know Yudhishtira's devotion and his affection for you. He has not found any peace of mind after these needless deaths of his enemies. He grieves for you and for Gandhari. Overwhelmed with shame and distress, he dares not come before you because he knows what you suffer on account of your children.'

Krishna then says to the sorrowing Gandhari, 'O daughter of Subala, you of stern vratas, listen to me. O auspicious one, there is no woman like you in the world. You will remember the wise words that you spoke in the sabha in my presence, but which your sons did not obey. You told Duryodhana then, "Listen, O foolish prince, victory will go only where dharma is."

Your words have now come true. Knowing all this, do not grieve or think of cursing the Pandavas. O Bhadre, because of the strength of your tapasya, you have the power to burn up the whole world with your eyes that you have kept bound in virtue for so long.'

Gandhari says quietly, 'It is as you say, O Kesava. My grieving heart was shaken by untold fury but, hearing what you say, it is calmed. Now, you and the sons of Pandu are the only remaining sanctuary for my blind old king Dhritarashtra.'

Gandhari covers her face and begins to sob loudly. Lord Krishna comforts her with kindly words. Then, suddenly, in his sacred heart, he sees a great evil that Drona's son Ashwatthaman is contemplating. He rises in haste, after touching Vyasa's feet, and says to Dhritarashtra, 'I take your leave, O Bharatasattama. Do not grieve. I leave you so suddenly because I fear that the son of Drona is contemplating doing something unspeakably evil to destroy the Pandavas this very night.'

Both Gandhari and Dhritarashtra say, 'Go quickly, O Kesava, and protect the Pandavas. We hope to see you again soon.'

After he leaves, the noble Vyasa comforts the broken Dhritarashtra.

Having achieved what he came for, Krishna drives like the wind from Hastinapura and arrives at the Pandava camp. There he reports the success of his mission."

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Kicked in the head, his thighs broken, prostrate on the ground, what, O Sanjaya, does my exceedingly proud son then say?'

Sanjaya says, 'I and our other subjects come in droves to where your son lies dying. King Duryodhana, O monarch, covered with dust, gathers up his flowing locks with painful effort and begins to sigh like a snake which has had its back broken. Filled with rage, with tears flowing fast from his eyes, he glares at me. He strikes his arms against the earth for a while like an enraged elephant and, shaking his loose locks, and gnashing his teeth, he begins to censure Yudhishtira. Breathing heavily, he tells me, "Alas, I who led eleven chamus of troops and had for my protectors Santanu's son Bhishma, the Maharatha Karna, Gotama's son Kripa, Sakuni, Drona, that foremost among all wielders of arms, Ashwatthaman, the heroic Salya and Kritavarman, alas, I have come to this sorry plight. It seems that Kaala is irresistible and no one can conquer or escape Time. Inform my friends who are still alive, how Bhima struck me down sinfully. Bhurisrava, Bhishma and Drona also suffered grievous adharma from the cruel Pandavas, for which, surely, they will incur the condemnation of all righteous men.

What pleasure can a man of dharma enjoy at having gained victory by sinful means? Who again would approve of a Kshatriya fighting through vile perfidy? How can that wretch Vrikodara rejoice after the manner in which he struck me down? How could he lay his foot on my head when I lay with my thighs and my very manhood broken? Is such a man worthy of honour?

O Sanjaya, tell my suffering parents that I have performed yagnas, supported a vast number of servants, ruled the world with her seas, subdued my enemies, gifted wealth to my kinsmen, made my friends happy and defied all my enemies. I conquered hostile kingdoms and enslaved great kings. I was always generous towards all whom I loved. Who is there more fortunate than I am?

I have attended to the three purusharthas—Dharma, Artha and Kama. I have studied the Vedas and given dakshina according to the laws. By observing the duties of my svadharma, I have earned many realms of blessedness in the hereafter. Fate ensured that I was never defeated in battle and subjected to anyone's overlordship. Fate ensured that I fought valiantly and did nothing dishonourable or against my Kshatriya dharma. Who can be more fortunate than I can?

Yet now, only after my fall, has fate abandoned me. I have found the death that all noble Kshatriyas wish for. I have been killed vilely, sinfully, with a low stroke of the wretched Bhima's mace, for he could never have prevailed against me otherwise. Tell the blessed Ashwatthaman, Kritavarman of the Satwata vamsa, and Saradwat's son Kripa, that they should never trust the Pandavas, who have perpetrated these many crimes of adharma."

After this, your royal son tells our messengers, "Bhima has killed me treacherously. I who was sovereign of all the world am now like a destitute, a vagrant, and I will follow in the wake of Drona, Karna, Salya, Vrishasena, Sakuni, Jalasandha, king Bhagadatta, of Somadatta's son, Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus, of all my brothers led by Dusasana, of Dusasana's proud son, of my own son Lakshmana, and the millions of others who fought for me and have already attained swarga.

Alas, how will my sister Dussala, stricken by sorrow, bear the news of the death of her brothers and her husband? Alas, what will be the plight of the old king, my father, my mother Gandhari, and his daughters-in-law and grand-daughters-in-law? Without doubt, the beautiful and large-eyed mother of Lakshmana, now that she has lost her son and husband, will soon meet with her death. If Charvaka, the mendicant devotee who is a master of speech, learns everything, that blessed man will certainly avenge himself for my death. By dying upon the sacred field of Samantapanchaka, celebrated over the three worlds, I myself will surely gain many eternal regions of honour, felicity and bliss."

Hearing these lamentations of the king, thousands of grieving men flee in all directions. The whole earth, with her forests and seas, with all her mobile and immobile creatures, begins to tremble violently, and to emit deep roars from her very entrails. All the points of the compass turn dismal and murky. The messengers find Ashwatthaman and report to him all that had transpired after which they return, thoughtful and grief-stricken.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'After the messengers convey word of the fall of Duryodhana to the remaining severely wounded Maharathas of the Kaurava army, Kripa and Kritavarman ride quickly to the spot. They see Duryodhana lying on the ground like a sala tree laid low by a tempest, covered in blood, in agony and weltering on the bare ground. He is surrounded by many ravening carnivores, like wealth-coveting dependants around a king lying in state. His forehead contracted into furrows of rage, he rolls his eyes in anger and growls at the beasts. Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman alight from their chariots and run towards the king.

A tearful Ashwatthaman says, "O Naravyaghra, truly there is nothing stable in the world of men, since you, the king of the world, now lie on the bare earth covered with dust. Where are Dusasana or the maharatha Karna, or your many friends? Ah, the ways of time and Yama are truly inscrutable. Look at the reverses that Kaala inflicts. Where is your vast army, your pure white canopy and your yak-tail fan, O Rajan?"

Hearing this from the sorrowing Ashwatthaman, your son first consoles him and, shedding tears of grief afresh, says, "This liability of all living creatures to death is ordained by the Creator himself—that death has now come to me, who reigned over the entire earth. I never turned my back on battle, whatever calamities overtook me, and always lived in courage and perseverance. Fate decreed that I should die at the hands of evil men and through deception. My friends, it is great good fortune that you have escaped alive from this great slaughter.

Do not grieve for me. If the Vedas are any authority, I have certainly acquired many eternal regions. I am not ignorant of the glory of Krishna of immeasurable energy. He did not cause me to deviate from the proper observance of Kshatriya dharma. You have striven hard for my success but Destiny will always prevail."

Duryodhana, with eyes laved with tears, falls silent, his body wracked with pain. Seeing him thus, Drona's son flares up in anger like the fire of the pralaya. He takes Duryodhana's hand and, in a voice hoarse with tears, says, "My father was killed by those wretches through a base deceit. Yet, that does not burn me as keenly as your distress. Listen to the vow that I swear, by Truth, by all my acts of piety, and by my religious merits: today, in the very presence of Krishna, I will despatch all the Panchalas to Yamaloka. Allow me, Rajan, to fulfil my oath."

Duryodhana is pleased to hear these words and asks Aswatthaman to bring a pot full of water. Receiving the vessel, your son tells Kripa, "O blessed Brahmana, let Ashwatthaman be installed as our Senapati. Those learned in the scriptures say that at the command of the king, even a Brahmana may fight, especially one who has adopted the ways of a Kshatriya."

At the king's command, Kripa, the son of Saraswat, installs Ashwatthaman as senapati. He embraces the king and leaves, the ten points resounding with his leonine roars. Duryodhana, covered in blood, passes that fearful night there in agony while the grieving Maharathas leave the battlefield, their hearts unbearably heavy, and reflect anxiously and earnestly on what they should do next.'"

The End of Salya Parva

Sauptika Parva

CANTO 1

AUM! Having bowed down unto Narayana, and Nara the most exalted of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, must the spirit of Jaya be invoked!

Sanjaya says, 'Then, those three heroes, Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman, go together towards the south. At the hour of sunset they arrive at a place near the Kuru encampment. Letting their animals loose, they are taken with fear. Seeing a forest they enter it stealthily. They set themselves down at no great distance from the Kuru camp. Lacerated and wounded deep by many savage weapons, they breathe long and hot sighs, thinking of the Pandavas. Then, hearing the loud celebrations of the victorious Pandavas, they fear a pursuit and quickly flee towards the east. Having gone for some way, their animals become tired and they themselves are thirsty. Overpowered by wrath and vindictiveness, those great bowmen cannot bear what has transpired; they burn with grief at the terrible end of Duryodhana. They rest for a while.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Bhima's feat, O Sanjaya, seems incredible to me, since my son whom he brutally felled had the strength of ten thousand elephants. In manhood's prime and possessed of an adamantine body, no one could kill Suyodhana. Alas, even that son of mine was struck down by the Pandava.

Without doubt, O Sanjaya, my heart is made of stone, since it does not break not into a thousand pieces even after hearing of the slaughter of my hundred sons. Alas, what will be the plight of myself and my wife, an old couple now destitute of children? I dare not dwell in the dominions of Pandu's son! Having been the sire of a king and a king myself, how shall I pass my days as a slave obedient to the commands of Pandu's son? Having laid my command over all the Earth and having stood over the heads of all, how shall I live now as a slave in wretchedness? How shall I, O Sanjaya, endure the fire-like mockery of Bhima who has single-handedly slain a full hundred sons of mine? The words of the high-souled Vidura have come true! Alas, Sanjaya, that my son did not pay heed to those words.

However, tell me, what did Kritavarman, Kripa and Drona's son do after my son Duryodhana had been treacherously struck down?'

Sanjaya says, 'They have not gone far, O king, when they stop, for they see a dense forest. Having rested a little while, they enter that great forest, riding in their chariots drawn by excellent steeds whose thirst has now been assuaged. That forest abounds with all manner of animals, and with all kinds of birds. And it is dense, with great trees and entwining creepers and infested by numerous predators. Spangled with many bodies of water and adorned with various kinds of flowers, it has many lakes overgrown with blue lotuses.

Having entered that dense forest, they cast their eyes about and see a gigantic banyan tree with thousands of branches. Repairing to the shade of that tree, those maharathas, O king, those foremost of men, see that is the greatest tree in that forest. Alighting from their chariots and unyoking their horses, they cleanse themselves duly and say their evening prayers.

The Sun reaches the Asta Mountain, and Night, the mother of the universe, arrives. The firmament, strewn with planets and stars, shines like an ornamented piece of brocade and is wondrous to behold. The denizens of night begin to howl and utter their myriad cries at will, while they that walk the day fall asleep. Awful becomes the noise of the night-wandering animals. The carnivores are full of glee, and the night, as it deepens, grows dreadful.

At that sinister hour, Kritavarman, Kripa and Drona's son sit together under that mighty banyan, and they begin to give expression to their sorrow about the destruction that had overtaken both the Kurus and the Pandavas. Heavy with sleep, exhausted, they lay themselves down on the bare earth.

Blood from their congealing wounds still drips onto the earth; arrows still protrude from their magnificent bodies. Kripa and Kritavarman quickly fall asleep. However deserving of happiness and undeserving of torment, they lie stretched on the bare ground. Indeed, O monarch, those two who had always slept on luxurious beds now sleep restlessly, like vagrants, on rough earth, afflicted by toil, grief, and their slumber nightmared.

Drona's son, however, O Bhaarata, yielded to the influence of wrath and reverence, cannot sleep, but lies there breathing like a trodden upon snake. Burning with rage, that hero of mighty arms casts his eyes on every side of that terrible forest. As he surveys that vana, teeming with many creatures of night, the great warrior sees in the branches of the lofty, sprawling banyan a covering of crows, thousands of the dark birds roosting in the night, most with their wings tucked under shiny wings. Each perched close to its neighbour, those crows sleep at ease, O Kauravya.

Suddenly, as he gazes raptly at the sleeping crows, Ashwatthaman sees an owl of terrible aspect make its appearance there. Of gigantic body, with green eyes and tawny plumage, its beak is huge and its talons are like swords. And the speed with which it comes resembles that of Garuda. Uttering soft cries, that awesome owl glides towards the branches of that banyan tree. That tawny ranger of the sky, that slayer of crows, alights softly on one of the branches of the banyan and, now with horrible cries, kills a great number of his sleeping enemies. He tears the wings off some and bites off the heads of others; with his razor-like talons he breaks the legs of many. With uncanny strength and speed, that great and ghastly owl kills some hundreds of crows in mere moments, while Aswatthaman watches him from below, entranced.

In time too short to tell, such is the onslaught of the owl, the ground covered by the spreading branches of the banyan is thickly strewn and heaped on every side with dead crows. Soon, no crow remains alive, and the owl is filled with delight; its great lens-like eyes shine like those of a slayer of foes after having prevailed over his enemies at his pleasure.

Seeing that ferocious deed perpetrated in the night by the owl, Drona's son begins to reflect on it; he considers it a sign to himself and is quickened to follow the owl's murderous example. He says to himself, "This owl teaches me a lesson in battle. I am bent upon the destruction of the enemy, and the time for the deed has come! I cannot kill the victorious Pandavas for they are too mighty. Yet, while I was in Duryodhana's presence, I swore that I would kill them. It would seem that I have pledged myself to a suicidal venture, like an insect essaying into a blazing fire. If I were to fight them fairly, I shall, without doubt, have to lay down my life. By an act of guile, however, success may still be mine and a great destruction overtake my foes!

Men in general, as also those versed in the scriptures, always laud means which are certain over those which are uncertain. Whatever of censure and evil repute this act may provoke ought to be incurred by the man that observes the way of the Kshatriya. The Pandavas of uncleansed souls have, at every step, perpetrated ugly and sinful deeds that were also full of guile.

In this regard, certain ancient verses, full of truth, are heard, sung by enlightened men of dharma, who sang them after a careful consideration of the demands of justice.

These say: 'The enemy's force, even when exhausted, or wounded with weapons, or engaged in eating, or when leaving the field, or when resting within their camp, should be smitten! They should be dealt with in the same way when afflicted with sleep in the dead of night, or when bereft of their commanders, or when broken with wounds and grief, or when under an erroneous impression of safety.'"

Having reflected in this way, the valiant son of Drona forms the resolution of killing the sleeping Pandavas during the night and the Panchalas as well. Having decided upon this evil plan and pledging himself repeatedly to its execution, he wakes both his uncle Kripa and Kritavarman, lord of the Bhojas. Awakened from sleep, those two illustrious and mighty ones hear Ashwatthaman's vile scheme. Filled with shame, both of them give him no reply. Having reflected for a short while, Ashwatthaman says with tears in his eyes, "King Duryodhana, that one hero of great might, for whose sake we waged war with the Pandavas, has been slain! Deserted and alone, though he was the lord of eleven akshauhinis of troops, that Kshatriya of unstained prowess has been struck down by Bhimasena and a number of wretches banded together in battle. Vrikodara has perpetrated another vile and vicious deed - for he kicked the head of a king whose locks were given the sacred coronal bath.

The Panchalas roar and give vent to jubilant cries and raucous laughter. Filled with joy, they blow their conches and beat their drums. Listen, do you hear the pealing of their drums, the blare of their conches, borne by the winds, frightful to the ear, and filling all the cardinal points of the world. Loud also is the din made by their neighing steeds and grunting elephants and roaring warriors. That deafening noise made by the rejoicing warriors as they march to their quarters, as also the clatter of their chariot-wheels comes to us from the east. So great has been the havoc wrought by the Pandavas on the Dhartarashtras that we three are the only survivors of that carnage.

Some of us were endowed with the might of a hundred elephants, and some were masters of all weapons. Yet have they been slain by the sons of Pandu. I regard this to be an instance of the reversals brought about by Time. And truly, what I say is the end to which such an act leads! Truly, although the Pandavas have achieved such difficult feats, even this should be the result of those exploits. If your wisdom has not been driven out by shock and grief, then say what is proper for us to do in this grave matter."

Kripa says, “We have heard all that you have said, O mighty one. Listen, however, to a few words of mine. All men are subject to and governed by two forces, Destiny and Exertion. There is nothing higher than these two. Our actions do not become successful in consequence of destiny alone, nor by exertion alone, O best of men. Success springs from the union of the two. All purposes, high and low, depend on a union of these two. In the whole world, it is through these two that men are seen to act as also to abstain from action.

What result is produced by clouds pouring rain upon a mountain? What results are not produced by them pouring upon a cultivated field? Exertion, where destiny is not auspicious, and absence of exertion where destiny is auspicious - both these are fruitless. What I have said about the union of the two is the truth. If the rains properly moisten a well-tilled field, the seeds yield a fine harvest. Human success is also of this nature.

Sometimes, destiny, having settled a course of events, acts of itself without waiting for exertion. For all that, the wise, aided by skill, have recourse to effort. All the purposes of human actions, O bull among men, are accomplished through those two coming together. Influenced by these two, men are seen to strive or be quiescent. Recourse may be had to exertion. But exertion succeeds through destiny. It is in consequence also of destiny that one who sets himself to work, depending on exertion, attains to success. The exertion, however, of even a competent man, even when well directed, when it is without the concurrence of destiny is seen in the world to be fruitless. Those, therefore, among men, that are idle and without intelligence, disapprove of exertion. This, however, is not the opinion of the wise.

Generally, any action performed is not seen to be unproductive of fruit in the world. The absence of action, again, is seen to result in grave misery. A man obtaining something of itself, without having exerted himself in any way, as also one not obtaining anything even after exertion, is not found. One who is busy in action is capable of supporting life. He, on the other hand, that is idle, never gains happiness. In this world of men it is generally seen that they that are addicted to action are always inspired by the desire of earning good. If one devoted to action succeeds in gaining his object or fails to acquire the fruit of his deeds does not become censurable in any respect. If anyone in the world is seen to luxuriously enjoy the fruits of action without doing anything, he is generally seen to incur ridicule and become an object of hatred. He who, disregarding this rule about karma, lives otherwise, is said to do an injury to himself. This is the opinion of those that are endowed with intelligence.

Efforts become unproductive of fruits in consequence of these two reasons: destiny without exertion and exertion without destiny. Without exertion, no deed in this world becomes successful. Devoted to action and endowed with skill, that man, however, who, having bowed down to the gods, seeks the accomplishment of his objects, is never lost. The same is the case with one who, desirous of success, properly waits upon the aged, asks them what is for his good, and obeys their beneficial counsels. Men approved by the old should always be solicited for counsel, while one has recourse to exertion. These men are the infallible root of means, and success is dependent on means. He who applies his efforts after listening to the words of the old soon reaps abundant fruits from those efforts. That man who, without reverence and respect for wise elders, seeks the accomplishment of his purposes, being moved by passion, anger, fear, and avarice, soon loses his prosperity.

This Duryodhana, stained by covetousness and bereft of foresight, without taking counsel, foolishly embarked on an ill-considered enterprise. Disregarding all his well-wishers and taking counsel with only the wicked, though repeatedly dissuaded, he waged war with the Pandavas who are his superiors in all good qualities. From the beginning, he was evil. He could not restrain himself. He did not do the bidding of friends. For all that, he now burns in grief and calamity.

As for me, since I followed that sinful wretch, this great catastrophe has overtaken me. It has scorched my understanding. Plunged in reflection, I fail to see where my salvation lies.

A man that is himself perplexed should ask counsel of his friends. In such friends he has his understanding, his humility, and his prosperity. One's deeds should have their root in them. That should be done which intelligent friends, having settled by their understanding, do counsel. Let us, therefore, repair to Dhritarashtra and Gandhari and the high-souled Vidura and ask them what we should do. They will tell us what is for our weal. We should do what they say. Even this is my certain resolution. Those men whose actions do not succeed even after exerting themselves, should beyond doubt be regarded as being afflicted by destiny."' Sanjaya says, 'Hearing these words of Kripa that were auspicious and fraught with dharma and artha both, Aswatthaman, O monarch, is overwhelmed by sorrow. Burning with grief as if in a fire, he forms an evil resolution and then addresses them both, saying, "The faculty of understanding is different in different men. Each man, however, is pleased with own understanding. Every man regards himself more intelligent than others. Everyone respects his own understanding and accords it great praise. Every man's own wisdom is with each a subject of praise. Everyone speaks ill of the wisdom of others, and well of his own, in all instances. Men whose judgements agree with respect to any unattained object, even though there be a variety of considerations, become gratified with and applaud one another. The judgements, again, of the same men, overwhelmed with reverses through the influence of time, become opposed to one another. More particularly, in consequence of the diversity of human intellects, judgements necessarily differ when minds are clouded.

As a skillful physician, having duly diagnosed a disease, prescribes a medicine by using his intelligence to effect a cure, even so men, for the accomplishment of their deeds, use their intelligence, aided by their own wisdom. What they do is again disapproved by others. A man, in youth, is affected by one kind of understanding. In middle age, the same does not prevail with him, and in the time of age, another kind of understanding becomes agreeable to him. When fallen into grave distress or when visited by great prosperity, the understanding of a person, O lord of the Bhojas, is seen to be much afflicted. In one and the same man, through want of wisdom, the understanding becomes different at different times. That understanding which at one time is acceptable becomes the reverse of that at another.

Having resolved, however, according to one's wisdom, that resolution which is best should be endeavoured to be accomplished. Such resolution, therefore, should force him to put forth exertion. All men, O lord of the Bhojas, begin their enterprises joyfully, even those that lead to death, in the belief that they can achieve what they set out to do. All men, relying on their own judgements and wisdom, endeavour to accomplish diverse purposes, feeling them to be beneficial. The resolution that has possessed my mind today because of our dire calamity, as something that can dispel my grief - I will now disclose that resolve to both of you.

The Creator, having formed his creatures, assigned unto each his dharma. As regards the different varnas, he gave each a portion of excellence. To Brahmanas he gave that foremost of all things, the Veda. To the Kshatriya he gave superior energy. To the Vaishya he gave skill, and to the Sudra he gave the duty of serving the three other varnas. Hence, a Brahmana without self-restraint is to be censured. A Kshatriya without energy is base. A Vaishya without skill deserves condemnation, as also a Sudra who is bereft of humility.

I am born into a revered and high family of Brahmanas. Through ill-fortune, however, I am wedded to Kshatriya ways. If, conversant as I am with Kshatriya dharma, I now adopt the ways of a Brahmana and achieve a high object, that course would not be consistent with honour. I wield an excellent bow and superior astras in battle. If I do not avenge the slaughter of my father, how will I dare show my face or open my mouth in the midst of men? Paying regard to Kshatriya dharma, therefore, without hesitation, I will walk in the steps of my high-souled sire and my fallen king.

Having removed their armour and flushed with victory, the Panchalas will sleep unsuspiciously tonight, exhausted by the toil of battle. While they sleep at their ease in their camp, I will launch a terrible attack on them, taking them unawares. Like Maghavat slaughtering the Danavas, I will attack as they sleep and, putting forth my utmost prowess, kill them all like a blazing fire consuming a heap of dry grass. I will kill them all and their king Dhrishtadyumna. And having done so, I shall find peace of mind, O best of men.

Why, I will go amongst them with dreadful carnage even like Rudra with his Pinaka in rage among living creatures when the age ends. Having slain all the Panchalas tonight, I will then, in joy, attack the sons of Pandu, taking their lives one after another. Strewing the earth with the bodies of all the Panchalas, I will pay the debt I owe to my ruthlessly murdered sire. Yes, this very night I will make the Panchalas follow in the wake, hard to tread, of Duryodhana and Karna and Bhishma, and Jayadratha of the Sindhus. Putting forth my might, I shall tonight grind to a pulp the head, like that of an animal, of Dhrishtadyumna, the king of the Panchalas! I shall tonight, O son of Gautama, kill the sleeping sons of the Panchalas and the Pandavas.

Having exterminated the Panchalas tonight, while they lie sunk in sleep, I shall, O you of great intelligence, find great happiness and regard myself to have done my duty."

Kripa said, "Through good fortune, O you of unfading glory, your heart is set today on vengeance. The wielder of the thunder himself will not succeed in dissuading you today. However, both of us will accompany you in the morning. Put off your armour and take down your standard; rest now and sleep this night. I shall accompany you, as also Kritavarman of the Sattvata vamsa, both clad in mail and riding our chariots, while you ride forth against the foe. United with us tomorrow, you shall indeed kill the enemy, the Panchalas with all their followers, in the press of battle, putting forth your awesome might, O greatest of maharathas. If you put forth your true prowess, you will certainly achieve the feat you have in mind.

Rest, therefore, this night. You have kept awake for many a night. Having rested and slept, and refreshed, O giver of honours, encounter the foe in battle. Then shall you certainly prevail and kill the enemy. No one, not even Vasava amongst the gods, would venture to attempt to vanquish you when you bear the foremost of weapons, O first of maharathas. Who is there that would, even if he be Indra himself, fight Drona's son, when great Aswatthaman comes into battle accompanied by Kripa and protected by Kritavarman? Having rested and slept this night and shaken off fatigue, we shall slay the enemy tomorrow morning.

You are a master of the devastras. I also am so, without doubt. This hero of Sattvata's race is a mighty bowman, always a master of battle. The three of us together, O son, shall indeed succeed in destroying our assembled enemies in battle by putting forth our might. And great shall be our happiness then! Dispelling your anxieties, rest for this night and sleep happily. Armed with bows, clad in mail and well able to scorch our foemen, Kritavarman and I will follow you, O best of men, while you ride your chariot against the enemy.

Riding to their camp and proclaiming your name in battle, you will then make a great slaughter of the foe. Tomorrow morning, in broad daylight, having caused a carnage among them, you will sport like Sakra after the decimation of great Asuras. You can truly vanquish the army of the Panchalas in battle, even like the slayer of the Danavas vanquishing the Danava host in wrath. United with me in battle and protected by Kritavarman, not the Vajradhari himself could withstand you.

Neither I, O son, nor Kritavarman, will ever retreat from battle without having razed the Pandavas from this world. Having slain the choleric Panchalas along with the Pandavas, we shall come away in triumph, or slain by them we shall find Swarga for ourselves. With every means in our power, we two will help you in battle tomorrow morning. O Mahabaho, I tell you the truth, O sinless one."

When Kripa speaks these wise words to his nephew, the son of Drona, his eyes turning red with rage, answers his uncle, O king, saying, "Where can a man afflicted by defeat, or he that is under the sway of fury, or one whose heart is always engaged in evolving schemes for the acquisition of wealth, or one that is under the power of lust, find sleep? All these four are present in me. Any one of these, singly, would destroy sleep. How great is the grief of that man whose heart is always thinking of the slaughter of his sire! My heart now burns day and night, and I have no peace. In particular, you have both seen the way in which my father was murdered by those sinners. The thought of that murder roils my very entrails.

How can one like me live for even a moment after hearing the Panchalas proclaim that they have slain my father? I cannot bear the thought of living without having killed Dhrishtadyumna. Indeed, I must kill him and all his supporters. Who is there so stone-hearted that would not burn after having heard the lamentations that I have heard of the king lying with his thighs and manhood broken? Who is there so destitute of compassion whose eyes would not fill with tears after hearing the anguished words Suyodhana spoke in his anguished state?

They whose side I took have been vanquished. The thought of this enhances my sorrow as a surge of tide swells the sea.

Protected as they are by Krishna and Arjuna, I regard them, O uncle, to be irresistible by Indra himself. Yet, I am unable to restrain this rising wrath in my heart. I do not see the man in this world that can assuage this rage of mine. The messengers informed me of the defeat of my friends and the victory of the Pandavas. That burns my heart.

However, once I have butchered my enemies in their sleep, I shall find rest and live without anxiety."

CANTO 5

Kripa says, "A man who is bereft of intelligence and who does not have his passions under control, cannot, even if he waits dutifully upon his superiors, understand all the considerations of dharma. This is my firm opinion. Similarly, an intelligent person who does not practise humility fails to understand the settled conclusions of righteousness. A brave man, if he is without understanding, fails to know his duty even if he waits all his life upon a Rishi, even as a wooden ladle cannot taste the flavourful food in which it may lie immersed. The wise man, however, by waiting upon a learned person for even a moment, succeeds in knowing his dharma, like the tongue tasting fine food as soon as it comes into contact with it.

That man who is endued with intelligence, who waits upon his superiors, and who has his passions under control, succeeds in knowing all the laws of dharma and never disputes with what is accepted by all. An ungovernable, irreverent, and evil soul perpetrates sin in seeking his well-being by disregarding destiny.

Well-wishers seek to restrain a friend from sin. He who suffers himself to be dissuaded succeeds in winning prosperity. He that does otherwise reaps misery. As a man of a distraught mind is restrained by soothing words, even so should a friend be restrained by his well-wishers. He that suffers himself to be so restrained never becomes a prey to grief. When a wise friend is about to commit a sin, well-wishers possessed of wisdom repeatedly and to the extent of their power endeavour to restrain him. Setting your heart on what is truly beneficial, and restraining yourself by your own self, do my bidding, O son, so that you may not have to repent afterwards.

In this world, the killing of sleeping men is not lauded, according to the dictates of dharma. The same is the case with men that have laid down their arms and alighted from their chariots and horses. They also must not be killed who say 'We are yours!' and they that surrender themselves, and they whose locks are dishevelled, and they whose horses have been killed under them or whose chariots have been broken. All the Panchalas will sleep tonight, divesting themselves of armour. Trustfully sunk in sleep, they will be as dead men. That crooked-minded man who would mortally attack them then, it is plain, would sink into a deep and limitless sea of hell without a raft save himself. In this world you are celebrated as the foremost of all men who know and use weapons. You have not yet committed even a minute trespass against dharma. When the sun rises tomorrow and light discovers all things, you, like a second sun in effulgence, will conquer the enemy in battle. But what you plan to do tonight, ah, this sin so impossible in one like you, will look like a glaring red spot upon a white sheet. This is my firm opinion."

Aswatthaman says, "Without doubt, it is even as you say, O Matulan my uncle. The Pandavas, however, have already shattered the bridge of dharma into a hundred pieces. In the very sight of all the kings, before your eyes also, Dhrishtadyumna murdered my father after my sire had laid down his weapons. Karna, also, that greatest maharatha, was slain by Arjuna after the wheel of his ratha had sunk into the earth and he was plunged into distress. Shantanu's son Bhishma, after he had laid down his weapons, on seeing Sikhandi, Arjuna cut down mercilessly, his own grandsire. So, also, the mighty bowman Bhurisrava, while he sat in the prayavrata on the field of battle, Satyaki slew, disregarding the cries of protest of all the kings.

And now, Duryodhana, too, having encountered Bhima in battle with the mace, hath been slain unrighteously by the sinful Vrikodara in the very sight of all the lords of earth. The king was all alone in the midst of a number of mighty maharathas standing around him. Under such circumstances was that tiger among men slain by the wretched Bhima. Those lamentations that I have heard, of the king lying prostrate on the earth with his thighs broken, and from the messengers circulating the news, excoriate my very heart and I am in unbearable agony.

Such are the sinful Panchalas, who have broken all the bounds of virtue. Why do you not censure them who have transgressed all dharma? Having slain the Panchalas, those murderers of my sire, in the night when they are buried in sleep, I care not if I am born as a worm or a winged insect in my next life. That which I have resolved is hurrying me towards its accomplishment. Then how can I have sleep and happiness? That man is not yet born in the world, nor will be, who will succeed in making me change this resolution that I have formed for the Panchalas' destruction."

Sanjaya continues, 'Having said these words, O monarch, the valiant son of Drona yokes his steeds to his chariot and makes to set out towards his enemies. Kripa and Kritavarman, those great souls, say to him, "Why do you yoke your horses to your chariot? Upon what business are you bent? We are determined to come with you tomorrow, O bull among men! We sympathise with you in weal and woe. It does not become you to mistrust us."

Remembering the killing of his father, a raging Aswatthaman tells them again what he has decided to do. "When, having slain hundreds of thousands of warriors with his arrows, my great father had laid down his weapons, he was ruthlessly killed by Dhrishtadyumna. I will kill that murderer today when he has taken off his armour. With sin I will kill Drupada's sinful son tonight. I have decided to kill Dhrishtadyumna like an animal, so the Panchala prince will not attain to realms earned by warriors nobly slain in battle. Put on your coats of mail even now, take up your bows and swords, and wait for me here, you best of maharathas and parantapas."

Having said this, Aswatthaman sets out for the enemy's camp. And now, both Kripa, O king, and Kritavarman follow him and, as they go, the three shine like sacrificial fires fed with libations of ghee. They ride, O lord, towards the camp of the Panchalas within which all are asleep. Coming to the gate, Drona's son, that maharatha, stops.'

Dhritarashtra says, “Seeing Drona’s son stop at the gate of the encampment, what, O Sanjaya, do Kripa and Kritavarman do? Tell me this!”

Sanjaya says, “Calling Kritavarman, as also the mighty Kripa, Drona’s son, aflame with rage, approaches the gate of the camp. Suddenly he sees there a gigantic being, whose very sight could make one’s hair stand on end; he has the effulgence of the Sun or the Moon, and stands guarding the entrance. Round his loins is a tiger-skin dripping blood, and he has a black deer’s hide for his upper garment. For his sacred thread, he wears a great snake. His many arms are long and massive and he holds many kinds of uplifted weapons.

He wears another thick serpent on his upper arm as an angada and his mouth seems to be full of spewing flames. His great teeth make his face terrible to behold. His maw is open and dreadful. His face is adorned with thousands of beautiful eyes. His body I cannot begin to describe, as also his attire. The very mountains, upon beholding this one, would split into fragments. Blazing flames then issue from his mouth and nose and ears and all thousands of eyes. From those flames hundreds and thousands of Hrishikesas issue, armed with conches and discs and maces.

Looking at that extraordinary Being, who would strike terror into the whole world, Drona’s son, feeling no fear, covers him with showers of devastras. That Being devours them all, even like the Badava fire devouring the waters of the ocean. Seeing his arrow showers prove fruitless, Aswatthaman casts a long spear at the Being, ablaze. That sorcerous lance with the blinding tip the Being consumes like a meteor falling into the Sun.

Without pausing, Aswatthaman draws a wonderful blue sword the colour of the sky and with a golden hilt. It unsheathes like a glimmering serpent emerging from its hole. Drona's son casts that blade at the Being like a bolt of lightning. Striking the great one, the sword vanishes like a mongoose into its lair. His rage mounting, Aswatthaman hurls a mace afire, long as a sacrificial stake for Indra, at the astounding one. That too the Being calmly swallows.

At last, when all his weapons are exhausted Aswatthaman, casting his eyes around, sees the whole sky crowded with images of Janardana. Seeing that wondrous sight, Drona's son recollects the words of Kripa and, turning pale, says, "He that does not listen to the benign counsel of wise friends is obliged to repent, even as I do now, fool that I am for disregarding my two well-wishers. That fool who, ignoring the way of the scriptures, seeks to slay his enemies, falls from the path of dharma and is lost in the trackless wilderness of sin. One should not cast weapons upon kine, Brahmanas, kings, women, friends, one's mother, one's preceptor, a weak man, an idiot, a blind man, a sleeping man, a terrified man, one just arisen from sleep, an intoxicated person, a mad man and one that is heedless. The sages of old always inculcated this truth into men. I have ignored the eternal way of the shastras, essayed along a dark way, and fallen into terrible distress. The wise have said it to be a calamity when one falls back through fear from a great feat after having set out to achieve it. By putting forth only my skill and might, I cannot achieve that which I have vowed to do.

Human exertion is never regarded more efficacious than destiny. If any human action that is commenced does not succeed through destiny, the actor becomes as one who, falling from the path of righteousness, is lost in the wilderness of sin. The sages speak of defeat as foolishness when, having set out upon a course, one swerves from it through fear. Because of the wickedness of my essay, this calamity has come upon me, otherwise Drona's son would never had been forced to hold back from battle.

Again, this Being, whom I see before me, is most wonderful! He stands there like the upraised rod of divine chastisement. Even after reflecting deeply, I cannot recognise who he is. Without doubt, he is the terrible fruit of my sinful determination. He stands here to baffle that dark resolve. It truly seems that destiny has ordained that I fail in my evil resolve. It is not for me to exert myself to accomplish my purpose unless destiny turns favourable to me. So, at this hour, I shall seek the protection of the puissant Mahadeva! He will dispel this dreadful danda of divine punishment that bars my way. I will seek the shelter of that God, that source of everything beneficial, the Lord of Uma, the Kapardin who wears a garland of human skulls, that plucker-out of Bhaga's eyes, who is also called Rudra and Hara. In tapasya and prowess, He far surpasses all the gods. I shall, therefore, seek the protection of Girisha armed with the trident."' Sanjaya says, 'Having decided to invoke Rudra's blessing, Drona's son alights from his chariot and stands with folded hands and head bent in worship of Mahadeva Siva, the Supreme God. And he says, "I seek the protection of Him called Ugra, Sthanu, Shiva, Rudra, Sarva, Ishana, Ishvara, Girisha; and of that boon-giving God who is the Creator and Lord of the universe; of Him whose throat is blue, who is Aja, Unborn, who is called Sankara, who destroyed the sacrifice of Daksha, and who is called Hara; of Him whose form is the universe, who has three eyes, who is possessed of multifarious forms, and who is the Lord of Uma; of Him who dwells in smasanas, who swells with energy, who is the Lord of diverse tribes of ghostly beings, and who is the possessor of undecaying prosperity and power; of Him who wields the skull-topped club, who is called Rudra, who bears matted locks on his head, and who is a Brahmachari. Purifying my soul that is so difficult to make clean, and possessed as I am of little tejas, I adore the Destroyer of Tripura, the triple city, and offer myself as the sacrificial animal. Hymned you have been, deserving are you of hymns, and I hymn your glory!

Your purposes are never obstructed. You wear skins upon your body; you have red hair on your head; you are blue-throated; you are unbearable; you are irresistible! You are pure; you are the Creator of Brahma; you are Brahma; you are a brahmachari; you are an observer of vratas; you are devoted to tapasya; you are infinite; you are the refuge of all tapasvins; you are multiform; you are the leader of diverse tribes of bhutas and pretas; you are three-eyed; you are fond of those wild beings called ganas; you are always seen by Kubera, the Lord of treasures; you are dear to Gauri's heart; you are the sire of Kumara; you are tawny; your vehicle is the most excellent bull; you are clothed in subtle attire; you are most fierce; you are eager to adore Uma; you are higher than all that is high; you are higher than everything; there is nothing higher than you; you are the first wielder of weapons; you are immeasurable, and you are the protector of all the quarters; you are cased in golden armour; you are divine; you have the moon as an ornament on your head!

With dhyana, I seek your protection, O God of gods! I hereby make an offering to you, the purest of the pure, of this my body, composed of the five elements, to overcome the dreadful distress that has overtaken me and to attain success in the enterprise I have in my heart!"

Knowing this to be his resolution from his desire to accomplish his purpose, a golden altar appears before the mahatman son of Drona. Upon the altar, O king, appears a blazing fire, filling all the points of the compass, cardinal and subsidiary, with its splendour. Many mighty beings, also, with flaming mouths and eyes, of many feet, heads, and arms, adorned with angadas set with gems, with uplifted arms, and looking like elephants and mountains, appear there. Their faces resemble those of hares and boars and camels and horses and jackals and cows and bears and cats and tigers and leopards and crows and apes and parrots. And the faces of some are like those of mighty snakes, and others have faces like those of ducks. And all of them are endowed with great effulgence. And the faces of some are like those of woodpeckers and jays, O Bhaarata, and of tortoises and crocodiles and porpoises and sharks and whales, and of lions and cranes and pigeons and elephants and stags.

Some have faces like those of ravens and hawks, some have ears on their hands; some have a thousand eyes, some large bellies, and some are so attenuated that they have no flesh, O Bhaarata! And some, O king, have no heads, and some have faces like those of bears. The eyes of some are like fire, and some have fiery complexions. The hair on the heads and bodies of some blaze and some have four arms, and some, O king, have faces like those of sheep and goats. The colour of some is like that of conches, and some have faces that resemble sankhas, and the ears of some are like conch shells, some wear garlands made of conches, and the voices of some resemble the boom of conches.

Some have matted jata on their heads, and some five tufts of hair, and some are quite bald. Some have lean bellies; some have four teeth, some have four tongues, some have ears straight as arrows and some wear diadems on their brows. Some have strings of grass on their bodies, O monarch, and some curly hair. Some have turbans made of cloth, some have coronets, some have beautiful faces, and some are adorned with ornaments. Some wear ornaments made of lotuses, and some are decked all over with flowers. Their numbers are hundreds of thousands.

Some are armed with sataghnis, some with thunder, and some have mushalas in their hands. Some bear bhushundis, some carry nooses, and some have maces in their hands, O Bhaarata. On the backs of some are slung quivers brimming with exquisite arrows, and all of them are fierce in battle. Some have standards with banners and bells, and some are armed with battle-axes. Some have large nooses in their upraised arms, and some carry clubs and bludgeons. Some have stout posts in their hands, some have curved scimitars, and some have snakes with hoods erect for their coronets. Some have large snakes wound around their upper arms for angadas, and some have stunningly beautiful ornaments on their persons. Some are begrimed with dust and dirt, some smutted with mire, and all of them are attired in white robes and garments. The limbs of some are blue, while others have limbs that are tawny. And some there are that are beardless.

Those beings, called Ganas, possessed of golden complexions, and filled always with joy, play upon drums and horns and cymbals and jharjharas and anakas and gomukhas. And some sing and some dance about uttering loud cries, and some leap forward and cut capers and leap around and sideways. Endowed with great fleetness, they run about most fiercely, the hair on their heads waving in the air, like huge elephants infuriated with musth and frequently uttering loud roars. Terrible, and of frightful mien, and armed with lances and battle-axes, they wear robes of diverse hues and beautiful garlands and fragrant liniments. Adorned with angadas, bracelets decked with great gems, and with upraised arms, they are all imbued with great courage. Capable of forcibly slaying all foes, they are irresistible in prowess. Drinkers of blood and fat and other animal matter, they live on the flesh and entrails of animals.

Some have their matted locks tied in tall tufts above their heads. Some have single tufts on their heads; some have rings on their ears; and some have bellies like earthen pots used for cooking. Some are of very short statures, and some are awesomely tall and ferocious. Some have grim features, some have pendulous lips, and the genitals of some are incredibly long. Some wear costly and diverse kinds of crowns upon their heads; and some have bald pates, and the heads of others are covered over with thick jata.

They are such that they can bring the firmament with the sun, moon and stars, down onto the earth, and exterminate the four orders of created things. They know not what it is to fear, and can endure the frowns of Hara. They always do as they please, and are the lords of the lords of the three worlds. Always engaged in merry sport, they are thorough masters of speech and are perfectly free from pride. Having obtained the eight kinds of divine attributes, they are never elated with pride. The divine Hara is always filled with wonder at their feats. They are devout worshippers of Mahadeva. Adored by them in thought, word, and deed, the Great God protects these worshippers of his, looking upon them, in thought, word, and deed as children of his own loins.

Full of wild rage, they always drink the blood and fat of all haters of Brahman. They also always drink Soma rasa that is imbued with four kinds of taste. Having adored the trident-bearing God with Vedic mantras, with brahmacharya, with tapasya, and with self-restraint they have obtained the companionship of Bhava. The divine Maheswara, that lord of the past, the present, and the future, as also Parvati, eats with those diverse tribes of mighty beings that partake of their own nature.

Causing the universe to resound with the peal of diverse kinds of instruments, with raucous laughter, with loud sounds and shrieks and leonine roars, they approach Aswatthaman. Uttering the praises of Mahadeva and spreading blinding light all around, desirous of enhancing the honour of Aswatthaman and the glory of the Mahatman Hara, and wanting to ascertain the extent of Aswatthaman’s tejas, and also of beholding the slaughter during the hour of sleep, armed with terrible and fierce bludgeons and fiery chakras and battle-axes, that crowd of strange beings, of terrible forms, come from every side. They inspire the three worlds with dread at their sight.

The mighty Aswatthaman, however, sees them and feels no fear. Drona’s son, armed with bow, and with fingers cased in fences made of iguana skins, offers up himself as a sacrificial beast to Mahadeva. Bows are the fuel, and sharp shafts are the ladles, and his own soul possessed of great might is the libation, O Bhaarata, in that act of sacrifice. The valiant and wrathful son of Drona, with propitiating mantras, offers up his own soul as the yagnapasu. Having with fierce rites adored Rudra of fierce deeds, Aswatthaman, with folded hands, says these words to that Greatest God.

Aswatthaman says, “Sprung from Angirasa’s line, I am about to pour my soul, O Siva, as a libation on this fire. Accept, O Lord, this yagnapasu! In this hour of distress, O Soul of the universe, I offer up my own self as the sacrificial victim, from devotion to you and with my heart focused in dhyana. All creatures are in you and you are in all creatures. An assemblage of all transcendent attributes occurs in you! O Lord, you are the refuge of all creatures. I wait as a libation for you, since I am unable to vanquish my foes. Accept me, O Rudra.”

Having said these words, Drona’s son ascends that sacrificial altar on which a fire blazed brightly, offers himself up as the sacrifice and enters that fire.

Beholding him stand immovable amidst the towering flames, with upraised arms, the divine Mahadeva appears there Himself and smilingly says, “With truth, purity, sincerity, resignation, ascetic austerities, vows, forgiveness, devotion, patience, thought, and word, I have been duly adored by Krishna of pure deeds. For this there is none dearer to me than Krishna. To honour him and at his word I have protected the Panchalas and shown you diverse kinds of maya. By protecting the Panchalas I have honoured him. They have, however, been marked by time. The span of their lives has run out.”

Having said these words to Aswatthaman, the divine Mahadeva enters Aswatthaman’s body, after giving him a great and polished sword. Filled by that divine being, Drona’s son blazes up with tejas. From that energy derived from the Godhead, he becomes all-powerful in battle. Many invisible beings and rakshasas go along his right and his left as he sets out, like the Lord Mahadeva himself, to enter the camp of his enemies.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘While Drona’s son, that mighty warrior, went towards the Panchala camp, do Kripa and Bhoja stop from fear? I hope those two maharathas, checked by vulgar guards, do not flee from thinking their opponents to be irresistible? Or, have they, after grinding down the camp, the Somakas, and the Pandavas, followed, while still engaged in battle, the glorious path along which Duryodhana has gone?

Are those heroes, slain by the Panchalas, sleeping on the bare earth? Did they achieve any great feats? Tell me all this, O Sanjaya!’

Sanjaya says, ‘When the noble son of Drona rushes into the camp, Kripa and Kritavarman wait at the gate. Seeing them ready to exert themselves, Aswatthaman is filled with joy, and addressing them in a whisper, O king, says, “If you both put forth your might, you can kill all the Kshatriyas in the world! What need I say, then, of this paltry remnant of the Pandava army, particularly when it is plunged in sleep? I shall enter the camp and careen there like Yama. I am sure that you two will ensure that no man escapes you with life.”

Saying this, the son of Drona enters the vast camp of the Parthas; casting off all fear, he goes in through a place where there is no door. The mighty-armed hero, having entered the camp, pads very softly towards the sprawling tent of Dhrishtadyumna.

Having achieved great feats in the war, the Panchala princes are exhausted. They now sleep deeply, all together in the same tent, next to one another, confident of their safety. Entering Dhrishtadyumna's chamber, O Bhaarata, Drona's son sees the prince of the Panchalas asleep before him on his bed. He lies on a beautiful sheet of silk upon an opulent and luxurious bedstead. Fine garlands of flowers are strewn upon that bed and it is perfumed with powdered dhupa. Aswatthaman, O king, awakens the fire-born prince, sleeping trustfully and fearlessly, with a savage kick. Feeling that kick, the prince, irresistible in battle and of immeasurable soul, starts awakes with a cry and sees Drona's son standing over him. As he rises from his bed with a growl, the mighty Aswatthaman seizes him by his long hair and thrusts him down onto the ground with powerful hands.

From fear as also from being still sleepy, Dhrishtadyumna can summon no strength to repel his violent assailant. He can only writhe and roar like some animal, O king, while Aswatthaman repeatedly kicks both his throat and chest in frenzy. Drona's son attempts to kill the Panchala prince like some lowly beast. Dhrishtadyumna rakes Drona's son weakly with his nails, and says in a whisper, "O Son of my Guru, kill me with a weapon, do not tarry. O best of men, let me find the regions of the righteous!"

Having said this much, Dhrishtadyumna falls silent. Never pausing in his bestial attack on the Panchala prince, Drona's son hisses, "O wretch of your race, there is no heaven for those that kill their Gurus. And for that crime, evil Panchala, you do not deserve to be killed by any noble weapon!"

Saying this, Aswatthaman, smoking with rage, renews his assault with his feet, kicking all the vital parts of his supine victim, and kills his enemy like a lion killing a fallen elephant.

At the screams of that hero while he was being kicked to death, his wives and guards that are in his tent all awaken, O king! Seeing someone crushing the prince with superhuman force, they regard the assailant to be some preternatural being and remain hushed, uttering no cry or sound from sheer terror. Having horribly despatched Dhristadyumna to Yama, Aswatthaman of great energy strides out and climbs onto his beautiful chariot. Indeed, coming out of Dhrishtadyumna's abode, O king, Aswatthaman causes all the sky to resound with his roars, and then drives on his ratha to other parts of the camp to continue his spree of murdering.

After Drona's son has gone, the women and all the guards set up a loud wailing. Seeing their king slain, all the wives of Dhrishtadyumna sob hysterically. At that wailing of theirs many mighty Kshatriyas, awaking, put on their armour and come to ask after the cause of that lamentation. Those women, terrified at the sight of the predatory Aswatthaman, beg the men to pursue him.

They say, “Whether he is a Rakshasa or a man we do not know! Having slain the Panchala king, he stays there on his chariot. Look!”

Those Panchala warriors run out and surround Drona’s son. In less time than it takes to tell, Aswatthaman invokes the Raudrastra and turns them all into mounds of ashes. Having killed Dhrishtadyumna and all his followers, Drona’s son sees Uttamaujas asleep on his bed. Again attacking him with his foot, brutally kicking his throat and chest, Drona’s son kills that great hero also, while that prince writhes in agony and his eyes bulge from their sockets.

Running up and believing his brother to have been slain by a Rakshasa, Yudhamanyu swiftly strikes Drona’s son in the chest with his mace. Rushing towards him, Aswatthaman seizes him and brings him down to the ground and kills him also like an animal, while that warrior utters loud screams.

Having killed Yudhamanyu, Aswatthaman finds all the other Panchala maharathas and, waking them from sound sleep, kills them all like animals being slaughtered at a dark sacrifice. Then taking up the sword Rudra gave him he embarks on a rampage of murder, running down all the paths of the camp and beheading, slitting the throats of and driving his blade into the hearts of all the sleeping warriors he finds. Mad with bloodlust he kills not only men with that inexorable blade but all the horses and elephants that he comes upon. Covered all over with blood, dripping with the gore of man and beast, he seems then to be Death himself commissioned by Time to fetch carnage to the world.

Making his enemies tremble by the repeated blows of his sword, Aswatthaman is bathed in blood. Covered with gore and wielding his blazing sword, as he careered about in battle, his form grows more ghastly and superhuman in appearance with each moment. Those who wake from sleep, O Kaurava, are stunned by the awful sounds they hear all around. Seeing Drona’s son, they look at each other’s faces and mutely tremble. Believing him to be a particularly horrible Rakshasa, those brave Kshatriyas shut their eyes in terror.

Drona's son rages through the Panchala camp like Yama himself, and then he sees the sons of Draupadi and the remaining Somakas. Alarmed by the noise, and learning that Dhrishtadyumna had been slain, those mighty warriors, the sons of Draupadi armed with bows fearlessly pour their shafts over Drona's son. Awakened by their noise, the Prabhadrakas, with Sikhandi at their head, attack Aswatthaman with their arrows. Drona's son gives a bloodcurdling roar and turns, now wanting to kill these maharathas before him.

Remembering his father's death, Aswatthaman blazes up in fresh rage. Leaping down from the terrace of his chariot, he rushes furiously at his enemies. Taking up his bright shield with a thousand moons emblazoned and his massive celestial sword decked with gold, the mighty Brahmana warrior charges the sons of Draupadi and begins to lay about him with his weapon.

That tiger among men strikes Prativindhya through his belly, killing him instantly. The valiant Sutasoma pierces Aswatthaman with a lance, and rushes at him with his sword raised high. Aswatthaman cuts off Sutasoma's arm with the sword in its hand, and plunges his blade deep into his side. Sutasoma falls dead. Nakula's son, the valiant Satanika, hefts a chariot-wheel in both his hands and strikes Aswatthaman a blow like thunder across his chest, hurling the wheel at him. The Brahmana spirit of darkness sets violently on Satanika, felling him to the ground and then cutting his head from his throat with a clean stroke of his sword.

Hefting a spiked cudgel, Srutakarman rushes at Aswatthaman and strikes him a fell blow on the left side of his head. Aswatthaman strikes Srutakarman across his face, truncating his features, and that son of Panchali also falls dead. At this, the heroic Srutakirti, maharatha, comes running up and covers Drona's dreadful son with a storm of arrows. Stanching that gale of shafts with his shield, Aswatthaman cuts off Srutakirti's handsome, why, beautiful head from his neck with its ornate earrings now glinting with blood and blood spouting copiously from his naked throat.

The slayer of Bhishma, the mighty Sikhandi, with all the Prabhadrakas, attack Aswatthaman from every side with weapons of every kind. Sikhandi strikes Aswatthaman with an arrow squarely between his brows. Blazing up in fury, Drona's son dashes up to Sikhandi and with a single stroke of Rudra's sword cuts him in two cleaving him from his head down to the fork of his legs. His wrath unabated, he rushes at the other Prabhadrakas as well as what remains of Virata’s forces.

One after another, he kills them all in the sinister night, the sons, the grandsons, and all the followers of Drupada. Master swordsman that he is, he runs like a storm of death everywhere across that camp hewing down mighty warriors like tender saplings with Mahadeva’s ineluctable blade.

The warriors in the Pandava camp see that Death-Night in her embodied form, a black image, mouth bloody and bloody eyes, wearing crimson garlands and smeared with crimson unguents, attired in a single piece of red cloth, with a noose in hand, and resembling an old crone, chanting a dismal note and standing full before their eyes, and about to lead away men and horses and elephants all tied with a stout rope. She seems to take away diverse kinds of spirits, with dishevelled hair and tied together with that one black rope, as also, O king, many mighty maharathas divested of their weapons.

In the days before this, O sire, the foremost warriors of the Pandava camp would see in their dreams that figure leading away the sleeping warriors and Drona’s son smiting them from behind! The Pandava soldiers saw that hag and Drona’s son in their dreams every night from the day when the battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas first began. Afflicted before by these nightmares, now they find themselves actually ravaged by Aswatthaman who terrifies them all with his frightful roars.

Afflicted by Destiny, the brave men of the Pandava camp now remember the sight they had seen in their dreams, and see their nightmare turn into ghastly reality, even as they die.

At the chilling noises that erupt in the dark, thousands of Pandava bowmen awake from their slumber. Aswatthaman hacks off the legs of some, and divides the hips of others, and pierces some in their flanks, cavorting everywhere like the Destroyer himself let loose by Time. The Earth, O lord, was soon covered with corpses of men crushed into formlessness or trodden down by frightened elephants and horses and with others that roar in panic or agony.

Many cry out, “What is this?” “Who is this?” “What is this noise?” “Who is doing this?”

While they give vent to such shrieks, Drona’s son becomes their Destroyer. He despatches all those Pandus and Srinjayas, who are without armour and unarmed, to Yama.

Awakened by the reigning bedlam, others wake from dark dreams, in fear, still full of sleep and numb; they all vanish from this world so swiftly under the relentless assault of Drona's raging son. Many find their legs paralysed, so they could not run from him, while others do not escape for their bodies have lost all energy and they cannot move. Rills of blood glisten under the stars. As pandemonium rules the grisly night, others, in the grip of utter madness and blind fright, flail out and kill one another.

Drona's son again mounts his chariot of the rumbling wheels, takes up his bow once more and sends a few hundred more men to their deaths. Others awaken, and he kills them before they can come near him and they too are bound by the Kaalaratri crone with her rope. Aswatthaman flares across that camp and many more dazed men he crushes and truncates beneath his chariot, all the while loosing fusillades of arrows around him, each shaft claiming a life. Then again, with that beautiful shield of his, adorned with a thousand moons, and with that sword which was of the colour of the evening sky, he rages among his enemies. Like an elephant trampling a lake, Drona's irresistible son storms about in the Pandava camp.

Awakened by the mayhem, O king, many other warriors rise sleepily and affrighted, and run in all directions to escape the great calamity that is upon them. Many shriek harshly while others cry out incoherent exclamations. Most cannot get to their armour or weapons. Their long hair loose, they now fail to recognise one another and cannot tell friend from foe.

Some just fall flat on the ground from exhaustion even as they get up; others wander here and there like men still inside a horrific dream. Elephants and horses, breaking their tethers, spray excreta and urine in stark fear. Others huddle together, as if that might save them from the terror that sweeps the night. Amongst these, some lay themselves down on the earth, and the rampaging horses and elephants crush them to death.

While the camp is in this state, O king, Rakshasas utter abysmal roars of joy, filling all the quarters with their demonic voices! Hearing their warriors' wails, more elephants and horses break their tethers and stampede everywhere in panic crushing hundreds of their own men. The dust those animals raise makes the night doubly dark. When that thick gloom sets in, all the warriors in the camp became perfectly stupefied; sires do not recognise their sons, brothers do not know their brothers. Elephants attack riderless elephants, and horses other steeds without horsemen in the frenetic night; they pound and trample to gory pulp men that come in their way. Black chaos rules and the warriors run madly at their own comrades, making blood, limbs and heads fly everywhere. Men hack their comrades into pieces in the ominous gloom.

Leaving the gates they watched, and the outposts they guarded, panic-stricken sentries flee blindly, not knowing where they went. These kill one another, the slayers, O lord, not recognising the slain. Afflicted by Fate, they cry out for their sires and sons. While they flee, abandoning their friends and relatives, they call out to one another, crying out their families and names. Others just scream and fall senseless onto the ground. And Drona's avenging son swoops down and puts the lot to sword.

Other Kshatriyas, while their fellows are being slaughtered, lose their courage entirely and, in the grip of fear, try to make good their escape from the camp of death. They pass through the gates standing ajar and Kripa and Kritavarman cut them all down. Without weapons and armour, and with hair loosened, they fall on the ground, fold their hands and, trembling and sobbing, beg for their lives. However, the two Kuru warriors at the gates give them no quarter but kill them like animals on a hunt. None amongst those that escape from the camp escapes Kripa and Kritavarman.

And then, to please Drona's son, those two set the Pandava camp on fire in three places, barring the way of those that would make a run for their lives. When the camp is ablaze, Aswatthaman, that delighter of his sires, runs amok as he pleases, sword in hand and hacking down his enemies with supernatural skill. Some of his braver enemies run towards him and some run from him anyway they can. That tremendous Brahmana kills them all, regardless. His anger far from subdued, only burning higher, Drona's valiant son fells some of the enemy, cutting them in halves with his sword as if they are sesame stalks. The Earth, O bull of Bharata's race, is strewn all around with the fallen bodies of the best men and horses and elephants, while their various screams and cries mingle eerily in the darkness and the light of the fires lit by Kripa and Kritavarman.

When thousands have fallen, innumerable headless trunks rise briefly in a macabre dance and fall again, blood spuming from their naked necks. Aswatthaman, O Bhaarata, hacks off arms adorned with angadas and holding weapons in their fists, and heads, and thighs like trunks of elephants, and hands, and feet. The illustrious son of Drona mangles the backs of some, and now those left alive seek only to flee from the wild and tameless Brahmana. And he, on his rampage, hacks some of them in two at the waist, he lops off the ears of others, and takes some arms off at their shoulders, and thrusts down the heads of some into their trunks, even after the favoured fashion of Bhima.

As Aswatthaman rages on in this way, like some demon of the pit, covered entirely in blood, only his eyes staring white, butchering thousands of men, the night deepens and grows ever more ghoulish. The earth, scattered over with thousands of corpses, of men and beasts, is too dreadful to even look at, while screams and death rattles continue to ring out all around. Cut down by the wrathful son of Drona, his enemies fall onto that earth, where now yakshas and rakshasas teem, that camp frightful with broken chariots and dead steeds and elephants.

Some call out to their brothers, some to their sires, and some to their sons. And some say, "The Dhartarashtras could never do in battle what these evil Rakshasas are doing to us during the hour of sleep! It is only because the Parthas are not here that this horrible carnage is happening. That son of Kunti, who has Janardana for his protector, cannot be vanquished by the Devas, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas or the Rakshasas. Devoted to Brahman, truthful in speech, self-restrained, and compassionate towards all creatures, Arjuna would never kill anyone who is asleep, or one that is unprepared, or one that has set aside his weapons or one who has joined his hands in supplication, or one who is retreating, or one whose hair is undone. Ah, these are demons of the vilest kind who perpetrate such terrible deeds upon us."

Uttering such words, many lay themselves down in helplessness.

The din of the cries and groans of men and their beasts dies down quickly. The earth being drenched with blood, O king, the thick and frightful cloud of dust soon disappears. Thousands of men, crawling feebly in agony, overwhelmed with anxiety and overcome by despair, are swiftly slain by Aswatthaman like Rudra during the pralaya. Many who lay themselves down on the ground clasping one another, and many who seek to flee, and others who seek to hide, and those who offer some resistance in battle, are all slain by the savage son of Drona. Burnt by the flames of Kripa and Kritavarman and slaughtered by Aswatthaman, the men lose their minds and kill one another in madness.

Before half the night is over, the son of Drona, O monarch, sends that remaining host of the Panchalas and Pandavas to Yama's abode.

That night of horror, so deadly for the men and beasts in that camp, fills all the fiendish rangers of the dark with glee. Many rakshasas and pisachas of various tribes can be seen gorging upon human flesh and quaffing the blood that lies spilt on the ground. They are fierce, tawny in hue, sinister, of adamantine teeth, and dyed in gore. With matted locks on their heads, their thighs are long and massive; endowed with five feet, their bellies are large and protruberant. Their fingers are set backwards. Of harsh temper and ugly features, their voices are raucous and fearsome. They have rows of tinkling bells tied to their bodies. Possessed of blue throats, they are frightful to behold. Cruel and terrible without exception, and without abhorrence for anything, they come there with their children and wives. Indeed, diverse are the forms seen there of the flesh-eating, blood-drinking rakshasas that come to feed at Aswatthaman's massacre. Lustily drinking the blood that runs in streams, they are full of joy and begin to dance in separate bands.

"This is ambrosial!" "This is pure!" "This is sweet!" they cry in feral elation.

Other carnivores, having gorged upon fat and marrow and bones and blood, begin to feed on the more delicate parts of corpses. Others, drinking the fat that flowed in streams, run naked over the field. Possessed of diverse kinds of faces, other predators and scavengers of ferocity, that live upon dead flesh, arrive there in their thousands. More grim and gigantic rakshasas, of fell deeds, swarm there in bands as numerous. Other ghostly beings, filled with joy and gorged to satiety, O king, are also seen in the midst of that zone of hell.

When finally day dawns, Aswatthaman wants to leave the camp. He is covered over in blood, dripping with it, and his sword is clutched so fiercely in his grasp that it seems that his hand and that awful blade have become one. Having walked that path that warriors of dharma never approach let alone tread, Aswatthaman looks like the Fire at the end of the Yuga after it has consumed all creatures, leaving only ashes. Having done what he had sworn, having trodden the left-handed, untrodden way, Drona's son, O lord, forgets his grief over the killing of his sire. When he leaves the camp of the Pandavas and the Panchalas, he leaves it as still as it had been when he entered it; only now all its inmates sleep in death, their bodies ravaged by beasts and birds of carrion, by foul rakshasas, pisachas and other filthy beasts and spirits.

After the nocturnal slaughter, when all is quiet again, Aswatthaman issues from the camp in dark triumph, meets Kripa and Kritavarman and, full of black joy, tells them in detail of what he has done. Those two, in return, devoted as they are to his good, give him the agreeable intelligence of how they had also slaughtered thousands of Panchalas and Srinjayas at the gates. Even thus does that night prove terrible to the Somakas who had been heedless and buried in sleep. The course of time, without doubt, is irresistible. Those who had exterminated us are themselves decimated.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Why is it that that maharatha son of Drona did not achieve such a feat before, although he had resolutely exerted himself to bestow victory upon Duryodhana? For what reason did that great bowman do this after the slaying of my wretched son? Tell me this!'

Sanjaya says, 'Through fear of the Parthas, O son of Kuru's race, Aswatthaman could not achieve this feat then. It was owing to the absence of the Parthas and the intelligent Kesava, as also of Satyaki, that Drona's son could do what he did. Who is there, the lord Indra unexcepted, who could do what Aswatthaman did in the night in the presence of those heroes? Besides, O king, Aswatthaman succeeded only because the men were all asleep. Having brought great slaughter to the Pandava forces by night, those three maharatahas, Aswatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman, meet together, embrace, and exclaim, "Great fortune!"

In joy Aswatthaman says, "All the Panchalas have been slain, as also all the sons of Draupadi. All the Somakas also, as well as all that remained of the Matsyas I have slaughtered. Crowned with success, let us at once bring this news to Duryodhana. If he is still alive, we must give him this joyful news!"'

Sanjaya says, 'Having killed all the Panchalas and the sons of Draupadi, the three Kuru heroes come together to the place where Duryodhana lies, struck down by Bhima. They see that the king is still alive. Jumping down from their chariots, they surround your son, who lies there in agony, his thighs and manhood smashed. He lies in a swoon of pain, his life about to ebb away. He is vomiting blood from time to time, and his eyes are turned down to the earth.

A number of carnivores of terrible forms surround him close, wolves and hyenas; they wait for life to leave his body and then feed on it. He keeps them at bay with difficulty. He writhes upon the earth. Seeing him there, bathed in his own blood, the three heroes who are the sole survivors of his army, Aswatthaman and Kripa and Kritavarman, are besieged by grief and sit surrounding him. With those three maharathas, covered with blood and breathing in hot sighs, around him the Kuru king looks like a sacrificial altar surrounded by three fires. The three warriors weep unrestrainedly seeing that once great king lying there like that. Wiping the blood from his face with their hands, they utter piteous lamentations in the hearing of Duryodhana who lies dying on the bare earth.

Kripa says, "There is nothing that destiny cannot bring to pass! Look where king Suyodhana, who was the lord of eleven akshauhinis now lies on the ground, struck down by his enemies and covered in blood. Look where the mace adorned with gold, which he so loved, lies beside him, still resplendent. In no battle did that mace abandon this Kshatriya. Even now, when he is about to ascend into heaven, that weapon does not leave the illustrious hero; why, it lies beside him faithfully even like a loving wife by the side of her lord in his bedchamber. Ah, look at the reversal that Time brings. This Parantapa, this scorcher of his enemies, who used to walk at the head of all the crowned kings of the world, now eats the dust of the earth. He who once struck down countless foes and made them lie on bare ground, alas, that king of the Kurus himself lies today on the bare ground, struck down by his enemy. He to whom hundreds of kings used to bow down in fear, lies today on the field of battle, surrounded by beasts of prey. Once, great Brahmanas waited upon this lord for the wealth he gave so bounteously. Today, wretched wolves and hyenas wait upon him to feast upon his body!"'

Sanjaya continues, 'Looking at that king of Kuru's vamsa lying on the ground, Aswatthaman, with tears streaming down his face caked with blood, O best of the Bhaaratas, utters these piteous lamentations: "O Rajavyaghra, tiger among kings, all the people said that you were the foremost of all bowmen. They also said that in mace fights you, a disciple of Sankarshana, were like the Lord of treasures Kubera himself. How then, O sinless one, could Bhima find any weakness in you? You were always mighty and possessed of genius at the mace. Bhima, on the other hand, O king, is a base and evil fiend.

Without doubt, O Suyodhana, O greatest king, Time in this world is more mighty than everything else, for here we see even you struck down by Bhimasena in battle. Ah, how could the base Vrikodara strike you down and so sinfully, you who know all about dharma? Yes, beyond doubt, Time is irresistible. Having summoned you to a fair fight, Bhimasena struck you below the waist, which is forbidden, for there was no other way in which he could have prevailed over you. Fie on Yudhishtira who tolerated your crowned head being stamped on by Bhima's foot in contempt. As long as this world lasts, in every battle warriors will damn Vrikodara for what he did. O great Suyodhana, O king, there is no shred of doubt that you were struck down sinfully.

The mighty Rama of Yadu's race always said that Duryodhana has no equal with the mace. In every sabha he would proudly boast of your prowess and say, 'Duryodhana of the Kuru vamsa is a worthy disciple of mine!' My lord, you have attained to that end which great rishis have declared to be the high reward of a Kshatriya slain in battle with his face turned towards his enemy. And so I do not, O bull among men, grieve for you, O peerless Suyodhana. I grieve only for your mother Gandhari and your sire, childless as they now are. Wracked with sorrow, they will have to wander over the earth, begging for their food. Fie on Krishna of the Vrishnis, and on the evil-minded Arjuna. They regard themselves as being great knowers of dharma, yet both of them stood by indifferent while you were being treacherously slain.

How will the other Pandavas, shameless though they are, O king, speak of the manner in which they have accomplished your death? You are most fortunate, O son of Gandhari, for you have died on the field of battle, O bull among men, while facing the enemy squarely, even while outnumbered and alone. Alas, what will be the plight of Gandhari, who is now childless, and who has lost all her kinsmen and relatives? What will be the plight of the blind king, your father?

Shame be on Kritavarman, on myself, as also on maharatha Kripa, since we have not yet ascended into Swarga with you, most regal one, before us. Fie on us, lowest of men, since we do not follow you that were the granter of all wishes, the protector of all men, and the benefactor of all your subjects. Through your power, the homes of Kripa, of myself, and of my father, along with those of all our dependants, O tiger among men, are full of wealth. Through your grace, have we, with our friends and relatives, performed many great yagnas with a profusion of dana and dakshina to Brahmanas. Where will sinners such as ourselves now go, since you have left us for Swarga, taking with you all the kings of the earth?

Since we three, O king, do not follow you that are about to obtain the highest end, it is for this that we lament, O great one. Deprived of your companionship, bereft of wealth, our memories painfully dwelling upon your prosperity, alas, what will be our lot since we do not go with you? Without doubt, O Lord of Kuru's race, we shall have to wander across the earth in grief. Deprived of you, O king, where can we find peace and where happiness?

Going from this world, O monarch, and meeting those mighty warriors that have gone before you, show your regard for them at my request, one after another, according to the order of their eminence and years. Having offered worship to your guru, my father Drona, that foremost of all wielders of bows, tell him, O king, that I have killed Dhrishtadyumna. Embrace king Balhika, maharatha, as also the king of the Sindhus, and Somadatta, Bhurisrava, and all the other great kings. I beg you, embrace them all for me and ask after their welfare."' Sanjaya continues, 'Having said these words to the king deprived of his senses and lying broken, Aswatthaman once more casts his eyes on him and says, "If, O Duryodhana, you have any life in you still, listen to some words that will bring you pleasure. On the side of the Pandavas, only seven are alive, and among the Dhartarashtras, only we three. The seven on their side are the five brothers and Krishna and Satyaki; on our side, we three are Kripa, Kritavarman and me. All the sons of Draupadi have been slain, as also all the children of Dhrishtadyumna. All the Panchalas too have been slain, as also those that remains alive of the Matsyas, O Bhaarata.

Behold the vengeance we have taken for what they did. The Pandavas are now childless. While they were buried in sleep, we killed all the men and animals in their camp. Stealthily entering their sleeping camp in the night, O king, I have killed the sinner Dhrishtadyumna as one kills an animal."

Listening to this, which still brings joy to his heart, Duryodhana opens his eyes and says, "That which neither Ganga's son, nor Karna, nor your father, could achieve, has at last been done by you today, O mighty Aswatthaman, along with Kripa and the Bhoja. You have killed the wretched Dhrishtadyumna who was the Senapati of the Pandava forces, and you have killed Sikhandi. For what you have done I regard myself equal to Maghavat himself. May every good befall you three. Let all prosperity be yours. All of us will meet again in Swarga!"

Saying this, the high-souled king of the Kurus falls silent. Casting off his grief for all his slain kinsmen, he then gives up his prana, his life-breath. His soul ascends into sacred heaven, while his only his body remains on earth. Even thus, O Dhritarashtra, great king, your son Duryodhana breathed his last, his body broken but not his spirit. Having first provoked the war, he was at last slain by his enemies. The three heroes repeatedly embrace the king and gaze on him for long as if they cannot tear their eyes away. They then climb into their chariots.

Having heard those piteous lamentations of Drona's son, I came away at early dawn towards the city. Even thus the armies of the Kurus and Pandavas have been destroyed. Great and terrible has been that carnage, O king, caused by your evil policy. After your son ascended into heaven, I was afflicted with grief and the spiritual sight which the Rishi gave me has left my heart and my eyes!'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing of his son's death, Dhritarashtra breathes long and hot sighs, and is plunged in great anxiety."

Vaisampayana said, “After that night has passed, Dhrishtadyumna’s sarathy brings word to Yudhishtira of the great slaughter of the night.

The charioteer says, ‘The sons of Draupadi, O king, have been slain with all the sons of Drupada himself, while they were heedless and trustfully asleep in their camp. During the night, O Dharmaraja, your camp has been razed by the cruel Kritavarman, and Kripa, the son of Gautama, and the sinful Aswatthaman. Killing thousands of men and elephants and horses with lances and darts and battle-axes, those men have entirely exterminated your army. While your forces were being slaughtered like a forest cut down with axes, a loud bewailing was heard rising from your camp. I am the sole survivor, O lord, of that vast force. I, O virtuous Yudhishtira, escaped with some difficulty from Kritavarman when he was momentarily distracted.’

Hearing these evil tidings, Kunti’s son Yudhishtira falls down on the earth, grief having its way with him at the loss of his sons. Coming up quickly, Satyaki takes the king in his arms. Bhimasena and Arjuna and the two sons of Madri also stretch out their arms to hold their brother. Having recovered his senses, the son of Kunti laments in searing grief, his words rendered indistinct by sorrow:

‘Alas, having vanquished the enemy, we have ourselves been vanquished in the end! The course of events is difficult to be ascertained even by men endowed with spiritual sight. The vanquished have become victorious. We ourselves, again, while victorious, are vanquished. Having slain brothers and friends and sires and sons and well-wishers, and kinsmen, and counsellors, and having quelled them all, we ourselves are at last defeated. Misery looks like prosperity and prosperity seems to wear the face of misery. This our victory has assumed now the shape of defeat. Our victory has ended in defeat. Having won the war, I must now grieve as a tormented wretch. How then can I regard ours as a victory? In reality, I have been doubly defeated by the enemy. They for whose sake we have incurred the sin of victory by slaying our kinsmen and friends, alas, they, after victory had crowned them, have been slain by defeated enemies that were heedful.

Alas, through heedlessness have they been butchered that had escaped from even Karna, who had barbed arrows and nalikas for his teeth, the sword for his tongue, the bow for his gaping mouth, and the twang of his bowstring and the sound of his palms for his roars; that always wrathful Karna who never retreated from battle, and who was a very lion among all men!

Alas, those princes that succeeded in crossing, by boats that were their weapons, the great Drona-ocean having chariots for its deep lakes, showers of arrows for its waves, the ornaments of warriors for its gems, chariot horses for its animals, darts and swords for its fish, elephants for its crocodiles, bows for its whirlpools, mighty weapons for its foam, and the signal of battle for its moonrise, making it swell with energy, and the twang of the bowstring and the slapping sound of palms for its roar - alas, even those princes have been murdered out of heedlessness.

There is, in this world, no more powerful cause of death, as regards men, than carelessness. Prosperity abandons a careless man from every side, and every kind of misery overtakes him.

The tall standard that stood on his ratha was the wreath of smoke that infallibly indicated the Bhishma-fire. Arrows were its flames, and wrath was the wind that fanned it. The twang of his formidable bow and the sound of his palms were the roar of that fire. Armour and diverse kinds of weapons were the homa libations that were poured into it. The vast enemy army was the heap of dry forest-grass that fire set into. Alas, even they that had endured that fierce fire, whose terrible energy was the mighty weapons in Bhishma's hand, have at last fallen through heedlessness.

A heedless person can never acquire knowledge, asceticism, prosperity, or renown. Indra found great happiness after killing all his foes heedfully. Behold the survivors among our enemies have, through our heedlessness, slain so many sons and grandsons of kings, each of whom was like another Indra himself. Alas, they have perished like merchants with rich freight drowning through carelessness in a shallow stream after having crossed the great ocean. They whose bodies now lie on the bare ground, slain by those vengeful villains, have without doubt ascended into heaven.

I grieve, however, for the princess Krishnaa. Ah, she will be plunged today in an ocean of grief. Hearing of the slaughter of her brothers and sons and her venerable sire, the king of the Panchalas, without doubt she will fall senseless onto the earth. Her body wracked by grief, she will not rise again. Unable to bear the pain of such various affliction, and worthy as she is of happiness, alas, what will be her plight? Cut to the quick by the slaughter of her sons and brothers, she will be like one scorched by fire.'

Having indulged in these lamentations, that king of Kuru's race then addresses Nakula, saying, 'Go and bring the unfortunate princess Draupadi here along with all her maternal relations.' Obedient as always to the king who equalled Yama himself in righteousness, Nakula goes swiftly on his chariot to the chambers of Draupadi where that princess lived with all the wives of the Panchala king. Having despatched the son of Madri, Yudhishtira, crushed by grief, with tears in his eyes and accompanied by his companions, goes to the field on which his sons had battled and which still teems with diverse kinds of creatures, blood-drinkers and flesh-eaters. Entering that cursed field abounding with fierce sights, the king sees his sons, well-wishers and friends all lying on the ground, covered with blood, their bodies mangled, and heads separated from their trunks. Seeing them like that, Yudhishtira, foremost of righteous men, is stricken through by grief. That lord of the Kurus breaks out into loud sobs and falls unconscious on the earth. And so do all his followers."

Vaisampayana said, "Seeing his sons, grandsons, and friends all slain in battle, the king's soul is unhinged by mighty grief, O Janamejaya! Recollecting those sons and grandsons and brothers and allies, a profound sorrow takes possession of the illustrious sovereign. Senseless and trembling, his eyes are bathed in tears. His friends then, themselves filled with horror, begin to comfort him.

At this time, Nakula, skilled in running errands, arrives there on his chariot of solar refulgence, accompanied by the princess Krishnaa in dreadful distress. She has been living in Upaplavya all this while. Hearing the heartrending news about the slaughter of all her sons, she becomes uncontrollably agitated. Trembling like a plantain tree shaken by the wind, the princess Draupadi arrives in the presence of Yudhishtira, and falls down before him. Her face, adorned with eyes like full-blown lotuses, is darkened by sorrow like the Sun himself when shrouded by clouds.

Seeing her prostrate on the earth, the wrathful Vrikodara of inexorable prowess runs forward and sweeps her up in his arms in a tight embrace. Comforted by Bhimasena, that dark and most beautiful woman on earth begins to weep and, addressing the eldest son of Pandu with his brothers, says, "O great king, having won the whole world through good fortune, you shall enjoy her after the slaughter of your valiant sons in the observance of Kshatriya dharma.

Through good fortune, O son of Pritha, you are joyful at the thought of having won the Earth. By good fortune, your thoughts do not dwell on Subhadra's son whose tread resembled that of a great elephant. By good fortune, you do not, like me while I remained in Upaplavya, recollect your heroic sons slaughtered in the observance of Kshatriya dharma. O son of Pritha, hearing of the murder of those sleeping heroes by Drona's sinful son, grief burns me as if I were in the midst of a fire. If Drona's son is not made to reap the fruit of this sin; if, putting forth your prowess in battle, you do not take the life of that wretch, along with the lives of his followers, then listen to me, you Pandavas, I will sit here in praya until life leaves this body of mine!'

Having said these words, the hapless Panchali, daughter of Yajnasena, sits on the ground beside the eldest son of Pandu, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja. The Rajarishi Yudhishtira, of righteous soul, seeing his beloved queen sit in praya, says to her, 'O auspicious one, O you who know dharma well, all your sons and brothers have righteously met with noble deaths. It does not become you to grieve for them. As for Drona's son, he has fled to a distant forest, O beautiful princess. How will you be assured that we have killed him even if we do?'

Draupadi answers, 'I have heard that Drona's son has a gem embedded in his head, a stone with which he was born. I want to see that jewel brought to me after the slaughter of that vile man in battle. Setting that stone on your head, O king, I will be able to endure living. This is my resolve.'

Saying this to the royal son of Pandu, the beautiful Krishnaa approaches Bhimasena and says gravely, desperately, to him, 'Remember the dharma of a Kshatriya, O Bhima, and come to my rescue. Kill the sinner Aswatthaman as Maghavat did Sambara. There is no one in this world who is equal to you in prowess. It is known throughout the world how, when a great calamity befell us at Varanavata, you became the refuge of all the Parthas. When, again, Hidimba saw us in the deep jungle, it was you who saved us from the Rakshasa. Like Maghavat rescuing his queen Sachi, the daughter of Puloma, you saved me in Virata's city from being ravished. Even like those great feats, O Bhima, that you achieved in the past, now kill, O Parantapa, the son of Drona and then be you joyful.'

Hearing these and the other piteous pleas and wails of the princess, Bhima cannot bear them. He mounts his great chariot, makes Nakula his sarathy and sets out at once to kill Aswatthaman. As he goes he pulls violently on his bowstring so the horses fly. Bhima sweeps along on the trail of Drona's son's chariot."

CANTO 12

Vaisampayana said, "After the irresistible Bhimasena has set out, Krishna, that bull of the Yaduvamsa, of eyes like lotus-petals, says to Yudhishtira, 'O son of Pandu, your impetuous brother, spurred by grief at the slaughter of his sons, rides alone to kill the Acharya's son. O Bharatarishabha, of all your brothers, Bhima is dearest to you. He is in great danger, why do you not bestir yourself? The astra called the Brahmashira, which Drona imparted to his son, can consume the whole world. The illustrious Drona once gave Arjuna the same weapon. Aswatthaman could not bear that and begged his father to give it to him as well. Unwillingly, Drona taught his son the mantras to invoke and unleash the Brahmashira. Drona knew the restlessness and ruthlessness, when moved, of his son.

Knowing every nuance of dharma, when he gave that astra to Aswatthaman he said, "Even when overtaken by the greatest peril, my child, in the thick of battle, you must never use this weapon, particularly against human beings." A little later, he said again sadly, "O bull among men, you will not, it seems, walk the path of dharma."

Hearing those bitter words, the dark and proud Aswatthaman, despairing of obtaining every kind of prosperity, went forth in grief to wander over the earth.

Then, O king of the Kurus, while you were living in the forest, O Bhaarata, he came to Dwaraka and stayed there, worshipped by the Vrishnis. One day, after he began living in Dwaraka, he came to me, by himself, when I was also alone on the sea-coast, and there smilingly said to me, "O Krishna, that weapon called Brahmashira, worshipped by the Devas and Gandharvas, which my father, the Acharya of the Bharatas, received from Agastya after performing the austerest tapasya, is now with me, O Dasharha, as much as it is with Drona. O foremost one of Yadu's race, in exchange for that celestial weapon, give me your Sudarshana Chakra!"

When he begged me for my Chakra with folded hands and in the humblest tone, I said to him, "All the Devas, Danavas, Gandharvas, Manushyas, Garudas and Nagas together do not have even a hundredth part of my tejas. I have this Saringa, this Chakra, and this Kaumodaki. I will give you whichever among these you want from me. Without giving me the Brahmashira that you want to give me, take from among these weapons of mine whichever you can wield in battle."

When I said this to him, as if challenging me, he asked for my Chakra. "Take it," said I to him, at which he rose suddenly and seized the Chakra with his left hand. However, he could not move the weapon from where it lay. He then made to seize it with his right hand. Taking a firm grip on the Sudarshana and putting forth all his strength, he failed to budge it. At this, Drona's son was filled with grief and frustration. After he tried again, he sat down exhausted, giving up, O Bhaarata.

When he withdrew from his purpose, I said, "He who is always regarded as the best of all men, that wielder of the Gandiva, the warrior who has white steeds yoked unto his chariot, upon whose flag Hanuman sits, the Kshatriya who pleased Siva himself in a hand to hand encounter, that Phalguna than whom I have no dearer friend on earth, that friend to whom there is nothing that I cannot give including my very wives and children, that dear friend Arjuna of unstained deeds never said to me, O Brahmana, what you have done.

That son whom I obtained through tapasya and perfect brahmacharya for twelve years on the breast of Himavat, that son of mine Pradyumna of great energy and an amsa of Sanatkumara himself, begotten by me upon my wife Rukmini who had kept vows as austere as mine - even he never asked for my Sudarshana Chakra, which you of little understanding have done.

Rama of unrivalled might never said such words to me. Neither Gada nor Samba ever asked of me what you have done. No one among the other greatest maharathas of the Vrishni and the Andhaka vamsas who live in Dwaraka ever asked of me what you have done. You are the son of the Acharya of the Bharatas; you are held in high esteem by all the Yadavas. Let me ask you, O best of warriors, against whom would you fight using this weapon?"

Drona's son replied, "After offering worship to you, O Krishna, it was my intention to fight you, O you of unfading glory. It was for this, O Krishna that I asked for the Sudarshana which is adored by the Devas and Danavas. If I had your Chakra, I would then become invincible. Having failed, O Kesava, in obtaining my unattainable wish, I am about to leave you, O Govinda. Bless me, O Krishna. This terrible weapon is wielded by you that are the first of all terrible persons. Unrivalled are you for having this weapon!

There is none else in this world that can own it but you, O Lord."

Having said these words to me, the son of Drona left Dwaraka, taking with him many pairs of fine horses, much wealth and diverse kinds of gems. He is wrathful, wicked, restless, and savagely cruel. He has the Brahmashira. Vrikodara must be protected from him!'" Vaisampayana said, “Having said these words, Krishna mounts his chariot furnished with every kind of powerful weapon. Two pairs of the finest steeds of the Kamboja breed, adorned with garlands of gold, are yoked to it. The colour of that best of rathas is of the morning sun. On the right is yoked the steed known as Shaibya; on the left is Sugriva; the Parshni is borne by two others called Meghapushpa and Balahaka. A celestial standard adorns that chariot; it is decked with gold and incomparable jewels and Viwakarman, the divine Artificer, had created it. Standing tall like the Maya of Vishnu himself, upon that standard is Vinata’s son Garuda, shining with great splendour. Indeed, that enemy of snakes perches on the standard-top of Kesava who is Truth embodied.

After Krishna, Arjuna of irresistible feats and Yudhishtira, king of the Kurus, ascend the same ratha. Seated on that chariot, by the side of him of Dasharha’s race, who wields the bow Saringa, the two sons of Pandu look exceedingly handsome, like the twin Aswinis seated by the side of Vasava. Then, he of Dasharha’s vamsa urges those majestic steeds endowed with the fleetness of the wind, to fly after Bhima. And so they do, with the chariot bearing the immortal Krishna and the two sons of Pandu. They course ahead with a deafening roar of hooves and wheels, swiftly as birds flying through the air.

Going at that speed, they soon catch up with Bhima. Although they meet that Vayuputra, they fail to stop him in his mad careen as, full of wrath, he rides fiercely after Drona's dangerous son. In the very sight of those illustrious bowmen, Bhima flies towards the bank of the river of heaven, Ganga brought down to earth of old by Bhagiratha. He sees the high-souled, illustrious, dark-skinned and island-born Vyasa sitting near the edge of the water in the midst of many rishis. And he also sees Drona's son of evil sitting beside them, covered with dust, attired in a piece of cloth made of kusa grass, and smeared all over with ghee. Mahabaho Bhimasena, the son of Kunti, seizes up his bow with a shaft fixed to it, rushes at Aswatthaman, and roars, 'I have come to kill you, you dog!'

Seeing that terrible titan come towards him, bow in hand, and the two brothers on Janardana's chariot, Aswatthaman becomes afraid and thinks his hour has come. That Brahmana of staunch soul instantly invokes the Brahmashira given him by his father. He pulls up a blade of grass with his left hand. In distress, he infuses that blade of grass with the proper mantras and turns it into the Brahmashira. Unable to stand the arrows of the Pandavas and the presence of those wielders of devastras, in wrath Aswatthaman cries out a dreadful curse: 'For the destruction of all the Pandavas!'

Having said these words, O tiger among kings, the fallen son of Drona unleashes that weapon which stuns all the worlds. A fire erupts in the blade of grass, which seems as if it will consume Swarga, Bhumi and Patala like the all-destroying Yama at the end of the yuga."

Vaisampayana said, "Knowing Aswatttman's intention at once, Krishna says to Arjuna, 'Pandava, summon the Brahmashira that your Acharya gave you. Partha, to protect yourself and your brothers loose that weapon which can contain every other astra.'

Arjuna leaps down from the chariot with his Gandiva and the astra fitted to its string. Silently wishing weal upon his Guru's son and then upon himself and his brothers, that parantapa bows to all the Devas and all his superiors, and unleashes the four-headed weapon of Brahma, thinking of the welfare of all the worlds and saying, 'Let Aswatthaman's weapon be quelled by mine!'

That astra blazes up in apocalyptic flames, like those of the pralaya that appear at the end of the yuga. So, too, the astra shot by Drona's son of fierce energy blazes up with white flames within a great sphere of fire.

Thunderclaps echo deafeningly; thousands of meteors fall from the sky; and all living creatures quake with dread. The entire firmament seems to resound with dreadful noise and assumes a terrible aspect with those flames. The Earth, with her mountains and waters and trees, trembles.

And then seeing the two mahastras scorching the three worlds, the two great rishis, Narada, who is the soul of every creature, and Vyasa, the grandsire of all the Bharata princes, show themselves there. The two rishis seek to pacify the two heroes Aswatthaman and Dhananjaya. Knowers of all dharma and wanting the welfare of all creatures, those two sages of limitless tejas stand in the very midst of the two blazing weapons, themselves immune to every astra, themselves like two flames of the pralaya. The two whom no living creature can resist, whom all the Devas and Danavas always adore, becalm those two world-destroying weapons, indeed saving all of creation.

The two rishis say, 'The maharathas who have fallen into this battle are masters of every kind of weapon. Yet, never before did they loose such an astra at men. What act of rashness is this, you heroes?'" Vaisampayana said, "At the very sight, O tiger among men, of those two rishis possessed of splendour like that of Agni, Arjuna quickly resolves to withdraw his great astra. Folding his hands, he addresses the rishis, saying, 'I invoked this weapon, saying, "Let it nullify Aswatthaman's Brahmashira!" If I withdraw this high weapon, Drona's sinful son will consume us all with his astra. You two are like Devas. You must devise some means by which our welfare as also that of the three worlds may be secured.'

Saying this, Dhananjaya withdraws his astra. The withdrawal of the Bramashira by the gods themselves is exceedingly difficult. Not excepting the great Indra himself, there was nobody save the son of Pandu who could withdraw that high weapon once it had been unleashed. That astra was born of Brahmatejas, and no man whose soul was not pure could call it back; only a true brahmachari could. For, if one who has not practised the vow of brahmacharya attempts to bring it back after having shot it, it strikes off his own head and destroys him. Arjuna is a brahmachari and an observer of vratas. Having obtained that unobtainable weapon, he had never used it even when plunged in the gravest danger. Observant of the vow of truth, possessed of great heroism, leading the life of a brahmachari, the son of Pandu is submissive and obedient to all his superiors. It was for this that he succeeds in withdrawing his Brahmashira.

However, Drona's son, even upon seeing those two rishis standing before him, finds he cannot call back his astra loosed in dark fury. His heart downcast, Aswatthaman says to the Dwaipayana, the island-born Vyasa, 'Threatened by a great danger, and wanting to protect my life, I invoked the astra because I was afraid of Bhimasena, O Muni. This Bhima of false ways acted sinfully, O holy one, when he slew the son of Dhritarashtra in battle. It is for this, O Dvija, that, of uncleansed soul as I am, I invoked and loosed the Brahmashira. I dare not, however, withdraw it now. Having inspired this irresistible weapon with the energy of agni, I unleashed it for the destruction of the Pandavas. And so, indeed, will my Brahmashira destroy all the Pandavas. O Mahamuni, I have in wrath done this sinful thing.'

Vyasa says, 'Pritha's son Dhananjaya knew the astra called the Brahmashira. Neither from wrath, nor to kill you in battle, did he summon this weapon. Arjuna used it now only to contain your astra. He has withdrawn it. Having got even the Brahmashira through your father's instructions, the mighty-armed Dhananjaya did not fall away from Kshatriya dharma. Arjuna is possessed of such patience, and such honesty. He is a master of every weapon. Why do you seek to destroy such a one and all his brothers? That land where a Brahmashira is destroyed by another lofty weapon suffers a drought for twelve years, for the clouds do not rain a drop of water there for that time. For this reason, the mighty-armed son of Pandu, although he had the power, would not from compassion for living creatures consume your weapon with his.

The Pandavas should be protected; you should be protected; the kingdom also should be protected. Therefore, O you of mighty arms, withdraw this devastra of yours. Dispel the wrath from your heart and let the Pandavas be safe. The Rajarishi Yudhishtira never wishes to win victory by committing any sin. Give these Pandavas that gemstone which is embedded in your head. Taking that, the Pandavas will in return grant you your life.'

Drona's son says, 'This my jewel is more valuable than all the wealth that has ever been earned by the Pandavas and the Kauravas. If this gem is worn, the wearer ceases to have any fear from weapons or of disease or hunger. He has no fear of Devas and Danavas and Nagas. His apprehensions of Rakshasas as also from thieves and bandits will cease. Even these are the virtues of this gem of mine. I cannot part with it. However, O holy one, I must do what you ask of me. Here is this gemstone.

Here is my self. But this blade of grass infused with the Brahmashira must fall into the wombs of the Pandava women, for this weapon is lofty and cannot be frustrated. O Maharishi, having loosed it, I find I cannot withdraw it. It will make barren the wombs of all the Pandava women and there shall, as I said, be an end of the Pandavas. As for your other commands, O holy Vyasa, I shall obey them.'

Vyasa says, 'Do that then. Do not, however, entertain any other purpose, O sinless one. Casting this weapon into the wombs of the Pandava women, stop yourself with that.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Listening to Vyasa, Drona's son directs that weapon into the wombs of the Pandava women."

Vaisampayana said, “Knowing what the sinner Aswatthaman has done, Krishna, blithe as ever, says to him, ‘A certain Brahmana of pious vows, seeing Virata’s daughter, who is now Arjuna’s daughter-in-law, in Upaplavya, said, “While the Kuru line will become extinct, a son will be born to you. And he will pass through death to live, and for this reason be called Parikshit, the tested one.” The words of that holy man shall come true: I say to you, the Pandavas shall have a son called Parikshit and he shall live!’

Aswatthaman replies in fury to Krishna, ‘You say this, O Kesava, from your partiality for the Pandavas, but it shall not happen. O you of eyes like lotus-petals, my words cannot but be fulfilled. Invoked by me, this weapon of mine shall fall on the foetus that nestles in the womb of Virata’s daughter Uttaraa and destroy that child which, Krishna, you want to protect.’

Krishna says, ‘The fall of this mighty weapon will not be fruitless. The embryo will die. But being dead, it will live again and have a long life. As for you, all wise men know you for a coward and a sinful wretch. You always sinned and now you have turned to murdering unborn children. And for this, O Aswatthaman, you must reap the harvest of your sins. For three thousand years you will wander over this earth, without a companion and without being able to speak to anyone. Alone and without anybody by your side, you will wander through diverse countries, O wretch, and you shall have no place in the midst of men. The stench of pus and blood will emanate from you, and inaccessible forests and dreary moors shall be your abode. You will wander over the earth, O sinful soul, with the weight of all diseases upon you, the agony of every pestilence.

Meanwhile, the heroic Parikshit, attaining to age and a knowledge of the Vedas and the practice of pious vratas, will acquire all weapons from Kripa, the son of Sharadvata. Having gained a knowledge of all the devastras, and observant of every Kshatriya duty, that righteous-souled king shall rule the earth for sixty years. More, that boy will become the mighty-armed king of the Kurus, and be known by the name Parikshit, before your very eyes, O evil one. Though burnt by your weapon's fire, I shall revive him. O lowest of men, behold the tejas of my tapasya and my truth.'

Vyasa says, 'Since, disregarding us, you have decided to do this cruel thing, and your conduct is such although you are a high Brahmana by birth, therefore, what Devaki's son has said will be realized, for you have adopted Kshatriya usages!'

Aswatthaman says, 'With you among all men, O holy one, I will live. And let the words of this illustrious and foremost of men become true!'"

Vaisampayana continued, 'Then, having made over his precious gem to the Pandavas, Aswatthaman makes his forlorn way into the deeper forest. The Pandavas who have killed and punished all their enemies set Krishna and the island-born Vyasa and the great Narada at their head and, taking the gem that was born with Aswatthaman, return quickly to Draupadi who sits in prayopavesa, the fast unto death on Kurukshetra.

Borne by their steeds swift as birds, those tigers among men return with him of Dasharha's vamsa to their camp. Alighting from their chariots, those maharathas, themselves stricken with grief, see Panchali in deep, implacable mourning. Approaching the princess, the Pandavas with Kesava sit around her.

Urged by Yudhishtira, the mighty Bhimasena gives Aswatthaman's unworldly jewel to Draupadi, and says, 'This gem, O precious queen, is yours. The killer of your sons has been vanquished. Rise now, casting off your sorrow, and recollect the dharma of a Kshatriya queen. O you of black eyes, when Vasudeva was about to set out from Upaplavya on his mission of peace, you cried out, O tender one, to Madhusudana, "I have no husbands! I have no sons, nor brothers! Nor are you alive, O Govinda, since the king wishes for peace!" You spoke even those bitter words to Krishna, that greatest of all men. Now recollect those words of yours that were so becoming of a Kshatriya queen.

The wretched Duryodhana, that obstacle to our sovereignty, has been killed. I have drunk the blood of Dusasana. We have paid the debt we owed to our enemy. No one will be able to censure us any longer. Having vanquished Drona's son, we have set him free for the sake of his being a Brahmana and for the respect that should be shown to our dead Acharya. His fame and honour have been destroyed, O Devi, only his body remains alive. He has been divested of his precious jewel and his is bereft of his weapons.'

Draupadi says, 'I only wanted to avenge the terrible injury that he did to us. The Guru's son is as worthy of my reverence as the Acharya himself. Let the king bind this gem to his head, O Bhaarata!'

Then, for Draupadi's sake and thinking of it as a gift from Drona, Yudhishtira sets the jewel on his head. He looks as radiant and regal as a mountain with the moon above it. Though stricken with grief at the death of her sons, the princess Draupadi, of great strength of mind, abandons her vow of praya.

Now Yudhishtira turns to address Krishna."

Vaisampayana said, "In great grief at the slaughter in the night of his sons and the Panchalas, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira says to him of Dasharha's vamsa, 'How, O Krishna, could my sons, all of whom were mighty warriors, be killed by the sinner Aswatthaman of no extraordinary skill in battle? How could Drona's son slay the sons of Drupada, all of whom were such great maharathas? How could he kill the fire-born Dhrishtadyumna, before whom Drona himself could not stand? What deed did the Acharya's son do, O bull among men, so that he slew all our men by himself?'

The Holy One says, 'Drona's son sought the help of the eternal Mahadeva, highest of all the Gods. It was with Siva's help that he could do what he did. If Mahadeva be gratified he can bestow even immortality. Girisha can give such valour as will succeed in containing Indra himself. I know Mahadeva truly, O bull of the Bharata vamsa! I know of his various deeds of old. He, O Bhaarata, is the beginning, the middle, and the end of all creatures. This entire universe exists and moves through his power.

The puissant Grandsire Brahma, wanting to create living creatures, met Rudra and the Pitamaha asked him, "Lord, create living creatures!" Thus implored, Rudra of the tawny jata, said, "Tathaastu! So be it." Saying that, he plunged into the waters and performed a long tapasya, for he was aware of the flaws that all creatures would have. Having waited in expectation of Rudra for a very long time, Brahma, through a fiat of his will, invoked another being into existence, to make him the Creator of all kinds of living things. Beholding Girisha immersed in the waters, this second being said to his father, “If there be no being born before me, I will create living creatures!” His sire replied to him, “There is no other first-born being besides you. This Sthanu has plunged into the water. Go and create living creatures, without any anxiety.”

That being then created many living creatures, Daksha the first, who in turn created all these creatures of four kinds. As soon, however, as they were created, they ran, O king, towards their sire, afflicted with hunger and meaning to devour him. The second being whom Brahma had created ran to him for protection from his own offspring. And he said unto the Grandsire, “Illustrious One, protect me from these, and let these creatures be given other food to live on!”

Brahma gave herbs and plants to be their food, and to those that were strong and predatory, he gave the weaker creatures to be their means of sustenance. Their means of living having been thus given, the newly-created creatures all went away where they wanted, and multiplied through sexual union, each with their respective species.

After the creatures had multiplied and the Grandsire had become well pleased, the First-born Siva rose from the water and beheld living creation. He saw that diverse kinds of creatures had been created and that they had multiplied through their own energy. At this sight, Rudra became incensed and caused his great Linga to disappear into the bowels of the Earth.

The unfading Brahma, soothing him softly, said, “O Siva, what were you doing so long within the water? For what reason have you caused your organ of generation to disappear into the bowels of the Earth?”

The Lord of the universe wrathfully answered the lord Brahma, “Someone else has created all these creatures! What purpose then would be served by this Linga of mine? With my tapasya, O Brahma, I have created food for all these creatures. These herbs and plants will also multiply like those that will subsist upon them!”

Having said these words, Bhava went away, in cheerlessness and rage, to the foot of the Menjavat Mountains to practise yet more severe austerities.’”

"Krishna continues, 'After the Krita-yuga had elapsed, the Devas wanted to perform a Yagna and made preparations according to the directions laid down in the Vedas. They collected ghrita and the other requisites. And they not only devised what the requisites of their sacrifice should be, but also determined those amongst themselves that should have a share in the sacrificial offerings.

Not knowing Rudra truly, the Devas, O king, assigned no share for the divine Sthanu. Seeing that the gods assigned to him no share in the sacrificial offerings, Sthanu, clad in black deer skin, wanted to destroy that sacrifice and, with that object in mind, he wrought a bow. There are four kinds of Sacrifices: the loka Sacrifice, the Sacrifice of special rites, the eternal domestic Sacrifice, and the Sacrifice consisting of the gratification derived by man from his enjoyment of the five elements and their compounds. It is from these four kinds of Sacrifice that the universe has sprung. Kapardin created his bow using the first and the fourth kinds of Sacrifices. The length of that bow was five cubits. The sacred "Vashat", O Bhaarata, was made its string. The four parts of which a Sacrifice consists became the adornments of that bow.

Then Mahadeva, filled with rage and taking up that bow, went to the place where the Devas were engaged in their Yagna. Seeing the unfading Rudra arrive there attired as a brahmachari and armed with that bow, the Goddess Earth quailed with fear and the very mountains began to tremble. The wind ceased to move, and fire itself, though fed, did not blaze forth. The stars in the firmament, in anxiety, began to wander in erratic courses. The Sun's splendour dimmed. The disc of the Moon lost its beauty. The entire firmament was enveloped in thick gloom. Overwhelmed by fear, the Devas did not know what to do. Their Yagna lost its splendour. Indeed, the mighty gods were all terrified.

Rudra in fury pierced the embodiment of Sacrifice, Yagna, with a fierce shaft through its heart. The embodied form of Sacrifice assumed the shape of a deer and fled into the sky from there with Agni, god of fire. Approaching Swarga in that form, he blazed forth in beauty. Rudra, however, O Yudhishtira, pursued him through the sky. After Yagna fled, the Devas lost their lustre. Why, losing their very senses, the gods were stupefied.

In rage, the three-eyed Mahadeva broke the arms of Savitri, and plucked out the eyes of Bhaga and the teeth of Pushana. The gods then fled, as also all the several parts of Sacrifice. Some amongst them, reeling as they sought to flee, fell down unconscious. The blue-throated Rudra laughed aloud and, whirling the horn of his bow, paralysed them. The Devas then uttered a great cry. At their command, the string of Siva's bow broke. The string having broken, the bow became stretched into a staff. The gods approached the bowless Mahadeva, with the embodied form of Sacrifice, sought his mercy and endeavoured to pacify him.

Being ever easily pacified, the Great God plucked out his wrath and flung it into the water, O king. That wrath, assuming the form of fire, Badava, is always engaged in consuming that fluid element. He gave Savitri his arms, Bhaga his eyes, and Pushana his teeth. And he also restored the Sacrifices themselves, O Pandava. The world became safe and calm once more. The gods assigned to Mahadeva all the libations of ghrita as the share of the Great Deity. O king, when Mahadeva was angry, the whole world was dreadfully agitated; when he became calm everything was safe and calm again.

Mahadeva Siva of fathomless power was worshipped and gratified by Aswatthaman. It was for this that Drona's sons could singly kill all your sons, those maharathas. It was for this that he could put to sword many other heroes, including the Panchalas, with all their followers. Do not suffer your mind to dwell on it. It was not Drona's son who accomplished what happened. It was done through the grace of Mahadeva Siva. Compose yourself and do now what should next be done.'"

JALAPRADANIKA-PARVA

AUM! Having bowed down unto Narayana and Nara, the foremost of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya

Janamejaya said, "After Duryodhana and all the other warriors have fallen, what, O Muni, does king Dhritarashtra do when he hears the news? What does the Mahatman, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira, do? What do the three survivors of the Kuru army—Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman—do? I have heard everything about the feats of Aswatthaman. Tell me what happens after that mutual denunciation of curses. Tell me all that Sanjaya says to the blind old king."

Vaisampayana said, "After he has lost his century of sons, Dhritarashtra, grief-stricken, cheerless, and looking like a tree shorn of its branches, is overwhelmed by anxiety and cannot speak.

Possessed of great wisdom, Sanjaya, approaching the king, says to him, 'Why do you grieve, O Rajan? Grief does not serve any purpose. Eight and ten Akshauhinis of warriors have been slain. The earth has been desolated, and is almost empty now. Kings of diverse realms, hailing from diverse lands, united with your son and have all laid down their lives. Now let the obsequial rites of your sires, sons, grandsons, kinsmen, friends and preceptors be performed.'

Vaisampayana continued, “Having lost all his sons and counsellors and all his friends, king Dhritarashtra of great energy suddenly falls on the earth like a tree uprooted by the wind.

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Destitute as I am of sons and counsellors and all my friends, I will have to wander in sorrow over the earth. What need have I now of life itself, left as I am without kinsmen and friends and resembling an aged bird shorn of its wings? Shorn of kingdom, deprived of kinsmen, and without eyes, I cannot, O you of great wisdom, shine any longer over the earth, for I am like a luminary shorn of its splendour. I did not follow the counsels of friends of Jamadagni’s son, of the Devarishi Narada, and of the island-born Vyasa, when they offered it to me.

In the midst of the Kuru court, Krishna said to me, for my good, “Declare a truce to all hostilities, O king! Let your son take the whole kingdom. Give but five villages to the Pandavas.”

Fool that I was, I did not follow even His advice and, for that, today I repent so bitterly. I did not listen to the righteous counsels of Bhishma. Alas, having heard of the slaughter of Duryodhana, whose roars were as deep as those of a bull, having heard also of the death of Dusasana and the killing of Karna and the setting of the Drona-sun, my heart yet does not break into pieces. I do not, O Sanjaya, remember any evil deed of mine in the past, whose consequences I am suffering so sharply today. Without doubt, I committed great sins in my past lives, for which the Supreme Ordainer has set me to endure such a terrible measure of grief. This destruction of all my kinsmen, this extermination of all my well-wishers and friends, in this my dotage, has come upon me through the force of Destiny. What other man is there on earth who is more afflicted than me? Since it is so, let the Pandavas see me this very day, firmly resolved to betake myself to the long way that leads to the regions of Brahma!’

While Dhritarashtra indulges in such demented lamentation, Sanjaya says to him, ‘Cast off your grief, O monarch. You have heard the conclusions of the Vedas and the contents of diverse scriptures and holy writ from the lips of the old. You have heard what the sages said to king Sanjaya when he was stricken with grief at the death of his son. When your son caught the pride that is born of youth, you did not accept the wise counsels offered to you by your well-wishers. Greedy for benefit, you did not do what would truly have benefited you. Like an over sharpened sword your own intelligence has wounded you.

You did generally pay court to those that were of evil conduct and deeds. Your son had Dusasana for his counsellor, and the vile Karna, and the equally wicked Sakuni and Chitrasena of foolish understanding, and Salya, too. Your Suyodhana made the whole world his enemy. O Bhaarata, he did not pay any heed to the words of Bhishma, the Pitamaha of the Kurus, nor to Gandhari and Vidura, to Drona, O king, or Kripa the son of Sharadvata, to the mighty-armed Krishna, to the intelligent Narada, to many other great Rishis, or to Vyasa himself of immeasurable tejas. Though possessed of great prowess, your son was of little intelligence, proud, always eager for battle, evil, ungovernable and discontented.

You are possessed of learning and intelligence and are always truthful. They that are as righteous and as intelligent as you, are never overwhelmed by grief. None of your son's confederates regarded dharma. War was the one word on their lips. For this the very Kshatriya varna has been exterminated and the fame of your enemies enhanced. You had the position of an elder and counsellor, why, of a king of kings, but not a word of salutary advice did you utter. Unfit as you were for the task, you did not hold the scales of justice evenly.

Every person should, from the very outset, adopt a righteous course of action that he may not have, in the end, to repent. Through blind love and favour for your evil son, O king, you did what was agreeable to Duryodhana. You are obliged to repent for that now, but it does not become you to give way to grief. The man whose eyes are directed towards only the honey hanging on the tree growing over a cliff, without being once directed to the fall, meets with destruction through his greed. Such a man is obliged to repent even as you do now.

The man who indulges in grief never wins wealth. By grieving one loses the fruits one desires. Grief is again an obstacle to the acquisition of objects dear to us. The man who gives way to grief loses even his salvation. The man who shrouds a burning coal within the folds of his clothes and is burnt by the fire that is kindled by it, must be pronounced only a fool if he grieves over his injuries. You and your son fanned the Partha-fire with your harsh words, and with your covetousness acting as the ghrita caused that fire to blaze into consuming flames. When that fire blazed forth your sons fell into it like insects and perished. However, it does not befit you now to grieve for them now that they have all been burnt in the fire of the enemy's astras.

The tear-stained face, O king, which you now wear is not approved by the scriptures or praised by the wise. These tears, like sparks of fire, burn the dead for whom they are shed. Kill your grief with your intelligence, and pick yourself up with the strength of your own self!' Thus does the noble Sanjaya comfort his blind king Dhritarashtra. Then, the wisest Vidura addresses the king."

Vaisampayana said, “Listen, O Janamejaya, to the nectar-like words that Vidura says to the son of Vichitravirya and by which he gladdens that bull among men.

Vidura said, ‘Rise, O king! Why are you stretched out on the earth? Pick yourself up. Rajan, even this is the final end of all living creatures. Everything massed together ends in destruction; everything that grows high is sure to fall down. Union is certain to end in separation; life is sure to end in death. The Destroyer, O Bhaarata, takes both the hero and the coward. Why then, O bull amongst kings, should not Kshatriyas engage in battle? He that does not fight is seen to apparently escape with life. When, however, his time comes he cannot escape death. As regards living creatures, they do not exist at first. They exist in the period that intervenes. In the end, they once more are no more. What matter of grief then is there in this? The man that indulges in grief does not succeed in meeting with the dead. By indulging in grief, one does not himself die. When the course of the world is such, why do you indulge in sorrow?

Death drags away all creatures, even the gods. There is none dear or hateful to death, O best of the Kurus! As the wind tears off the tops of all blades of grass, even so, O bull of Bharata’s race, death masters all creatures. All creatures are like members of a caravan bound for the same destination. When death will encounter all, it matters little whom he meets with first. It does not become you to grieve for those that have been slain in battle. If the scriptures are any authority, all of them must have obtained the highest end. All of them were versed in the Vedas; all of them had observed stern vows. Facing the foe all of them have met with death. What matter of sorrow is there in this? Invisible they had been before their births. Having come from that unknown region, they have once more become invisible. They are not yours, nor are you theirs.

What grief then is there in their vanishment? If slain, one wins heaven. By slaying, fame is won. Both these, with respect to us, are productive of great merit. Battle, therefore, is not bootless. No doubt, Indra will contrive for them realms that will grant their every wish and more. These, O bull among men, become the guests of Indra. Men cannot, by sacrifices with profuse gifts, through ascetic penances and by learning, go so quickly to swarga as Kshatriyas slain in battle.

Into the bodies of enemy heroes, which were the sacrificial fire, they poured their libations of arrows. And they, in turn, had to endure the flaming arrows with which their enemies scathed them. I tell you, O king, that in this world there is not a better road to heaven than battle for a Kshatriya. They were all high-souled Kshatriyas; possessed of great courage, they were ornaments of grand sabhas. They have attained a lofty state of blessedness. They are not men for whom we should grieve. Comfort yourself and cease to grieve, O Purusharishabha. It does not befit you to suffer yourself to be overwhelmed by sorrow and to abandon all your duties.

There are thousands of mothers, fathers, sons and wives in this world. Whose are they, and whose are we? From day to day, thousands of causes spring up for sorrowing and thousands of reasons for fear. These affect the ignorant but are nothing to him that is wise. There is none dear or hateful to Time, O best of the Kurus! Time is indifferent to none. All are equally hauled along by Time. Time causes all creatures to grow, and it is Time that destroys everything. When all else is asleep, Time is awake. Time is irresistible.

Youth, beauty, life, possessions, health, and the companionship of friends are all unstable. He that is wise will never covet any of these. It does not become you to grieve for what is universal. By indulging in grief, a man may himself perish, but grief itself, by being indulged in, never becomes lighter. If you feel your grief to be heavy, stand up to it by not indulging it.

Even this is the specific for grief—that one should not give in to it. By dwelling on it, one cannot lessen it; it only grows with indulgence. Upon the advent of evil or upon the bereavement of something that is dear, only they that are of little intelligence suffer their minds to be afflicted by grief. There is neither dharma, artha nor kama in that on which your heart dwells.

The indulgence in grief is the certain means of losing one's objectives. Through it, one falls away from the three great purusharthas, the ends of life. They that are without contentment are stupefied on the accession of vicissitudes that depend upon the possession of wealth. They, however, that are wise are unaffected by such losses and gains. One should kill mental grief with wisdom, just as physical grief is by medicine. Wisdom has this power. They, however, that are foolish, can never find peace of mind.

The karmas of a former life closely follow a man, insomuch that they lie by him when he lies down, stand by him when he stands, and run with him when he runs. In those conditions of life in which one does well or ill, one enjoys or suffers the fruit thereof in similar conditions. In those forms in which one performs particular actions, one enjoys or suffers the fruits thereof in similar forms. One's own self is one's own friend, as, indeed, one's own self is one's own enemy. One's own self is the witness of one's deeds, good and evil. From good deeds springs a state of happiness, from sinful karma comes suffering. One always finds the fruit of one's actions. One never enjoys or suffers weal or woe that is not the fruit of one's own deeds. Intelligent men like you, O king, never allow themselves to sink in sinful enormities that are contrary to wisdom and that strike at the very root of virtue and happiness.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O you of great wisdom, you have dispelled my grief with your luminous wisdom! But I wish to hear you speak again. How, indeed, do those that are wise free themselves from the mind's grief born of the advent of evils and the loss of objects that are dear?'

Vidura says, 'He that is wise finds peace by subduing both grief and joy through means by which one may escape from grief and joy. All those things about which we are anxious, O bull among men, are ephemeral. The world is like a plantain tree, without enduring strength. Since the wise and the foolish, the rich and the poor, all, divested of their anxieties, sleep finally on the funeral pyre, with bodies bereft of flesh and full of bare bones and shrivelled sinews, who amongst them will the survivors look upon as possessed of distinguishing marks by which the attributes of birth and beauty may be ascertained? When all are equal in death, why should human beings, whose understandings are always deceived by the things of this world, covet one another's rank and position?

The learned say that the bodies of men are like houses. In time these are destroyed. There is one Being, however, that is eternal. As a person, casting off one set of clothes, whether old or new, puts on another, even such is the case with the bodies of all embodied beings. O son of Vichitravirya, creatures obtain weal or woe as the fruit of their own karma. Through their actions they find heaven, O Bhaarata, or bliss, or hell and woe. Whether able or unable, they have to bear their burdens which are the result of their own deeds.

As amongst earthen pots some break while still on the potter's wheel, some while partially shaped, some as soon as brought into shape, some after being removed from the wheel, some whilst being removed, some after removal, some while wet, some while dry, some while being burnt, some while being removed from the kiln, some after removal therefrom, and some while being used, even such is the case with the bodies of embodied creatures. Some are destroyed while yet in the womb, some after coming out of the womb, some on the day after, some on the expiration of a fortnight or of a month, some on the expiration of a year or of two years, some in youth, some in middle age, and some when old. Creatures are born or destroyed according to their karma in previous lives. When such is the course of the world, why do you indulge in grief?

As men, while swimming in sport on the water, sometimes dive and sometimes emerge, O king, even so creatures sink and emerge in life's stream. They that are of little wisdom suffer or meet with destruction as the result of their own actions. They, however, that are wise, observant of virtue, and desirous of doing good to all living creatures, they, acquainted with the real nature of the appearance and disappearance of creatures in this world, attain at last to the highest end.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O most eloquent of men, how may the wilderness of this world be known? I wish to hear this. Tell me of it.'

Vidura said, 'I will describe to you all that creatures do from their very conception. At first, the jiva lives in the admixture of blood and the vital fluid. Then it grows, little by little. Then, on the expiry of the fifth month, it assumes form. It next becomes a foetus with all its limbs complete, and lives in a very impure place, covered by flesh and blood. Then, through the action of the wind, its lower limbs are turned upward and the head comes downward. Arriving in this posture at the mouth of the uterus, it suffers manifold woes. In consequence of the contractions of the uterus, the creature then comes out of it, endowed with the results of all his previous karma. He then encounters in this world other evils that rush towards him. Calamities proceed towards him like dogs at the scent of meat. Next, diverse diseases approach him while he is enchained by his previous actions.

Bound by the chains of the senses and women and wealth and other sweet things of life, diverse evil practices also approach him then, O king. Seized by these, he never finds happiness. In that season, he does not obtain the fruit of his actions, right or wrong. They, however, that set their hearts on dhyana, succeed in protecting their souls. The man governed by his senses does not know that death has come to his door. At last, dragged away by Yamadutas, the messengers of the Destroyer, he meets with death at the appointed time. Agitated by his senses, for whatever good and evil has been done at the outset and having enjoyed or suffered the fruits of these, he once more becomes indifferent to his acts of self-destruction.

Alas, the world is deluded, and covetousness brings it under its dominion. Deprived of understanding by greed, wrath and fear, one knows not one's own self. Filled with joy at one's own respectability of birth, one is seen to traduce those that are not high-born. Swollen also with pride of wealth, one is seen to condemn the poor. One regards others to be ignorant fools, but seldom takes an account of oneself. One attributes faults to others but is never keen to punish oneself. Since the wise and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, the highborn and the lowborn, the honoured and the dishonoured, all go to the place of the dead and sleep there, freed from every anxiety, with bodies divested of flesh and full only of bones united by dried-up tendons, who amongst them would the survivors look upon as distinguished above the others and by what signs would they ascertain the attributes of birth and beauty?

When all, stretched after the same fashion, sleep on the bare ground, why then should men, taking leave of their senses, wish to deceive one another? He that, looking at this saying in the scriptures with his own eyes or hearing it from others, practises virtue in this unstable world of life and adheres to it from an early age, attains to the highest end. Learning all this, he that adheres to Truth, O king, succeeds in crossing all paths.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me in detail everything about the ways of that intelligence by which this wilderness of karma may be safely crossed.'

Vidura says, 'Having bowed down to the Self-Born, I will tell you how the great sages speak of the wilderness of life. A certain Brahmana, living in the great world, once found himself in a large inaccessible forest that teemed with beasts of prey. It abounded on every side with lions and other animals that looked big as elephants, all of which were roaring aloud. Such was the aspect of that forest that Yama himself would take fright at it. Beholding the forest, the heart of the Brahmana was exceedingly agitated. His hair stood on end, and other signs of fear manifested themselves on his person, O scorcher of foes.

Inside the forest, he began to run here and there, casting his terrified eyes everywhere to find someone whose shelter he might seek. Yes, desperate to avoid those terrible creatures, he ran in fright. However, he could not distance himself from them. He then saw that the terrible forest was covered over by a great net and that a frightful woman stood there, her arms outstretched. That jungle was also encompassed by many five-headed snakes of dreadful forms, tall as cliffs and their hoods touching the very heavens.

Within that vana was a pit whose mouth was covered with many hard and unyielding creepers and plants. During his panicked flight, the Brahmana fell into that hidden pit. He became entangled in those clusters of creepers that were interwoven with one another, and hung there like the large fruit of a jack tree hanging by its stalk. He continued to hang there, feet up and head down. While he was in that posture, diverse other calamities overtook him. He saw a great and mighty snake within the pit. He also saw a gigantic elephant near its mouth. That elephant, dark in complexion, had six faces and twelve feet. And the animal gradually approached that pit covered with creepers and trees. About the twigs of the greatest tree that stood at the lip of the pit, flew many bees of frightful forms, drinking the honey gathered in their comb about which they swarmed in dense numbers.

The honey fell from the honeycomb in many jets. The one who hung in the pit continually drank those ambrosial jets but his thirst was never quenched but only grew. Unsatiated with repeated draughts, the Brahmana wanted more and more. Even then, O king, he did not become indifferent to life. Even there, the man continued to hope to live on. A number of black and white rats were eating away the roots of that tree. There was fear from the beasts of prey, from that fierce woman on the hem of that forest, from that snake at the bottom of the pit, from that elephant near its top, from the fall of the tree through the action of the rats, and lastly from those bees buzzing about to taste the honey.

In that plight he continued to dwell, quite deprived of his senses, in that wilderness, and never at any time losing the hope of prolonging his life.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Alas, great was the distress of that Brahmana and very painful his life! Tell me, O first of speakers, whence was his attachment to life and whence his happiness? Where is that region, so unfavourable to the practice of virtue, in which that man resides? Oh, tell me how will that man be freed from all those great terrors? Tell me all this. We shall then exert ourselves properly to save him. My compassion has been greatly moved by the difficulties that lie in the way of his rescue.'

Vidura says, 'They that are conversant, O monarch, with the Moskhadharma, the religion of Moksha, cite this as a simile. Understanding this properly, a man may attain to bliss in the regions hereafter. That which is described as the wilderness is the great world. The inaccessible forest within it is the limited sphere of one's own life. Those that have been mentioned as beasts of prey are the diseases to which we are subject. The woman of gigantic proportions who dwells in the forest is identified by the wise with decrepitude which destroys beauty. That which has been spoken of as the pit is the body of embodied creatures. The great snake at the bottom of that pit is time, the destroyer of all embodied creatures. It is, indeed, the universal destroyer. The creepers growing in that pit and attached to whose spreading stems the man hangs down is the desire for life which is cherished by every creature. The six-faced elephant, O king, which comes towards the tree standing at the mouth of the pit is spoken of as the year. Its six faces are the seasons and its twelve feet are the twelve months. The rats and the snakes that gnaw at the roots of the tree are said to be days and nights that continually lessen the lifespans of all creatures. Those that have been described as bees are our desires. The numerous jets that are dropping honey are the pleasures derived from the gratification of our desires and to which men are seen to be powerfully addicted. The wise know life's course to be even such. Through that knowledge they succeed in tearing off its bonds.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Excellent is this parable that you have related! Indeed, you are a knower of the truth. Having listened to your nectar like words, I want to hear more.'

Vidura says, 'Listen to me, O king, I shall once more discourse in detail on the means which enable the wise to free themselves from the ties of the world. As a person, O king, who has to travel a long way is sometimes obliged to halt when tired, even so, O Bhaarata, they that are of little intelligence, travelling along the long way of life, have to make frequent halts in the shape of repeated births into diverse wombs. The wise, however, are free from that obligation. For this, men conversant with the scriptures describe life's course as a long way. The wise also call life's round with all its difficulties a forest.

Creatures, O bull of Bharata's race, whether mobile or immobile, have to repeatedly return to the world. The wise alone escape. The diseases, mental and physical, to which mortals are subject, whether visible or invisible, are spoken of as beasts of prey by the wise. Men are always afflicted and impeded by them. Then, again, the fierce predators, represented by their own actions in life, ever cause anxiety to them that are of little intelligence. If anyone somehow escapes from diseases, decrepitude—that destroyer of beauty—overwhelms him after. Plunged in a slough by the objects of the different senses—sound and form and taste and touch and scent—man remains there without anything to rescue him thence. Meanwhile, the years, the seasons, the months, the fortnights, the days, and the nights, coming one after another, gradually despoil him of beauty and lessen the lifespan allotted to him. These are all messengers of death. They, however, that are of little understanding know them not to be such. The wise say that all jivas are governed by the Ordainer through their actions.

The body of a creature is called the chariot. The living principle is the sarathy of that ratha. The senses are said to be the steeds. Our acts and the understanding are the traces. He who follows after those running horses has to come repeatedly to this world in a round of rebirths. He, however, who, being self-restrained, stops them by his understanding does not have to return. They that are not bewildered while wandering in this wheel of life that does truly revolve like an actual wheel, do not in reality wander in a round of rebirths.

He that is wise should certainly take care to prevent the obligation of rebirth. One should not be indifferent to this, for indifference may subject us to it repeatedly. The man, O king, who has restrained his senses and subdued anger and greed, who is contented, and truthful in speech, succeeds in gaining peace. This body is called the chariot of Yama. Those of little intelligence are perplexed by it. Such men, O king, obtain that which you have done. The loss of kingdom, of friends, and of children, O Bhaarata, and other calamities such as these, overtake him who is still under the influence of desire. He that is wise should apply the medicament of intelligence to all great griefs. Indeed, obtaining the specific of wisdom, which is truly efficacious and is also almost unattainable, the man of restrained soul would kill that serious sickness called sorrow. Neither prowess, nor wealth, nor friends, nor well-wishers can cure a man of his grief so effectually as keeping a self-restrained soul. Therefore, observant of the great dharma of abstention from causing all injuries, or friendship for all creatures, be of pious conduct, O Bhaarata!

Self-restraint, renunciation and heedfulness are the three steeds of Brahma. He who rides on the chariot of his soul, to which these steeds are yoked with the help of traces furnished by good conduct, and drives it, casting off all fear of death, flies, O king, to the worlds of Brahma. That man who gives to all creatures an assurance of his harmlessness, goes to the highest of worlds, the blessed realm of Vishnu. The fruit that one obtains by an assurance unto all creatures of his harmlessness cannot be obtained by a thousand sacrifices or by daily fasts. Amongst all things there is certainly nothing dearer than the self. Death is certainly feared and abhorred by all creatures, O Bhaarata! Therefore, compassion must certainly be shown to all.

Endowed with diverse kinds of errors, entangled by the net of their own intelligence, both they that are wicked and the good wander repeatedly on the earth. They, however, that are wise and endued with subtle sight, attain to union with the Supreme Brahman.'" Vaisampayana said, “Even after hearing what Vidura says, Dhritarashtra, king of the Kurus, afflicted with grief on account of the death of his sons, yet again falls senseless to the ground. Seeing him fall down in that state, his friends, as also the island-born Vyasa, and Vidura, and Sanjaya, and other well-wishers, and the attendants who waited at his gates and who enjoyed his confidence, sprinkle cool water over his body, fan him with palm leaves and gently massage him with their hands. For a long while they comfort the king in that condition. Recovering his senses after a time, Dhritarashtra weeps for a long while, thinking only of the death of his sons.

CANTO 8

He says, ‘Fie on the human condition! Fie on the human body! The woes that are suffered in this life frequently arise from the very state of humanity. Alas, O lord, great is the grief, like poison or fire, that one suffers at the loss of sons, of wealth, of kinsmen and relatives. That grief causes our limbs to burn and our wisdom to be destroyed. Overwhelmed with that grief, a person regards death to be preferable to living on. This calamity that has overtaken me through ill-fortune is even like that. It will not, I see, end except with my life itself. O best of regenerate ones, I shall put an end to my life this very day.’ Having said these words to his high-souled sire, that foremost of all men conversant with Brahman, Dhritarashtra, overwhelmed again with grief, falls deathly silent. Hearing what his son, the blind king, says, the puissant Vyasa speaks to him once more.

Vyasa says, 'O Mahabaho Dhritarashtra, listen to what I say. You are possessed of learning, you have great intelligence, and you, mighty one, are skilled in understanding dharma. Nothing of that which should be known is unknown to you, O Parantapa! Without doubt, you know the instability of all things doomed to die. When the world of life is unstable, when this world itself is not eternal, when life is sure to end in death, why then, O Bhaarata, do you grieve? Before your very eyes, O king, a concatenation of events brought about by Time, making your son the cause, resulted in this war. This destruction of the Kurus was inevitable. Why then do you grieve for those heroes that have attained to the highest end? Mahabaho, the Mahatman Vidura knew everything. With all his might he endeavoured to bring about peace. It is my opinion that the course marked out by Destiny cannot be controlled by anyone, even if one struggles for all eternity. I directly heard the course that was settled upon by the gods. I will relate it to you, so that peace of mind may be yours.

Once, I went to the court of Indra. There I beheld all the denizens of heaven assembled together. There were, O sinless one, all the Devarishis also, with Narada at their head. There, O monarch, I saw also the Earth, Bhumi Devi in her embodied form. She had gone to the Devas for the accomplishment of a mission. Approaching the gods, she said, "You have already promised that which you all should do for me, O blessed ones, while you were in Brahma's abode. Let that be accomplished soon."

Hearing these words of hers, Vishnu, the adored of all the worlds, smilingly addressed her in the midst of the heavenly conclave, saying, "The eldest of the hundred sons of Dhritarashtra, who is known by the name of Duryodhana, will accomplish what you desire. Through that king, your purpose will be achieved. For his sake, many kings will assemble together on the field of Kuru, and slay one another with great weapons. And, O Devi, your burden will be lightened in battle. Go quickly to your own place and continue to bear the weight of creatures, O beauteous one!"

From this you will understand, O king, that your son Duryodhana, born in Gandhari's womb, was an amsa of Kali, sprung for the very purpose of causing a universal slaughter. He was vindictive, restless, wrathful, and never satisfied. Through the influence of Destiny his brothers also became like him. Sakuni became his maternal uncle and Karna his great friend.

Many other kings were born on earth to help in the task of destruction, in order to lighten the burden of the earth. As the king is, so do his subjects become. If the king be righteous, even adharma in his dominions assumes the form of dharma. Servants, without doubt, are affected by the merits and defects of their masters. And your sons, O king, having acquired a bad father, have all been destroyed.

Conversant with the truth, Narada knew all this. Through their own sins, your sons have been destroyed, O king. Do not grieve for them. There is no cause for grief. The Pandavas have not, O Bhaarata, the least fault in what has happened. Your sons were all of evil souls. It is they that caused this carnage on earth. Be you blessed.

Narada told Yudhishtira of all this in his court during the Rajasuya yagna, saying, "The Pandavas and the Kauravas, encountering each other, will meet with destruction. Do that, O son of Kunti, which you should!"

At these words of Narada, the Pandavas became filled with grief. I have told you an eternal secret of the gods. This will destroy your grief and restore to you a love of your life, and cause you to cherish affection for the Pandavas, for all that has happened has been due to what was ordained by the gods. O Mahabaho, I learnt all this some time ago. I also spoke of it to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja on the occasion of his greatest of sacrifices, the Rajasuya. When I secretly told him of all this, Dharma's son did his best to preserve peace with the Kauravas. That, however, which was ordained by the gods proved too powerful to be frustrated by him. The fiat the Destroyer can never be foiled by creatures of this world, mobile and unmoving.

You are devoted to virtue and possessed of superior intelligence, O Bhaarata. You know that which is the way and that which is not the way of all creatures. If Yudhishtira learns that you burn with grief and frequently faint, he will cast off his very life. He is always compassionate and possessed of wisdom. His kindness extends even to all the inferior creatures. How is it possible, O king, that he will not show compassion to you? At my command, and knowing that what is ordained is inevitable, as also from kindness to the Pandavas, continue to endure your life, Bhaarata! If you live, your fame will spread in the world. You will be able to acquire a true knowledge of all dharma and find many years to gain punya for yourself.

This grief for the death of your sons that has arisen in your heart like a blazing fire must be extinguished with the sacral water of wisdom!'"

Vaisampayana continued, “Hearing these words of Vyasa of immeasurable tejas, and reflecting upon them for a while, Dhritarashtra says, ‘O best of enlightened ones, I am tormented by a vast load of grief. My senses repeatedly forsake me and I am unable to pick myself up. However, hearing what you say about what was ordained by the gods, I shall not think of casting off my life and I shall live and act without indulging this searing grief.’

Hearing these words from Dhritarashtra, O monarch, Satyavati’s son Vyasa vanishes from there.”

CANTO 9

Janamejaya said, "After the holy Vyasa vanished, what, O Maharishi, did king Dhritarashtra do? What also did the Kuru king, the Mahatman son of Dharma, do? What did those three, Kripa, Kritavarman and Aswatthaman do? I have heard of the feats of Aswatthaman and the mutual pronouncement of curses. Tell me what happened next and what Sanjaya next said to the old king Dhritarashtra."

Vaisampayana said, "After Duryodhana has been killed and all the troops slaughtered in the night, Sanjaya, deprived of his spiritual sight, comes back to Dhritarashtra.

Sanjaya says, 'The kings of diverse peoples, who came from different realms, have all, O king, gone to the lands of the dead, along with your sons. Your son, who was constantly implored for peace but who always wished to end his enmity with the Pandavas by killing them in war, has caused the very world as we knew her to be destroyed. Do you, O Rajan, have the obsequial rites for your sons and grandsons and sires to be performed in proper order.'

Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing these terrible words from Sanjaya, the king falls onto the earth and lies motionless like a dead man. Vidura says to the prostrate king, the very same words he had said before 'Rise, O king, why do you lie on the ground? Do not grieve, O bull of Bharata's race! Even this, O lord of the earth, is the final end of all creatures. At first, all creatures do not exist. Then, they are alive. At the end, they once more cease to be. What cause for sorrow is there in all this? By indulging grief, one cannot fetch back the dead. By indulging in grief, one cannot die oneself. When such is the course of the world, why do you, of all men, so indulge grief? One may die without having fought a battle. Some also escape alive after fighting a war. When one's time comes, O Rajan, one cannot escape. Time takes away all creatures, of every kind.

There is none dear or hateful to Time, O best of the Kurus. As the wind tears off the ends of all blades of grass, even so Time brings all creatures under its influence. All creatures are like members of the same caravan bound for the same destination. What cause of sorrow is there if Time meets with one a little earlier than with another? Those, O king, that have fallen in battle and for whom you grieve, are not really objects of grief, since all those illustrious ones have found swarga. With sacrifices with profuse gifts, through tapasya, and even through knowledge, men cannot so easily repair to heaven as Kshatriyas by dying courageously in battle. All those heroes were conversant with the Vedas; all of them were observant of vows; all of them have perished, facing the enemy in battle. What cause then is there for grieving?

They poured their libations of arrows into the bodies of their brave foes as into a fire. Foremost among men, they bore in return the arrow libations poured upon themselves. I tell you, O Rajan, that there is no better way to heaven for a Kshatriya than through battle. All of them were high-souled Kshatriyas; all of them were heroes and ornaments of royal sabhas. They have attained to a high state of blessedness. One should not grieve for them. Do you comfort yourself, and do not grieve, O bull among men! It does not become you to suffer yourself to be overwhelmed by sorrow and abandon all karma.'" Vaisampayana said, "Hearing these words of Vidura, that bull of Bharata vamsa, Dhritarashtra, orders his chariot to be yoked. He says again, 'Bring Gandhari here without delay, and all the royal Bharata women. Bring Kunti also, as well as all the other ladies who are with her. Having said these words to Vidura, knower of all dharma, Dhritarashtra of righteous soul, well-nigh deprived of his senses by sorrow, climbs into his arrived chariot. Gandhari, stricken with grief at the death of her sons, accompanied by Kunti and the other ladies of the royal household, comes at the command of her lord to where Dhritarashtra waits for her. Beside themselves with sorrow, they come all together to the king. As they meet, they accost each other and utter loud wails of woe. Vidura, who by now has become more grief-stricken than those regal women, comforts them. Setting them on the chariots that stand ready for them, he sets out with them from the city of the elephant. As they go, piercing cries ring out from every Kuru house. The whole city, including the children, are pierced through with anguish.

Those proud, exquisite royal women, whom not the gods themselves had ever set eyes on, are now bereft of their lords and seen by the common people. With their beautiful tresses all dishevelled and their ornaments cast aside, those women, each wearing just a single piece of cloth, go forth in untold grief. Indeed, they issue from their palaces resembling white mountains, like a dappled herd of deer from their mountain caves after the fall of their king stag. The royal women emerge in successive bevies, O king, and, unhinged with grief, dash here and there as if in panic, somewhat like a herd of fillies in a circus pen.

Seizing each other by the hand, they utter loud cries after their sons and brothers and sires. They seem to enact the scene that takes place during the pralaya at the end of the yuga. Weeping and crying and running here and there, and unhinged by grief, they do not know what to do. Those women, who once felt the blush of modesty in the presence of even companions of their own sex, now feel no trace of shame, though scantily clad, in appearing before their mothers-in-law. Once they would comfort each other while afflicted with even slight discomfort. Now, overcome by grief, they refrain from even casting their eyes at each other.

Surrounded by those thousands of wailing women, the king cheerlessly issues out of the city and goes swiftly towards the field of war. Artisans and traders and Vaishyas and all kinds of mechanics, issuing out of the city, follow the king. Shattered by the absolute destruction that has overtaken the Kurus, the royal women set up a bewailing that seems to pierce all the worlds. All creatures that heard that terrible cry think that the hour of the pralaya has come when all things would be consumed by the fire that arises at the end of the yuga. The citizens of Hastinapura also, devoted to the house of Kuru, their hearts filled with anxiety, set up a piercing cry, O king, that was as loud as that uttered by the royal women.”

Vaisampayana said, “Dhritarashtra has not gone for more than two krosas when he comes upon the three maharathas, Sharadvata’s son Kripa, Drona’s son Aswatthaman, and Kritavarman the Bhoja. As soon as they see the blind and mighty king, the three heroes sigh in grief and address him in voices choked with tears, ‘Your royal son, O king, having achieved the most difficult feats, has, with all his followers, gone to the world of Indra. We are the only three rathikas of Duryodhana’s army that have escaped with our lives. All the others, O bull of Bharata’s race, have perished.’

Having said these words to Dhritarashtra, Kripa says to the grief-stricken Gandhari, ‘Your sons died while achieving feats worthy of heroic Kshatriyas, while fearlessly fighting and striking down large numbers of the enemy. Without doubt, having found those bright worlds that are attainable only through the use of weapons, they have assumed resplendent forms and sport there like gods.

Amongst those heroes there was not one that turned back from battle. Every one of them has fallen at the end or the edge of weapons. None of them folded his hands, begging for quarter. Death in battle at the end or edge of weapons has been said by the ancients to be the highest end that a Kshatriya can obtain. Thus, O queen, it does not befit you to grieve for any of them. Their enemies the Pandavas also, O Gandhari, have not been more fortunate. Listen to what we, led by Aswatthaman, have done to them.

Learning that your son had been killed treacherously by Bhima, we slaughtered the Pandavas' men, entering their camp while it lay buried in sleep. All the Panchalas have been slain. Indeed, all the sons of Drupada, as also all the sons of Draupadi, have been slaughtered. Having caused this carnage of the sons of our foes, we now fly from the Pandavas themselves, for we three cannot stand against them in battle. The Pandavas are all irresistible heroes and mighty bowmen. They will soon catch up with us and, filled with rage at the slaughter of their sons, will have their revenge on us.

Having done what we did, O queen, we dare not tarry. Grant us leave, O Maharani! It does not become you to set your heart on sorrow. O Dhritarashtra, you also give us leave to fly from here. O mighty king, summon all your fortitude and observe the dharma of a Kshatriya in its highest form.'

Having said these words to the king, and circumambulating him in pradakshina, Kripa, Kritavarman and Drona's son, O Bhaarata, hardly able to tear their eyes away from Dhritarashtra of great wisdom, urge their horses towards the banks of the Ganga. Riding away, those maharathas, with hearts plunged in grief and agitation, now take one another's leave and go their separate ways.

Sharadvata's son Kripa rides to Hastinapura; Hridika's son Kritavarman flies to his own kingdom; while the son of Drona sets for the asrama of Maharishi Vyasa. Even thus, those heroes, who had brought dreadful grief to the Pandavas, ride away before the sun rises higher, repeatedly casting backward glances at one another, and all of them full of fear.

It is after this, O Rajan, that the sons of Pandu encounter the son of Drona and, putting forth their prowess, vanquish him, as I have already told you."

Vaisampayana said, “After all the warriors had been slaughtered, king Yudhishtira the just hears that his uncle Dhritarashtra has set out from the city called after the elephant. Ravaged by grief on account of the death of his sons, Yudhishtira, O king, accompanied by his brothers, sets out to meet with his uncle, equally full of sorrow at the death of his hundred sons. The son of Kunti is followed by the high-souled and heroic Krishna of Dasarha’s race, and by Yuyudhana, as also by Yuyutsu. The princess Draupadi, also, burning with grief, and accompanied by those Panchala ladies that are with her, sorrowfully follows her lord.

Yudhishtira sees near the banks of the Ganga, O king, the crowd of Bharata women crying like a flock of bereaved she-ospreys. The king is soon surrounded by those thousands of royal women who, with arms raised up in sorrow, indulge in loud lamentations and give vent to all kinds of incoherent words, both agreeable and distasteful.

They cry where, indeed, is that righteousness of the king, where is his truth and compassion, for he has slain sires and brothers and preceptors and sons and friends?

‘How, O mighty-armed one, has your heart become tranquil after causing Drona, your grandsire Bhishma, and Jayadratha to be slaughtered? What need have you of sovereignty, after having seen your sires and brothers, O Yudhishtira, and the irresistible Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi massacred?'

Passing by those weeping, screaming women, Yudhishtira comes and touches the feet of his eldest uncle. Having saluted their sire according to custom, those parantapas, the Pandavas, announce themselves to him, each uttering his own name. Dhritarashtra reluctantly embraces the eldest son of Pandu, who was the cause of that great carnage. Having embraced the Dharmaraja and spoken a few weak words of comfort to him, O Bhaarata, the dark-souled Dhritarashtra seeks Bhima, like a fire ready to consume everything that would approach it. Indeed, that fire of his wrath, fanned by the wind of his grief, seems to be ready to consume the Bhima-forest.

However, knowing Dhritarashtra's evil intentions toward Bhima, Krishna pulls away the real Bhima, and presents an iron statue of the second son of Pandu to the old king. Indeed, with sure prescience of what the blind king would attempt to do, Krishna had kept that contrivance ready. Seizing the iron Bhima in his awesomely strong arms, king Dhritarashtra, strong as ten thousand elephants, clasps it so ferociously that the iron image breaks into pieces. Such is his effort that his own chest is bruised and he begins to vomit blood. Covered with his own blood, the king falls down on the ground like a parijata tree topped with its flowery burden.

His wise charioteer Sanjaya, son of Gavalgana, lifts up the monarch and, soothing and comforting him, says, 'Do not do such a thing!'

His fury exhausted, the demented king returns to his senses. He is suddenly wracked with guilt and sorrow, and begins to weep aloud, saying, 'Alas, oh Bhima, alas, oh Bhima! What have I done?'

Seeing the aged king's fury has left him and that he is genuinely stricken at the thought that he has killed Bhima, Krishna says softly, 'Do not grieve, O Dhritarashtra, for you have not killed Bhimasena. That was an iron statue, O king, which you shattered. I knew that you were full of rage and drew Bhima away from you and the jaws of Death.

O tiger among kings, there is none equal to you in strength of body. What man is there, O Mahabaho, that could endure the might of your arms? Indeed, even as no one can escape alive from an encounter with Yama himself, even so none can come out safely from your angry embrace. It was for this that the iron image of Bhima, which Duryodhana had fashioned and upon which he daily rained blows of his mace, was kept ready. Through grief for the death of your sons, your mind has fallen away from dharma. It is for this, O great king, that you seek to kill Bhimasena, though killing Bhima would do you no good. Your sons would not come back to life even if you killed Pandu's second son.

I say you must yourself condemn what we all saw you attempt to do and not set your heart on grief!'" Vaisampayana said, “Some maid-servants then come to the king to bathe him. After he had been duly bathed, Krishna speaks to him again,’ O king, you have read the Vedas and many other Shastras. You have heard all the ancient Puranas and Itihasas, and know everything about the Rajadharma, the duty of kings. You are learned, possessed of great wisdom, and indifferent to strength and weakness. Why then do you harbour such anger when all that has overtaken you is the result of your own fault? I spoke to you before the battle. Both Bhishma and Drona, O Bhaarata, did the same, as also did Vidura and Sanjaya. However, then you did not follow our advice. Indeed, though we repeatedly exhorted you to do the right thing, you would not listen to us, even while knowing that the Pandavas were superior to you and yours, O Kauravya, in strength and courage.

CANTO 13

That king who can see his own faults and knows the signs and the distinctions of place and time, finds great prosperity. That king, however, who, though wisely counselled by well-wishers, does not accept what they say, good or bad, meets with great distress and is obliged to grieve because of the evil policy he pursues. Do you now live a different life, O Bhaarata. You did not keep your mind under restraint, but suffered yourself to be ruled by Duryodhana. That which has come upon you is the result of your own sins. Why then do you seek to kill Bhima?

Recollect your own crimes, and curb your anger now. Bhima has justly killed the wretch who, from hubris, had Panchali dragged roughly into the Kuru sabha; this revenge properly belonged to Bhima and he swore an oath that he would have revenge. Look clearly at your own evil deeds as also at those of your evil son. The sons of Pandu are perfectly innocent. Yet have they been treated most cruelly by you and by Suyodhana.'

Vaisampayana continued, "After he has been told the stark truth by Krishna, king Dhritarashtra replies to Devaki's son, 'Mahabaho, it is even as you say; everything you say is perfectly true. It was a father's excessive love that made me fall away from dharma. By good fortune, you protected that tiger among men, the mighty Bhima, and he did not come into my embrace when I was full of anger. But now, the fever of my wrath has passed. O Madhava, I am eager to embrace that hero, the second son of Pandu. When all the kings that went to war are dead, when my children are gone, my welfare and happiness depend upon the sons of Pandu.'

Saying this, the old king embraces those mighty princes, Bhima and Dhananjaya, and the two sons of Madri, and he weeps as he does this and comforts and blesses them."

Vaisampayana said, “Commanded by Dhritarashtra, those bulls of Kuru’s race, the Pandava brothers, accompanied by Krishna, now come to meet Gandhari. The faultless Gandhari, tormented by the death of her hundred sons, remembers that Yudhishtira had slain all his enemies, and wants to curse him. Understanding her evil intent towards the Pandavas, Vyasa addresses himself to the task of preventing the chaste queen of great powers from harming the Pandavas. Having cleansed himself with the sacred and fresh water of the Ganga, the Maharishi, who can go anywhere he pleases by merely willing it, comes quick as a thought to where Gandhari is, with darkness in her heart.

Appearing out of nowhere, seeing clearly into the queen’s heart, Vyasa mahatapasvin says to his daughter-in-law, ‘Do not curse the sons of Pandu! On the other hand, show them your forgiveness. You are strong and pure and you must not be angry with the blameless Pandavas. Set your heart on peace. Restrain the curse you are about to pronounce. Listen to my advice. Avid for victory, your son said to you every day of the eighteen days of the war, “O mother, bless me that I win this war!” Implored every day by Duryodhana, you would always say to him, “Victory lies where dharma is!”

O Gandhari, I do not remember anything that you ever said having ever been proven false. And neither were the words you said to Duryodhana false. You are always engaged in doing good to all men, why, to all creatures. Having successfully crossed the dreadful sea of the war on Kurukshetra, the Pandavas have surely won victory as well as increased their own dharma. Once you always observed the practice of forgiveness. Why would you not observe it now? Subdue the sin in your heart, O you who know all about dharma.

There is victory where dharma is. Remembering your own righteousness and the words you yourself spoke; restrain your anger, O Gandhari! Do not sin, O you that are beautiful in speech.'

Gandhari says, 'Holy one, I do not have any ill will towards the Pandavas, nor do I wish that they should die. However, out of grief for the death of my sons, my heart is agitated. I know that I should protect the Pandavas with as much care as Kunti herself does, and that Dhritarashtra should also do the same. The very race of Kshatriyas has perished through the sins of Duryodhana and of Sakuni, and through the deeds of Karna and Dusasana. In this matter, not the slightest blame can attach to Arjuna or to Pritha's son Vrikodara, or to Nakula or Sahadeva, or to Yudhishtira himself.

Swollen with arrogance and pride, the Kauravas have fallen in battle, along with many others who came to fight for them. But one thing that Bhima did, in your very presence, Krishna, roils me. Vrikodara challenged Duryodhana to a duel with maces and, discovering during the fight that my son was clearly his superior, Bhima struck him below the waist smashing his thighs and his manhood and only thus killing him. This is what stirs my anger. How can great Kshatriyas cast aside dharma for the sake of their lives, the dharma of even war laid down by the great Mahatamans of old?'" Vaisampayana said, “Bhima hears what Gandhari says and grows afraid. Nervously, he attempts to pacify her. ‘Whatever I did, whether dharma or adharma, I did through fear and to protect my life. It becomes you to forgive me, O my mother. Your mighty son could not be killed by anyone in a fair fight with maces. It was for this that I did what I was forced to. Duryodhana himself once vanquished Yudhishtira with treachery, at dice. He was always vindictive and deceitful towards us. This was why I killed him treacherously.

By then your son was the sole living maharatha on his side. If he had killed me during the mace fight, my brothers and I would have lost our kingdom yet again. That is why I killed him as I did. You know all that your son said to Panchali while she, in her period, wore just a single cloth. Without killing Suyodhana, we could never peacefully rule the whole world with her seas. It was for this that I did what I had to.

Your son inflicted many wrongs on us. In the midst of the Kuru sabha he bared his left thigh up to his very manhood and asked Draupadi to go and sit there. For that, he deserved death at our hands even then. However, at the command of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, we suffered ourselves to be restrained by the compact that had been made. But how could we ever forget or forgive what Duryodhana said and did on that day?

Great were our privations and sufferings in the forest. Remembering all this, I did what I had to, to kill Duryodhana. With his death, we have ended the enmity that simmered for so many years. Yudhishtira has his rightful kingdom back and we have been freed from hatred and anger that burned us for so long. But your son was invincible with the mace and there was no way that I or anyone could kill him in a duel with maces.'

Gandhari says, 'Since you praise my son so for his skill in battle, he did not deserve such a death. However, he did do all that you say. But Bhima, when Vrishasena had killed Nakula's horses, O Bhaarata, you drank my son Dusasana's blood on the field. What you did was cruel and unforgivable and suited to only the basest of men. It was an evil thing you did, O Vrikodara!'

Bhima replies, humbly, 'It is a sin to drink the blood of even a rank stranger, what then need be said about quaffing the blood of one's own self? For one's brother is, verily, one's self; there is no difference between the one and the other. However, the blood did not, O mother, pass down my lips and teeth. Karna knew this. Only my hands were smeared with Dusasana's blood. Seeing Nakula deprived of his horses by Vrishasena, I struck dread into the hearts of your rejoicing sons.

When Dusasana seized Draupadi's hair on the day of the game of dice, and hauled her into the Kuru sabha, I swore a hot oath in rage that I would drink Dusasana's blood one day in battle. If I did not at least appear to fulfil my oath, I would swerve from Kshatriya dharma. It was for this, O queen, that I set my lips to his blood after killing him, but the blood never passed down my throat. O Gandhari, do not impute that sin to me. When you did not restrain your own sons in the past, how can you now blame us, who are innocent?'

Gandhari says, 'Unvanquished by anyone, you have slain a hundred sons of this old man. Oh, why did you not spare, O child, even one son of this old couple deprived of kingdom, perhaps one whose offences were lighter? Why did you not leave even one crutch for this blind couple? O child, although you live unharmed, having killed all my children, yet no grief would have been mine if you had adopted the path of dharma while killing them.'

Still wrathful at the slaughter of all her sons and grandsons, now Gandhari asks after Yudhishtira, saying, 'Where is the king?'

Trembling and with folded hands, Yudhishtira approaches her and says softly, 'Here is Yudhishtira, O devi, the cruel slayer of your sons! I deserve your curses, for I am the cause of this great destruction. Oh, curse me! I no longer have any need for life, for kingdom, or for wealth. Having caused my friends and kin to be killed, I have proved myself to be a great fool and a hater of near and dear ones.'

To Yudhishtira who says this, and who is overcome with fear and stands in her presence, Gandhari, drawing long sighs, says nothing. Conversant with the laws of dharma, the Kuru queen, possessed of great foresight, directs her eyes, from within the folds of the cloth that cover them, to the tip of Yudhishtira's toe, even as the prince, with his body bent forwards, is about to fall at her feet. At this glance, the king, whose toenails had all been clear and fine, feels a sharp pain on this thumb toe and finds it has been burnt ashen! Seeing this, Arjuna quickly darts behind Krishna and the other sons of Pandu become pale and restive with fear. Then, having cast off her wrath, Gandhari comforts the Pandavas as a mother should.

With her leave, those heroes of broad chests then go together to present themselves before their own mother. Seeing her sons after a long time, Kunti, who had constantly been filled with anxiety on their account, covers her face with her cloth and begins to weep. Having cried for some time, with her sons, Pritha sees the wounds and scars of many weapons on their bodies. She then repeatedly embraces and strokes each of her sons, and full of sorrow, breaks into tears again, along with Draupadi who has lost all her sons and whom she sees lying on the bare earth, lamenting piteously.

Draupadi says, 'O venerable devi, where have all your grandsons, with Abhimanyu among them, gone? Seeing you in such distress, why do they not hurry to come before you? Ah, having lost my sons, what need have I of a kingdom?'

Raising up the grief-stricken princess of Panchala, Pritha begins to comfort that queen of the large eyes. Then Kunti, accompanied by the princess of Panchala and followed by her sons, comes toward the grief-stricken Gandhari. Seeing the illustrious Kunti with her daughter-in-law, Gandhari addresses her, saying, 'Do not, O daughter, grieve so. Look, I too am as stricken with grief as you. I feel certain this universal carnage has been brought about by the irresistible course of Time. Inevitable as it was, this horrible slaughter has not been caused by the voluntary agency of men. Even that has come to pass which Vidura of great wisdom foretold after Krishna's embassy for peace had failed. Do not, therefore, grieve over a thing that was inevitable, especially after its occurrence. Having fallen bravely in battle, they should not be grieved for. I am in the same plight as you. If you yield so to grief, who then will comfort us? Ah, through my negligence, this foremost of races has been destroyed.'"

STRI-VILAPA-PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Having said these words, Gandhari falls silent. She remains at a slight remove from the grisly field of war, but with her spiritual eye, sees clearly the carnage everywhere, and particularly the slaughter of the Kurus. Always devoted to her lord, that most blessed queen had always practised stern vratas. Undergoing the severest penances, she was always truthful in her speech. Through a boon granted her by Vyasa, she is possessed of spiritual knowledge and power. Piteous are the lamentations in which that great queen then indulges.

Endowed with vast intelligence, the Kuru queen sees, from a distance, but as if from near, that horrifying field of battle, full of wonderful and macabre sights. Scattered all over with bones and hair, and covered with streams of blood, Kurukshetra is strewn with thousands upon thousands of corpses on every side. Covered with the blood of elephants, horses, rathikas and other kinds of warriors, it teems with headless trunks and trunkless heads. And it resounds with the cries of elephants and horses and men and women; it abounds with jackals and cranes and ravens and kankas and crows. And it is the sporting ground of rakshasas that live on human flesh. It swarms with ospreys and vultures and resounds with the inauspicious howls of jackals and the cackling of hyena packs.

Then king Dhritarashtra, at the command of Vyasa, and all the sons of Pandu with Yudhishtira at their head, along with Krishna and all the royal Kuru women, comes onto that field of battle. The regal women see their slain brothers and sons and sires and husbands lying on the ground, and being devoured by beasts of prey and wolves and ravens and crows and pretas and pisachas and rakshasas and diverse other wanderers of the night. Seeing that horrific field and its dreadful sights past all dark imagination, Kurukshetra whose spectacle resembles the sights seen on the sporting ground of Rudra, the women give vent to piercing shrieks and quickly alight from their fine carriages and chariots.

Witnessing sights the like of which they had never before seen or could imagine, some of the Bharata ladies feel their limbs turn to water and fall to the ground. Others are so horrified that they faint. Indeed, the Panchala and the Kuru women are plunged into unutterable distress. Hearing the cries of those women pierce the sky all around, Gandhari speaks to Krishna of the lotus-eyes, foremost among all men.

Full of grief, she says, 'Look, O lotus-eyed Madhava, upon these daughters-in-law of mine! Deprived of their lords, their hair loose and wild, they utter cries of woe like a flight of she-ospreys. Seeing the corpses past all count, they dementedly call out to their great dead Bharata lords. They run from their husbands to their sons and then to their slain sires and brothers.

Ah, look Krishna, the field is covered with the mothers of heroes, all of whom have lost their sons. Look where the wives of dead heroes swarm, flinging themselves across the remains and bodies of their husbands and crying inconsolably. Look where the field of battle is adorned with those tigers among men, Bhishma and Karna and Abhimanyu and Drona and Drupada and Salya, as if with still smouldering fires.

Look where Kurukshetra is adorned with the golden coats of mail and with the priceless gemstones of the greatest warriors, and with their angadas, and keyuras and garlands. The field of death strewn with spears and spiked clubs hurled by heroic hands, and swords and diverse kinds of bows and numberless arrows.

And beasts of prey and carrion stand around, sporting, or lie down where they please, some having fed so they can eat no more and others still tearing meat from the bones of noble men. Yes, even such is ghastly Kurukshetra, and my heart and all my limbs burn to witness this spectacle with mystic sight. Krishna, I feel as if the five elements themselves, the panchamahabhutas of which all creation is made, have been destroyed in the destruction of the Panchalas and the Kurus.

Fierce vultures and other vicious birds, in thousands, drag blood-dyed corpses and, seizing them by their armour, devour them, tearing away chunks of flesh. Who could have imagined the deaths, all together, in a few days, of such heroes as Jayadratha, Karna, Drona, Bhishma and Abhimanyu? Alas, though they were invincible, yet they have been killed, Madhusudana, and vultures, kankas, ravens, kites, dogs and jackals feast upon them.

There, those tigers among men that fought on Duryodhana's side, who took the field in wrath, now lie unmoving like fires that have burned down. All of them are worthy of sleeping on soft and clean beds. But, alas, plunged into calamity, they sleep today on the bare ground, never to awaken again. Once gifted vabdhis and magadhis would sing their praises; now they listen to the cries of jackals. Illustrious heroes who once slept on costly beds with their limbs smeared with sandalwood paste and powdered aloe, alas, they now sleep in the dust. These vultures and wolves and ravens that rend their flesh have now become their ornaments. With ominous and fierce cries, the birds and beasts of carrion drag those magnificent bodies this way and that, fighting over them, ravens gobbling down their eyeballs.

These Kshatriyas, who always delighted in battle, wear smiles and grimaces on their handsome faces, while their hands still clutch keen shafts, tempered swords and bright maces, as if life has not yet left them. Countless magnificent Kshatriyas, of noble bodies and features, wearing golden garlands, lie on the coarse ground as if asleep. And then, the beasts of carrion, the scavengers, find them and tear them apart in moments, making off with grand limbs.

Other warriors, with massive arms, sleep with maces clasped to them, as if those are their beloved wives. Others, still cased in armour, continue to hold brilliant weapons in their hands. And these the jackals and hyenas avoid, Krishna, fearing that they are still alive, for so they seem. But others, whom the carnivores drag away and dismember have their golden garlands broken and the broken pieces glitter like drops of the sun on bloody ground.

Ah look, where thousands of savage wolves actually haul away the dead by thick and heavy golden necklaces. Many, whom bards well-trained to their work once used, with their hymns and eulogies of grave import, to delight every morning, are now surrounded by mourning women, stricken with grief and sobbing hysterically around them, O tiger of Vrishni's race! The faces of those beautiful women, O Kesava, though pale with shock and sorrow, look resplendent still, like an assemblage of red lotuses. The Kuru women have stopped weeping, with their companions. They are all filled with anxiety. Overwhelmed with sorrow, they run here and there, beside themselves. And yet, their faces, stained with tears and suffused with anger and fear, shine like the morning sun or gold or burnished copper.

Hearing one another's incoherent lamentations, wails of woe bursting forth from every side, the Kuru women cannot decipher what exactly they are crying out. Some of them, drawing long sighs and crying out shrilly and repeatedly, are so stricken that they give up their very lives. Many of them, seeing the corpses of their sons, husbands, or fathers, wail loudly and without let. Others strike their heads with their own soft hands.

Strewn over with severed heads and hands and other limbs, and often raked together into large piles, the earth is awesome with these signs of havoc and heroism. The women see headless trunks of great majesty, and so many heads cut from their necks that they swoon in large numbers and lie unmoving for a long time.

Uniting heads with trunks in despair, those women, mindless with grief, discover that they are mistaken in their pairings, cry out, "This head does not belong to this body!" and weep more bitterly still. Others, putting together arms and hands, thighs and feet, severed by arrows or swords, then fall senseless to look at the restored bodies.

Some amongst the Bharata women look at the bodies of their lords, bodies that have been mangled by animals and birds and their heads torn off, and do not recognise them. Others look at their brothers, sires, sons, and husbands slain by foes, strike themselves repeatedly, heads, breasts and arms, while their loud bewailing never pauses, O Krishna. Miry with flesh and blood, the earth in parts is impassable with arms still holding swords in their grasp, and with heads adorned with sparkling earrings. Looking at the field strewn with their brothers and fathers, and sons, those faultless women, who have never before suffered the least distress, are now plunged into chasmal dismay.

Look, O Janardana, at the bevies of Dhritarashtra's daughters-in-law, who look like herds of exquisite fillies adorned with excellent mane. What,

O Kesava, can be a sadder spectacle for me than this one presented by these lovely women who have assumed such a pitiable aspect?

Without doubt, I must have committed great sins in my past lives, since I am now looking at my sons and grandsons and brothers all slaughtered by their enemies. Even as she laments thus to Krishna, her subtle gaze wanders farther afield, beyond Kurukshetra, and alights upon her son Duryodhana."

CANTO 17

Vaisampayana said, "Seeing Duryodhana lying dead and covered in blood, Gandhari suddenly falls to the ground in a dead faint, like an uprooted plantain tree. She soon regains her senses and begins to weep, repeatedly wailing aloud. Going to him, that queen takes him in her arms and laments loudly and piteously.

Stricken with grief, and agitated, the Kuru queen exclaims, 'Alas, O my son! Alas, O son!'

Burning with sorrow, she drenches her son's broken corpse with her hot tears. Duryodhana lies unmoving, his massive chest and great shoulders now still forever, adorned still with bloodied garlands.'

Still addressing Krishna who stands beside her, Gandhari continues, 'O puissant one who have exterminated this race, O you of Vrishni's vamsa, this foremost of kings, my son, said to me, "O mother, wish me victory in this war!" Tiger among men, I knew that a great calamity was upon us and replied to him, "Where dharma is, there victory shall be. And since, my son, your heart is set on war, you will attain to those blessed realms that Kshatriyas find and sport there like a god."

These were the words that I then said to him. I did not then grieve for my son. However, I grieve for the helpless Dhritarashtra bereaved of all his friends and kinsmen. Look, O Madhava, where my son, that greatest of warriors, wrathful, skilled in weapons, and irresistible in battle, sleeps in the dust on the bed of Kshatriyas. Look at the reverses brought about by Time.

This scorcher of his foes who once walked at the head of all the crowned kings of the world now sleeps in the dust. Beyond doubt, my heroic Duryodhana, when he sleeps on that bed which is the hero's, has attained the most unattainable end. Inauspicious jackals now delight that prince asleep on the Kshatriya hero's bed, Suyodhana who was once delighted by the most beautiful women sitting around him. He who was once encircled by kings vying with one another to please him, alas, he, slain and lying on the ground, is now encircled by vultures. He who was formerly fanned with beautiful chamaras by exquisite women is now fanned by birds of carrion with their wings. Ah, how he sleeps on the bare ground, this mighty-armed prince, slain by Bhimasena in battle, like an elephant killed by a lion.

Look at my Duryodhana, O Krishna, lying on the naked earth, covered with blood, killed by Bhimasena with his mace. This mahabaho who gathered eleven akshauhinis of troops, O Kesava, has, through his own evil policy, now been killed. Alas, there that great bowman and mighty warrior sleeps, struck down by Bhimasena, like a tiger slain by a lion.

Having disregarded Vidura, as also his own father, this reckless, foolish and evil prince has succumbed to death because he ignored his elders. He who had ruled the earth without a rival for thirteen years, alas, that prince, that son of mine, sleeps today on the bare ground, felled by his enemies. Not long ago, O Krishna, I saw the earth, full of elephants and kine and horses, and ruled by my Duryodhana. Today, O you of mighty arms, I see her ruled by another, and destitute of elephants and kine and horses. What need have I, O Krishna, of my life?

Look again upon this sight that is more painful than the death of my son —the sight of these beautiful royal women weeping beside their slain heroes. Look, O Krishna, at the mother of Lakshmana, that princess of large hips, with her tresses loose, that beloved wife of Duryodhana, she who looks yet like a golden vedi. How she of unmatched beauty and intelligence once made love in the mighty embrace of her lord. Oh, why does my heart not break into a hundred pieces at the sight of my son and grandson slain in battle?

Ah, my son's wife now sniffs the head of her heroic son covered in blood. And now, she moves back to her lord and so sadly and tenderly strokes his magnificent form with her fair hand. And thus, she moves from one to the other, heartbroken by the deaths of both. Now she casts her teary gaze on one, and then the other. Look, O Madhava, striking her head with her hands, she falls upon the breast of her heroic lord, the king of the Kurus. Her complexion is like that of the filaments of the lotus, and even in her bitter grief, she is still lovely as a lotus. The unfortunate princess now strokes the face of her son and now that of her lord. If the shastras and the srutis be true, this slain king has attained those realms of blessedness that one wins only through the use of weapons!'"

"Gandhari says, 'Behold, O Madhava, all my hundred sons, who never tired in battle, have been killed by Bhima with his mace in battle. Yet, what grieves me more today is that these, my daughters-in-law, of tender years, deprived of their husbands and their sons and with their hair unkempt and loose, wander this deathly field of war today like women that have lost their very minds. They who once walked only on the terraces of godly mansions with their feet adorned with many ornaments, now, in great affliction of heart, tread this hard earth, mired with blood and flesh, with those same tender feet. Reeling in sorrow, they roam here and there like drunken women, driving away vultures and jackals and crows by waving their slender arms and screaming shrilly.

Ah, look, where that royal one of faultless limbs looks at this scene of carnage and falls down as if felled with an axe of grief. When I look at Duryodhana's wife, my dead grandson Lakshmana's mother, I feel as if someone tears my heart within my chest into shreds with cruel, burning nails. These beautiful regal women, some dark and some fair, their limbs and arms so slender and their forms so womanly—some see their brothers, some their husbands, and some their sons, lying on the rude earth drenched in blood—themselves fall down, seizing the arms of their precious and beloved dead.

Listen, O unvanquished one, to the ringing wails of the elderly women and those of middle age at the gruesome sight of the field of war. Look where they support themselves weakly against broken chariots and the bodies of dead elephants and horses. Look, O Krishna, where one of them has picked up the severed head of a kinsman, and holds it in her hands with tears streaming down her face. I believe, O sinless one, that both they and I of little understanding must have committed great sins in our past lives, since, O Janardana, all our men have been slain by Yudhishtira Dharmaraja.

Whatever we do, good and bad, always bears fruit! Behold, O Madhava, the young women of beautiful breasts and bellies, well-born, modest, with long, black eye-lashes and tresses as dark on their heads, blessed with sweet voices, graceful as swans, now deranged by grief, swoon and fall uttering cries shrill as flights of cranes. Look, O lotus-eyed hero, their lovely faces like full-blown lotuses, are scorched by the sun. Alas, O Vasudeva, the wives of my proud sons who were as strong as great elephants in musth, are now exposed to the gaze of the common people.

Look, O Govinda, at the shields decked with a hundred moons, the standards of solar effulgence, the golden coats of mail, the collars and cuirasses made of gold and the helmets of my sons, scattered on the earth, are still as splendid as sacrificial fires over which libations of ghrita have been poured. There Dusasana sleeps, felled by Bhima, and the blood of all his limbs quaffed by that parantapa. Look at that other son of mine, O Madhava, slain by Bhima with his mace, impelled by Draupadi and the recollection of his pain at the time of the game of dice. Addressing the dice-won princess of Panchala in the midst of the Kuru sabha, Dusasana, wanting to please his elder brother as also Karna, said to Draupadi, "You are now the wife of a slave! Panchali, enter our harem now, with Sahadeva, Nakula and Arjuna!"

At that time, O Krishna, I said to Duryodhana, "O my son, rid yourself of the envious, deceitful and wrathful Sakuni. Know that your uncle, my brother, is entirely evil and addicted to violence. Send him away from you at once and make peace with the Pandavas. O you of little intelligence, do you not think of Bhimasena filled with anger? You pierce him with vicious words even like an elephant being burned with brands of fire."

But he ignored me and continued to spew his wordy venom at them, like a snake spitting its poison at a great bull. That Dusasana now sleeps on bare ground, his massive arms outstretched, slain by Bhimasena like an elephant brought down by a lion. Ah, what a horrible thing Bhima did when he drank my son’s blood on Kurukshetra.’ ”

"Gandhari says, 'There, O Madhava, my son Vikarna, always lauded by the wise, lies on bare ground, slain by Bhima and mangled horribly. Lifeless he lies, Krishna, among dead elephants like the moon in the autumn sky surrounded by blue clouds. Vultures feed with difficulty on his broad palm, cased in its leathern glove, and scarred by constant wielding of the bow. His helpless young wife tries ceaselessly to drive the vile birds away, but to no avail. The youthful, brave and handsome Vikarna, O bull among men, raised in luxury and deserving of every kind of weal, now sleeps in the dust, O Madhava! Though all his vital parts have been pierced with clothyard shafts and bearded arrows and nalikas, yet the magnificence and beauty of his form has not deserted him.

There, my son Durmukha, that slayer of large bands of foes, sleeps, with his face towards the enemy, slain by the inexorable Bhimasena keeping his vow that he would singly kill all my hundred sons. Ah, look where jackals have eaten away my son Durmukha's face, O Krishna; what they have left so far looks even more splendid like the moon of the seventh day of the bright fortnight. Krishna, Krishna, how could they bear to kill that son of mine of incomparable beauty and make him lie in the dust? O compassionate one, how could they kill Durmukha, before whom no foe could stand?

O Lord of all, cast your eyes again upon that other son of Dhritarashtra—Chitrasena, also brutally slain and lying on the ground, that hero who was the model of all bowmen?

Look at all the young women who sit, side by side with the ravening vultures and jackals, around his majestic form adorned with blood-stained wreaths and garlands. Their loud wailing mingling with the yowls and growls of the jackals and the cackling of hyenas is piteous but, ah, also strangely wonderful, and I know not why!

Youthful and handsome, and always waited upon and served by the most beautiful women, my son Vivimsati sleeps there, stained with dust. His armour has been pierced with many arrows. Slain by Bhima in the midst of the general carnage, my heroic Vivimsati is now surrounded and waited upon by vultures. Having penetrated the ranks of the Pandava army, that Kshatriya now lies on the bed of a hero, on the bed of an exalted Kshatriya.

Look, O Krishna, at his startlingly handsome face, a smile still playing on it, with its hooked fine nose and arched thick eyebrows, and resembling the luminous moon himself. Yes, in days gone by, large numbers of the most beautiful women used to wait upon him, like thousands of apsaras upon a gandharva at his sport.

Who, again, could endure my son Duhsaha, that parantapa, that hero, that ornament of sabhas, that irresistible warrior, that resister of all enemies?

Covered with arrows and the blood they have drawn, Duhsaha's body looks resplendent, like a mountain overgrown with flowering karnikaras. With his garland of gold and his bright armour, Duhsaha, though dead, is lustrous yet, like a white mountain of fire!'"

"Gandhari says, 'He whose strength and courage were regarded, O Kesava, as one and half times superior to those of his sire and you, he who resembled a fierce and proud lion, he who, without a follower, alone pierced the impenetrable array of my son, he who proved to be the death of many, alas, he now sleeps there, having succumbed to death. I see, O Krishna, the splendour of that son of Arjuna, of that hero of immeasurable tejas, Abhimanyu, has not been dimmed even in death. There, the daughter of Virata, the daughter-in-law of the wielder of the Gandiva, that girl of flawless beauty weeps pitiably at the sight of her young dead husband. That young Uttaraa approaching her slain lord, and tenderly strokes his broken body, his noble face.

Once, drunk with honeyed wines, this most intelligent and exquisite girl would shyly, passionately embrace her youthful husband, and kiss the face of Subhadra's son, that face like a full-blown lotus, the head supported on a neck adorned with three lines like those of a conch-shell. Taking hold of her lord's golden coat of mail, that young woman now gazes through eyes that stream tears at the blood-dyed body of her dead husband.

Looking at Abhimanyu, Uttaraa says to you, O Krishna, "O lotus-eyed one, this hero whose eyes so resembled yours, has been killed. In might and energy, and prowess also, he was your equal, O sinless one. He resembled you in beauty. Yet he sleeps on the ground, slain by the enemy."

Addressing her own lord, the princess says again, “You were raised in every luxury. You used to sleep on soft skins of the ranku deer. Ah, does your body not feel pain today lying thus on bare ground? Your massive arms like elephant’s trunks, adorned with golden angadas, outstretched, your arms covered with skin hardened by the frequent drawing of the bowstring, you sleep, O lord, in peace, as if exhausted with the toil of too much exertion in the training halls. Alas, why do you not speak to me that am weeping before you? I do not remember ever having offended you. Why then do you not speak to me? Once you would call lovingly to me even when you saw me at a distance.

Beloved Abhimanyu, where will you go now, leaving behind you the revered Subhadra, these your sires that resemble the very gods, and my wretched self, all wracked with grief?”

Look, O Krishna, gathering the blood-dyed locks of her lord with her petal soft hands and placing his head on her lap, the beautiful Uttaraa speaks to him as if he were alive. She says, “How could those great maharathas kill you in the midst of battle, you that are Krishna’s sister’s son, and the son of the Gandivi? Oh, fie on those warriors of evil deeds, Kripa and Karna and Jayadratha and Drona and Drona’s son, who vilely banded together and took your life. What was the state of mind of those unrivalled maharathas, when they surrounded you like a tiger on a hunt, O my love of such tender years, and slaughtered you to my break my heart?

How could you, O Kshatriya, who had so many protectors, be killed so helplessly in the very sight of the Pandavas and the Panchalas? Looking at you, O hero, cut down in battle by many vile men fighting together, how is that tiger among men, that son of Pandu, your father, able to bear the burden of life? Neither the acquisition of a vast kingdom nor the defeat of their enemies can make the Parthas bereft of you, O my lotus-eyed one, joyful.

As for me, through virtue and self-restraint, I will very soon join you in those realms of bliss which you have acquired through the use of weapons. Protect me, O Kshatriya, when I arrive in those realms. One cannot die until one’s hour comes, since, wretched that I am, I still draw breath after seeing you slain in battle. Having gone away to the world of the Pitris, who else, like me, do you now speak to, O tiger among men, in sweet words mingled with smiles? I have no doubt that you will agitate the hearts of the apsaras in heaven, with your great beauty and your soft words and wondrous smiles.

Having attained the worlds kept for men of righteous deeds, you are now united, O son of Subhadra, with the apsaras. While sporting with them, at least at times think of my loving deeds towards you. It seems that your union with me in this world was ordained for only six fleeting months, for in the seventh, O Abhimanyu, you lost your very life."

O Krishna, even as Uttaraa laments in this manner the ladies of the royal house of Matsya lead away the stricken princess, deprived of all her purposes. Pulling away the afflicted Uttaraa, themselves even more afflicted than that girl, those women weep and utter loud wails at the sight of the slain Virata. Mangled with the weapons of Drona, prostrate on the ground, and covered with blood, Virata is surrounded by screeching vultures and howling jackals and crowing ravens. Those black-eyed women approach the prostrate form of the Matsya king, over which carnivores, beasts and birds, utter cries of joy, and attempt to turn the body, what is left of that great king, over. Weak with grief, they cannot do so. Scorched by the sun, and worn with exertion and toil, their faces have become pale. Look also, O Madhava, at those other young boys besides Abhimanyu—Uttara Kumara, Sudakshina prince of the Kambojas, and the handsome Lakshmana—all lying dead on the field of war.'"

"Gandhari says, 'Look now where the mighty Karna, that greatest of all bowmen, lies on the ground. In battle he was like a blazing fire. However, the fire that was Karna was consumed by the Arjuna fire. Look where Vikartana's son Karna, after having slain so many atirathas, has himself been laid low on the field, and lies drenched in blood. Choleric, sensitive and a mahatejasvin, he was twice as mighty as any other atiratha. Slain by the wielder of the Gandiva, that incomparable hero now sleeps on the ground, even like another sun.

From fear of the Pandavas, my maharatha sons set great, great Karna at their head while going into battle, like a herd of elephants do their leader, the greatest tusker among them. Alas, like a tiger slain by a lion, or an elephant by another infuriated elephant, that awesome warrior was killed by Savyasachi. Gathered together, Karna's wives, their hair loose and their faces covered with the dust of Kurukshetra, sit wailing and beating their breasts around that noblest of men, that fallen hero.

Thoughts of Karna would haunt Yudhishtira for thirteen years, filling him with dreadful anxiety and robbing him of sleep. Karna was the warrior that the Dharmaraja feared most because he knew that Karna was the one warrior my sons had who could indeed have killed Arjuna. Invincible against all enemies, like Maghavat himself in battle, Karna was like the Badava fire of the pralaya itself, and immovable as Himavat.

That hero became the protector of Dhritarashtra’s son, O Madhava! Alas, deprived of life, he also now lies on the bare ground, like a tree felled by the wind. Look where Karna’s wife, his son Vrishasena’s mother, flings herself again and again on the ground, crying out his name. Listen, she exclaims, “Your guru Bhargava’s curse has surely pursued you, O my lord. And when your chariot wheel was sunk into the ground, the vicious Arjuna cut your magnificent head from your body with his astra. Ah even the greatest skill and might are nothing against what fate wills, for surely otherwise no one could have killed you.”

That woman, the mother of Sushena, cries out piercingly and falls finally in a dead faint for she cannot bear to look at the great Karna prostrate on the ground, his waist still encircled by a wide golden belt. Oh, how grievous it is to look at how scavenging beasts and birds of carrion have reduced that grand and lustrous body into small pieces with fang and claw.

The sight is not gladdening, Krishna, like that of the moon on the fourteenth night of the dark fortnight. Falling onto the earth, the hapless woman recovers her senses, rises again, and yet again falls down in a swoon. Grief has its way with her not only on account of her lord having been slain but also on account of the death of her son. Ah, look how she comes and lovingly sniffs Karna’s dead face even like an animal of the wild might do with her mate whom she finds killed by some predator!’”

"Gandhari says, 'Slain by Bhimasena, look where the lord of Avanti lies, with vultures, jackals and crows feeding on that hero. Though he once had many friends, he now lies now perfectly friendless and alone. Look, Madhusudana, he lies on a Kshtariya's bed after having killed numberless enemies; he lies covered in blood. Jackals, kankas and other carnivores drag him here and there competing for mouthfulls of his flesh. Ah, behold the reversals brought about by Time. Gathered together, his wives also sit around him and wail aloud in grief.

Look at Pratipa's son Balhika, that mighty bowman possessed of great ojas, slain with a broad-headed shaft and lying on the ground like a sleeping tiger. Though dead, his face is still lustrous as a full moon risen on the fifteenth day of the bright fortnight. And there, burning with grief on account of the death of his son, and wanting to keep the vow he swore, Indra's son Arjuna slew the son of Vriddhakshatra. Look upon that Jayadratha who, though protected by the illustrious Drona, was killed by Partha, after Arjuna stormed through eleven akshauhinis of troops. Inauspicious vultures, O Janardana, now feed upon Jayadratha, the lord of the Sindhu-Sauviras, once so full of pride and vigour.

Though his devoted wives seek to protect his corpse, look, Krishna, the carnivores drag his body away into the nearby woods. The Kamboja and Yavana wives of that mighty-armed lord of the Sindhus and the Sauviras wait upon him to protect him from the feral scavengers.

When, O Janardana, Jayadratha, along with the Kekayas, attempted to ravish Draupadi, he deserved to be slain by the Pandavas. However, out of regard for my daughter Dussala, they set him free. Why, Krishna, did they not show some pity once more for Dussala? That daughter of mine, of tender years, is now crying in dreadful grief. She strikes her body with her own hands and curses the Pandavas. What, O Krishna, can be a greater sorrow to me than that my daughter of tender years should be a widow and all my daughters-in-law should become husbandless?

Ah, look where Dussala, having cast off her grief and fears, runs here and there, dementedly, in search of the head of her husband. He who held up all the Pandavas, save Arjuna, when they wanted to rescue Abhimanyu trapped inside the Chakravyuha, himself succumbed to death. His wives, with faces as beautiful as the moon, now sob, sitting around that irresistible hero who was like an infuriated elephant in battle.'"

"Gandhari says, 'And there lies Salya, the maternal uncle of Nakula, slain in battle, O lord, by the pious and virtuous Yudhishtira. Everywhere, Salya would boast that he was your equal. Now, that maharatha, king of the Madras, lies dead. When he agreed to be Karna's sarathy, he did his best, as I have heard, to dampen Karna's confidence and sap his vitality to give the Pandavas victory. Alas, behold the smooth face of Salya, lambent as the moon and adorned with eyes like the petals of the lotus, eaten away by crows. There, the tongue of that king, of the complexion of molten gold, has been plucked out of his mouth and is being devoured by birds of carrion.

The women of the royal house of Madra, sobbing and wailing aloud, sit around the body of that king, that ornament of sabhas, now slain by Yudhishtira. Krishna, those women sit around Salya like she-elephants in their season around their great tusker sunk in a swamp. Look at the brave Salya, that giver of protection, foremost of warriors, stretched out on the final bed of Kshatriyas, his body mangled with shafts.

And there, king Bhagadatta of great prowess, the ruler of a mountain kingdom, the foremost of all wielders of the ankusha, the elephant-hook, lies on the ground, his life leaked out of his massive frame. Look at the garland of gold that he still wears on his head, which is still so splendent. Though his body is being eaten away by beasts of prey, that garland still adorns the glossy locks on his head. Fierce was the battle that took place between this king and Partha, even like that between Sakra and the Asura Vritra. This mighty-armed one, having fought Dhananjaya, son of Pritha, and having reduced him to dire straits, was at last slain by his antagonist.

And there, he who had no equal on earth in heroism and prowess, that achiever of dread and incomparable feats in battle, the incomparable Bhishma, lies. Behold the son of Santanu, O Krishna, that warrior of solar refulgence, stretched on the earth, like the Sun himself fallen from the firmament at the end of the yuga. Having scorched his foes with the fire of his weapons in battle, that valiant warrior, that sun among men, O Kesava, has set like the real sun at dusk. Behold that hero, O Krishna, who in his knowledge of dharma was equal to Devapi himself, now lying on a bed of arrows, ah, so perfectly worthy of Kshatriyas. Having spread his exceptional bed of barbed and unbarbed arrows, that aged hero lies on it like the divine Skanda in his clump of heath. Indeed, the son of Ganga lies, resting his head on that excellent pillow of three arrows given him by the wielder of the Gandiva.

To obey the command of his sire Santanu, this illustrious one drew his vital seed up into his body and kept immaculate brahmacharya. Unrivalled in battle, that son of Santanu now lies there, O Madhava. Of righteous soul and a knower of every dharma through his knowledge of both this world and the next, Bhishma, though mortal, still bears his life in his broken body and breathes like an immortal god upon the earth. When Santanu's son lies on his bed of arrows today, it seems that no other man remains alive on earth that owns learning and prowess competent to achieve great feats in battle. Truthful in speech, this virtuous hero, solicited by the Pandavas, told them the means by which they could achieve his death. Alas, he who revived the line of Kuru that had become extinct, that illustrious one possessed of great intelligence, has left the world with all the Kurus in his company. Of whom, O Madhava, will the Kurus ask of dharma and karma after that bull among men, Devavrata, who is like a god, will have left us for swarga?

And behold Drona, that foremost of Brahmanas, that Acharya of Arjuna, of Satyaki, and of the Kurus, lying dead on the ground. Endued with unearthly tejas, Drona was as conversant with the four kinds of astras as the king of the Devas or Shukra of Bhrigu's race. Through his grace, Bibhatsu the son of Pandu has achieved the most impossible feats. Deprived of life, that Brahmana now lies on the ground. Finally, the astras refused to come at his bidding. Setting him at their head, the Kauravas challenged the Pandavas; at last, that greatest of bowmen was mangled by weapons. As he careered in battle, scorching his foes in every direction, his course resembled that of a blazing conflagration. Alas, deprived of life, he now lies on the ground like an extinguished fire.

The handle of the bow is yet in his grasp. The leathern fences, O Madhava, still encase his fingers. Though slain, he still looks as if he is alive. The four Vedas, and all the different kinds of weapons, O Krishna, did not abandon that hero even as these never leave the Lord Prajapati himself. His auspicious feet, deserving of every adoration and adored indeed by bards and eulogists and worshipped by disciples, are now gnawed away and taken by jackals. Senseless with grief, Kripi woefully attends on Drona who has been slain by Drupada's son.

Look at that stricken Brahmana woman fallen upon the earth, with her hair in disarray, her face downcast and weeping softly. Alas, she attends in inexpressible sorrow upon her lifeless lord. Many brahmacharis, with matted jata on their heads, also attend on the body of Drona that is still cased in armour rent through with the virile shafts of Dhrishtadyumna. The illustrious and delicate Kripi, forlorn and cheerless, attempts weakly to perform the last rites on the body of her great husband slain in battle.

Now look where the Samavedis have set Drona's sacred body on a strange pyre, and set it alight with all due rites, and are singing the three great Samans. Those brahmacharis, with matted locks on their heads, have piled the funeral pyre of that incomparable Brahmana with bows and arrows and chariot-boxes, O Madhava! That Mahatejasvin Acharya is consumed by the very fuel of war. And all those brahmacharis at once chant the Samans and weep. Having consumed Drona on that fire, like a fire within a fire, those twice-born disciples of his now go toward the banks of the Ganga, walking along the left side of the pyre and having placed Kripi at their head.'"

"Gandhari says, 'Behold the son of Somadatta, who was killed by Yuyudhana, being pecked at and torn apart by a swarm of predatory birds. Burning with grief at the death of his son, Somadatta, as he lies on the field himself seems to censure the great bowman Satyaki.

There, the mother of Bhurisrava, that faultless woman, overcome with grief, addresses her dead lord Somadatta, "It is your good fortune, O king, that you do not see this terrible carnage of the Bharatas, this extermination of the Kurus, this sight that resembles the scenes that come to pass at the end of the yuga. Through good fortune, you do not see your heroic son, who bore the device of the sacrificial stake on his banner and who performed numerous sacrifices with profuse gifts to all, lying slain on the field of battle. By good fortune, you do not hear the wails of woe uttered by your daughters-in-law, like the screams of a flight of cranes on the bosom of the sea. Bereaved of both husbands and sons, those young women run here and there, in madness, each clad in a single piece of raiment and each with her black tresses all dishevelled. By good fortune, you do not see your son, that tiger among men, without one of his arms, overthrown by Arjuna, and now being devoured by beasts of prey. By good fortune, you do not see today your son slain in battle, and Bhurisrava deprived of life, and your widowed daughters-in-law plunged into grief. Indeed, it is your good fortune that you do not see the golden chattra of that illustrious warrior who had the sacrificial stake for the device on his banner, torn and broken on the terrace of his chariot. Ah, the black-eyed wives of Bhurisrava indulge in piteous lamentations, surrounding their lord slain by the ruthless Satyaki. Afflicted with grief on account of the slaughter of their lords, those women, weeping copiously, fall on the earth with their faces towards the ground, and now slowly approach you, O Krishna!

'Alas, why did Arjuna of pure deeds commit such a sin, for he struck off the arm of a great, great warrior, who was brave and devoted to the performance of sacrifices, when Bhurisrava was not watching him? And Satyaki committed an even worse sin, for he took the life of a man of restrained soul while our lord had laid down his weapons and sat in prayavrata. Alas, O righteous one, you lie on the ground, slain unfairly by two enemies."

Even thus, O Madhava, do those wives of Bhurisrava cry out to you in their grief. And look, those wives of that tameless warrior, all of slender waists, now take that lopped off arm of their husband onto their laps and sob without restraint.

"Here is that arm which used to invade the girdles, fondle the deep bosoms, and touch the navel, the thighs, and the hips, of fair women, and loosen the ties of the undergarments they wore! Here is that arm which slew foes and dispelled the fears of friends, which gave thousands of kine and exterminated Kshatriyas in battle. In the presence of Vasudeva himself, Arjuna of unstained deeds hacked it off while you fought Satyaki and had that Vrishni at your mercy. What, indeed, will you, O Janardana, say of this great feat of Arjuna while speaking of it in the midst of royal sabhas? What will the diadem-decked Arjuna himself say of it?'"

Censuring you in this way, that most gracious woman has finally fallen silent. Bhurisrava's other wives lament with her as if she were their daughter-in-law.

And there lies the mighty Sakuni, the lord of the Gandharas, slain by Sahadeva. Once, he would be fanned by golden handled chamara whisks, and now birds of carrion fan him with their wings. He was a mayavi, a master sorcerer who could assume a hundred different forms at will; all his maya has been burnt up by the son of Pandu. An expert dice-player, and an expert cheat at the game, it was he who vanquished the naïve Yudhishtira in the Kuru sabha and won his vast kingdom for Duryodhana using his formidable guile. However, now, Pandu's son has won Sakuni's life-breaths.

Look, Krishna, at the swarming numbers of vultures, kites and crows that crowd around my dead brother's corpse.

That expert dice player acquired his expertise, it would seem, for the destruction of my sons; he was the one who kindled the fire of enmity between my sons and the sons of Pandu. He was indeed the key enducer to the slaughter of all these millions of Kshatriyas. And he, too, that evil one, has attained many realms of bliss through the valour he showed on the field of war, and he too died a Kshatriya's death. Madhusudana, knowing my brother, my fear is that he will succeed in fomenting dissensions even in those worlds of felicity, between my children, all of whom are confiding and all too trusting and candid!'"

"Gandhari says, 'Behold that irresistible ruler of the Kambojas, that bull-necked hero, lying in the dust, O Madhava, though he deserves to be stretched out at his ease on the finest Kamboja blankets. His stricken wife weeps bitterly at the sight of his blood-stained arms, which were once smeared with sandalwood paste. That beautiful woman says, "Even now, adorned with beautiful palms and graceful fingers, these two arms of yours resemble spiked maces, coming within whose clasp, joy never left me for a moment. What will be my end now, O ruler of men, when I am deprived of you?"

Blessed with a melodious voice, the Kamboja queen weeps helplessly and her fine frame quivers with emotion. Look, Krishna, at that bevy of royal women there. Although tired and worn out with the heat, yet beauty does not leave their forms; they are like the unfading garlands the Devas wear that the sun cannot scorch or fade. Behold, O Madhusudana, the heroic ruler of the Kalingas lying the ground with his mighty arms adorned with golden angadas. Behold, O Janardana, those Magadha ladies sobbing helplessly as they stand around Jayatsena, the king of the Magadhas. The yet charming and melodious wails of those long-eyed and sweet-voiced girls, O Krishna, pierce my heart with grief. With all their ornaments put away, and wailing loudly in sorrow, alas, those Magadhan queens who should be lying in sweet languor on costly beds, now lie tearing their hair on bare ground.

And there, those other women, surrounding their lord, the ruler of the Kosalas, prince Brihadbala, also beat their breasts and lament around the body of their lord. Look where they draw out the terrible arrows with which the mighty Abhimanyu pierced their husband and king; look where, one after the other, they fall onto the ground fainting in grief. The faces of those exquisite women, Krishna, look like faded lotuses.

There, the brave sons of Dhrishtadyumna, of tender years and all adorned with garlands of gold and beautiful angadas, lie, slain by Drona. Like insects on a blazing fire, they have all been incinerated by falling upon Drona, whose chariot was the chamber of fire, having the bow for its flame and shafts and spears and maces for its fuel. Similarly, the five Kekaya brothers, of great courage, and also adorned with beautiful angadas, are lying on the ground, cut down by Drona and with their faces turned towards that hero. Their coats of mail, of the splendour of molten gold, and their tall standards and chariots and garlands, all made of the same metal, shed a bright light on the earth like so many fires.

Look, O Madhava, at king Drupada overthrown in battle by Drona, like a mighty elephant in the forest slain by a great lion. The bright sovereign parasol, white in hue of the king of the Panchalas, shines, O lotus-eyed one, like the moon in the autumn sky. The daughters-in-law and the wives of the old king, afflicted with grief, having burnt his body on a pyre, walk slowly along, keeping the pyre to their right.

And there more women, mindless with sorrow, take away the brave and great Dhrishtaketu, that bull among the Chedis, slain by Drona. This scourge of his enemies, O slayer of Madhu, this great bowman, having baffled many weapons of Drona before the Acharya killed him, now lies there, like a tree uprooted by a mountain wind. Alas, that valiant king of the Chedis, that maharatha Dhrishtaketu, after having slain thousands of foes, lies himself slain. Hrishikesha, the wives of the lord of the Chedis sit around his body, still glowing with black locks and ornate earrings, though torn apart by vultures and ravens. Those best among women set the remains of the prostrate form of the heroic Dhrishtaketu, born of the Dasharha race, on their laps, and sob.

And nearby, look, O Krishna, at Dhrishtaketu's beautiful son, also cut down ruthlessly by Drona with his astras. He never deserted his father while they battled their enemies together. Mark, O Krishna, not even in death does he abandon his heroic sire. And even thus, my son's son, that slayer of hostile heroes, the mighty-armed Lakshmana, has followed his father Duryodhana out of this world.

Behold, O Kesava, the two brothers of Avanti, Vinda and Anuvinda, lying there on the field, like two blossoming sala trees in the spring uprooted by a tempest. Clad in golden armour and adorned with angadas of gold, they are still armed with swords and bows. Their eyes like those of a bull, and decked with bright garlands, both of them are stretched out lifeless on the field. The Pandavas, O Krishna, and you, are surely invincible, for they and you have escaped from Drona, from Bhishma, from Karna son of Vikartana, from Kripa, from Duryodhana, from the son of Drona, from the maharatha, from Somadatta, from Vikarna, and from the bold Kritavarman.

Ah, look at the reversals brought about by Time! Those bulls among men who could slay the very celestials have themselves been slain. Without doubt, there is nothing too difficult for destiny to bring about, since even these men, these heroes, have been slain by Kshatriya warriors.

Even when you returned before the war to Upaplavya, having failed in your mission to make peace, I knew that my sons all endowed with great prowess were already dead. Santanu's son and the wise Vidura told me then, "Cease to harbour love for your sons!"

What those wise ones then said has not proved vain, for very soon my sons have all been killed and consumed into ashes!'

Vaisampayana continued, "Having said all this, Gandhari is suddenly overwhelmed by sorrow and falls senseless to the ground. Then, rising slowly, and filled once more with the wild wrath of a grief-stricken mother and woman, her heart in turmoil, Gandhari now blames Krishna for everything, for the entire carnage on Kurukshetra.

Gandhari says, 'The Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras, O Krishna, have both been massacred. Whilst they were being exterminated, O Janardana, why were you indifferent to them? You could have prevented the carnage, for nothing is beyond you and your Yadavas. You had the eloquence, and you had the power to effect peace between the warring cousins. Since, Madhusudana, you were deliberately indifferent to this universal slaughter, Mahabaho, you must pay for what you did. By the little punya that I have acquired through waiting dutifully on my husband, by that merit so difficult to attain, I will curse you, O you who wield the discus and the mace.

Since you were indifferent to the fate of the Kurus and the Pandavas, whilst they slew each other, O Govinda, you shall be the slayer of your own kinsmen! In the thirty-sixth year from this one, O Krishna, after causing the slaughter of all your own kinsmen and friends and sons, you will perish in a base and dishonourable manner in the wilderness. The women of your race, deprived of their sons, kinsmen, and friends, shall weep and lament even as these women of the Bharata vamsa do today!'

Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing this curse, with a faint smile the Mahatman Krishna says to the venerable Gandhari, 'There is none in the world, save myself, who can possibly exterminate the Vrishnis, for they bear my blood in them and will overrun the earth if they are left alive. I know this well, and indeed I myself will happily make an end to them when the time comes. By cursing me, O Gandhari, you have helped my very cause, O you of the most exalted vratas. Not the Devas, the Danavas or men can kill the haughty Vrishnis. And therefore, the Yadavas must fall by one another's hands.'

The Pandavas are stunned to listen to what Krishna says. Their faces are drained of blood and strange fear courses through their hearts and bodies. Uncanny hopelessness fills them."

CANTO 26

"The Holy One says, 'Arise, arise, O Gandhari, do not set your heart on grief. It is through your own fault that this vast carnage has taken place. Your son Duryodhana was evil, envious and arrogant. By lauding his sinful deeds, you make good of evil. Ruthless and cruel, he was the embodiment of hatred and enmity, and disobedient to the injunctions of the old. Why do you wish to ascribe your own faults to me? Dead or lost, the person that grieves for what has already occurred finds more grief. By indulging in grief, one increases it two-fold.

A Brahmana woman bears children for the practice of austerities; the cow brings forth calves for bearing burdens; the mare brings forth her young for acquiring speed of motion; the Sudra woman bears a child for adding to the number of servitors; the Vaishya woman for adding to the number of keepers of cattle. A Kshatriya princess like you, however, brings forth sons for making war and being killed!'

Vaisampayana said, "Hearing these words from Krishna, which are disagreeable to her, Gandhari, with heart roiled by grief, remains silent. The Rajarishi Dhritarashtra, however, restraining the grief that arises from folly, says to Yudhishtira, 'If, O son of Pandu, you know it, tell me the number of those that have fallen in this war, as also of those that have escaped with their lives!'

Yudhishtira answers, ‘One billion, six hundred and sixty million and twenty thousand men have fallen in this war. Of the heroes that have escaped, the number is two hundred and forty thousand and one hundred and sixty-five.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Tell me, O mighty-armed, for you know all things, to what ends have those foremost of men attained.’

Yudhishtira say, ‘Those warriors of true prowess that gladly cast off their bodies in fierce battle have all attained regions like those of Indra. Knowing death to be inevitable, they that have encountered it unhappily have attained the companionship of the Gandharvas. Those warriors that have fallen at the edge of weapons, while turning away from the field or begging for quarter, have attained the world of the Guhyakas. Those high-souled warriors who, observant of Kshatriya dharma and regarding flight from battle to be shameful, have fallen, mangled by keen weapons, while advancing unarmed against fighting foes, have all assumed bright forms and attained the regions of Brahma. The remaining, that have randomly met with death on the field of battle, have attained the realm of the Uttara-Kurus.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Through what power of knowledge, O son, do you see these things like a great tapasvin? Tell me this, O Mahabaho, if you think that I can listen to it without impropriety!’

Yudhishtira says, ‘While at your command I wandered in the forest, I obtained this boon during our tirtha yatra to sacred fords and other holy places and shrines. I met with the Devarishi Lomasa and had from him the boon of spiritual vision. Thus did I gain second sight through the power of knowledge!’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Our dead must be cremated, with due rites, the bodies of both the friendless and the slain that have friends. What shall we do with those that have none to look after them and that have no sacred fires? The duties and obligations that await us are many. Who are those whose last rites we should perform? O Yudhishtira, will they find realms of blessedness by the merit of their karma, they whose bodies are now being torn apart by vultures and jackals?’

Vaisampayana continued, “Thus addressed, Kunti’s son Yudhishtira of great wisdom commands Sudharma, the priest of the Kauravas, and Dhaumya, and Sanjaya of the Suta varna, and Vidura of profound wisdom, and Yuyutsu of Kuru’s race, and all his servants led by Indrasena, and all the other Sutas that are with him and says, ‘Have the funeral rites of the slain, numbering thousands, to be duly performed, so that nobody may perish for want of men to take care of them.’

At this command of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, Vidura, Sanjaya, Sudharma, Dhaumya, Indrasena and others collect sandalwood, aloe and other kinds of wood used for cremations, as also ghee, oil, perfumes and costly silken robes and other kinds of cloth, and large heaps of dry wood, and broken chariots and diverse kinds of weapons, cause funeral pyres to be heaped and set alight and then, without haste but with grave dignity, burn, with all the proper rites the slain kings in appropriate order.

They duly cremate upon those fires that blaze forth with libations of clarified butter poured over them in torrents, the bodies of Duryodhana and his hundred brothers, of Salya, and king Bhurisrava; of king Jayadratha and Abhimanyu, O Bhaarata; of Dusasana’s son and Lakshmana and king Dhrishtaketu; of Brihanta and Somadatta and the hundreds of Srinjayas; of king Kshemadhanva and Virata and Drupada; of Sikhandi prince of the Panchalas, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata’s race; of the valiant Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas; of the ruler of the Kosalas, the sons of Draupadi, and Sakuni the son of Subala; of Achala and Vrishaka, and king Bhagadatta; of Karna and his son of great wrath; of those great bowmen, the Kekaya princes, and those mighty warriors, the Trigartas; of Ghatotkacha the prince of rakshasas, and the brother of Baka, of Alambusha, the foremost of night rangers, and king Jalasandha; and of hundreds and thousands of other kings.

The Pitri-medha rites in honour of some of the illustrious dead are performed there, while some sing Samans, and some utter ululating lamentations for the dead. With the loud noise of Samans and Riks, and the lamentations of the women, all living creatures are quite stupefied that night. The funeral fires, smokeless and blazing brightly amid the surrounding darkness, look like luminous planets in the firmament enveloped by clouds. Those among the dead that had come from diverse realms and were utterly friendless are piled together in thousands of heaps and, at the command of Yudhishtira, are burned by Vidura through a large number of servitors, men acting calmly and influenced by goodwill and affection, on pyres of dry wood. Having caused the last rites of all the great slain to be performed, the Kuru king Yudhishtira, setting Dhritarashtra before him, goes towards the river Ganga.”

Vaisampayana says, "Arrived at the auspicious Ganga full of sacred water, of many great pools along her course, adorned with high banks and broad shores, and having a vast bed, they cast off their ornaments, upper garments, and belts and girdles. The Kuru women, crying and afflicted by fanged grief, offer oblations of water to their sires and grandsons and brothers and kinsmen and sons and revered elders and husbands. Conversant with their duties, they also perform the tarpana, the water-rite, in honour of their friends. While those wives of heroes perform this rite in honour of their heroic lords, the access to the stream turns mild and easy, although these magical paths disappear afterwards. The shores of the stream, though crowded with those wives of heroes, look as broad as the ocean and present a spectacle of gloom and doom.

Then, suddenly, Kunti, O king, in a sudden paroxysm of grief, tearfully says to her sons in a low voice, 'That hero and great bowman, that leader of leaders of chariot divisions, that warrior distinguished by every mark of a Kshatriya, who has been slain by Arjuna in battle; that warrior whom, O sons of Pandu, you sent into the next world, that Suta's child born of Radha, that hero who shone in the midst of his forces like the lord Surya himself, who battled against all of you and your followers, who looked resplendent as he commanded the vast force of Duryodhana, who had no equal on earth for tejas; that hero who preferred glory to life, that utterly fearless warrior firm in truth and never tired by any exertion, was your eldest brother. Offer tarpana to that eldest brother of yours who was in truth born of me by the God of day; offer oblations of holy water to dead Karna!

Ah, that most tragic hero was born with a pair of earrings and clad in golden armour, and was like Surya himself in splendour!'

It is as if their mother has pierced each of the Pandavas with terrible astras. They either stand benumbed or collapse onto the earth in shock. Then that tiger among men, the great Yudhishtira, sighing like a snake, desperately asks Kunti, 'That Karna, who was like an ocean, having shafts for his billows, his tall standard for his vortex, his own mighty arms for a pair of vast makaras, his massive chariot for his deep lake, and the sound of his palms for his tempestuous roar, and whose impetuosity none could withstand save Dhananjaya—were you the mother of that matchless one? How was that son, resembling a very Deva, born of you?

The prowess of his arms scorched all of us. How, mother, could you conceal him like one hiding a fire within the folds of her cloth? His might of arms was always worshipped by the Dhartarashtras, even as we always worship the might of the wielder of the Gandiva! How was that foremost of mighty men, that first of maharathas, who endured the united force of all lords of earth in battle, how was he a son of yours? Was that greatest of all wielders of weapons our eldest brother? How did you bring forth that child of wonderful splendour? Ah, mother, we have been undone by what you kept hidden from us!

The grief I now feel at Karna's death is a hundred times sharper than what I felt at the death of Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi, and the destruction of the Panchalas and the Kurus. Thinking of Karna, it is as if my whole body is on fire. There is nothing we could not have attained, including everything that is in swarga. Alas, this horrible carnage, which has completely destroyed the Kurus, would never have happened if only we had known this secret that you kept!'

Lamenting thus, Yudhishtira breaks into loud sobs; he weeps like a small child. Finally, collecting himself, he offers tarpana to his elder brother, Karna, whom he had never known. All the royal women that throng the banks of the river send up a loud, piercing cry of grief. Yudhishtira has all the wives and other members of Karna's family to be brought before him. Along with them, the Dharmaraja properly performs the water-rites in honour of his elder brother. Having completed the ceremony, the king, with all his senses and mind agitated, comes out from the waters of Ganga."

PART I

Rajadharmanusasana Parva

CANTO 1

AUM! Bowing down to Narayana and Nara, the foremost of Purushas, and to Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Vaisampayana said, "After offering oblations of water to all their friends and kinsmen, the sons of Pandu, Vidura, Dhritarashtra, and all the Bhaarata women continue to dwell on the banks of the sacred stream, Bhagirathi. They spend the month of mourning outside the Kuru city. Yudhishtira Dharmaraja performs the water-rites, and many great Rishis arrive to see the monarch. Among them are the island-born Vyasa, Narada, Devala, Devasthana and Kanwa, all accompanied by their best disciples.

Many other Munis, wise and expert in the Vedas, Grihastas and Snatakas, also come to meet the Kuru king. Yudhishtira duly worships the Maharishis and seats them on precious carpets. They accept the worship suitable for this period of mourning and impurity, and thousands of them sit in due order around the king. They offer consolation and comfort to the grieving Yudhishtira, king of kings, whose heart is racked by anguish.

After greeting Vyasa and the Rishis, Narada addresses Yudhishtira, the son of Dharma. 'Through the might of your arms and by the grace of Madhava you have righteously won this whole earth, and by your good fortune you have emerged alive from this dreadful war. Observant as you are of the Kshatriya dharma, do you not rejoice, O son of Pandu? Now that you have killed all your enemies and won this victory, will you not gratify your friends, O Rajan? I hope grief does not still afflict you.'

Yudhishtira replies, ‘I have indeed subjugated the whole world, through the might of Krishna’s arms, the grace of the Brahmanas and the strength of Bhima and Arjuna. However, this heavy sorrow is always in my heart, that through my greed I have caused this fearsome carnage of my kinsmen.

Having caused the death of Subhadra’s precious son, and of the sons of Draupadi, O holy one, this victory appears to me to be a defeat. What will my sister-in-law, Subhadra of Vrishni’s race, say to me? What will the people of Dwaraka have to say to Krishna when he returns from here? Again, the thought of Draupadi, who has always been considerate of us, and is now bereaved of her sons and kinsmen, causes me relentless pain.

There is another subject, O Narada, about which I will speak to you. It afflicts me that Kunti kept from us a great and terrible secret: that Karna—strong as ten thousand elephants, Maharatha unrivalled in this world, of leonine pride and gait, of vast intelligence and boundless compassion, whose generosity and liberality were legend—was her son. Born secretly to her, Karna, who kept many high vratas, who was the refuge of the Dhartarashtras, who was sensitive about his honour, whose prowess was irresistible, who was ever ready to repay every injury and always wrathful in battle, who vanquished us in repeated encounters, who was quicksilver in the use of weapons, conversant with every kind of warfare, possessed of great skill and endowed with wonderful valour—was thus, our own brother.

Only while we were offering oblations of water to the dead did Kunti speak of him as the son of Surya. She had placed that glorious infant in a basket made of light wood and committed him to the current of the Ganga. He whom the world regarded as a Suta’s child born of Radha was really the first son of Kunti—our eldest brother by blood. Alas, by coveting the kingdom I have caused my brother to be killed. It is this that burns my limbs, like fire a heap of cotton.

Arjuna of the white steeds did not know Karna for a brother. Neither I nor Bhima, nor the twins, knew him for such. However, he, the great archer, knew we were his brothers. We learnt that our mother Kunti went to him and said, “You are my son! You must make peace with your brothers and join their side in battle.”

The illustrious Karna refused. He said to our mother, “I cannot desert Duryodhana! It would be dishonourable, cruel and ungrateful of me. If I yield to your wishes and make peace with Yudhishtira, people will say that I am afraid of Arjuna Swetavahana. After I have vanquished Arjuna and Krishna in battle, I will make peace with Dharma's son."

Kunti said again to her magnificent son, "Fight Arjuna, then, but spare my other four princes."

With folded hands, Karna told his trembling mother, "If I ever hold your four other sons' lives in my hands, I will not kill them. Have no doubt, O Devi, that you will continue to have five sons. If Arjuna kills Karna, you will have five. If, on the other hand, I kill Arjuna, you will still have five—including me!"

Wanting the good of us Pandavas, our mother said to him, "Go then, O Karna, do good to your brothers whose weal you always seek."

And with that, Kunti took his leave and returned home.

Arjuna has slain this hero, a brother by a brother! Neither Kunti nor Karna ever disclosed their secret, O lord. And so did Arjuna kill in battle that greatest of Kshatriya bowmen. Only later, Dvijottama, did I learn that he was my brother. Why, I learnt from Kunti that he was the first-born, the eldest among us. How my hearts burns knowing that I caused my brother's death! If I had both Karna and Arjuna on my side, I could have vanquished Krishna himself.

While the evil sons of Dhritarashtra tormented me in the midst of the Kuru sabha, my suddenly risen anger cooled in a moment at the sight of Karna. During that game of dice, even while listening to Karna's harsh and bitter words, uttered from his desire to please Duryodhana, my wrath cooled at the sight of Karna's feet. It seemed to me that Karna's feet resembled the feet of our mother, Kunti! I reflected on this strange likeness for a long time, but I could not fathom it.

Muni, why did the earth swallow the wheels of his chariot during the battle? Why was my brother cursed? You must tell me. I must hear everything from you, O holy one. You know everything in this world, even the past and the future!'" Vaisampayana said, "Thus questioned, the Rishi Narada discloses the manner in which Karna, whom people believed to be a Suta's son, had been cursed.

CANTO 2

Narada says, 'It is just as you say, O Bhaarata! Mahabaho, no one could resist either Karna or Arjuna in battle. Listen to me carefully, for what I am about to tell you is unknown even to the gods. Long ago, a question arose about how all the Kshatriyas could be given an opportunity to attain Swarga by dying in battle.

For this, Kunti conceived a child, Karna, in her maidenhood, a son capable of provoking a vast and general war. Endowed with tameless energy, this child came to have the status of a Suta. He acquired the science of weapons from Dronacharya, the foremost descendant of Angirasa's vamsa.

The young man burned with envy seeing the might of Bhimasena, the quickness of Arjuna at archery, your intelligence, Yudhishtira, the humility of the twins, the lifelong friendship between Vasudeva and the Gandivi, and the affection of the people for all of you. Early in life, he had made friends with Duryodhana, partly by accident and partly due to his own nature and the hatred he bore you.

Seeing that Dhananjaya was superior to everyone in the astra shastra, Karna one day approached Drona in private and said to him, "You love us, your pupils, as much as you do your son. I want to acquire the Brahmastra, with all its mantras and the power of withdrawing it, for I want to fight Arjuna. I pray that through your grace all the masters of weaponry will regard me as a Maharatha."

Drona, from partiality for Arjuna, as well as from his knowledge that Karna had evil in him, replied, "Only a Brahmana who has duly observed all his vows, or a Kshatriya who has practised austere penances, may have the Brahmastra, no other man."

Hearing this, Karna paid Drona obeisance, took his leave and went to Parasurama who lived on the Mahendra mountain. Approaching Rama, he bowed and said, "I am a Brahmana of Bhrigu's vamsa."

This pleased Rama and he welcomed him so kindly, and with such honour, that Karna was overjoyed. While living on the Mahendra mountain, which resembled heaven itself, Karna met and mingled with many Gandharvas, Yakshas and Devas, and duly acquired all their astras, becoming a favourite of the celestial ones and the great Asuras and Rakshasas, too.

One day, O Partha, while Surya's son roved alone along the sea-coast near this asrama, armed with bow and sword, he accidentally slew the homa cow of a learned Brahmavadi who was performing his daily Agnihotra puja.

Karna tried repeatedly to pacify the Brahmana saying, "O holy one, I killed your cow unintentionally, forgive me for what I did!"

But, filled with wrath, the Brahmana cursed him, crying, "Base wretch, you deserve to be killed. Let the fruit of this deed be yours, evil one: that while fighting him whom you are always challenging, and for whose sake you strive so much every day, the earth will swallow the wheels of your chariot. And while you are dazed and helpless, your enemy will cut off your head! Leave me now, vile man. Just as you have heedlessly killed my cow, your enemy too will kill you whilst you are distracted!"

Karna still sought to gratify that foremost of Brahmanas by offering him cattle, wealth and precious gems. The Brahmana, however, said, "Nothing can deflect my curse. Go away or remain here, as you please." Hanging his head in sorrow, Karna returned apprehensively to Rama, pondering what had happened.'"

"Narada continues, 'Parasurama, tiger of Bhrigu's race, was well pleased with the might of Karna's arms, his affection for him, his self-restraint, and his attention to the needs of his guru. Rama of great tapasya joyfully taught his tapasvi sishya everything about the Brahmastra, along with the mantras for loosing and withdrawing it.

Having acquired this knowledge, and endowed with wonderful prowess, Karna devoted himself with great enthusiasm to the science of weapons, spending his days happily in Bhrigu's asrama. One day, while roaming with Karna in the vicinity of his hermitage, Rama suddenly felt exhausted by the rigorous fasts he had kept. The son of Jamadagni affectionately and familiarly set his head down on Karna's lap and slept soundly.

While his guru was sleeping, a large and frightful insect, which lived on phlegm and fat and flesh and blood, and whose bite was agonizing, dug its teeth into Karna's thigh. Afraid of waking his guru, Karna could neither pluck out and fling away nor kill that insect. O Bhaarata, though it pierced deep into his thigh with its fangs, the son of Surya allowed it to have its way, lest his acharya should awake.

Karna bore the intolerable pain with heroic patience, and continued to hold Bhargava Rama's head on his lap, without making the slightest movement. When finally Karna's blood flowed onto the face of Rama of great tejas, the Bhargava awoke and said in some alarm, "Alas, I have been sullied! What have you done? Tell me the truth without fear!"

Karna told him about the insect's bite and Parasurama beheld the creature, which resembled a minute boar with eight feet, vicious teeth and needle-like bristles. Called Alarka, its limbs had shrunk with fear. As soon as the mighty-armed son of Jamadagni cast his eyes upon it, the creature gave up its life, melting into the very blood which it had drawn.

Then in the sky they saw a Rakshasa of terrible form, dark in hue, with a red neck, who could assume any form at will. Staying upon the clouds, his object fulfilled, the Rakshasa, with folded hands, addressed Rama, "O Mahatapasvin, you have rescued me from the hell I was in. Blessed are you! I adore you. You have saved me!"

Rama asked him, "Who are you, and why did you fall into hell? Tell me."

The Rakshasa said, "Once I was a great Asura called Dansa. In the Krita yuga, O sire, I was of the same age as Bhrigu. I ravished that sage's beloved wife, and in anger your ancestor cursed me, 'Subsisting on urine, fat and phlegm, you will lead a hellish life!' I fell down onto the earth in the form of a hideous insect.'

I asked him, 'When, O Brahmana, will this curse end?'

Bhrigu replied, 'This curse will end through Rama of my race.' Since then I have been living the life of an unclean soul. Righteous one, you have rescued me from that sinful life."

With these words, the great Rakshasa bowed to Rama and vanished. Now Rama turned in wrath on Karna: "Fool, no Brahmana could endure such agony. Your patience is that of a Kshatriya. Tell me the real truth about yourself and who you are."

Karna, fearing a curse and wanting to mollify his master, replied, "O Bhargava, know me for a Sutaputra. People call me Radheya Karna, the son of Radha. I came here in all humility, only from a desire to acquire your astras from you. A revered guru in the Vedas and other branches of knowledge is like one's father, and it was for this that I told you that I was a Brahmana, one of your own varna."

To the unhappy and trembling Karna, prostrate with folded hands upon the earth, Jamadagnya, smiling though his anger, said, "Since you are not a Brahmana and have been false, and since you came here from your greed for weapons, O wretch, know that when you are engaged in battle with a warrior equal to yourself, and death is upon you, this Brahmastra will fade from your memory, and will not appear at your bidding. However, on earth, no Kshatriya will be your equal in battle. Go now! This is no place for a liar like you."

Humbly taking his dismissal, Karna came away. Arriving then before Duryodhana, he said, "I have mastered all the astras!"""

CANTO 4

"Narada says, 'Having thus obtained weapons from Parasurama of Bhrigu's race, Karna began to pass his days pleasurably in the company of Duryodhana.

About this time, Chitrangada, the ruler of the country of the Kalingas, held a swayamvara for his daughter in his opulent capital city of Rajapura. Hundreds of kings travelled there to try and win the hand of the princess. Hearing of the contest, Duryodhana too went to the city in his golden chariot, taking Karna with him.

Among those assembled were Sisupala, Jarasandha, Bhishmaka, Vakra, Kapotaroman, Nila, Rukmi of great prowess, Sringa the ruler of the kingdom of women, Asoka, Satadhanwan and the heroic king of the Bhojas. Besides these, O Yudhishtira, many others from the countries of the south, many master warriors of the Mlechcha tribes, and many rulers from the east and the north also came there. With their manly, glowing bodies, adorned with splendid golden angadas, all of them were like tigers.

After the kings had all taken their seats, the maiden princess, accompanied by her nursemaid and a guard of eunuchs, entered the arena. As she circled the arena, the names of each of the kings present were recited to her as she approached each one.

When the fair princess passed over Duryodhana, the son of Dhritarashtra of Kuru's vamsa could not brook her rejection. Disregarding all the kings, he commanded the princess to stop. Intoxicated with the pride of power, and relying upon Bhishma and Drona, Duryodhana abducted the young woman, forcing her into his chariot. Karna, great hero, riding his own chariot, armed with a sword, clad in mail, and with his fingers cased in leather fingerlets, rode just behind Duryodhana.

There was an uproar among the kings, all of whom gathered ready for battle. They shouted “Put on your mail! Let the chariots be made ready!”

Enraged, they pursued Karna and Duryodhana, showering arrows down on them like masses of clouds pouring rain upon two hills. Karna kept cutting down all their bows and arrows with sure, single shafts of his own. Some of the Kshatriyas became bowless; some rushed on, bows in hand; some were on the point of shooting their arrows, and some flew after the two, armed with spears and maces.

The dexterous Karna, foremost of all bowmen, crushed them all. He killed many of their charioteers until, vanquished, those lords of the earth turned away crestfallen from the battle. Protected by Karna, Duryodhana forged on with a joyful heart, bringing the princess home with him to Hastinapura.’”

CANTO 5

"Narada continues, 'Hearing of Karna's legendary might, the king of the Magadhas, Jarasandha, challenged him to single combat. A fierce battle took place between them and both masters of the devastras attacked each other with diverse unearthly missiles. Finally, when they had exhausted their arrows, broken their bows and swords and lost their chariots, the two Mahayoddhas fought with bare hands.

Karna quickly prevailed and could have severed into two his antagonist's body, once united by Jara. Finding himself in mortal danger, Jarasandha gladly made peace with Karna: "Enough! I submit."

Out of friendship he then gifted Karna the town of Malini. Until then, Karna, tiger among men and scourge of all foes, had been king only of the Angas, but from then onwards, the Parantapa began to rule over Champa too, which, as you know, had the approval of Duryodhana.

Thus Karna became famed on earth for the valour of his arms. When, for your sake, Indra, king of the Devas, tricked him with divya maya and begged him for the kundala and kavacha with which he was born, Karna gave away those precious talismans that safeguarded his life. Once Karna had been deprived of his earrings and divested of his natural armour, Arjuna was able to kill him in Krishna's presence.

A Brahmana's curse; the curse of the illustrious Parasurama; the boon granted to Kunti; the illusion with which Indra deceived him; his humiliation by Bhishma, who mockingly called him an ardharatha, half a chariot-warrior, at the naming of Rathas and Atirathas; the undermining of his confidence by the sharp-tongued Salya; Krishna's strategy; and lastly, the devastras which Arjuna had received from Rudra, Indra, Yama, Varuna, Kubera, Drona and the illustrious Kripa: for these many reasons the wielder of the Gandiva succeeded in killing Vikartana's magnificent son, Karna, resplendent as Surya himself.

Ah, your brother had been cursed and beguiled by many. Yet, because he has fallen in battle you should not grieve for him, Naravyaghra!'" Vaisampayana said, "Having said these words, the Devarishi Narada falls silent. Filled with sorrow, Rajarishi Yudhishtira plunges into deep dejection. Seeing him sighing like a snake, unmanned by sorrow and sobbing, Kunti, herself quite deranged with grief, tries to console him.

CANTO 6

She says gravely and gently, 'Mahabaho, Yudhishtira, it does not become you to mourn like this. You of great wisdom, kill this sorrow of yours, and listen to me. Before the war, I told Karna that you are his brother. Surya Deva also appeared to him in a dream and again in my presence, and counselled him like a well-wisher solicitous of his good. But neither Surya nor I could change his mind or sway his loyalty away from Duryodhana. It was fate that made him your inveterate enemy, bent upon doing you all harm and I, too, gave up trying to reason with him.'

Yudhishtira is like a smouldering fire, overcome with anxiety and despair, to think of his dead sons, grandsons, kinsmen and friends, and most of all of Karna. Tears burning his eyes, he says to his mother, 'This great tragedy has overtaken us because you kept your secret from me!'

Then, in his terrible sorrow, that mighty king of dharma of blazing tejas, curses all the women of the world: 'From now on, no woman will succeed in keeping a secret!'

Again, the king thinks of his slain sons and grandsons and other kinsmen and friends and is plunged in intolerable woe. The wisest of kings resembles a fire covered with smoke, as despair overpowers him."

CANTO 7

Vaisampayana said, "With a troubled and sorrowful heart, Dharmatma Yudhishtira begins to grieve for the mighty Maharatha, Karna.

Sighing repeatedly, he says to his brother, 'O Arjuna, had we been beggars in the cities of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, this miserable end would not be ours that we have achieved by exterminating our kinsmen. Our enemies, the Kurus, have attained Swarga by purifying themselves in battle, while we who are guilty of slaughtering our kinsmen have lost all the purusharthas, and have no right to the fruits of dharma.

A curse on the famous might, valour and wrath of Kshatriyas! It is on account of these that tragedy has overtaken us. Blessed are forgiveness, self-restraint, purity, renunciation and humility, abstention from causing injury, and truthfulness of speech on all occasions, such as Rishis and Munis practise. Full of pride and arrogance, we have fallen into this plight from greed, recklessness and a desire to enjoy the fruits of power.

Looking at our kinsmen slain on the field of battle, such is our grief that not even sovereignty over the three worlds will make us happy. Alas, for worldly reasons we sinfully slew those noble lords who did not deserve to die at our hands; we are alive, but deprived of friends and stripped of the very meaning of life. Like a pack of dogs fighting over a piece of meat, we have been overtaken by a great disaster. And that piece of meat means nothing to us. It is fit to be thrown away.

They who have been slain did not deserve to die, not for the sake of mountains of gold or all the horses and kine in the entire world. Filled with envy and greed, and swayed by anger and pleasure, all of them are now dead and gone to Yamaloka.

Fathers practise asceticism and brahmacharya, truth and renunciation, in the hope of getting sons blessed with every kind of prosperity. So, too, with fasts, sacrifices, vows, sacred rites and auspicious ceremonies, mothers conceive and carry their offspring, anxiously hoping for a safe delivery and wondering, “Will they be born safely, grow in might and be honoured on earth? Will they be able to give us happiness in this world and the next?”

Alas, those mothers have had to abandon all their expectations now that their sons, glorying in youth and resplendent with ornaments, have been slain. Without having enjoyed the pleasures of this world, without having paid the debts they owed to their parents and to the gods, they have gone to Yamaloka. Alas, O my mother, those kings have been slain at just the time when their parents expected to reap the fruits of their might and wealth.

They were always governed by envy and greed for earthly pleasures, and slaves to rage and desire. Because of their evil deeds, they could never enjoy the fruits of victory. I believe that all the Panchalas and the Kurus that have fallen in this battle, those slain as well as those who slew them, have perished without reaching Swarga as they should have in the normal course. The people regard us as the cause of the destruction of the world, although it was the sons of Dhritarashtra who were actually responsible. Duryodhana was always cunning, always evil and deceitful. Although we never offended him, he always treated us perfidiously. Yet, we have not vanquished them, nor have they vanquished us. The Dhartarashtras could not enjoy this earth, their costly gemstones and well-filled treasury, or their vast territories, women or music. They did not heed the counsels of ministers, their friends and men learned in the scriptures. Their hatred for us consumed them and denied them happiness and contentment. Seeing our prosperity, Duryodhana became envious, growing pale and emaciated, and Sakuni reported this to King Dhritarashtra. As a doting father, Dhritarashtra tolerated his vile policy, disregarding the advice of Vidura and Ganga’s noble son Bhishma to restrain his wicked and covetous son Duryodhana, who was entirely governed by his passions. The king has met with destruction, just like me.

Beyond doubt, Suyodhana has tarnished his blazing fame by causing the death of his brothers and bringing terrible grief to his parents. What other Kshatriya would use such language against his kinsmen as he did, in the presence of Panchali? Because of our evil star, Duryodhana, our very race has perished. We have killed those whom we should not have slain, and thereby incurred the censure of the world. Having installed this sinner as king, Dhritarashtra grieves today. We have slain our heroic foes and taken their possessions and kingdom. It has pacified our anger but, ah, my grief stupefies me!

O Dhananjaya, we can only make amends by auspicious deeds, by confessing to all that we have sinned, by repentance, by alms-giving, by penances, by journeys to tirthas after renouncing everything, by constant meditation on the shastras. Of all these, the Srutis aver that he who practises renunciation escapes from birth and death, and attains Brahman. So, O Arjuna, with your leave, I will go to the forest, casting off all worldly attachments, adopting mauna, and practising Gyana Yoga, the path of wisdom.

The Srutis declare, and I have seen with my eyes, that a man with worldly desires can never find any kind of punya. I have myself committed this sin which, as the Srutis have said, causes the cycle of samsara. Abandoning my entire kingdom, and my worldy possessions, I shall go to the forest, escaping from the ties of the world, freed from grief and attachment.

I beg you, O Kurusthama, rule this earth, to which you have restored peace, and which you have divested of all evil, for I have no need for kingdom or for pleasure.'

Having said these words, Yudhishtira stops. His younger brother Arjuna then addresses him in the following words."

CANTO 8

Vaisampayana said, "Like one unwilling to forgive an insult, the tejasvin Arjuna, betraying some fierceness but smiling the while, says gravely, 'It grieves me to see the distress that urges you to abandon this great prosperity which you have gained after such a superhuman victory. Having killed your enemies, and having conquered the world legitimately through adherence to your svadharma, why should you abandon everything through fickleness of heart?

Where on earth has an impotent or an irresolute man ever acquired sovereignty? Why then did you, in blind rage, kill all the kings of the world? He who aspires to live like a sannyasi will not want to enjoy the good things of the world. Poor and stripped of his wealth, he can never win fame or acquire sons and possess great and noble animals. O king, if you abandon this vast kingdom and live like a wretched mendicant, what will the world say of you?

Why do you want to renounce your wealth and power, and lead the life of a sadhu; you, born a king? Having conquered the whole world, do you really wish from folly to live in the forest, abandoning all things of artha and kama?

If you take vanavasa, in your absence evil men will destroy yagnas, and the stain of that desecration will certainly be yours. King Nahusha, having committed many base sins in a state of poverty, gave up his mendicancy and proclaimed that poverty is for vanaprasthas.

Making no provision for the morrow is a practice for Rishis, as you know. Kshatriya dharma depends entirely on wealth, and one who robs another of wealth, robs him of his dharma as well. Who among us, O king, would forgive such robbery if it is practised against him? A poor man, even if he is only an onlooker, is falsely accused of a crime. Poverty is a sin and it is wrong for you to applaud it.

The fallen man, O king, also grieves like a poor man. I do not see the difference between them. All kinds of punya and karma flow from the possession of great wealth, all religious performances, all pleasures, and Swarga itself! Without wealth, a man cannot find the means of sustaining existence. The karma of a man of small wit, a fool who allows himself to be stripped of his wealth, is dried up like shallow streams in the summer. He who has wealth has friends and relatives, and we regard him as a worthy and accomplished man in the world. On the other hand, if a man without wealth wants to achieve any purpose, he meets with failure.

Wealth attracts wealth, as tame elephants entice wild ones into captivity. Religious acts, pleasures, joy, courage, wrath, learning and dignity, all these proceed from wealth, O king! From wealth one acquires family honour, and increases one's religious merit. He who is without wealth has neither this world, nor the next, O best of men. He cannot perform deeds of dharma, for these spring from wealth like rivers from a mountain.

He who has few possessions in terms of horses and cows, servants and guests is truly leaner than an emaciated man. Judge truly, O king, by the conduct of the Devas and the Danavas who forever wish to slaughter their kinsmen, the Asuras. If one did not regard as righteous the appropriation of wealth belonging to others, how would kings practise their dharma on this earth?

The sages have in the Vedas laid down this injunction: that kings should live reciting the three Vedas every day, seek to acquire wealth, and carefully perform sacrifices with the wealth thus acquired.

When the gods have obtained footing in Swarga and won their prosperity through great battles, what fault can there be in such strife? The Devas act in this way, and the eternal precepts of the Vedas sanction it.

To learn, teach, sacrifice and assist at others' yagnas, these are our principal duties. The wealth that kings plunder becomes the means of their prosperity, and that has never been obtained without some injury to others. The reason why kings conquer this world is to acquire riches, and that appropriated wealth becomes as much theirs as the riches claimed by sons of their sires. The Rajarishis who have gone to Swarga have declared this to be the royal dharma, for, like water flowing forth from a replete reservoir, wealth runs in every direction from the treasuries of kings.

This earth which once belonged to king Dilipa, Nahusha, Ambarisha and Mandhatri, now belongs to you! You should perform a great yagna, O Rajan, making generous gifts of every kind, spending a vast quantity of the earth's produce, or else the sins of this kingdom will be upon you. The subjects whose king performs an Asvamedha yagna with bountiful gifts, all become purified of sin and sanctified by attending the ablutions at the end of the yagna.

Vishwarupa Mahadeva, in a great sacrifice requiring libations of all kinds of flesh, poured all creatures as sacrificial offerings into the fire and then his own self. Eternal is this auspicious path, for one can never destroy its fruits. This is the great path called Dasaratha, and if you abandon it, O Rajan, what other course will you take?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'For a little while, O Arjuna, if you were to concentrate your attention and fix your mind and inner hearing on your antaratma, you would approve of what I am about to say. Abandoning all worldly possessions and pleasures, I will follow the path of dharma—but I will not tread the path that you recommend. Regardless of whether you ask me or not, I will show you the only path that is auspicious and that one should walk.

Renouncing the pleasures and activities of the world of men, I will perform mahatapasya, living on fruit and roots in the forest and wandering with the animals that have their home there. Performing yagnas, pouring libations into the sacred fire at the proper times, morning and evening, I will reduce my body through starvation and, with matted hair, covering myself with skins, enduring cold, wind, heat, hunger, thirst and toil, I will emaciate myself with tapasya as laid down in our shastras.

I will daily listen to the clear strains of the free and joyful birds and animals living in the forest, charming to the heart and the ear. I will enjoy the fragrance of flower-laden trees and creepers, and the varied fruits that grow in the forest. I will spend my time in the company of its many excellent sannyasis. I will not do the slightest injury to any living creature anywhere.

Leading a reclusive life and devoting myself to contemplation, I will live upon ripe and unripe fruits and gratify the Pitris and the Devas with offerings of wild fruits, spring water and grateful hymns. Observing in this way the austere regulations of a forest life, I will pass my days calmly awaiting death or, living alone in silence, with my head shaved clean. I will obtain my food by begging fruit each day of only one tree.

Smearing my body with ashes, and finding shelter in abandoned houses, or lying at the foot of trees, I will cast off all things, dear or hateful. Aloof from both grief and joy, regarding with equanimity censure and applause, hope and affliction, and prevailing over all the works of maya, I will live in detachment: following mauna vrata, assuming the outward form of a blind and deaf idiot, living in contentment and deriving happiness from my own soul. Without doing the least injury to any of the four kinds of moving and unmoving creatures, I will behave equally towards all, be they conscious of dharma or merely following the dictates of their senses.

I will not jeer or frown at anybody and, restraining all my senses, always be of cheerful aspect. Asking no one for directions, I will journey along any path that I happen to meet, taking no note of the country or the points of the compass or looking behind me, divesting myself of desire and anger, turning my gaze inwards and casting off pride of soul and body.

Nature always walks ahead; thus, food and drink will somehow come. I will not think of those pairs of opposites that stand in the way of such a life. If I fail to find pure food in a small measure in one house, I will go to other homes. I shall go to seven houses in succession to satisfy my hunger. When the smoke from a house no longer issues forth, its hearth-fires having been extinguished; when husking-rods have been kept aside, and all the inmates have eaten; when mendicants and guests cease to wander, I will go and beg for alms at two, three or five houses at the most.

I will wander over the earth having broken the bonds of desire and, preserving equanimity in success and failure, become a tapasvin, and behave as one who is neither fond of life nor at the point of death: viewing both with equal indifference.

If a man strikes off one of my arms, and another smears the other arm with sandal-wood paste, I will not wish either evil to the one nor good to the other. The only acts I perform will be to open and shut my eyes and take as much food and drink as will barely sustain life in my body. Without ever being attached to action, and always restraining the functions of the senses, I will give up all desires and cleanse the soul of every impurity. Freed from all attachments and tearing off all bonds, I will live free as the wind and enjoy everlasting contentment.

Impelled by desire, and from ignorance, I have committed great sins. Many grihastas performing both auspicious and inauspicious acts are yoked to the wheel of karma, maintaining their wives, children and kinsmen, all bound to them in relations of cause and effect. When they die they take upon themselves all the effects of their sins, for none but the actual doer is burdened with the consequences of his deeds. Bound by karma, men come into this ever-turning wheel of life, are born again and again, and, being born, meet their fellow men.

He is sure to find happiness who abandons the worldly course of life, which is really a fleeting illusion, though it seems eternal, and is afflicted by birth, death, decrepitude, disease and pain. When the very Devas and great Rishis, who understand the law of karma, fall down from heaven or from their positions of eminence, who would wish to have even heavenly prosperity? Insignificant kings, having found success through diverse means, often slay another king through some contrivance.

Through reflection this nectar of wisdom has come to me and, having attained it, I want to find a permanent, eternal and unchangeable place for myself. By adopting this fearless path of life, I will make an end to this physical frame that is subject to birth, death, decrepitude, disease and pain.'"

"Bhimasena says, 'Your understanding, Rajan, has become blind to the truth, like that of a foolish and hollow chanter of the Vedas. If you criticize the dharma of kings and want to lead a life of idleness, O Bharatarishabha, you had no reason to destroy the Dhartarashtras.

Do we not find in the Kshatriyas forgiveness and compassion, pity and mercy? If we had known that this was your intention, we would have never taken up arms or slain a single man. We would have subsisted on alms until death took us, and this terrible war between the rulers of the earth would have never been fought.

The learned have said that this mobile and immobile world is the object of enjoyment for the strong, and that the Kshatriya's duty is to eliminate all who stand in the way of the one assuming the sovereignty of the earth. Accordingly, we killed all those who stood as enemies of our kingdom, so that by adherence to our dharma we now rule this earth. Govern it righteously, O Yudhisthtira.

To refuse the kingdom now is to be like the man who, having dug a well, stops his work before finding water and comes up covered in mud; or, like the man who, having climbed up a tall tree and taken the honey, dies before tasting it. It is to be like one who, having set out on a long journey, turns back in despair short of his destination; or like one who, having slain all his enemies, O Pandava, falls by his own hand. It is to be like the hungry man who, having obtained food, refuses to eat it, or like a man under the influence of kama who, having obtained a woman reciprocating his passion, refuses to take her.

We follow you, O king of feeble understanding, because you are our eldest brother, and you have made us objects of censure. We are all maharathas, accomplished in knowledge and endowed with great energy, yet we are obedient to the words of a eunuch, as though we were entirely helpless. We are the refuge of the helpless but, when the people see us like this, they will think we are impotent.

Consider what I say. The shastras decree that only in times of distress should aged and weak kings, or those defeated by enemies, adopt a life of renunciation. Men of wisdom, therefore, will not applaud renunciation as the dharma of a Kshatriya but regard that course of life as a loss of virtue.

How can the true Kshatriyas condemn these duties? Indeed, if these obligations be blameworthy, why should Ishwara not be censured? It is only the poor and non-believers who support this interpretation of the Vedas, that a Kshatriya should take sannyasa. In reality, a Kshatriya who adopts the life of a sannyasi fails to support life by his prowess and exertions, and thereby fails in his dharma.

Only that man who cannot support his sons and grandsons and worship the Devas, Rishis, Atithis and Pitris, can happily lead the life of a solitary hermit in the forest. Just as the deer, boars and birds, though they lead a forest life, cannot attain heaven, able Kshatriyas who fail to exert their power cannot attain Swarga by becoming sannyasis. There are other ways for them to seek religious merit.

If anyone were to gain success from renunciation, then mountains and trees would surely have it, for are all Brahmacharins who lead such lives, injuring no one and remaining always aloof from worldliness. If it be the truth that a man's success depends upon his own lot in life and not upon that of others, then, as a Kshatriya, you should take yourself to a life of action.

If they who only fill their own stomachs could attain success, then all aquatic creatures would be successful, for they have no one to support but themselves. Look, the world moves on, with every creature in it employed in karma proper to its nature. And so, you must adopt a life of action, for the man of inaction can never prosper.'"

CANTO 11

"Arjuna says, 'In this regard, O Bharatarishabha, an itihasa is told of a discourse between certain sannyasis and Sakra. A number of well-born Brahmana youths, foolish and immature, abandoning their homes, left for vanavasa. Thinking that this would be a virtuous path, these rich youths wanted to live as Brahmacharins, and abandoned their brothers and parents. It so happened that Indra felt pity for them and, assuming the form of a golden bird, the holy Sakra addressed them, saying, "Men who perform yagnas and share the leftover sacrificial food acquire great punya and their lives are praiseworthy. Having accomplished their purushartha, these virtuous men attain the highest end."

The Rishis said, "Look, this bird lauds those who subsist upon the leftovers (avasesha) of yagnas, and tells us this because we live upon such leftovers."

The bird replied, "I do not praise you. You are filthy and impure, and living on refuse renders you vile, for you do not subsist upon the remnants of sacrifice."

The Rishis said, "We regard this course of our life to be blessed. Tell us, O bird, what is good for us. Your words inspire us."

The bird said, "If you do not lose faith in me by fighting against your better selves, I will advise you on what is true and beneficial."

The Rishis said, "We will listen to your words, for the different paths are all known to you, O Dharmatman, and we are ready to obey your commands. Instruct us."

The bird said, “Among quadrupeds, the cow is the foremost; among metals, gold; among words, mantras; and among those who walk on two legs, Brahmanas. These mantras regulate all the rites of a Brahmana’s life, beginning with those concerning gyana and the period after it, and ending with those concerning death and cremation. The Vedic rites are his foremost sacrifice and his path to Swarga. If it were not so, how could those in quest of heaven find what they seek through mantras?

He who, in this world, worships his soul, firmly regarding it to be a particular Deva, gains success consistent with the nature of that God. The seasons measured by fortnights lead to the sun, the moon, or the stars. Depending upon the action, these three kinds of success, are desired by every man.

The grihasta’s life is superior and sacred and is called the domain for the cultivation of success. What paths do these men take that are against action? Foolish and destitute, they incur sin because they live by abandoning the eternal paths of the Devas, Rishis and Brahmanas and taking instead to the paths disapproved of by the Srutis.

There is a law in the mantras which says, ‘O Sacrificer, perform the sacrifice represented by gifts of valuable things. I will give you happiness in the form of sons, kine and Swarga!’ To live thus in accordance with the shastras is said to be the highest tapas of the tapasvin. And so you should perform yagnas and tapasya in the form of gifts. The due performance of these eternal duties—the worship of the Devas, the study of the Vedas, the gratification of the Pitris, and respectful services to the gurus—are called mahatapasya.

By performing these arduous penances, the Devas have obtained the highest glory and power. And I tell you to bear the burden of the duties of the grihasta. Without doubt, tapasya is the foremost of all things and is the root of all creatures; however, it is to be practised by leading the life of a grihasta, upon which everything depends.

They who eat the leftovers of feasts, after duly apportioning the food morning and evening among kinsmen, attain ends that are hard indeed to achieve. They are called eaters of the remnants of feasts who eat after having served Sadasyas, Devas, Rishis and kinsmen.

Thus, those who observe their svadharma, who keep difficult vratas and are truthful in speech become objects of great respect in the world, with their own faith exceptionally strengthened. Free from pride, these achievers of the most strenuous feats go to Swarga and live for endless time in the realms of Sakra."' Arjuna continues 'Hearing those words, beneficial and full of righteousness, those Rishis abandoned the path of renunciation, saying, "There is nothing in it," and became grihastas. Therefore, O Dharmarajan, calling to your aid that same ananta gyana, rule the wide world that is now free of your enemies.'" Vaisampayana said, "Hearing these words of Arjuna, O Parantapa, the mighty-armed and broad-chested Nakula, bronzed of skin, wise and moderate in speech, looked at the king, the foremost of all dharma purushas, and spoke, appealing to his brother's heart.

Nakula said, 'The very gods have established their fires in the region called Visakha-yupa, O Rajan, so you know that the Devas themselves depend upon the fruits of action. The Pitris that support life by dispensing rain on earth even to all disbelievers, by observing the laws of Ishwara as declared in the Vedas, are engaged in karma. Those who reject the declaration of the Vedas recommending action are godless, while the man who follows the path of the Devas attains, O Bhaarata, the highest realms of heaven.

The grihasta's life, all men acquainted with Vedic truths say, is superior to all the other modes of life. Knowing this, the man who restrains his soul, O Rajan, and gives away his righteously acquired wealth in yagnas to Brahmanas well versed in the Vedas is regarded as the true renouncer. However, he who disregards the life of a grihasta, the source of much happiness, and attempts to leap to the next asrama of life, that of a sannyasi, moves in darkness.

The man who roves the world homeless, O Kaunteya, a mendicant who has the foot of a tree for his shelter, who observes the mauna vrata, never cooks for himself, and seeks to restrain all the functions of his senses, is actually a man who has given up the vows of a sannyasi. The Brahmana who, disregarding anger and joy, and especially deceit, employs all his time in the study of the Vedas, is actually turning away from the observance of the vows of a sannyasi.

The four different varnasramas were at one time weighed in the balance. The wise have said that when grihasta was placed on one side of the scale, it required the three others to be placed on the other to counterbalance it. Observing the result of this examination, and seeing further that domesticity alone contains both heaven and pleasure, grihastasrama became the way of the greatest Rishis and the refuge of all men conversant with the ways of the world.

Therefore, O Bharatarishabha, he who adopts the way of the grihasta, thinking it to be his duty, and relinquishing all desire for the fruits thereof, is a real sannyasi, and not the man of clouded understanding who goes into the vana abandoning his home and its surroundings. A man who, in the garb of dharma, fails to vanquish his desires even as a vanaprastha, is bound by grim Yama with his deadly noose round the sinner's neck.

The karma that is performed from vanity is said to be unproductive, while the karma done from a spirit of renunciation always bears abundant fruit. Tranquillity, self-restraint, fortitude, truth, purity, simplicity, sacrifice, perseverance and righteousness are regarded as virtues recommended by the greatest Rishis. The deeds of a grihasta, it is said, are intended for Pitris, Devas and Sadasyas.

In this varnasrama alone, O Rajan, are the three-fold aims of dharma, artha and kama to be attained. The renouncer who unswervingly adheres to this mode of life, in which one is free to perform all karma, does not encounter ruin either here or hereafter.

The sinless Ishwara created living beings with the intention that they would adore him through yagnas, which include generous gifts. Creepers, trees, leaf-shedding herbs, animals that are clean and ghrita were created to be the ingredients of the yagna. For a grihasta, the performance of a yagna is fraught with impediments. That is why this asrama is said to be exceedingly difficult, well-nigh unattainable. Grihastas who possess wealth and corn and animals but do not perform yagnas earn eternal sin, O Rajan.

Amongst Rishis, there are some that regard the study of the Vedas to be a sacrifice, and others that regard dhyana to be a great sacrifice which they perform in their minds. O Rajan, the very gods covet the companionship of a regenerate man who, as a result of treading the path of dhyana, has become equal to Brahman.

By refusing to spend for yagnas the diverse kinds of wealth that you have taken from your enemies, you are only displaying your want of faith. I have never seen a king in the observance of grihastasrama renounce his wealth in any way but the Rajasuya, the Aswamedha, and other kinds of great sacrifices. Like Sakra, the king of the Devas, O Rajan, perform these other sacrifices that are praised by the Brahmanas.

The king through whose heedlessness subjects are plundered by robbers, and who does not offer protection to those whom he is called upon to rule, is said to be the very embodiment of the demon Kali. If, without giving away horses, kine and female slaves, elephants adorned with trappings, and villages, populous lands, fields, and houses to Brahmanas, we take vanavasa with our hearts harbouring unfriendly feeling towards relatives, we will become such Kalis among Kshatriyas. Kshatriyas who do not practise charity and give protection to others incur great sin. Sorrow is their portion hereafter, not bliss.

If, O lord, you take to a wandering life without performing mahayagnas and the due rites in honour of your deceased ancestors, without bathing in sacred tirthas, you will meet with destruction like a small cloud separated from a mass and shredded by the winds. You will fall away from both worlds and have to be born as a Pisacha.

A man becomes a true sannyasi by casting off every internal and external attachment, not merely by abandoning his home to live in the forest. A Brahmana who lives observing these laws in which there are no impediments does not fall from this or the other world. Observing one's svadharma, duties respected by the ancients and practised by the best of men, who would grieve for having slain prosperous enemies in war, like Sakra razing the armies of the Daityas?

Having observed the Kshatriya dharma and subjugated the world through your prowess, O Rajan, and having made gifts to those who know the Vedas, you can go to realms higher than heaven. It does not become you, O Kaunteya, to indulge in grief.'"

"Sahadeva says, 'O Bhaarata, one does not attain felicity by renouncing all external objects, or by discarding mental attachments. Let our enemies enjoy the religious merit and happiness that come to one who has cast off worldly things but whose mind still covets them! On the other hand, let our friends enjoy the religious merit and happiness that come to him who rules the earth, having relinquished all internal attachments.

The word mama—mine—is Yama, Death's self; while the opposite, na-mama—not mine—is eternal Brahman's. Brahman and Yama, O Rajan, entering invisibly into every soul, cause all creatures to act. If this entity that is called Atman is never subject to destruction, then destroying the bodies of living men cannot make one guilty of murder. If, on the other hand, the Atman and the body of a being are born or destroyed together, then the rites and deeds prescribed by the shastras would be futile.

Therefore, driving away all doubts about the immortality of the Atman, the man of intelligence should adopt that path which the men of dharma of ancient times have ever trodden. Life is certainly fruitless for a king who, having acquired the entire earth with its mobile and immobile creatures, does not enjoy it. As for the vanaprastha who lives upon wild fruits and roots, but whose attachment to things of the earth has not ceased, such a one, O king, lives within the jaws of death.

Look, O Bhaarata, the hearts and the outward forms of all creatures are but manifestations of yourself. They who look upon all creatures as their own selves escape the great fear of destruction. You are my father and my protector; you are my brother, my elder and guru. So, O lord of the earth, forgive these confused and sorrowful utterances of a grief-stricken one, which I have spoken out of my love for you.'"

Vaisampayana said, “When Kunti’s son, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, remains silent after listening to his brothers tell these truths of the Vedas, the noble, beautiful and large-eyed Draupadi speaks to that bull among kings, seated like the leader of a herd of elephants in the midst of his brothers, themselves like so many lions and tigers.

Expecting loving regard always from her husbands, especially from Yudhishtira, she is always treated with affection and indulgence by the king. Conversant with her wifely duties and observant of them in practice, this wide-hipped princess, casting her eyes on her lord, wanting his attention, speaks in pointed but sweet words.

‘O Kaunteya, your brothers dry their palates with laments like the chataka bird, but you do not make them happy. Gladden with seemly words the hearts of your brothers who are like great tuskers in musth, these heroes who have drunk the cup of misery. Why, O king, while living beside the Dwaita lake, did you reassure your brothers who were with you, suffering cold, wind and sun?

Why did you say to them, “Rushing into battle for victory, we will kill Duryodhana and enjoy the earth that can grant every wish. Depriving great Maharathas of their chariots, slaying huge elephants, and strewing the field of battle with the bodies of great warriors, horsemen and heroes, you, Parantapas, will perform mahayagnas of diverse kinds with gifts in profusion. All these sufferings of exile in the forest will end in happiness.”

Having once said these words to your brothers, O foremost of all men of dharma, why do you now dismay us with this new resolve? Just as there can be no fish in a dry swamp, no eunuch can ever have children or enjoy wealth. A Kshatriya, or a ruler without the power to punish, can neither shine nor enjoy the earth, nor can his subjects ever have happiness.

Friendship for all creatures, charity, study of the Vedas, penances—these constitute the duties of a Brahmana and not of a Kshatriya, O best of kings! Restraining the evil, cherishing the honest and never retreating from battle—these are the highest duties of kings. He is said to be conversant with dharma in whom both forgiveness and anger exist, giving and taking, terrors and fearlessness, and chastisement and reward. It was not through study, or gift, or sannyasa that you have acquired the earth. You have vanquished and slain the force of the enemy, ready to burst upon you with all its might, an army abounding with elephants, horses and chariots, strong with three kinds of strength, and protected by Drona, Karna, Aswatthaman and Kripa!

This is why I ask you to enjoy the earth. Once, O king, you conquered the realm called Jambu, with all her populous kingdoms, as well as Kraunchadwipa to the west of the great Meru, equal to Jambudwipa, Sakadwipa to the east of the great Meru, equal to Kraunchadwipa, Bhadraswa on the north of the great Meru, equal to Sakadwipa, O Purushavyaghra!

You even penetrated the ocean and captured other realms, islands surrounded by the sea and containing many densely peopled provinces. O Bhaarata, having achieved such immeasurable feats, and having obtained through them the adoration of the Brahmanas, how is it that your soul is not gratified? Seeing your brothers, O Bhaarata, these heroes swelling with strength and resembling bulls or mighty elephants in musth, why don't you speak words to them that will bring joy to their hearts?

All of you are like Devas, able to resist any foe and able to scorch your enemies. Had only one of you become my husband, my happiness would have been immense, O Naravyaghra. What can I say when all five of you are my husbands and care for me as the five senses inspire the physical frame? The words of my mother-in-law, who has great knowledge and great foresight, cannot be untrue. "O princess of Panchala," she said to me, "Yudhishtira will always keep you happy."

I see, O Dharmaraja, that having slain thousands of powerful kings, you are about to render this achievement futile through your folly. They whose eldest brother has lost his mind now all have to follow him in madness. Through your madness, O king, all the Pandavas are about to lose their minds.

Had your brothers been in their senses, O Rajan, they would have imprisoned you with all unbelievers and taken upon themselves the sovereignty of the earth. One who from dullness of intellect does as you now want to do, can never succeed in winning prosperity. The man who treads the path of madness should be treated with incense and kohl, with drugs infused through the nose, and with other medicaments.

O best of the Bhaaratas, I am the worst of all my sex, since I want to live on even though I am bereaved of my children. You should not disregard my words or those of your brothers who are trying to dissuade you from your deranged purpose. Indeed, by abandoning all the earth, you urge adversity and danger upon yourself.

Shine, O Rajan, like those two great kings, Mandhatri and Ambarisha, admired in their time by all the lords of earth. Protecting your subjects righteously, govern Bhumi Devi, this Goddess Earth, with her mountains and forests and islands. Do not become downcast, O king; worship the gods with many sacrifices, fight your enemies and make gifts of wealth, apparel and other objects of enjoyment to Brahmanas, O best of all kings.'" Vaisampayana said, "Hearing these words of Yajnasena's daughter, Arjuna speaks once more, showing proper regard for his mighty-armed eldest brother of unfading glory.

Arjuna says, 'The man armed with the rod of punishment, the Neeti danda, governs and protects all his subjects with it. This authority is awake when everything else is asleep. For this reason, the wise have characterized the rod of chastisement to be dharma itself. It protects dharma and artha. It is identified with purusharthas, and protects grain and wealth. Knowing this, O learned one, take up the rod of punishment and observe the course of the world.

One class of sinful men desist from doing evil through fear of the danda in the king's hands, another from fear of Yama's danda, another from fear of the next world and yet another from fear of society. Thus, O Rajan, in this world, everything depends on the punitive danda, and there is a class of men for whom the only restraining force from devouring one another is that rod. If it did not protect people, they would have sunk into the darkness of hell.

The wise thus named the rod of chastisement, because it restrains the ungovernable and punishes the wicked. One should punish Brahmanas by oral censure; Kshatriyas, by giving them only as much food as necessary to support life; Vaisyas, by the imposition of fines and forfeitures of property, while for Sudras there is no punishment.

Under the name of danda we have established laws in the world to keep men aware of their duties and for the protection of property. Wherever dark-skinned and red-eyed punishment stands ready to tackle every offender, and the king is a Dharmaraja, the subjects never forget themselves. The Brahmacharin and the grihasta, the rishi and the sannyasi, all walk in their respective ways through fear of punishment alone.

He who is without the restraint of fear never performs a sacrifice or gives anything away, never adheres to any commitment or covenant. Without achieving the most difficult feats and without killing, as a fisherman kills fish, no man can obtain great prosperity. Without bloodshed, no man has been able to achieve fame in this world or acquire wealth or subjects.

By the killing of Vritra, Indra himself became the Great. Men offer their worship much more to those of the gods who are given to taking life. Rudra, Skanda, Sakra, Agni, Varuna, Kaala, Mrityu, Vayu, Kubera, Surya, the Vasus, the Maruts, the Sadhyas, and the Viswadevas, O Bhaarata, are all death-dealers. Humbled by their prowess, everybody bends to these gods, never to Brahma, Dhatri or Pushan.

Only a few men who are noble of disposition worship gods who are self-restrained, peaceful and equally disposed towards all creatures. I do not perceive any creature in this world that supports life without doing any injury to others. Animals live upon animals, the stronger upon the weaker. The mongoose devours mice; the cat devours the mongoose; the dog devours the cat; the dog again is devoured by the spotted leopard. Behold, all things in turn are devoured by Yama, the Destroyer, when he comes! The gods have wrought this universe, moving and motionless, as food for living creatures, and the true gyani is never confused by this.

It is appropriate for you, O Maharajan, to be what you were born to be. Only a foolish Kshatriya, restraining anger and joy, takes refuge in the vana. The very sannyasis cannot support their lives without killing creatures. In water, on earth, and in fruits, swarm innumerable creatures, and it is not true that one does not kill them.

What higher dharma is there than supporting one's life? There are many creatures so minute that their existence can only be guessed at, and the mere falling of one's eyelids destroys them. There are men who, subduing anger and pride, take to an ascetic course of life and, leaving village and towns, become hermits in the forest. Arriving there, they become confused and adopt the grihasta's life once more.

One sees other grihasthas tilling the soil, uprooting herbs, felling trees, killing birds and animals, performing yagnas, and finally attaining Swarga. O Kaunteya, I have no doubt that the deeds of all creatures are crowned with success only when the policy of punishment is properly applied. If one were to abolish punishment from the world, all creatures would soon be destroyed.

Like fish in the water, stronger animals prey on the weaker. Remember the truth declared long ago by Brahma himself that punishment, properly applied, sustains all beings. Look, the very fires, when almost extinguished, blaze up again, in fright, when blown upon. Such is the fear of force or discipline. If there were no danda, the good could not be distinguished from the bad, the whole world would be enveloped in darkness and all things would be plunged in chaos.

Even those who are breakers of laws, who are atheists and scoff at the Vedas, become disposed to observe laws and restrictions from fear of punishment. Everyone in this world is kept straight by fear of danda. A man who is by nature pure and righteous is scarce.

Yielding to fear of punishment, man becomes disposed to observe rules and restraints. Danda was ordained by the Creator himself for protecting dharma and artha, for the happiness of all the four orders, and for making them righteous and humble. If punishment could not inspire fear, then ravens and beasts of prey would have devoured all other animals, men and the sacrificial ghrita.

If discipline did not uphold and protect, nobody would have studied the Vedas, nobody would have milked a cow, and no maiden would have married. If discipline and fear of punishment did not uphold and protect, destruction and chaos would have set in on every side, all barriers would have been swept away, and the very idea of property would have disappeared. People could then never duly perform annual sacrifices with large gifts, and no one, to whatever mode of life he might belong, would observe the duties of their particular varnasrama declared in the shastras, no one would have succeeded in acquiring knowledge.

Even if yoked, camels, oxen, horses, mules or donkeys, would not draw chariots and carriages, without the application of the danda; on danda depend all creatures. The learned, therefore, say that punishment is the root of everything, and upon it rests this world and the heaven that men desire.

Wherever enemy-destroying punishment is well applied, no sin, no deception and no evil is seen. If the danda of punishment is not upraised, the dog will lick the sacrificial butter and the crow will fly away with the first yagna offering.

Whether through dharma or adharma, this kingdom is now ours, and our duty is to abandon grief, to enjoy it and perform yagnas. Men who are fortunate, living with their beloved wives and children, eat good food, wear rich attire, and cheerfully acquire virtue. All our karma, without doubt, is dependent on wealth, which is again dependent on danda.

Understand, therefore, the importance of discipline. One declares duties only for the maintenance of the relations of the world. There are two things here: abstention from injury, and injury prompted by dharma; the second, being superior as dharma, may be done without fault.

There is no deed that is wholly meritorious, nor any that is wholly evil, since in all karma something exists of both right and wrong. Animals are castrated, their horns cut off, and they are made to bear burdens, tethered and beaten.

In this samsara of no substance, this cruel world, rotten with sin and full of pain, O Rajan, maintain the ancient customs of men. Perform yagnas, give alms, protect your subjects, and practise dharma. Slay your enemies, O Kaunteya, and protect your friends. Do not be sorrowful, Rajan, while killing your enemies, for you will not incur the slightest sin. He who takes up a weapon to cut down an armed foe advancing against him, does not incur the sin of murder, for it is the fury of the advancing enemy that provokes the wrath of the slayer.

The inner soul of every creature can never be slain. When the Atman is incapable of being slain, how then can one be slain by another? As a man enters a new house, even so creatures enter successive bodies, abandoning forms that are worn out, acquiring new forms. Those who can see the truth view death as being this repeated transformation.'" Vaisampayana said, "After Arjuna's speech, Bhimasena, passionate and energetic, mustering all his patience, says to his eldest brother, 'O Rajan, you know all about dharma, nothing is unknown to you. We always try to emulate your conduct, but alas, we cannot.

I tried to restrain myself from saying anything. But my anguish compels me to speak. Listen to me, O ruler of men. Because of your confusion, everything we have is in danger, and we are made unhappy and weak. How is it that you, the ruler of the world, familiar with every branch of knowledge, have let sorrow cloud your understanding like a coward?

You know the paths of dharma and adharma of the world, as well as the future and the present. So, O puissant one, I will tell you why you should assume sovereignty. Listen to me.

There are two kinds of diseases, physical and mental, each linked to the other, and neither of them exists independently. Mental sickness springs from physical ailment, the physical from the mental: this is the truth. He who feels regret because of past physical or mental grief finds yet more sorrow in sorrow, and suffers twice over.

Cold, heat and wind are the three attributes of the body, and their existence in harmony is the sign of good health. If one of the three prevails over the rest, there are remedies laid down for it. Cold checks heat, and heat checks cold.

Sattva, rajas and tamas are the three attributes of the mind. The existence of these three in harmony is the sign of mental health. If one of these prevails over the rest, there are remedies prescribed.

Grief checks joy, and joy checks grief; one man living in the present, enjoying bliss, wants to remember his past sorrows, while another, living in present sorrow, wants to recollect his past happiness. You, however, were never made sad by misfortune or glad by fortune. So, you should not use your memory now to make yourself sad during times of bliss, or glad during times of sorrow. Perhaps Destiny is all-powerful, or perhaps it is because of your nature that you are so afflicted.

But how is it that you do not remember the sight of Draupadi being dragged before the sabha barely clad while in her period, or our expulsion from Hastinapura and our vanavasa wearing deerskins and living in the great forests?

Why have you forgotten the woes inflicted on us by Jatasura, the battle with Chitrasena, and what we suffered at the hands of the Sindhu king; how Kichaka kicked Draupadi during our ajnatavasa? Parantapa, another fierce battle, like that which you fought against Bhishma and Drona, now lies before you, but this one will have to be fought with your mind alone, without arrows, friends, relatives or kinsmen.

If you give up your life before winning this battle, you will have to be reborn to fight these same enemies again. So, fight that battle this very day, O Bharatarishabha. Disregard the concerns of your body, use your own ability, identify your mind's foe and conquer it. I cannot imagine what your condition will be if you do not succeed in this battle; whereas, by winning it, you will attain the great end of life. Apply your intellect to this, ascertain the right and the wrong paths, follow the course that your father did before you, and rule your kingdom with dharma.

By good fortune, the sinful Duryodhana and all his followers are dead, and Draupadi has braided her hair again. With due ceremonies and lavish gifts, perform the Aswamedha yagna. The tejasvin Krishna and we are your servants, O son of Pritha!'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Discontentment, heedless attachment to earthly goods, the absence of tranquillity, power, folly, vanity and anxiety: all these affect you, and so you covet sovereignty, O Bhima. Try to be happy freed from desire, prevailing over joy and grief and attaining tranquillity. The peerless king who will rule this unbounded earth will nevertheless have but one stomach. Why then do you applaud this course of life?

One's desires, O Bharatarishabha, cannot be fulfilled in a day, or in many months. Desire can never be gratified, cannot, indeed, be exhausted in the course of one's whole life. Fire, when fed with fuel, blazes forth; otherwise, it is extinguished. So you should extinguish with a little food the fire in your stomach when it appears. He who is ignorant seeks endless food for his belly. Conquer your stomach first and you will then be able to conquer the earth.

Once you conquer and win the earth, it will be for your permanent good. You applaud desires and enjoyments and prosperity, but those who have renounced all enjoyments and have reduced their bodies through penance, attain regions of supreme happiness. The acquisition and preservation of a kingdom involves both dharma and adharma. The desire for them exists in you. Free yourself from your great burdens, and adopt renunciation.

To appease his hunger, the tiger slaughters many other animals. From greed, other weaker beasts, scavengers, live off the tiger's prey. If kings practise renunciation while enjoying worldly possessions and pleasures, they can never have contentment, and a loss of understanding is noticeable in them. However, those who subsist on leaves of trees, or use two stones only or their teeth for husking their grain, or live upon water or air alone, succeed in conquering Naraka. Between the king who rules this unbounded earth, and the man who regards equally stone pebbles and gold, it is the latter who attains his purusharthas, not the former.

So, depend upon that which is the eternal refuge of joy both here and hereafter, and stop wishing and hoping and being attached to your wants. Those who have given up desire and enjoyment never grieve, while you yearn for pleasures to come, and mourn them as they go. It is only after discarding desire and its gratification that you will succeed in liberating yourself from hypocrisy.

There are two well-known paths for us: the path of the Pitris and the path of the Devas. They who perform yagnas take the Pitri-patha, while those who are for moksha, go by the path of the gods. Casting off their bodies, the great Rishis attain realms that are above the power of Yama; they do this through brahmacharya, tapasya and the study of the Vedas.

The knowing call worldly enjoyments bonds, bandhana, as well as karma. Liberated from those two sins—bondage and action—man attains the highest end. One has heard of Janaka, freed from the duality of opposites, liberated from desire and enjoyment, observant of the religion of moksha, singing a verse: "My treasures are immense, yet I have nothing! If fire again destroys the whole of Mithila and reduces it to ashes, nothing of mine will be burnt!"

Like a man on the hill-top looking down upon men on the plain below, he who has ascended to the summit of gyana sees people pining for things that do not call for grief. He who, casting his eyes on visible things, really sees them, is said to have true vision and understanding, because of the knowledge he has gained of unknown and incomprehensible things.

Men who know the words of sages are cleansed souls, and those who have attained a state of Brahman, succeed in obtaining great honour. When one understands that creatures of infinite diversity are all one and the same, and that they spring from the same essence, one attains Brahman.

Those who reach this highest condition attain the supreme and blissful end, not they who are without gyana, or who are of small and narrow minds, or are bereft of understanding, or are without tapasya. Indeed, everything rests on the trained understanding!'" Vaisampayana said, “When Yudhishtira falls silent, Arjuna, moved by what the king said, and afire with sorrow and grief, once more addresses his eldest brother. ‘People tell this old story, O Bhaarata, about the discourse between the ruler of the Videhas and his queen. It relates to the words which his grief-stricken spouse said to her lord when, abandoning his kingdom, he resolved to lead the life of a sannyasi. Casting off wealth, children, wives and precious possessions of various kinds, the established path for acquiring religious merit and the sacred agni itself, King Janaka shaved his head and put on the garb of a sannyasi.

CANTO 18

His wife found him without wealth, observing the vows of a mendicant, resolved to abstain from inflicting any kind of injury on others. Free from vanity of every kind, he was prepared to subsist upon a handful of barley fallen from the stalk and obtained by gathering the grains from crevices in the field.

Approaching her lord at a time when no one was with him, the queen, endowed with great strength of mind, fearlessly and in anger uttered to him these words full of reason: “Why have you adopted the life of a sannyasi, abandoning your kingdom full of wealth and corn? A handful of fallen barley cannot be proper for you. Your resolution does not suit your karma, O Rajan, for you are abandoning your great kingdom but coveting instead a handful of grain. With this handful of barley, how will you gratify your athithis, the Devas, Rishis and Pitris? Your labour is pointless. Alas, abandoned by all of them, you intend to lead the life of a wandering mendicant, O king, having cast off all action!

Until now, you were the supporter of thousands of Brahmanas versed in the three Vedas, and of many others besides. How can you now want to beg them for your own food, renouncing your blazing prosperity, and looking around like a dog for its meagre pickings? Today, your mother has lost a son and your wife, the princess of Kosala, is a widow. These helpless Kshatriyas, expectant of fruit and religious merit, depend upon you, and have all their hopes set on you. By killing their hope, to what regions will you go, O king, especially when moksha is uncertain and creatures are dependent on karma? Sinful as you are, you have neither this world nor the other, for you wish to live abandoning your wife.

Why do you lead a life of a sannyasi, abstaining from your karma, abandoning garlands and perfumes and ornaments and robes of different kinds? Once you were a large and sacred lake for all creatures, a mighty tree worthy of adoration and granting its shelter to all. Alas, how can you wait upon and worship others? If even an elephant desists from all work, packs of carnivores and innumerable worms would devour it. What then can be said of you in this state?

How can your heart be set on a mode of life which recommends an earthen pot and a triple-headed stick, forces one to abandon his very clothes and permits the acceptance of only a handful of barley? You say that your kingdom and a handful of barley are the same to you; why then do you abandon the first? If, again, a handful of barley becomes an object of attachment with you, then your original resolution of renouncing everything fails.

If you live up to your resolution of renouncing everything, what am I to you and you to me, and what is your grace to me? If you want to be happy, then rule this earth! Those who wish for happiness, but are poor, destitute and abandoned by friends, may adopt renunciation. But he who imitates such men by giving up palatial mansions, beds and chariots, robes and ornaments, does so improperly indeed! One always accepts gifts made by others, another always gives gifts. You know the difference between the two, but who, indeed, of these two should be considered the superior? If a gift be made to one who always accepts gifts, or is proud, that gift becomes useless, like clarified butter poured upon a forest fire. As a fire, O Rajan, never dies till it has consumed all that has been cast into it, even so a beggar can never be silenced until he receives alms.

In this world, the food that is given by a charitable man is the sure support of the pious. If, therefore, the king does not give food, where will the pious go who seek salvation? Those who have food in their houses are grihastas, and they support sannyasis. Since life flows from food, the giver of food is the giver of life. Leaving the life of a grihasta, the sannyasis depend upon the very varna from where they come. By doing so, these self-restrained men acquire and enjoy fame and power.

A man does not become a sannyasi by merely renouncing his possessions, or adopting a life dependent on charity. Only he who renounces the possessions and pleasures of the world with a sincere mind is a true sannyasi. Unattached at heart, though attached in outward appearance, standing aloof from the world, having broken all his bonds, and regarding friend and foe equally, such a man, O king, is regarded to be free!

Having shaved their heads clean and putting on the ochre robe, men may be seen to adopt vanaprastha, but in fact they are bound by many ties and ever on the lookout for useless wealth. Those who, after casting off the three Vedas, their natural occupations and their children, adopt a life of mendicancy by taking up the triple-headed crutch and the brown robe, are really fools.

Understand, O Rajan, that without having shed anger and other faults, adopting the ochre robe is only to earn sustenance. Those with clean-shaven heads who have set up the banner of virtue have just this objective in life. Therefore, O king, keeping your passions under control, do you win regions of bliss hereafter by supporting the truly pious amongst men of matted locks or clean-shaven heads, naked or clad in rags, skins or ochre robes. Who is there more virtuous than he who maintains his sacred fire, who performs sacrifices with gifts of animals and dakshina, and who practises charity day and night?"'

Arjuna continues, 'We regard King Janaka to be a gyani in this world. Even he became confused, in this matter of the meaning of dharma. Do not yield to bewilderment! This is the way that those who practise charity observe the duties of grihasta. By abstaining from violence of all kinds, by casting off desire and wrath, by being engaged in protecting all creatures, by observing the excellent dharma of dana and, lastly, by cherishing superiors and the elderly, we will succeed in attaining the regions of happiness to which we aspire. By duly gratifying gods, guests, and all creatures, by worshipping Brahmanas, and by truthfulness of speech, we will certainly attain realms of bliss.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I am conversant with both the Vedas and the scriptures that lead to the attainment of Brahman. In the Vedas there are principles of both kinds—those that instill action and those that teach renunciation of karma. The shastras are confusing but I know their well-reasoned conclusions and the truth that is in the mantras. You know only weapons and the ways of Kshatriyas, and do not truly understand the meaning of the scriptures.

If you knew your dharma, you would understand that even one with the clearest insight into the meaning of the scriptures and the truths of religion, should not address such words to me. However, whatever you said out of brotherly love was proper. I am thankful to you for that, O Arjuna!

No one in the three worlds is equal to you in all the ways of battle and in the diverse skills of the way of karma. You can surely speak of the subtleties connected with these subjects, nuances that are impenetrable to others. But, O Dhananjaya, it is not fitting for you to doubt my intelligence. You know the science of war, but you have never waited upon the aged and do not know the decisions arrived at by those who have studied the subject both in brief and at length. Even intelligent men seeking salvation arrive at the conclusion that between tapasya while living in the world, sannyasa and the knowledge of Brahman, the second is superior to the first, and the third to the second.

To think that there is nothing superior to wealth is an error, and I will convince you of it, so that wealth may not again appear to you in that light.

One sees all men of dharma devoted to sannyasa and the study of the Vedas. Since they have the merit of tapasya, the Rishis have many eternal regions reserved for them. Others possessed of tranquillity of soul, having no enemies, and dwelling in the vana, have gained Swarga through tapasya and study of the Vedas. By restraining desire for worldly possessions, and casting off that darkness born of folly, pious men go northward by luminous paths to the realms kept for practisers of tyaga.

The lunar regions, the path of the south that leads to regions of light, are kept for men devoted to action. Those who are subject to samsara, to birth and death, attain these. However, the end which those who desire salvation have before their eyes is indescribable. Yoga is the best means for attaining it.

I cannot explain it easily to you. The gyanis live, reflecting on the scriptures from a desire to identify what is unreal. But they are often led astray in the belief that the object of their search exists in this and that. Having mastered the Vedas, the Aranyakas, and the other scriptures, they miss the Real, like men failing to find solid timber in an uprooted banana plant.

Some of them, disbelieving in its unity, regard the Atman that dwells in this physical frame, consisting of the five elements, to be possessed of the attributes of desire and aversion and others. Incapable of being seen by the eye, exceedingly subtle and inexpressible through words, the Atman revolves in a round of re-births among the creatures of the earth, keeping before it that which is the root of karma.

Having made the Atman, which is the spring of every kind of blessedness, advance towards itself, having restrained all desires of the mind, and having cast off all kinds of action, one may become perfectly independent and happy. When such a path trodden by the righteous exists and it is attainable through gyana why, O Arjuna, do you laud wealth which is full of every kind of calamity?

Men of olden times who were conversant with the shastras, who were always engaged in distributing gifts, sacrifice and action, were of this opinion, O Bhaarata! There are some fools who, accomplished in the science of debate, deny the existence of the Atman, based on the strength of their convictions of a previous life. It is very difficult to make them accept this truth about final emancipation and moksha.

Those wicked men, though possessed of great learning, travel all over the world making empty speeches in assemblies and courts, and deprecating the true doctrine of Mukti. O Partha, who else will succeed in understanding that which we do not understand? Indeed, since these men cannot understand the true meaning of the scriptures, they cannot know those wise and pious men who are truly great and who know the shastras deeply.

O son of Kunti, men who know the truth obtain Brahman through asceticism and intelligence, and great happiness by renunciation.'" Vaisampayana said, “After Yudhishtira stops, the great Rishi Devasthana says eloquently and reasonably to the king, ‘Phalguna told you that there is nothing superior to wealth. I will discuss this subject with you. Listen to me with undivided attention.

O Ajatasatru, you have righteously won the earth. Having won her, it does not become you, O king, to abandon her without cause. Four asramas of life are indicated in the Vedas, which you will duly pass through, one after another. At present, you should perform great sacrifices with lavish gifts. Among the very Rishis, some engage themselves in the tapasya represented by Vedic study, and some in that presented by gyana. O Bhaarata, you must know that action possesses these very sannyasis.

The Vaikhanasas preach that the man who does not seek wealth is superior to him that seeks it. I believe that he who follows this principle makes a grave mistake. Men collect diverse things for performing yagnas, simply because the Vedas require it. Tainted by his lack of understanding, he who gives away wealth to the undeserving, rather than to the deserving, does not know that he incurs the very sin of killing an unborn.

The exercise of the dharma of daana after discerning the deserving from the undeserving is not easy. The Supreme Ordainer created wealth for sacrifice, and created man to husband this wealth, and to perform sacrifice. For this reason the whole of one’s wealth should be applied to yagnas. Pleasure would be a natural consequence.

Possessed of prodigious energy, Indra, by performing diverse yagnas with lavish gifts, surpassed all the Devas. Becoming their king, he shines in Swarga. Everything should be applied to sacrifices.

Clad in deer-skin, the high-souled Mahadeva, having poured his own self as a religious offering in the yagna called Sarva, became the first among the gods and, surpassing all creatures in the universe, shines in radiant glory.

King Marutta, the son of Avikshit, with his enormous wealth vanquished Sakra himself, the lord of the Devas. In the great sacrifice he performed, all the vessels were of gold, and Sree herself came to it. You have heard that the great king Harischandra, having performed yagnas, earned great merit and great happiness. Though a mortal man, he vanquished Sakra with his wealth. For this reason everything should be applied to sacrifice.'"

"Devasthana says, 'Let me tell you in this context an old story about the sermon Brihaspati gave Indra at his request.

Brihaspati said, "Contentment is the highest heaven, the highest bliss, and there is nothing higher than it. When a man withdraws from all his desires, like a tortoise drawing in all it limbs, the natural splendour of his Soul soon shows itself. When one does not fear any creature or frighten any creature, when one conquers one's desire and aversion, then they say one sees one's Soul. When one seeks to injure nobody and cherishes no desire, in word and thought, they say one attains Brahman."

Thus, O Kuntiputra, men obtain corresponding fruits, whatever religion they follow. Awaken yourself to this thought, O Bhaarata! Some praise quietude, others action, while there are others who extol contemplation, and others again who advocate both quiescence and action.

Some praise sacrifice, others, renunciation; some praise charity, others, acceptance; and some, abandoning everything, live in silent meditation. Some praise sovereignty and the cherishing of subjects, after enslaving and killing foes, while some are for passing their days in seclusion. Observing all this, the learned conclude that only that religion which consists in not injuring any creature is worthy of the approval of the righteous. Abstention from injury, truthfulness of speech, justice, compassion, self-restraint, having children by one's own wives, good nature, modesty, patience—the practice of all these is the best religion, as told by Swayambhuva Manu himself. O son of Kunti, observe this dharma with care.

The Kshatriya who, conversant with the truths of Rajadharma, the royal dharma, takes sovereignty upon himself, restraining his soul at all times, regarding as equal that which is dear and that which is not, and subsisting upon the remains of sacrificial feasts, who restrains the wicked and cherishes the righteous, who obliges his subjects to tread the path of virtue and who himself treads that path, who at last hands over his crown to his son and retires to the forest as a sannyasi, to subsist on the produce of the wilderness and to live according to the laws of the Vedas, having cast off all idleness, is sure to obtain the most excellent fruits in both this world and the next, for he conducts himself in conformity with the well-known duties of kings.

The Moksha of which you speak is exceedingly difficult to gain, and its pursuit involves countless difficulties. Those who observe their svadharma and practise charity and ascetic penances, who are compassionate, free from desire and anger, and who engage in ruling their subjects with righteousness, protecting cows and Brahmanas, attain a lofty end. The Rudras with the Vasus, the Adityas, the Sadhyas and hosts of kings adopt this dharma, O Parantapa, and by practising it with care, they reach Swarga.'" Vaisampayana said, "After this, Arjuna once more says to his eldest brother, King Yudhishtira, of unfading glory but of doleful heart, 'O Vidheyajala, having through the practice of Kshatriya dharma obtained sovereignty that is so difficult to acquire, and having conquered all your enemies, why do you burn in grief?

Rajan, for Kshatriyas, death in battle is regarded as more meritorious than the performance of all the diverse sacrifices. The shastras that lay down the dharma of Kshatriyas declare that tapasya and renunciation are the dharma of Brahmanas. Even this is the law for the two varnas in the next world. Indeed, O powerful one, death in battle is for Kshatriyas; their dharma is exceedingly fierce and always connected with the use of weapons, and the shastras decree that when the time comes, they should perish by weapons in the battlefield.

The life of even a Brahmana, O king, who lives in the observance of the Kshatriya dharma, cannot be faulted, for Kshatriyas also spring from Brahmanas. Neither renunciation, nor sacrifice, nor penances, nor dependence on the wealth of others is for Kshatriyas. You, Bharatarishabha, know all your duties and, as a wise king skilled in all karma, can distinguish what is right and what is wrong. Cast off this gloom brought about by repentance, and with a strong will, prepare yourself for action!

The heart, especially of a Kshatriya, is as hard as the vajra. Through the exercise of the Kshatriya dharma, you have vanquished your enemies and acquired an empire, which is now peaceful. Now conquer your soul, O ruler of men, engage yourself in the performance of sacrifices and in the practice of charity.

Indra himself, though a Brahmana, became a Kshatriya in his actions and battled with his sinful kinsfolk, eight hundred and ten times. His actions were commendable and worthy of praise, and as a result, he became the king of the Devas. Perform sacrifices with lavish gifts, just as Indra did, O Rajan, and liberate yourself from your fever.

Do not, Bharatarishabha, grieve like this for what is past. The slain men have attained Swarga, purified by weapons in accordance to the laws of the Kshatriya dharma. That which has happened, had to happen, and Destiny, O Purushavyaghra, cannot be resisted.'" Vaisampayana said, "Thus addressed by the wavy-haired Arjuna, Yudhishtira remains silent. Then the island-born Vyasa says, 'The words of Arjuna, O amiable Yudhishtira, are true. The highest dharma, as declared by the scriptures, depends on the dharma of a grihasta. You know all your duties, so practise the dharma of grihasta that is prescribed for you.

A life of retirement in the forest, casting off garhapatya, is not for you. The Devas, Pitris, athithis and dasas, all depend for their sustenance upon a man leading the life of a grihasta; you should support all of them, O lord of the earth! Men leading domestic lives support birds and animals and various other creatures; so is grihasta superior to all the other asramas, and is the most difficult of all the four stages of life.

Live this most difficult life of a grihasta then, O Kaunteya, as you know all the Vedas well and have earned great ascetic merit. You must bear like an ox the burden of your ancestral kingdom, O Rajan.

To obtain success Brahmanas should strive to the best of their ability after tapasya, tyaga, kshama, gyana, sannyasa, keeping the senses under control, dhyana, living in solitude, contentment and knowledge of Brahman.

Let me now remind you of the duties of Kshatriyas, which you already know. As we are told, sacrifice, learning, exertion, ambition, wielding the danda, fierceness, protection of subjects, knowledge of the Vedas, practice of all kinds of penance, goodness of conduct, acquisition of wealth, and gifts to deserving persons—it is these, well performed and acquired by Kshatriyas, that secure for them both this world and the next.

Amongst these, O son of Kunti, wielding the rod of punishment is the foremost. Strength must always abide in a Kshatriya, and upon strength depends punishment. These duties that I have mentioned are, O king, the principal ones for Kshatriyas and contribute greatly to their success.

Brihaspati, in this connection, sang this verse: "Like a snake devouring a mouse, the earth devours a king who prefers peace and a Brahmana who prefers the life of a grihasta."

One again hears that only by wielding the rod of chastisement did the Rajarishi Sudyumna find the highest success, like Daksha himself, the son of Prachetas.'

Yudhishtira then asks, 'O holy one, by what deeds did Sudyumna, the lord of the earth, obtain the highest success? I want to hear the story of this king.'

Vyasa replies, 'There were two brothers—Sankha and Likhita, of high austerities. The brothers had separate houses, both of which were beautiful. Situated on the bank of the Bahuda river, these dwellings were always adorned with trees laden with flowers and fruits. One day, Likhita visited his brother Sankha when he was not at home. Arriving at the hermitage of his brother, Likhita plucked many ripe fruits and began to eat them without any qualms of conscience. While he was still eating, Sankha returned home.

Sankha asked his brother, "From where have you plucked these fruits, and why are you eating them?"

Approaching his elder brother and greeting him, Likhita smilingly replied, "I have plucked them from here."

Filled with great rage, Sankha told him, "You have committed theft by taking these fruits without permission. Go to the king and confess what you have done. Tell him that you have committed an offence by taking what was not given to you and, let him, observing his Kshatriya dharma, punish you as a thief."

The highly blessed Likhita of rigid vows, at the command of his brother, went to King Sudyumna. Hearing from his gate-keepers that Likhita had come, Sudyumna, with his counsellors, received the sage. Meeting him, the king said to that noble one conversant with dharma, "Tell me, O revered one, the reason for your visit. You may consider it done!"

The Rishi said to Sudyumna, "Promise first that you will grant what I ask. And you must keep your word. O bull among men, I ate some fruits that my elder brother had not given me. Do you, O Rajan, punish me for it without delay.”

Sudyumna answered, “If the king be regarded as competent to wield the rod of danda, he should be regarded as equally competent to pardon. O Anuvrata, consider yourself pardoned. Tell me now what other wishes you have, and I will certainly do what you want.”

Vyasa continues, ‘Thus honoured by the high-souled king, the Maharishi Likhita did not ask any other favour. Then the ruler of the earth commanded that both his hands be cut off and, after bearing the punishment, the Rishi went away. Returning to his brother Sankha, Likhita, in great affection, said, “You must now pardon this wretch, whom you have punished as he deserved.”

Sankha said, “I am not angry with you, nor have you injured me, O foremost of all persons, O true knower of dharma. Your virtue, however, had suffered a setback. I have rescued you from that plight. Go without delay to the Bahuda river, gratify the Devas, the Rishis and the Pitris with offerings of water, and never again set your heart on paapa.”

Obeying Sankha, Likhita performed his rites in the sacred stream and was about to begin the water-rite when two hands, like two lotuses in beauty, appeared at the extremities of his stumps. Filled with wonder, he came back to his brother and showed him the two hands. Sankha explained, “I accomplished this through my tapasya, so do not be surprised. Providence has been the instrument here.”

Likhita then asked, “O you of great splendour, when such was the power of your tapasya, why did you not purify me at first?”

Sankha replied, “I could not do otherwise, for I am not your punisher. The king who punished you has himself been purified, like you, along with the Pitris!”

Vyasa continues, ‘This king, O eldest son of Pandu, became renowned for this deed and gained the highest success, like the lord Daksha himself! Even this is the dharma of Kshatriyas, the ruling of subjects. Any other path, O monarch, would be regarded as a wrong one for them. Do not give way to grief. O best of all men, conversant with dharma, listen to the beneficial words of your brother. Wielding the danda, O Rajan, is the duty of kings, not shaving the head!’”

Vaisampayana said, "Once more the great sage Krishna-Dwaipayana tells Ajatasatru, the son of Kunti, 'Let these great Maharathas of abundant energy of mind, your brothers, O Yudhishtira, obtain the wishes that they cherished during your vanavasa. Rule the earth, O son of Pritha, like another Yayati, the son of Nahusha.

Misery was yours while you lived in the forest as ascetics. That misery has ended, O Purushavyaghra. Enjoy happiness, therefore, for some years. Then, O Bhaarata, having earned and enjoyed dharma, artha and kama for a goodly period with your brothers, you may seek vanavasa.

Be freed first from the debt you owe to sannyasis, to the Pitris, and to the Devas. Later, O son of Kunti, you can practise all the other asramas that follow the grihasta. Perform the yagnas of Sarvamedha and Aswamedha, O Rajan, and you will attain Swarga hereafter. Include your brothers also in great yagnas, with plentiful gifts for Brahmanas, and you will acquire great fame.

There is a saying, O Naravyaghra, to which you should hearken, for by living according to it, Kuruttama, you will not swerve from dharma. Only those men, Yudhishtira, who act like robbers are able to influence kings to follow the career of war and victory. The king who, guided by considerations of place and time and moved by an understanding of the scriptures, pardons even a number of robbers, incurs no paapa. The king who, realizing his tribute of a sixth, fails to protect his kingdom, acquires a fourth part of the sins of his kingdom.

Listen to how a king will not deviate from dharma. By violating the scriptures one incurs sin, while by obeying them one may live fearlessly. Guided by an understanding based upon the scriptures and disregarding lust and anger, the king who behaves impartially, like a father towards all his subjects, never incurs sin, O you of great splendour! If, due to misfortune, a king fails to do his duty, such failure will not be called a transgression. By force and policy the king should put down his enemies. He must not suffer sin to be perpetrated in his kingdom but should cause dharma to be practised.

Brave and honourable men who are virtuous, erudite Brahmanas who have mastered Vedic texts and rites, and men of wealth, should especially be protected. In judging legal suits and in carrying out religious activities, only the most learned men should be employed.

A prudent king will never repose his confidence upon one individual, however accomplished. The king who does not protect his subjects, whose passions are ungovernable, who is full of vanity, who is arrogant and malicious, is a culpable and tyrannical king. If his subjects perish from want of protection and the gods punish them, if robbers ruin them, the sin of all this besmirches the king himself. There is no sin, O Yudhishtira, in undertaking a task wholeheartedly, after full deliberation and consultation with capable advisors. Our tasks fail or succeed through destiny. If the king makes an effort, sin would not touch him.

I will tell you, O tiger among kings, the story of an ancient monarch called Hayagriva, heroic and of unstained deeds, who was defeated and killed after having himself slain a large number of enemies in battle, while he had no follower by his side. He did all that was necessary to keep his enemies in check and to protect all his subjects. Hayagriva acquired great fame from the battles he fought. Grieviously injured by robbers whom he boldly faced, the Mahatman Hayagriva, ever attentive to his dharma, lost his life in battle and, having achieved the object of his life, now enjoys great bliss in Swarga.

The bow was his sacrificial stake and the bowstring was the rope to bind victims. Arrows constituted the smaller ladle and the sword the large one, and blood was the clarified butter that he poured onto the sacrifice of battle. His chariot was the altar, the wrath he felt in battle was the fire, and the four excellent steeds yoked to his ratha were the four Hotris.

Having poured upon that sacrificial fire first his enemies as offerings, and then his own life-breath at the completion of the sacrifice, this bold lion among kings, Hayagriva, was freed from sin, and now sports in Devaloka. The high-souled and self-renouncing Hayagriva of potent mind, the performer of yagnas, protected his kingdom through good governance and intelligence, and filled all the worlds with his fame. He received merit from the performance of sacrifices and every kind of punya connected with human affairs. He wielded the danda, the rod of punishment, and ruled the earth with vigour and without pride. For this the virtuous Hayagriva, practising renunciation actuated by his faith, and full of gratitude, left this world and won the regions that are reserved for the intelligent and the wise, for those that follow the approved customs and conduct and are always prepared to die in battle.

Having studied the Vedas as well as other scriptures, having ruled his kingdom ably and caused all the four varnas to adhere to their respective dharmas, Hayagriva now rejoices in Devaloka. Having won many battles, cherished his subjects, drunk the soma rasa in sacrifices and gratified the foremost of Brahmanas with gifts, and having judiciously wielded the rod of chastisement over those under his sway, this king, at last, casting away his life in battle, dwells happily in heaven.

His life was worthy of every praise, and learned and honest men extol it. Crowned with success, this Mahatman, a king of virtuous deeds, won Swarga and acquired the realms reserved for great heroes.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Hearing the words of the island-born Rishi and seeing Dhananjaya angry, Yudhishtira, the son of Kunti, salutes Vyasa and says, 'This earthly sovereignty and its enjoyment fail to give any joy to my heart. On the other hand, this poignant grief at the loss of my kinsmen is eating away its core. Hearing the lamentations of these women who have lost their heroic husbands and children, I fail to find peace, O sage!'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Thus addressed, the virtuous Vyasa, foremost of all men conversant with Yoga, possessed of great wisdom and intimately acquainted with the Vedas, says to Yudhisthira, 'No man can acquire anything by his own actions, neither through sacrifices and worship, nor by giving anything to a fellow man. Man acquires everything in the course of Time, as intended by Brahma. If Time is unfavourable, men cannot by mere intelligence or study of the scriptures acquire any earthly possession, while sometimes an ignorant fool succeeds in winning wealth. Time is the effective way for the accomplishment of all karma.

During times of adversity, neither science, nor prayers, nor medicaments, yield any result. In times of prosperity, however, those very things, properly applied, become successful and bear fruit. By Time the winds blow violently, the clouds become rain-charged, tanks become adorned with lotuses of different kinds, and trees in the forest become decked with flowers. By Time nights become dark or lit, and the moon becomes full. If the Time has not come, trees do not bear flowers and fruits, the currents of rivers do not gather force, and birds, snakes, deer, elephants and other animals never become excited.

If the Time has not come, women do not conceive. It is with Time that winter and summer and the monsoon come. If the Time for it has not come, no one is born and no one dies; the infant does not acquire power of speech and the child does not grow to youth. It is with Time that the seed sown puts forth its sprouts.

If the Time has not come, the sun does not appear above the horizon nor does it repair to the Asta hills; the moon does not wax or wane, nor the ocean, with its high billows, rise and ebb. In this connection one remembers the old story told, O Yudhishtira, by King Senajit in grief. The irresistible course of Time affects all mortals; all earthly things, ripened by Time, come to perish.

Some men, O king, slay others, and others again slay the slayers. This is the language of the world. In reality, no one slays and no one is slain: it is only a matter of perception. The truth is that, as ordained, the birth and death of all creatures must come to pass and are a result of their very nature.

Upon the loss of one's wealth or the death of one's wife, son or father, one cries out saying "Alas, what grief!" and dwelling upon this sorrow always enhances it. Why do you, like a foolish man, indulge in grief? Why do you grieve for them who are beyond grief? Indulgence increases grief, just as fear grows if one yields to it.

This body, or anything on this earth, is not mine, for the things of this earth belong as much to others as to me. The wise, seeing this, do not allow themselves to be deluded, for there are thousands of causes for sorrow, and hundreds of causes for joy. These daily affect the ignorant, but not the wise. These, in course of time become objects of affection or aversion and, appearing as bliss or sorrow, revolve as if on a wheel and affect all living creatures. There is only sorrow in this world but no happiness, and it is for this reason that only sorrow is felt.

Indeed, sorrow springs from the affliction called desire, and happiness springs from the affliction called sorrow. Sorrow comes after happiness, and happiness after sorrow, and one does not always suffer sorrow or always enjoy happiness. Happiness always ends in sorrow, and sometimes proceeds from sorrow itself. He, therefore, who desires eternal happiness, must abandon both. Since sorrow must arise upon the cessation of happiness, and happiness upon the conclusion of sorrow, one should cast off like a snake-bitten limb that from which one experiences sorrow or heart-burning, that which it nurtures or which is the root of one's anxiety.

Be it happiness or sorrow, be it agreeable or disagreeable, whatever comes should be borne with an unaffected heart. O agreeable one, if you abstain in even a slight measure from doing what is pleasing to your wives and children, you will then know who is whose, and for what reason. Those who are very stupid or those who are masters of their souls enjoy happiness here, while those who occupy an intermediate place suffer misery. This, O Yudhishtira, is what was said by Senajit of great wisdom, the king who knew what is good and bad in this world, with dharma, and with happiness and misery.

A man can never be happy if other people's sorrows affect him. There is no end to grief, and it arises from happiness itself. Happiness and misery, prosperity and adversity, gain and loss, death and life, in their turn, affect all creatures. For this reason the wise man with an unagitated soul will neither be elated with joy nor be depressed with sorrow. To engage in battle is the yagna for a king; a due observance of the science of punishment is his yoga; and the gift of wealth in sacrifices, in the form of dakshina, is his renunciation. All these should be regarded as acts that sanctify him.

By governing the kingdom with intelligence and policy, casting off pride, performing sacrifices, and looking at everything and all persons with kindness and impartiality, a high-souled king sports in Devaloka after death. By winning wars, protecting his kingdom, drinking the soma rasa, improving the lot of his subjects, judiciously wielding the danda, and casting off his body at last in battle, a king enjoys happiness in Swarga.

Having studied all the Vedas and the other scriptures, having protected the kingdom and caused all four varnas to adhere to their respective duties, a king becomes sanctified and finally finds and dwells in Swarga. He is the best of kings whose conduct is applauded by the inhabitants of cities and country, counsellors and friends even after his death.'" Vaisampayana said, “Now the noble Yudhishtira reasons with Arjuna, saying, ‘You think, O Partha, that there is nothing superior to wealth, and that the poor man can neither have heaven, nor happiness, nor the fulfillment of his wishes. This is not true, for we see many men crowned with success through sacrifice in the shape of Vedic study, while many sages have with tapasya acquired Swarga.

O Dhananjaya, the gods regard as Brahmanas those who observe the practices of the Rishis by adopting brahmacharya, and who become knowers of dharma. O son of Pandu, you should always regard as truly virtuous those Rishis devoted to the study of the Vedas and those devoted to the pursuit of true knowledge.

All our actions depend upon those who devote themselves to the acquisition of gyana. O Bhaarata, we know this to be the opinion of the Vaikhanasas, and that the Ajas, the Prishnis, the Sikatas, the Arunas, and the Kitavas have all gone to heaven through the merit of Vedic study. O Dhananjaya, the Vedas prescribe that it is through battle, by studying the scriptures, by sacrifices, and by the restraint of passion, all arduous duties, that one goes to heaven by Dakshinayana, the southern path of the sun, which, as I told you, belongs to such men. Those who devote themselves to Yoga travel by Uttarayana, the northern path, to eternal and bright regions.

Of the two, those conversant with the Puranas laud the northern path. You should know that one acquires heaven through serenity, and that from tranquillity springs great happiness. There is nothing higher than serenity.

For the Yogin who has controlled anger and joy, contentment is his triumph. In this connection, one quotes the discourse by Yayati. Listening to this discourse, one may succeed in withdrawing all desires, like a tortoise drawing all his limbs into his shell.

When one does not fear anything, and no one and nothing is afraid of one, when one cherishes no desire, when one bears no hate, then one attains the state of Brahman. When one does not sin against any creature, in act, thought or word, one attains Brahman. When one has controlled one's pride and folly, and has withdrawn oneself from all attachments, it is then that the pious man of shining soul becomes fit for attaining salvation and the annihilation of separate existence.

Listen now to me with concentrated attention, O son of Pritha. Some desire virtue, some good conduct, and some wealth. One may desire wealth as a means for acquiring virtue, but it would be better to abandon such desires, since there are many hazards attached to wealth and consequently, to the religious deeds that one performs with wealth, as we have seen with our own eyes. You must understand that he who desires wealth will find it very difficult to abandon it later. Good deeds are very rare in those who amass riches, for wealth can never be acquired without injuring others and, when obtained, it brings numerous troubles.

A man of narrow heart, and without remorse, tempted by even a little wealth, will commit acts of aggression towards others, unconscious all the while of the sin of Brahmahatya that he incurs by his karma. After acquiring wealth with so much difficulty, such men will burn with grief if they have to give a portion of it to their servants, grief equal to what they would feel if they were actually robbed by thieves. If one does not part with one's wealth, disgrace becomes one's lot, while he who has no wealth never becomes the subject of censure.

Withdrawn from all attachments, such a man can become happy in all respects by supporting life upon what little he may obtain as alms. The acquisition of wealth cannot give anyone happiness. In this connection those who know the ancient scriptures recite certain verses relating to sacrifices.

The Creator created wealth for the sake of sacrifices, and created man for protecting that wealth and performing yagnas. For this, all wealth should be applied to yagnas, and it is not proper to spend it for the gratification of desire or enjoyment.

Understand, O son of Kunti, you that are the foremost of all wealthy persons, that the Creator confers wealth upon mortals for the sake of yagnas. It is for this that the wise think that wealth does not belong to anybody on earth. One should perform yagnas with it and give it away with a trustful heart. One should gift away what one has acquired, and not waste or spend it in gratifying one's desires or for enjoyment. What use is there in amassing more and more wealth when such proper objects exist on which to spend it?

Men of little understanding who give away wealth to those who have swerved from the duties of their order, have to subsist hereafter for a hundred years on excrement and dirt. Men give to the undeserving and not to the deserving, unable to discriminate between the two. For this reason the practice of the virtue of charity is difficult, and even when acquired, these two faults connected with wealth remain.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Grief does not forsake my wretched self as a result of the deaths in battle of young Abhimanyu, the sons of Draupadi, Dhrishtadyumna, Virata, King Drupada, Vasusena who knew dharma well, the royal Dhrishtaketu, and of numerous other kings hailing from diverse lands. I am a slayer of kinsmen, inordinately covetous of kingdom and an exterminator of my own race.

Alas, I have cut down in battle, through lust of sovereignty, this Ganga's son upon whose breast and limbs I used to play as a boy. It lacerated my heart to see Sikhandin assailing our grandfather, a lion among men, to see him trembling and reeling from Partha's shafts like thunderbolts, and to watch his tall form, pierced all over with blazing arrows, turn weak like an aged lion. It stunned me to see this destroyer of hostile chariots collapse like a mountain summit and fall in his own ratha with his face turned towards the east.

This Kurusthama who, bow and shafts in hand, waged a fierce battle for many days with Rama himself of Bhrigu's line, on the field sanctified by Kuru, this son of Ganga, this hero who, at Varanasi, in order to take brides for Hastinapura, challenged to battle on a single ratha the assembled Kshatriyas of the world, and who burnt that irresistible and foremost of kings, Ugrayudha, with the energy of his weapons—alas, I caused this Kshatriya to be slain in battle.

This hero, knowing full well that Sikhandin, prince of Panchala, was his nemesis, nevertheless refrained from killing him with his arrows. Alas, Arjuna slew that magnanimous warrior. O best of sages, my heart burned at that moment when I saw our Pitamaha stretched out on the earth and covered in blood. Alas, for lust of a kingdom, I am now the slayer of reverend elders, a perfect fool for causing the death of one who protected and nurtured us when we were children. All for the sake of a sovereignty that will last but a few days.

I approached our guru, the great archer Drona, adored by all the kings, and gave him false news of the death of his son. The memory of this sears my limbs. The Acharya said to me, "Tell me truly, O king, whether my son still lives." Expecting truth from me, the Brahmana asked me of all others but I lied to him, though silently, saying the word 'elephant'. I am culpable for coveting the kingdom and murdering my revered elders, for, throwing off the mantle of truth which everyone believed me to wear, I told my guru on the battlefield that we had killed Aswatthaman when, in fact, we had only slain an elephant of that name.

To what hell will I go, having perpetrated such ignominious deeds? I also caused my eldest brother Karna to be slain, that awesome warrior who never retreated from battle. Who is there more sinful than I? Through greed I caused the adolescent Abhimanyu, that Kshatriya who resembled a lion born in the hills, to break into the chakra vyuha that Drona himself protected. I am like one guilty of infanticide. Since then I have not been able to look in the face Arjuna or the lotus-eyed Krishna. I grieve also for Draupadi, bereft of her five sons like the earth bereft of her five mountains. I am a great offender, a great sinner and a destroyer of the earth.

Without rising from this seat that I now occupy, I will starve myself to death. I, the killer of my guru and exterminator of my race, will sit here in the observance of the Praya vrata, in order that I may not be reborn in any of the other order of beings. I will forgo food and drink and, without moving from this place, O great ascetic, I will dry up my precious life-breaths. I beg you humbly to grant me leave to do this and thereafter go wherever you please. Let everyone grant me leave to cast off this body of mine.'" Vaisampayana continued, "Restraining Pritha's son, who uttered these words stricken by sorrow on account of his kinsmen's deaths, Vyasa, the best of Rishis, says to him, 'This cannot be! It does not become you, O monarch, to indulge in such an excess of grief. I will repeat what I have said earlier. All this is Destiny, O mighty one. Without doubt, all creatures that are born display at first a combination of diverse materials and forces which at the end, dissolve. Like bubbles in the water they rise and disappear.

All things held together are sure to crumble, and all things that rise must fall. Union ends in dissolution, and life ends in death. Idleness, though temporarily agreeable, ends in misery and skilfull labour, though temporarily distressing, ends in happiness. Affluence, prosperity, modesty, contentment and fame dwell in labour and skill, not in idleness.

Friends are not competent to bestow happiness, nor foes competent to inflict misery. Similarly, wisdom does not bring wealth, nor does wealth bring happiness. Since the Maker has created you, O son of Kunti, to engage yourself in karma, and success springs from karma, it is not fitting for you to avoid karma, O king.'" Vaisampayana said, “Vyasa then dispels the grief of the eldest son of Pandu who, burning with sorrow on account of the slaughter of his kinsmen, has resolved to kill himself.

Vyasa says, ‘O Purushavyaghra, let me tell you the old story known as Asma’s discourse. Listen to it, O Yudhishtira! Janaka, the ruler of the Videhas, once filled with sorrow and grief, questioned a wise Brahmana named Asma to alleviate his anguish.

Janaka asked, “How should a man who wishes his own good behave upon occasions such as the accession and destruction of both kinsmen and wealth?”

Asma replied, “Immediately after the formation of a man’s body, joys and grief attach themselves to it. Either of the two can overtake the man, and whichever does, quickly robs him of his reason like the wind driving away gathering clouds.

In times of prosperity, one thinks, ‘I am of high birth! I can do whatever I like! I am not an ordinary man!’ His mind becomes soaked with such triple vanity. Addicted to earthly enjoyments, he begins to waste the wealth accumulated by his ancestors. Impoverished in the course of time, he regards it as laudable even to appropriate what belongs to others. Like a hunter piercing a deer with his shafts, the king then punishes this wicked robber of the possessions of others, this transgressor of law and rule. Such men scarcely live beyond twenty or thirty years, and never attain a full human span of a hundred years.

Carefully observing the behaviour of all creatures, a king should, by the exercise of his intelligence, apply remedies to allay the great sorrows of his subjects. The causes of all mental sorrow are two—delusion of the mind and accumulation of suffering; no third cause exists. All these diverse sorrows, and those arising from attachment to worldly pleasures that overtake man, are as follows.

Age and Death, like a pair of wolves, devour all creatures, strong or weak, short or tall. No man can escape decay and death, not even the conqueror of the entire earth circled by the sea. Whether it is happiness or sorrow that comes upon creatures, it should be enjoyed or borne without elation or dejection, since there is no method of escape. The evils of life, O king, can overtake one in early, middle or old age. They can never be avoided, while the sources of bliss that one covets never come. The absence of what is agreeable, the presence of what is disagreeable, good and evil, bliss and sorrow, follow Destiny. The birth of creatures and their death, their gain and loss, are all pre-ordained.

Even as scent, colour, taste and touch spring naturally, happiness and misery arise from what is pre-ordained. Fine seats, beds and vehicles, luxuries, drinks and food, come and go in the course of time. Even physicians fall ill, the strong become weak, and they who enjoy prosperity lose all and become indigent. The course of Time is indeed marvellous. High birth, health, beauty, prosperity and objects of enjoyment, all are gained through Destiny. The poor, although they may not desire it, have many children, while one sees the affluent to be childless. Astonishing is the course of Destiny. The evils caused by disease, fire, water, weapons, hunger, poison, fever, falls from high places and death overtake a man according to the Destiny under which he is born.

One sees that in this world somebody without sinning suffers diverse ills, while another, having sinned, is not weighed down by calamity. One in the enjoyment of wealth perishes in his youth, while one who is poor drags on existence for a hundred years, worn down by decrepitude. One born to an ignoble race may have a very long life, while one sprung from a noble line may perish as quickly as an insect. In this world, it is common for people in affluent circumstances to have no appetite, while the poor can digest chips of wood.

Impelled by destiny, the man with an evil soul, discontented with his condition, commits sins, saying, "I am the doer," which he regards as being all for his good. The wise censure hunting, dice, women, wine, fighting, but we see many men possessed of extensive knowledge of the scriptures to be addicted to them. Objects, whether coveted or otherwise, come upon creatures as a result of Time's course, for one can trace no other cause. Who makes and who supports air, space, fire, moon, sun, day, night, the luminous bodies in the firmament, rivers and mountains? Cold, heat and rain come one after another in the course of Time. Just so is the case with the happiness and misery of mankind.

Neither medicines nor mantras can rescue the man assailed by age or overtaken by death. Just as two logs of wood floating on the great ocean come together and separate again, creatures come together and, when the time comes, part. Time acts equally towards men who are rich and enjoy the pleasures of song and dance in the company of women, and towards helpless men who live upon food that others give them.

In this world one contracts a thousand kinds of relationships, such as mother and father, son and wife. In reality, however, whose are they and whose are we? No one can belong to us, nor can we belong to another. Our union here with wives and kinsfolk and well-wishers is like that of travellers at a road-side inn.

Where am I? Where shall go? Who am I? How did I come here? For what and for whom do I grieve? Reflecting on these questions, one obtains tranquillity. Life and its conditions are constantly revolving like a wheel, and the companionship of those who are dear is transitory. The union with brother, mother, father and friend is like that of ways-farers at a sarai.

Men of knowledge perceive the unseen next world, as if with physical eyes. Without disregarding the scriptures, one desirous of knowledge should have faith. One possessed of knowledge should perform the rites laid down in respect of the Pitris and the Devas, practise all religious duties, perform sacrifices, judiciously pursue dharma, artha and kama.

Alas, no one understands that the world is sinking on the ocean of Time that is immensely deep and infested with the great crocodiles called decrepitude and death. We see many physicians become themselves afflicted, with all the members of their families, although they have carefully studied the science of medicine. Taking bitter and diverse kinds of oily medicaments no more allows them to escape death than the continents can escape being submerged in the ocean.

We see age overcoming men well-versed in the arts of chemistry, notwithstanding chemical compounds applied judiciously, even like elephants breaking down trees. So, too, we see men of tapasya, devoted to study of the Vedas, practising charity, and frequently performing sacrifices, fail to escape decrepitude and death. For all creatures that have taken birth, neither years, nor months, nor fortnights, nor days, nor nights that have once passed, ever return. In due course, man, whose existence is transitory, is forced inevitably by Time onto this broad path that every creature perforce has to tread.

Whether the body springs from the creature or the creature springs from the body, one's union with wives and friends is truly like that of transients at a wayfarers' lodgings. No one can obtain a lasting companionship with another. One cannot obtain such companionship with one's own body: how then can it be had with anyone else? Where, O king, is your father today, and where your grandfather? You do not see them, O sinless one, and they do not see you!

No person can see either heaven or hell. The scriptures, however, are the eyes of the virtuous. Frame your conduct, O king, according to the scriptures. With pure heart, one should first practise the vow of brahmacharya, then have children, and then perform sacrifices, to pay the debt one owes to the manes, the gods and men.

A wise man, after having first kept the vow of brahmacharya, should perform yagnas and have children and, after casting off all anxieties of his heart, should pay court to heaven, this world, and his own soul. The king bent upon the practice of dharma, who strives judiciously to acquire Heaven and earth, and who takes only his share of earthly goods, wins a reputation that spreads over all the worlds and among all creatures, mobile and immobile."

The ruler of the Videhas, of clear understanding, having heard these wise words, became free from grief and, taking Asma's leave, returned to his home. O Yudhishtira of unfading glory, cast off your sorrow and rise up. You are equal to Sakra himself. Suffer your soul to be happy: you have won the earth in the exercise of Kshatriya dharma, so enjoy her, O son of Kunti. Do not disregard my words.'"

Vaisampayana said, “Yudhishtira Dharmaputra, best of kings, remains silent. Pandu’s son Arjuna says to Krishna, ‘This Parantapa, Dharma’s son, burns with grief on account of his slaughtered kinsfolk. Comfort him again, O Madhava. All of us have fallen into great danger. You, Mahabaho, must dispel his grief.’”

Vaisampayana continued, “The lotus-eyed Govinda of eternal glory turns his face towards the king. Yudhishtira cannot possibly disregard Kesava, for from their earliest years Govinda was dearer to him than even Arjuna.

Taking the king’s hand, smeared with sandalwood-paste and looking like a column of marble, the mighty-armed Saurin begins to speak, gladdening the hearts of all who listen to him. His face, adorned with beautiful teeth and eyes, glows like a full-blown lotus at sunrise.

Vasudeva says, ‘Do not, Purushavyaghra, indulge in grief that emaciates your body. Those slain in this battle cannot be brought back. These Kshatriyas, O king, who have fallen in this great war are like objects in one’s dreams that vanish when one awakes. All of them were heroes and ornaments of battle.

We vanquished them while they rushed at us, their enemies. They were all slain facing us, none had wounds in their backs from fleeing battle. They all fought with heroes and, after having cast off their life-breath in the great war, ascended into heaven, sanctified by weapons.

It is not right to grieve for them. All of them, cleaving to the Kshatriya dharma, possessed of valour, perfectly conversant with the Vedas and their angas, have attained the blissful end reserved for heroes. Set aside your grief for them after hearing the stories of ancient days about the high-souled lords of the earth who departed from this world.

There is an old story about the discourse of Narada with Srinjaya who was grief-stricken at the death of his son. Narada said, "You, I and all creatures, O Srinjaya, are subject to happiness and misery, and will have to die. Then what cause is there for sorrow? Listen to me with attention as I recite the great blessedness of some ancient kings. Listening to the story of these noble lords of the earth, you will cast off your grief and abate your sorrow.

As I recite their charming and delightful tales to you in detail, the malignant stars will be propitiated and the span of your life will increase.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that there was a king of the name of Marutta who was the son of Avikshit, and that even he fell prey to death. The gods, with Indra and Varuna and Brihaspati at their head, came to the sacrifice, called Viswasrij, performed by this great monarch. Challenging Sakra, the lord of the Devas, Marutta vanquished him in battle.

From a desire to earn Indra's favour, the learned Brihaspati had refused to officiate at Marutta's sacrifice. Thereupon Samvarta, the younger brother of Brihaspati, acceded to the king's request to be his chief Ritvik. During the rule of Marutta the earth yielded crops without being tilled and was embellished with diverse kinds of ornaments. At the sacrifice of this king, the Viswadevas sat as courtiers, the Maruts were the distributors of food and gifts and the high-souled Sadhyas were also present.

During this sacrifice of Marutta, the Maruts drank soma. The sacrificial gifts the king made surpassed in value those ever made by the Devas, the Gandharvas and all men. When even Marutta, O Srinjaya, who surpassed you in religious merit, knowledge, renunciation and affluence, and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, of another king named Suhotra, the son of Atithi, who too, fell a prey to death. During his rule, Maghavat showered gold for one whole year upon his kingdom. Obtaining this king for her lord, the earth became in reality, and not merely in name, Vasumati.

Indra showered upon the rivers, during the sway of this sovereign, golden tortoises, crabs, alligators, sharks and porpoises. Beholding these golden fish, sharks and tortoises in hundreds and thousands, Atithi's son became filled with wonder. Collecting the vast wealth of gold that covered the earth, Suhotra performed a sacrifice at Kurujangala and gave it away to Brahmanas.

When this King Suhotra, O Srinjaya, who surpassed you in the four attributes of tapasya, gyana, vairagya and dhana, and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son. Your son never performed a sacrifice and never made gifts. Knowing this, pacify your mind and do not give away to grief.

We also hear, O Srinjaya, that Brihadratha, the king of the Angas, fell prey to death. He gave away a hundred thousand horses and a hundred thousand maidens, adorned with golden ornaments, as dakshina at a yagna that he performed. A hundred thousand elephants also of the best breed he gave away as gifts at another yagna that he performed.

He also gave away as sacrificial charity a hundred million bulls, adorned with golden chains, accompanied by untold thousands of cows. While the king of Anga performed his sacrifice by the hill called Vishnupada, Indra became intoxicated with the soma he drank, and the Brahmanas with the gifts they received.

During the yagnas, O monarch, numbering hundreds, that this king performed in the days of old, the gifts he made far surpassed those ever made by the Devas, the Gandharvas and Manavas. No other man born, or that will ever be born, will give away so much wealth as did the king of the Angas during the seven sacrifices he performed, each of which was marked by the consecration of soma.

When, O Srinjaya, this Brihadratha, who was your superior in the four attributes and who was purer than your son, also fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear also, O Srinjaya, that Sibi, the son of Usinara, fell prey to death. This king swayed the whole earth as one does the leather shield in his hand. Riding on a single chariot that proved victorious in every battle, King Sibi subjugated every other monarch and caused the earth to resound with the rattle of his wheels.

Usinara's son Sibi gave away in a sacrifice all the cows and horses he had, both domesticated and wild. The Creator himself thought that no one among the kings of the past or the future had or would have the ability to bear the burden, as this Usinara's son Sibi did, that foremost of kings, that hero who possessed skill equal to that of Indra. Do not, therefore, grieve for your son who never performed any sacrifice or made any gift when indeed, Sibi, who was far superior to you in the four attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that the high-souled Bharata also, the son of Dushyanta and Sakuntala, who had a vast and well-filled treasury, fell prey to death. Devoting three hundred horses to the gods on the banks of the Yamuna, twenty on the banks of the Saraswati, and fourteen on the banks of the Ganga, that king of great tejas, of the olden days, performed a thousand Aswamedhas and a hundred Rajasuyas.

None among the kings of the earth can match the great deeds of Bharata, just as no man can, by the might of his arms, soar into the sky. Erecting numerous sacrificial altars, he gave away innumerable horses and untold wealth to the Rishi Kanwa. When even he, O Srinjaya, who was far superior to you in the four attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that Rama, the son of Dasaratha, also fell prey to death. He always cherished his subjects as if they were his own sons. In his dominions there were no widows and no one who was helpless. Indeed, in ruling his kingdom Rama was always like his father Dasaratha. The clouds, yielding showers seasonably, caused crops to grow in plenitude. During his rule, food was always abundant in his kingdom. No death occurred by drowning or by fire.

As long as Rama ruled, there was no fear in his kingdom of any disease. Every man lived for a thousand years, blessed with a thousand children. During Ramarajya, all men were whole and all men had their wishes fulfilled. When even the women did not quarrel, then what can be said of the men? During his rule his subjects were virtuous, contented, their desires satisfied, fearless, free and wedded to the vow of truth.

The trees bore flowers and fruit perennially, and met with no injury. Every cow yielded milk filling a drona to the brim. Having dwelt in the observance of severe tapasya for fourteen years in the forest, Rama performed ten Aswamedhas of great splendour to which he invited everyone. Young and dark, handsome, with reddened eyes, he looked like the leader of an elephant herd, with great and mighty arms stretching down to his knees and with shoulders like those of a lion.

Ascending the throne of Ayodhya, he ruled for ten thousand and ten hundred years. When Rama, O Srinjaya, who excelled you by far in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that King Bhagiratha also died. During one of the sacrifices of this king, intoxicated with the soma he had drunk, Indra, the adorable chastiser of Paka and king of the Devas, put forth the might of his arms and vanquished many thousands of Asuras.

At one of the sacrifices he performed, King Bhagiratha gave away a million maidens adorned with ornaments of gold. Each of these maidens sat on a chariot attached to four pedigreed steeds. With each chariot were a hundred elephants, all of the finest breed and decked with chains of gold. Behind each elephant were a thousand horses, and behind each one a thousand cows and behind each cow a thousand goats and sheep.

The river-goddess Ganga, earlier known as Bhagirathi, sat upon the lap of this king who dwelt near her stream, and since then came to be called Urvasi, 'one who sits on the lap'. The triple-coursed Ganga had agreed to be the daughter of Bhagiratha of Ikshvaku's race, the monarch always engaged in the performance of sacrifices with gifts in profusion to Brahmanas.

When he, O Srinjaya, who transcended you in respect of the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that the Mahatman Dilipa also fell prey to death. The Brahmanas love to recite his innumerable deeds. During one of his great sacrifices this king, with his heart fully assenting, gave away the entire earth, abounding with wealth, to the Brahmanas. At each sacrifice performed by him, the chief priest received as sacrificial fee a thousand elephants made of gold.

At one of his yagnas, the stake set up for slaughtering the victims was made of gold and exceedingly beautiful. Discharging the duties assigned to them, the gods having Sakra for their lord, used to seek the protection of this king. Upon this shining golden stake, decked with a ring, six thousand Devas and Gandharvas danced in joy, and Viswavasu himself in their midst played a raga on his vina. Such was Viswavasu's music that every creature, whatever he might be, thought that the great Gandharva was playing to him alone.

No other monarch could imitate this achievement of King Dilipa. The elephants of this king, intoxicated and adorned with trappings of gold, would be found lying down on the roads. The men who succeeded in obtaining even a sight of the Rajarishi Dilipa, went to heaven, as he was ever truthful in speech and his bow could withstand a hundred foes equal in energy to a hundred Anantas.

These three sounds never ceased in Dilipa's abode—the chanting of the Vedas, the twanging of bows, and cries of 'Let it be given!' When he, O Srinjaya, who transcended you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

Yuvanaswa's son Mandhatri also, O Sanjaya, we hear, fell prey to death. The Maruts extracted this child from his father's stomach through one side. Sprung from a quantity of clarified butter sanctified by mantras that had by mistake been quaffed by his father instead of his mother, Mandhatri had been gestated in the belly of Yuvanaswa.

This most prosperous king, Mandhatri, conquered the three worlds. Seeing this child of celestial beauty lying on the lap of his father, the gods asked one another, 'From whom shall this child suckle?'

Then Indra came forward, saying, 'He shall have it even from me!' The chief of the deities therefore named the child Mandhatri. For the nourishment of that great child, the finger of Indra, placed in his mouth, began to yield a jet of milk. Sucking Indra's finger, he grew into a powerful youth in a hundred days. In twelve days he looked like one of twelve years.

The whole earth in one day came under the sway of this high-souled, virtuous and brave king who resembled Indra himself for his prowess in battle. He vanquished King Angada, Marutta, Asita, Gaya and Brihadratha of the Angas. When Mandhatri fought in battle with Angada, the gods thought that the firmament was breaking apart with the twanging of his bow, and the whole earth from where Surya rises to where he sets was his field.

Having performed a hundred Aswamedhas and a hundred Rajasuyas, he gave the Brahmanas many Rohita fish. These fish were each ten yojanas in length and one in breadth. The other varnas divided among themselves those that remained after gratifying the Brahmanas.

When he, O Srinjaya, who transcended you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that Yayati, the son of Nahusha, also fell prey to death.

Having subjugated the whole world with its seas, he journeyed through it, decking it with successive sacrificial altars; with throws of a heavy piece of wood, he measured the intervals between the altars. Indeed, he reached the very shores of the sea as he went performing great sacrifices on those altars along his way.

Having performed a thousand yagnas and a hundred Vajapeyas, he gratified the foremost of Brahmanas with three mountains of gold. Having slain many Daityas and Danavas in battle, Nahusha's son Yayati divided the earth among his children. At last, discarding his other sons, headed by Yadu and Drahyu, he installed his youngest son Puru on his throne and then entered the forest with his wife.

When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that Ambarisha also, the son of Nabhaga, fell a prey to death. The subjects regarded this protector of the world and foremost of kings as the embodiment of dharma.

During one of his sacrifices, this sovereign assigned to the Brahmanas, to wait upon them, a million kings who had themselves performed thousands of sacrifices each. Men of piety praised Ambarisha, the son of Nabhaga, saying that such feats had never been achieved before, nor would their like be achieved in the future. These hundreds upon hundreds and thousands upon thousands of kings, that had at the command of Ambarisha waited at his sacrifices upon the presiding Brahmanas, became, through Ambarisha's punya, crowned with the fruits of the Aswamedha and followed their lord by the southern-path to regions of brightness and bliss.

When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead child.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that Sasabindu also, the son of Chitrasena, fell prey to death. This Rajarishi had a hundred thousand wives, and a million consorts, and sons by them, all of whom used to wear golden armour and were excellent bowmen. Each of these princes married a hundred princesses, and each princess brought a hundred elephants as her dower. With each of these elephants were a hundred chariots. With each chariot were a hundred steeds, all of good breed and all decked with trappings of gold. With each steed were a hundred cattle, and with each cow were a hundred sheep and goats.

This countless wealth Sasabindu gave away, at a horse-sacrifice, to the Brahmanas. When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead child.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that Gaya also, the son of Amurtarayas, fell a prey to death. For a hundred years, this king subsisted upon the remains of sacrificial food. Pleased with such devotion, Agni wanted to give him boons. The boons solicited by Gaya were, 'Let my wealth be inexhaustible, even if I give endlessly. Let my regard for dharma exist for ever. Let my heart take pleasure in Truth forever, through your grace, O consumer of sacrificial offerings.'

We hear that King Gaya obtained all these wishes from Agni. On days of the new moon, on those of the full moon, and on every fourth month, for a thousand years, Gaya repeatedly performed the Aswamedha. During this period he gave away a hundred thousand cattle and hundreds of mules to Brahmanas at the completion of every sacrifice.

This bull among men gratified the Devas with soma, the Brahmanas with wealth, the Pitris with Swadha, and the women with the satisfaction of all their wishes. During his great Horse-sacrifice, Gaya caused a golden ground to be made, measuring a hundred cubits in length and fifty in breadth, and gave it away as the sacrificial fee. This foremost of men, Gaya, the son of Amurtarayas, gave away as many cows as there are grains of sand in the Ganga river.

When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes, and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that Sankriti's son Rantideva also fell a prey to death. Having undergone the austerest of penances and worshipped Sakra with great reverence, he solicited these boons from him: 'Let us have abundant food and numerous guests. Let not my faith sustain any diminution, and let me not have to ask anyone for anything.'

The animals, both domesticated and wild, slaughtered at his sacrifice, used to come of their own accord to the high-souled Rantideva of rigid vows and great fame. The secretions that flowed from the skins of the animals slaughtered in his sacrifices produced a mighty and celebrated river which to this day is known by the name of Charmanwati. King Rantideva would make gifts to the Brahmanas in an extensive enclosure.

When the king said, ‘I give you a hundred nishkas!’ the Brahmanas rejected what was offered. When, however, the king would say, ‘I give a thousand nishkas!’ they accepted. All the vessels and plates in Rantideva’s palace, all the jugs and pots, the pans, plates and cups, were of gold. On nights when guests lived in Rantideva’s abode, twenty-thousand and one hundred cattle had to be slaughtered. Yet even on such occasions, the cooks, decked in earrings, used to boast to those who sat down to eat: ‘There is abundant soup, take as much as you wish; but we do not have as much meat today as we used to.’

When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that the high-souled Sagara also fell a prey to death. He was of Ikshvaku’s race, a tiger among men, and of superhuman prowess. Sixty-thousand sons used to walk behind him, like ten thousand stars waiting upon the moon in the cloudless firmament of autumn. His sway extended over the whole of this earth. He gratified the gods by performing a thousand Horse-sacrifices. He gave away to deserving Brahmanas palatial mansions with columns and other parts made of gold, containing costly beds and bevies of beautiful women with eyes like lotus petals, and diverse other kinds of precious objects. At his command, the Brahmanas divided these gifts among themselves.

Through anger this king caused the earth to be excavated, whereupon she came to have the ocean on her bosom, and for this, the ocean has come to be named Sagara after him. When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

We hear, O Srinjaya, that king Prithu, the son of Vena, also fell prey to death. The great Rishis, assembling together in the great forest, installed him in the sovereignty of the earth. And because it was thought that he would advance all mankind, he was called Prithu, the advancer. And because he protected people from injuries—Kshata, he was called a Kshatriya.

Seeing Prithu, the son of Vena, all the creatures of the earth exclaimed, 'We are now attached to him!' From this circumstance of the devotion of all creatures to him, he came to be called a Raja—one who can inspire attachment. The earth, during his sway, yielded crops without being tilled, every leaf that the trees had bore honey, and every cow yielded a large jugful of milk. All men were healthy, all their wishes granted. They had no fear of any kind. They used to live as they pleased, in fields or in houses.

When Prithu wanted to go over the sea, the waters became solid. The rivers also never swelled up when he had to cross them but remained perfectly calm. The flag on his chariot moved unobstructed everywhere. King Prithu, during one of his grand Aswamedha Yagnas, gave away to the Brahmanas twenty-one mountains of gold, each measuring three nalwas. When he, O Srinjaya, who far surpassed you in the four principal attributes and who was purer than your son, fell prey to death, do not grieve for your dead son.

What, O Srinjaya, are you reflecting in silence? It seems, O king, that you do not hear my words. If you have not heard them, then my discourse has been a fruitless rhapsody, like medicine or a diet to a person on the point of death."

Srinjaya said, "I am listening O Narada, to your discourse of excellent import and perfumed like a garland of flowers, this discourse upon the conduct of Rajarishis of wondrous deeds and great fame that can certainly dispel grief. Your discourse, O Maharishi, has not been a fruitless rhapsody. The very sight of you has freed me from grief. Like one never replete from drinking nectar, I am not satiated with your words. If you of true vision, O lord, can show grace towards this man burning with grief on account of the death of his son, then this son, through your grace, is sure to be revived and to rejoin me once more in this life."

Narada said, "I will give back your son bereft of life named Suvarnashthivin, whom Parvata gave you. Splendid as gold, this child shall live a thousand years."""

CANTO 30

"Yudhishtira asks, 'How did the son of Srinjaya become Suvarnashthivin? Why did Parvata give Srinjaya this child and why did he die? When the lives of all men in those days extended for a thousand years, why did Srinjaya's son die in infancy? Or was he Suvarnashthivin, gold-secreter, only in name? How did he come to be so? I want to know all.'

Krishna replies, 'I will tell you, O king, the facts as they happened. There are two Rishis, the foremost ones in the world, named Narada and Parvata. Narada is the maternal uncle and Parvata is his sister's son. With cheerful hearts, the uncle Narada and the nephew Parvata, in the olden days, left heaven to ramble across the earth and to taste clarified butter and rice.

Both of them, possessed of great ascetic merit, wandered over the earth, subsisting on food eaten by men. Filled with joy and entertaining great affection for each other, they entered into a compact that whatever desire, good or bad, one of them entertained, he would disclose it to the other and, in the event of one of them doing otherwise, he would be subject to the other's curse.

Agreeing to this understanding, these two great Rishis, adored by all the worlds, went to King Srinjaya, the son of Sitya, and told him, "For your benefit, both of us will stay with you for a few days. O lord of the world, attend to all our wants."

The king, saying "So be it!" set himself to attend upon them hospitably. One day, the joyful Srinjaya introduced to these illustrious ascetics his fair daughter, saying, "This is my daughter Sukumari, and she will wait upon you both. Bright as the filament of the lotus, she is beautiful and of faultless limbs, accomplished and of sweet manners."

"Very well," said the Rishis in reply, upon which the king instructed his daughter, "My child, attend upon these two Brahmanas as you would attend upon the gods or your father."

Saying, "Tathaastu," the virtuous Sukumari began to attend upon them in obedience to her father's behest. Her dutiful services and her unrivalled beauty very soon charmed Narada, and he began to cherish a tender flame towards her. This sentiment began to grow in the heart of the illustrious saint like the moon gradually waxing on the accession of the lit fortnight.

However, overwhelmed by shame, Narada could not disclose this growing ardour to his sister's son, the high-souled Parvata. Through his ascetic power, and also by Narada's behaviour, Parvata understood all. Inflamed with rage, he resolved to curse his love-afflicted uncle.

He said, "Having made a compact with me that whatever desire, good or bad, is cherished by either of us will be disclosed to the other, you have violated it. These were your own words. O Brahmana! I will curse you for this. You did not tell me that the charms of the maiden Sukumari have pierced your heart! You are a Brahmacharin, my guru, a Muni and a Brahmana. Yet you have broken the compact you made with me. I am angry and I will curse even you. Listen to me. This Sukumari will, without doubt, become your wife. From the time of your marriage, however, O Great One, both she and all men will see you as an ape, for your true features will disappear and you will have a monkey's face!"

Hearing this, Narada, filled with wrath, cursed his nephew Parvata in return, "Although you have ascetic merit and brahmacharya and truth and self-restraint, and although you are ever devoted to dharma, you will yet not be able to return to Swarga."

Thus in rage they cursed each other like two infuriated elephants. From that time the high-souled Parvata began to wander over the earth, respected as he deserved, O Bhaarata, for his own tejas. Narada, the greatest of Brahmanas, obtained with due rites the hand of Srinjaya's daughter, the faultless Sukumari.

But the princess saw Narada exactly as the curse had said. Indeed, just after the priests recited the last of the wedding mantras, Sukumari saw the celestial Rishi with the face of an ape. She, however, did not disregard her husband; on the contrary, she dedicated her love to him. Indeed, the princess, chaste as she was, devoted herself entirely to her lord and did not in her heart desire anyone else for a husband, even among the Devas, Munis and Yakshas.

One day, the illustrious Parvata, in the course of his wanderings, entered a solitary forest, and saw Narada there. Saluting him, Parvata said, “Show your grace to me, O mighty one, by allowing me to return to heaven.” Seeing the unhappy Parvata kneeling before him with folded hands, Narada felt sorry and told him, “You cursed me first, saying, ‘Be an ape!’ After which, I cursed you from anger, saying, ‘From this day you will not live in heaven!’ It was not right of you to curse me, since you are like a son to me.”

The two sages then freed each other from their curses. Seeing her husband possessed of celestial form and blazing with beauty, Sukumari fled from him, thinking him to be somebody other than her lord. Seeing the beautiful princess flying from Narada, Parvata said to her, “This is indeed your husband. He is the illustrious and powerful Rishi Narada, the foremost of virtuous men. He is your husband of one soul with you. Do not have any doubt about this.”

Assured in diverse ways by the high Parvata and informed also of the curse, the princess regained her equanimity. Then Parvata ascended to heaven and Narada returned to his home.’

Krishna continues, ‘The illustrious Rishi Narada, who himself played a part in this matter, is here, O best of men. If you ask him he will tell you everything that happened.’” Vaisampayana said, "The royal son of Pandu then asks Narada, 'Holy one, I want to hear of the birth of the child whose excreta were gold.' Narada Muni begins to narrate everything about the child of the golden secretions.

CANTO 31

Narada says, 'It is exactly as Kesava has said. Since you asked me I will now tell you the remaining part of this story. My sister's son, the Maharishi Parvata, and I once came to stay with Srinjaya, foremost of all victorious kings. He honoured us with all ceremony and gratified our every wish when we lived with him.

After the season of rain had passed, and when the time came for our own departure, Parvata raised this important and appropriate point with me: "We have dwelt in the abode of this king for some time, O Brahmana, and have been greatly honoured by him. Think of what we should give him in return."

I then told Parvata of blessed aspect, "Nephew, this concern becomes you, O you of great power, and all this depends upon you. Through your blessings let the king be made happy and let him obtain his wishes. Or, if you choose, let him be crowned with success through the ascetic merits of both of us."

At this, having summoned King Srinjaya, Parvata said to him, "You have gratified us exceedingly, Rajan, with your sincere hospitality. Think of a gift you would like. Let it be such that it may not imply enmity to the gods or destruction to men. Accept then, O king, a boon, for we think you deserve one."

Srinjaya replied, "If I have satisfied you both, then I have gained my object, for this is itself my greatest gain and I regard this as the realization of all my desires."

Parvata once again said, "Ask us, Rajan, for the fulfillment of that wish which you have cherished in your heart for a long time."

Srinjaya answered, "I desire a son who will be heroic and possessed of great energy, firm in his vows and of long life, highly blessed and possessed of splendour equal to that of Indra himself."

Parvata said, "Your desire will be fulfilled, but your child will not be long-lived, for your wish for such a son is also for prevailing over Indra. Your son will be known by the name of Suvarnashthivin. He will have splendour like Indra, but take care to protect him always from that Deva."

Hearing these words of Parvata Mahatman, Srinjaya began to beg the Rishis to change his boon, saying, "Let my son be long-lived, O Muni, through your tapasya."

Parvata remained silent, being partial to Indra. Seeing the king very sad I told him, "Think of me, O king, in your distress and I promise to come when you do. Do not grieve, O lord of earth! I will give you back your beloved child, even if he is dead, in his living form."

With that, both of us left his presence to go our different ways, and Srinjaya to his palace. In due course, the Rajarishi Srinjaya became the father of a son of great ability who blazed with tejas. The child grew up like a large lotus in a lake, and became Suvarnashthivin in reality as in name.

This extraordinary child, O Kuruttama, soon became widely known over the world. Indra also came to know that he was the fruit of Parvata's boon. Fearing humiliation at the hands of the child when he grew up, the slayer of Bala and Vritra began to watch closely for any lapses by the prince.

He commanded his Vajra, standing before him in embodied form, "Go, powerful one, and, assuming the form of a tiger, kill this prince. When grown up, this child of Srinjaya may, as Parvata prophesied, humiliate me through his achievements." The Vajra, razer of hostile towns, began from that day to continually watch for any lapse from the prince.

Meanwhile, Srinjaya was filled with joy having got a child whose splendour resembled that of Indra himself. The king, accompanied by his wives, and the other women of his household, began living in the midst of a forest. One day, on the shores of the Bhagirathi, the boy, accompanied by his nurse, was playing, running about here and there. Though only five years of age, his prowess, even then, resembled that of a mighty elephant.

While playing, the child met a powerful tiger that came upon him suddenly. The infant prince trembled violently as the tiger attacked him, and fell lifeless on the earth. His nursemaid gave vent to loud cries of grief.

Having slain the prince, the tiger, through Indra's powers of maya, vanished. Hearing the screams of the nurse, the king ran to the spot in great anxiety, and saw his son drained of blood, lying dead on the ground like the moon fallen from the firmament. Taking the boy covered with blood up onto his lap, the grief-stricken king began to lament piteously. The royal women rushed wailing to King Srinjaya.

The king thought of me with concentrated attention. Knowing that the king was thinking of me, I appeared before him. Stricken as the king was, I told him all those stories, Rajan, that this hero of Yadu's race has already related to you. With Indra's leave, I brought Srinjaya's child back to life.

That which is ordained must come to pass, it is impossible that it should be otherwise. After this, Prince Suvarnashthivin of great fame and energy began to delight the hearts of his parents. Of great prowess, he ascended the throne after his father's death, and ruled for one thousand and one hundred years. He worshipped the gods with many great sacrifices distinguished by lavish gifts. Possessed of great splendour, he gratified the Devas and the Pitris.

He had many sons, all of whom multiplied the race, and after many years he met with a natural death. O best of men, dispel this grief born in your heart, as Kesava and Vyasa of austere penances have counselled you to. Rise up, Rajan, and bear the burden of this your ancestral kingdom; perform high and great sacrifices so that you may obtain hereafter whatever regions you desire!'" Vaisampayana said, "To king Yudhishtira, who still remained speechless and plunged in grief, the island-born Maharishi Vyasa, knower of dharma, says again, 'O you of eyes like lotus petals, the protection of subjects is the dharma of kings. Those who are always observant of dharma regard it to be all-powerful. Do, therefore, O Rajan, walk in the steps of your ancestors.

CANTO 32

For Brahmanas, tapasya is a duty, as laid down by the eternal law of the Vedas. Tapasya, therefore, Bharatarishabha, constitutes the eternal duty of Brahmanas.

A Kshatriya is the protector of all in respect of their dharma. The man who, obsessed by earthly possessions, breaks wholesome restraints and offends social harmony must be punished with a strong hand. Such a brutish man who seeks to offend authority, be he an attendant, a son or even a sage, should by every means be chastised, or even killed, along with all men of similar sinful natures.

The king who conducts himself in any other manner incurs sin. He who does not protect dharma when someone disregards it is himself a transgressor of righteousness. The Kauravas were transgressors of dharma and you have slain them along with their followers. Since you have been observant of your svadharma, why then, Pandava, do you indulge in such grief?

The king must kill those who deserve death, make gifts to persons deserving of charity, and protect his subjects according to the law.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘I do not doubt the words that fall from your lips, O Mahatapasvin! Everything concerning niti and dharma is well known to you. I have, however, for the sake of kingdom, caused numbers to be slain. These savage and bloody deeds, O Brahmana, consume me!’

Vyasa asks, ‘Is the Paramatman the doer, or is man the doer? Is everything the result of chance in this world, or are the fruits that we enjoy or suffer the results of karma? If man is responsible for all karma, good or bad, being urged to do so by Brahman, the Supreme Being, then the fruits of these acts should be for Brahman himself. If a man cuts down a tree in forest with an axe, it is he who incurs the sin, not the axe.

Or, if one says that the axe being only the material cause, the consequence of the deed should attach to the animate agent and not to the inanimate tool, then the sin may be said to belong to the man who made the axe—but this can scarcely be true. If it is not reasonable, Kaunteya, that one man should incur the consequence of a thing done by another, then you should ascribe all responsibility to the Supreme Being.

If, again, man is himself the agent of all his actions, virtuous and sinful, then there is no Supreme Agent, and so, whatever you have done cannot bring evil consequences upon you. No one, O king, can ever turn away from what is destined. If, again, destiny be the result of the deeds of former lives, then no sin can be attached to one in this life, just as the sin of cutting down a tree cannot touch the maker of the axe.

If you think it is only chance that acts in the world, then such a vast war of destruction would never have happened, nor ever will. If you need to ascertain what is good and what is evil in the world, attend to the shastras. These scriptures have laid down that kings should stand with the danda uplifted in their hands. I think, Bhaarata, that karma, good and bad, continually revolves here as a wheel, and men obtain the fruits of their actions, good or evil.

One sinful deed proceeds from another. Therefore, Purushavyaghra, avoid all evil actions and do not set your heart upon grief. You should adhere to the duties, even if reproachable, of your own order. This self-destruction, Rajan, is not commendable in you. Atonements have been ordained for evil acts. He who is alive can perform them, but he who dies fails in their performance. Therefore, O Rajan, without laying down your life, perform these expiatory rites. If you do not perform them, you may have to repent in the next world.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'Sons and grandsons, brothers and fathers, fathers-in-law, acharyas, maternal uncles and grandfathers, many noble Kshatriyas, many relatives by marriage, friends, companions, sisters' sons, and kinsmen have fallen O grandfather, and many great men coming from diverse countries. I alone have caused all of them to be slain, from my desire for kingdom. Having slain many heroic kings devoted to dharma, all of whom had drunk soma during sacrifices, what end will I attain, O wisest of all sages?

My body is on fire, thinking that the earth is bereft of the many prosperous lions among kings who were enjoying great prosperity. Having witnessed this slaughter of kinsmen and millions of other men, I burn with grief, grandfather!

Oh, what will be the plight of those best of women deprived of their sons, of husbands, and of brothers? Reproaching the Pandavas and the Vrishnis as cruel murderers, these gaunt-faced women, plunged in grief, will throw themselves on the earth and, through sorrow, will cast off their life-breath, and go to the halls of Yama, O best of Brahmanas. I have no doubt of this!

The course of dharma is subtle, and it is plain that we will be stained with guilt for the deaths of these women. Having killed our kinsmen and friends and committed an inexpiable sin, we will fall into hell with our heads downwards.

So, O best of men, we will waste our limbs with the austerest of tapasyas. Tell me, O Pitamaha, what asrama of life I should adopt?'" Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing these words of Yudhishtira, the island-born Rishi, having reflected keenly for some time, says, 'Remember the dharma of a Kshatriya, O Rajan, and do not give way to grief. All these Kshatriyas have fallen while engaged in performing their svadharma of pursuing greater prosperity and greater fame on earth, O Bharatarishabha. These great men, all of whom were mortal, have perished through the influence of Kaala, inexorable Time.

You were not their slayer, nor Bhima, nor Arjuna, nor the twins. It is Time that took away their lives according to the inviolable law of change. Kaala has neither mother, nor father, nor anybody to whom he is disposed to show any favour. He is the witness of the actions of all creatures, and it is he who has taken them away. This battle, O Bharatarishabha, was only an event that he created. He causes creatures to be slain through other creatures, and this is how he demonstrates his irresistible power.

Understand that Kaala in his dealings with creatures is dependent upon the bonds of action and is the witness of all karma, good and bad. It is Time that brings about the fruits of our deeds, whether bliss or sorrow. Think, O Mahabaho, of the deeds of these Kshatriyas who have fallen. Their karma was the cause of their destruction, and for that they perished.

Think also of your own karma, of adhering to vows with a calm soul, and also of how the Supreme Ordainer has forced you to do your karma—the slaughter of so many men. Just as a weapon made by a smith or carpenter is under the control of the one that handles it, and moves as he moves it, this universe, controlled by actions done in Time, moves as those actions move it.

Seeing that the births and deaths of creatures take place without any assignable cause and in perfect wantonness, grief and joy are entirely needless. Although this entanglement of your heart is a mere delusion, still, if it pleases you, O king, perform expiatory rites to purify yourself of your so-called sin.

It is heard, O Kaunteya, that the Devas and the Asuras, covetous of prosperity, fought each other. The Asuras were the elder, and the gods the younger, brothers. Fierce was the battle between them, lasting for thirty-two thousand years. Making the earth one vast sea of blood, the Devas slew the Daityas and gained possession of Swarga.

Having obtained possession of the earth, a large number of Brahmanas, conversant with the Vedas, armed themselves, and stupefied with pride, sided with the Danavas and helped them in the fight. They were known by the name of Salavrika and numbered eighty-eight thousand. But the Devas slew all of them. So these evil men who desire the extinction of dharma and who were promoting adharma deserved to be slain, just as the gods did the ferocious demons.

If by slaying a single individual a family can be saved, or, if by slaying a single family the whole kingdom can be saved, such an act of killing will not be a transgression. Sin, O king, sometimes assumes the form of virtue, and virtue sometimes assumes the form of sin. However, they who are learned know which is which.

Therefore, console yourself, O son of Pandu, for you are well versed in the shastras. You, O Bhaarata, have only followed the path that the gods formerly trod. Men like you never reach hell. Comfort your brothers and all your friends, O Parantapa.

He who deliberately sins and feels no shame, but continues transgressing as before, is called in the shastras a great sinner. There is no atonement for him, and his offences know no diminution. You are born into a noble race. Forced by the faults of others, you have most unwillingly fought this war and, having done so, you repent.

The great yagna, the Aswamedha, is the expiation for you. Make preparations for this sacrifice, O monarch, and you will be freed from your sins.

The divine chastiser of Paka, having vanquished his foes with the help of the Maruts, gradually performed a hundred sacrifices and became Satakratu. Freed from stain, possessed of Devaloka and having obtained many realms of bliss and prosperity, Sakra, surrounded by the Maruts, shines in beauty, and illumines all the quarters with his splendour. The Apsaras adore the lord of Sachi in the heavens. The Rishis and the other gods all worship him with reverence.

You have won the earth through your prowess. You have vanquished all the kings, O sinless one; through your power, go with your friends to their kingdom, O king, and install their brothers, sons or grandsons on their thrones. Behave with kindness towards even the children in the womb, make your subjects glad, and rule the earth. Install on their thrones the daughters of those who have no sons. Women are fond of pleasure and power, and they will cast off their sorrows and become happy. Having comforted the whole empire in this way, O Bhaarata, please the gods with an Aswamedha yagna as the virtuous Indra did in earlier days.

It is not proper for us to grieve for the noble Kshatriyas who have fallen in battle. Struck by the power of the Destroyer, they have perished while observing their swadharma. You have discharged the duties of a Kshatriya and gained the earth without any thorn left in it.

Observe your swadharma, O Kaunteya, for then you will be able to enjoy happiness in the other world, O Bhaarata.'"

CANTOS 34–35

"Yudhishtira says, 'When does it become necessary for a man to perform penance? And what must he do to be freed from sin? Tell me, O Pitamaha.'

Vyasa says, 'If a man neglects to do what the Supreme Ordainer has ordained for him, or if he does what is forbidden to him, or if he behaves deceitfully, he is compelled to perform atonement rites.

The Brahmachari who forgets a vow; who rises from bed after sunrise, or goes to bed while the sun is setting; one who has rotten nails or black teeth; one whose younger brother weds first, or who weds before his elder brother; one who is guilty of killing a Brahmana; who speaks ill of others; who weds a younger sister before the older sister is married or weds an older sister after having married a younger one; who kills a Muni; who imparts knowledge of the Vedas to a person unworthy of it, or does not impart knowledge to one who is worthy of it; who takes many lives; who sells flesh; who has abandoned his sacred fire; who sells his knowledge of the Vedas; who slays his guru or a woman; who is born into a sinful family; who slaughters an animal wilfully; who sets fire to a dwelling house; who lives by deceit, or acts in opposition to his guru; one who has violated an agreement—they are all guilty of sins requiring expiation.

I will now mention other actions that are prohibited by both the world and the Vedas. Listen to me attentively.

The rejection of one's svadharma; the practice of the dharma of others; helping at the sacrifice or the religious rites of one unworthy of such assistance; eating food that is forbidden; deserting one that craves protection; neglecting to maintain servants and dependants; selling salt and sweet and other similar substances; killing birds and animals; refusing, though competent, to procreate upon a soliciting woman; omitting to present daily gifts grass to cows and the like, or to give dakshina; humiliating a Brahmana—these are all actions that those conversant with dharma have proscribed.

The son who quarrels with his father, the man who violates the bed of his guru, one who neglects to produce offspring with his wedded wife, are all sinful, O Naravyaghra. I have now told you, in brief and in detail, those actions and omissions by which a man becomes liable to perform expiation. Listen now to the circumstances under which men, even after committing these deeds, do not become stained with sin.

If a Brahmana well acquainted with the Vedas takes up arms and rushes at you in battle in order to kill you, you can take his life. By such an act the slayer does not become guilty of Brahmahatya. There is a mantra in the Vedas, O Kaunteya, which lays this down, and I am telling you only of those practices that are sanctioned by the authority of the Vedas.

One who kills a Brahmana who has renounced his own dharma and who advances, weapon in hand, with intent to kill, does not truly become the slayer of a Brahmana. In such a case it is the anger of the slayer that proceeds against the wrath of the slain.

By drinking alcoholic stimulants, in ignorance or upon the advice of a virtuous physician when his life is at peril, a man should have the regenerating ceremonies performed once more in his case. All that I have told you about the eating of forbidden food can be cleansed by these expiatory rites.

Sexual congress with the guru's wife at the preceptor's command does not stain the disciple. The Rishi Uddalaka had his son Swetaketu begotten by a disciple. Sin does not stain one who commits theft for the sake of his acharya in a season of distress. One who takes to theft for his own enjoyment, however, becomes tarnished.

A man is not defiled by stealing from other than Brahmanas in a season of distress and for the sake of one's guru. Sin leaves untouched only one who steals under such circumstances without appropriating any portion to himself. A falsehood can be spoken for saving one's own life or that of another, for the sake of one’s guru, for gratifying a woman, or for bringing about a marriage.

One’s vow of brahmacharya is not broken by having dreams that cause him to ejaculate. In such cases, the expiation laid down consists in the pouring of libations of clarified butter onto the sacred fire. If an elder brother dies or has renounced the world, the younger brother does not incur sin by marrying his brother’s wife. Solicited by a woman, one does not lose virtue through intimacy with her.

One should not kill or cause an animal to be slain, except in a sacrifice. Through the kindness manifested towards animals by the Creator himself in his laws they have become sacred, and fit for sacrifice. By making a gift in ignorance to an undeserving Brahmana one does not incur sin. The omission of charity towards a deserving man through ignorance does not lead to sin. By casting off an adulterous wife one does not incur sin, for by this, the woman herself can be purged while the husband avoids sin.

One who knows the true use of the soma juice, does not incur sin by selling it. By dismissing a servant who is incompetent to render service, sin will not touch you. I have now told you those actions by which one does not incur sin. I will now tell you how to do penance, in detail.’”

"Vyasa says 'Through penance, religious rites, and gifts, O Bhaarata, a man can wash away his sins if he does not commit them again. By subsisting like a sannyasi upon one meal a day procured by begging, by doing all his work himself without a servant, by begging with a human skull in one hand and a khatvanga in another, by becoming a Brahmacharin and always ready for hard work, by casting off all malice, by sleeping on bare ground, by announcing his offence to the world—by doing all this for full twelve years, a man can cleanse himself from the sin of Brahmahatya, having slain a Brahmana.

By dying at the hands of a warrior of one's own will and on the advice of men learned in the shastras, or by throwing oneself down three times, head downwards, into a blazing fire, or by walking a hundred yojanas, all the while reciting the Vedas, or by giving away one's entire property to a Brahmana conversant with the Vedas, or at least so much as would secure to him a livelihood, or a house properly furnished, and by protecting cattle and Brahmanas, one can be cleansed of Brahmahatya, the sin of having slain a Brahmana.

Again, by living upon the scantiest food every day for six years, a man can be cleansed of this sin. By observing a more rigorous vow with regard to food one can be purified in three years. By living upon one meal a month, one can be cleansed in just a year. By observing, again, an absolute fast, one can be purified within a very short time.

There is no doubt, again, that an Aswamedha yagna purifies a man. Men guilty of having slain a Brahmana who succeed in taking the avabhrita snana, the final bath at the completion of the sacrifice, are washed clean of all their sins. This is an injunction of great authority in the Srutis. One becomes cleansed of the sin of having killed a Brahmana, and indeed of all one's sins, by dying in a battle undertaken for the sake of a Brahmana, or by giving away a hundred thousand cattle to those deserving of gifts.

One becomes cleansed of all one's sins by giving away twenty-five thousand Kapila cows, all of which have calved, or at the point of death by giving away a thousand cows with calves to poor but deserving persons.

The man, O king, who gives away a hundred steeds of the Kamboja breed to deserving Brahmanas, becomes freed from sin. The man, O Bharata, who gives to just one man all that he asks for, and who, having given it, does not speak of it to anyone, is freed from sin.

If a person who has once drunk alcohol drinks as expiation hot liquor, he sanctifies himself both here and hereafter. One frees oneself of all sins by jumping off the summit of a mountain or entering a blazing fire, or by going on an everlasting journey after renouncing the world. By performing the sacrifice laid down by Brihaspati, a Brahmana who drinks can succeed in attaining to Brahmaloka. Brahma himself has said that if a man, after having drunk, becomes humble, makes a gift of land and abstains from liquor ever after, he becomes sanctified and cleansed.

The man who has violated his acharya's bed should lie on a heated sheet of iron and, having cut off his manhood, should take sannyasa with eyes always turned upwards. By casting off one's body, one becomes purified of all evil acts.

Women become cleansed of all their sins by leading a regulated life for one year. The man who observes a very arduous vow, or gives away the whole of his wealth, or perishes in a battle fought for the sake of his guru, is purified of all his sins. One who lies to his guru or acts in opposition to him, becomes cleansed of that sin by doing something agreeable to his preceptor.

One who has deviated from the vow of Brahmacharya can be exorcised of the sin by wearing the hide of a cow for six months and observing the penances laid down in the case of the slaughter of a Brahmana. One who is guilty of adultery, or of theft, can become clean by observing rigid vratas for a year. When one steals another's property, one should, by every means in his power, return the value of the stolen property and thereby be washed clean of the sin of theft.

The younger brother who has married before the marriage of the elder brother, and the elder brother whose younger brother has married before him, becomes pure by observing a severe vow, sincerely, for twelve nights. The younger brother, however, should marry again for rescuing his deceased ancestors. By such a second marriage, the first wife becomes cleansed and her husband himself will not incur sin by marrying her.

Men who know the scriptures declare that women may be cleansed of even the greatest sins by observing the vow of chaturmasya, all the while living upon scant and sattvik food. Men conversant with the shastras do not take into account the sins that women commit in their hearts. Whatever be their sins of this description, their menstrual course renders them clean, like a metal plate scoured with ash.

Plates made of the alloy of brass and copper made impure by a Sudra eating from them, or a vessel of the same metal that a cow has sniffed at, or that a Brahmana's Gandusha gargle has made unclean, can be cleansed by means of the ten purifying substances.

The shastras have laid down that a Brahmana should acquire and practise the full measure of dharma, and a Kshatriya should acquire and practise a measure of dharma less by a fourth part. So, a Vaisya should acquire a measure a quarter less than a Kshatriya's and a Sudra a fourth less than a Vaisya's. The heaviness or lightness of sins for purposes of expiation of each of the four varnas should be determined upon this principle.

Having killed a bird or an animal, or cut down living trees, a man should make known his sin and fast for three nights. For indulging in intercourse with one with whom it is prohibited, the expiation is to wander in wet clothes and to sleep on a bed of ashes. These, O king, are the atonements for sinful deeds, according to precedent, reason, the shastras and the laws.

A Brahmana can be cleansed of all his sins by reciting the Gayatri in a sacred place, while living upon frugal fare, casting off malice, abandoning anger and hate, remaining unmoved by praise and blame, and abstaining from speech. He should during the day-time be under the shelter of the sky and should lie down there even at night. Thrice during the day, and thrice during the night, he should plunge with his clothes into a stream or lake and perform his ablutions. Observing these rigid vows, he should abstain from speech with women, Sudras and sinners. By observing such regulations a Brahmana is purified of all sins that he unconsciously commits.

A man obtains in the other world the fruits, good or bad, of his karma which the elements witness. Be it punya or be it paapa, according to the true measure that one acquires of either, one enjoys or suffers the consequences even in this world. Through gyana, tapasya and by dharma, one enhances one's happiness even here, or one can enhance one's misery by committing sins. One should, therefore, always do what is righteous and abstain altogether from deeds that are not.

I have now indicated how the sins that I have mentioned can be expiated. There is atonement for every sin except those that we call Mahapatakas or the most heinous sins.

As regards sins in respect of unclean food, improper speech and the like, they are of two kinds: those that one commits consciously and those committed unconsciously. All sins that one commits consciously are grave, while those that one commits unconsciously are trivial or light. There is expiation for both.

Indeed the observance of the above rules can wash away all sin. However, God lays down these laws only for believers and those who have faith in Him. They are not for atheists or those who have no faith, or those in whom pride and malice predominate. A man who wishes for prosperity both here and in the hereafter, O Purushavyaghra, should adopt righteous behaviour, listen to the counsels of righteous men and observe the dharma that the shastras have ordained for him.

So, for the reasons I have already given, O Rajan, you will be cleansed of all your sins, for you have slain your foes while discharging your dharma as a king and for the protection of your life and inheritance. However, if you still regard yourself as sinful, perform expiation. Do not cast away your life out of grief, in a manner unbecoming of a wise man.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Thus addressed by the holy Rishi, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, having reflected for a short while, says these words to the Muni."

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, what food is clean and what unclean, what gifts are praiseworthy, and who should be considered deserving or undeserving of them.'

Vyasa says, 'Let me relate to you the old discussion between the Rishis and Manu, the lord of creation. In the Krita yuga, an assembly of Rishis of high austerities approached the great and powerful Prajapati Manu while he was seated at his ease, and requested him to engage in a discourse on dharma, asking, "What food should be eaten, who is to be regarded as a person deserving gifts, what gifts should be made, how should a person study, and what penances should one perform, how and what deeds should be done and what deeds should not? O lord of creation, tell us everything about all this."

Thus addressed, the divine and swayambhuva Manu told them, "Listen to me as I explain the dharma in brief as well as in detail. The shastras have laid down that the following deeds and places are expiatory in lands in which they are not prohibited—silent recitation of sacred mantras, homa, fasts, knowledge of the self, sacred rivers and regions inhabited by men devoted to pious deeds.

Some mountains also are purifying, as also the eating of gold and bathing in water in which one has dipped gems and precious stones. Tirtha yatra, and eating sanctified butter will also, without doubt, speedily purify a man.

No man would ever be called wise if he is proud and, if he wishes to be long-lived, he should for three nights drink hot water as a tapasya for being proud. Refusal to take what is not given, charity, the study of scriptures, tapasya, abstention from injury, truth, freedom from anger, and worship of the gods by means of yagnas, are the characteristics of dharma.

That which is virtue may, according to time and place, become sin; thus, the appropriation of what belongs to others, untruth, and injury and killing, may under special circumstances, become virtues. Men capable of judging deeds consider them to be of two kinds—virtuous and sinful. From the worldly and the Vedic points of view again, punya and paapa are good or bad according to their consequences.

Virtue and sin, everything a man may or may not do, would be either action or inaction. Inaction, abstention from Vedic rites and adoption of a life of contemplation leads to freedom from rebirth while the consequences of action, the practice of Vedic rites, result in repeated death and rebirth.

From the worldly point of view, deeds that are evil lead to evil and those that are good fetch beneficial consequences. Therefore, punya and paapa are to be distinguished by the good and the evil character of their consequences.

Deeds that are apparently evil, when undertaken from considerations connected with the Devas, the shastras, life itself, and the means by which life is sustained, produce consequences that are good. When an action is undertaken from the expectation, however doubtful, that it will produce harm to some one in the future, or when an action is done whose consequence is visibly harmful, the shastras command penance.

When a deed is done from anger or clouded judgment, then expiation should be performed by inflicting pain on the body, guided by precedent, the shastras and reason. When, again, anything is done in order to please or displease the mind, the sin arising from it may be cleansed by sanctified food and recitation of mantras. The king who lays aside the danda in a particular instance should fast for one night. The priest who abstains from advising the king to inflict punishment in a particular case, should fast for three nights as expiation. The man who from grief attempts to commit suicide with weapons, should fast for three nights.

There is no expiation for those who cast off the duties and practices of their order and class, country and family, and who abandon their very religion. When an occasion for doubt arises respecting what should be done, what ten persons versed in Vedic scriptures or three of those who frequently recite them may pronounce, should be regarded as the injunction of the shastras.

The bull, earth, little ants, worms generated in dirt and poison, should not be eaten by Brahmanas. They should not also eat fish that have no scales, and four-footed aquatic creratures like frogs and others, except the tortoise. Water-fowls called Bhasas, ducks, Suparnas, Chakravakas, diving ducks, cranes, crows, shags, vultures, hawks and owls. Also all four-footed animals that are carnivorous and that have sharp, long teeth, birds and animals with two teeth and those with four, the milk of the sheep, the she-ass, the she-camel, the newly-calved cow, woman and deer, should not be ingested by a Brahmana.

Besides this, food cooked by a woman who has recently given birth to a child, or food cooked by an unknown person should not be taken, nor should the milk of a cow that has recently calved. If a Brahmana takes food that a Kshatriya has cooked, it diminishes his tejas; if he takes the food provided by a Sudra, it dims his Brahmanic lustre; and if he takes the food provided by a goldsmith or a woman who has neither husband nor children, it lessens the span of his life. The food provided by a money-lender is equivalent to dirt, while that provided by a woman living by prostitution is equivalent to semen. The food provided by men who tolerate the infidelity of their wives, and by men whose spouses rule them, is also forbidden.

A Brahmana should not accept food given by a man selected for receiving gifts at a certain stage of a sacrifice; by one who does not enjoy his wealth or make any gifts; by one who sells soma, or who is a shoe-maker; by an unchaste woman, by a washerman, by a physician, by persons serving as watchmen, by a multitude of persons, by one who is pointed at by a whole village, by one deriving his income from dancing girls, by men married before their elder brothers, by professional singers and bards or by gamblers. He should refuse food which is brought with the left hand or which is stale, or mixed with alcohol, or has been already tasted, or that remains after a feast.

A Brahmana should not eat cakes, sugarcane, pot-herbs or rice boiled in sugared milk, if they have lost their taste, or fried barley powder and other kinds of fried grain mixed with curds if they are stale. Brahmanas leading a grihasta's life should not take rice boiled in sugared milk, food mixed with the tila seed, meat and cakes that one has not dedicated to the gods. He should take his food after first gratifying the Devas, Rishis, Athitis, Pitris and household deities.

By living thus in his own house, a grihasta becomes like a Bhikshu who has renounced the world. A man of such conduct, living with his wives in domesticity, earns great religious merit. No one should make a gift for the sake of acquiring fame, or from fear of censure and the like, or to a benefactor.

A virtuous man would not give gifts to persons living by singing and dancing, to professional jesters, to a person who is intoxicated, to one who is insane, to a thief, to a slanderer, to an idiot, to an albino, to one who has a defective limb, to a dwarf, to an evil man, to one born in a low and evil family, or to one who has not been sanctified by the observance of vows.

No gift should be made to a Brahmana who has no knowledge of the Vedas, but only to a Srotriya. An improper gift and an improper acceptance produce evil consequences to both the giver and the receiver. Just as a man who seeks to cross the ocean with the help of a rock or a mass of catechu sinks along with his support, so too do the giver and the acceptor both sink together.

Just as a fire covered with wet fuel does not blaze up, the acceptor of a gift who is remiss in penance, study and piety, cannot confer any benefit upon the giver. Just as water in a human skull and milk in a bag made of dog-skin become unclean due to the uncleaness of the vessels in which they are kept, the Vedas too become fruitless in a man who is not of good conduct.

A man may give from compassion to a low Brahmana who is without mantras and vows, who is ignorant of the shastras and who harbours envy. One may, from compassion, give to a man who is poor or afflicted or ill. But he should not give in the belief that he would derive any spiritual benefit from it, or that he would earn any religious merit by it. There is no doubt that a gift made to Brahmana who is without knowledge of the Vedas becomes perfectly fruitless.

A Brahmana who has not studied the Vedas is like an elephant made of wood or an antelope made of leather, as all three are nothing but names. A Brahmana without mantras is like a eunuch with women, or a cow with another cow, or a featherless bird, all in vain. A gift to a Brahmana devoid of learning is like a grain without a kernel, a well without water, or offerings poured on ashes.

An unlearned Brahmana is an enemy to all and the destroyer of the food that is offered to the Devas and Pitris. A gift made to him goes for nothing, and is like a gift to a robber. He can never succeed in acquiring regions of bliss hereafter. I have now told you in brief, O Yudhishtira, all that Manu said on that occasion. All should listen to this great conversation O Bharatarishabha.'"'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Maharishi, I wish to hear in detail what the dharma of kings is, and the dharma of all the four varnas. I wish also to hear, O great Brahmana, what conduct one should adopt in times of distress, and how one can subdue the world by treading the path of dharma. This discourse on atonement, dealing at the same time with the subject of fasts, excites great curiosity, and fills me with joy. The practice of punya and the discharge of Rajadharma are always inconsistent with each other. My mind is constantly confused thinking of how to reconcile the two.'

Then Vyasa, the maharishi who is the greatest master of the Vedas, looks at the Devarishi Narada and says, 'If you wish to hear of dharma in detail, ask Bhishma Pitamaha, Mahabaho. A profound knower of dharma and possessed of universal knowledge, the son of Bhagirathi will remove all your doubts on the difficult subject of duty.

The Devi, the celestial river of three courses, gave birth to him. He saw with his mortal eyes all the Devas with Indra at their head. Having gratified with his dutiful services the Devarishis with Brihaspati at their head, he acquired a knowledge of the dharma of kings, with its interpretations, from Usanas and Brihaspati who is the guru of all the celestial ones.

Having practised rigid vows, that Mahabaho acquired knowledge of all the Vedas and Vedangas from Vasishtha and from Chyavana of Bhrigu's race. In his youth he studied under the eldest-born son of the Pitamaha, Sanatkumara of blazing splendour, knower of the deepest truths of mental and spiritual science. He learnt the duties in full of the Yatis from the lips of Markandeya, and obtained all weapons from Rama and Sakra.

Although he was born among human beings, his death is yet under his own control and will only come when he wills it. We hear that although childless, he has many realms of bliss hereafter. Maharishis of great merit were always his courtiers. Nothing in the world of objects that should be known is unknown to him. Profoundly knowledgeable about all duties and acquainted with all the subtle truths of morality, he will also discourse with you upon these. Go to him before he abandons his prana.'

Thus addressed, Kaunteya of great wisdom says to Satyavati's son Vyasa, 'Having caused a great and horrible slaughter of kinsmen, I have become an offender against all and a destroyer of the earth. Having caused Bhishma himself, that warrior who always fought fairly, to be slain by deceit, how shall I approach him to ask him about dharma?'

Moved by the desire to benefit all the four varnas, the noble and mighty-armed Krishna, lord of the Yaduvamsa race, again addresses the great king. 'It does not become you to show such obstinacy in grief. O best of kings, do what the holy Vyasa has said. The Brahmanas and your brothers of great tejas stand before you, Mahabaho, imploring you like men beseeching the deity of the clouds at the close of summer.

The unslain remnant of the assembled kings, and the people belonging to all the four orders of your kingdom of Kurujangala, O king, are here. For the sake of doing what is agreeable to these noble Brahmanas, in obedience to the command of Vyasa of immeasurable tejas, O Parantapa, and at our request, we who are your well-wishers and Draupadi's, do what we ask you, and what is beneficial to the world.'

Yudhishtira of eyes like lotus petals rises from his seat for the good of the whole world. The Naravyaghra of great fame, entreated by Krishna himself, by the island-born Vyasa, by Devasthana, by Jishnu, and many others, casts off his grief and anxiety. Fully aware of the declarations of the Srutis, with the science that treats the interpretation of these declarations and with all that men usually hear and all that deserves to be heard, the son of Pandu finds peace of mind and resolves upon what he should do next.

Surrounded by all of them, like the moon by the stars, and placing Dhritarashtra at the head of the train, Yudhishtira sets out for the city after offering worship to the Devas and thousands of Brahmanas. He ascends a new white chariot covered with blankets and deerskins, to which are yoked sixteen white bullocks with auspicious marks, sanctified with Vedic mantras. Hymned by poets and bards, the king mounts the chariot, like Soma ascending his own ambrosial vehicle. His brother Bhima, of awesome powers, takes the reins. Arjuna holds a white sovereign parasol of great radiance over his head, as beautiful as a white cloud decked with stars. The two heroic sons of Madri, Nakula and Sahadeva, take up two yak-tails, white as the rays of the moon and adorned with gems, with which to fan the king.

Having ascended the chariot, the five brothers decked with ornaments, O Rajan, look like the five elements that permeate all things and beings. Riding another white ratha yoked to steeds fleet as thought, Yuyutsu follows behind the eldest son of Pandu.

Upon his own brilliant chariot of gold, yoked to Saibya and Sugriva, Krishna with Satyaki follows the Kurus. The eldest uncle of Pritha's son, O Bhaarata, accompanied by Gandhari, goes at the head of the train, upon a palanquin borne on the shoulders of men. The other women of the Kuru household, including Kunti and Krishna, journey in exquisite palanquins, headed by Vidura. Behind, follow a large number of chariots and elephants decked with ornaments, and foot-soldiers and horses.

The Dharmaputra travels towards Hastinapura accompanied by sweet-voiced balladeers and bards singing the king's praises. The progress of King Yudhishtira is majestic and beautiful, O Mahabhaho, beyond anything seen like it before on earth. During the regal progress of Pritha's son, the city and its streets are adorned with happy citizens who have come out to honour the king. Teeming with robust and cheerful men, the streets resound with the hum of innumerable voices. The highway along which the king passes is festooned with flowers and innumerable banners. The streets of the city are perfumed with incense, covered with powdered perfumes and flowers and fragrant plants, and adorned with garlands and wreaths. New metal jars, brimming with water, are kept at the door of every house, and groups of the loveliest young women gather there.

Accompanied by his friends, the son of Pandu, praised in speeches, enters the city through its profusely adorned gate."

Vaisampayana said, “When the Pandavas enter the city, thousands and thousands of the citizens come out to watch them. The richly adorned squares and streets, swelling each moment with the crowds, are like the surge of ocean waves at the rise of the moon. The great mansions, Bhaarata, that stand on either side, decked with every ornament and full of women, seem to shake with their weight. With soft and modest voices they praise Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the two sons of Madri, saying, ‘You are worthy of all praise, blessed princess of Panchala, who waits by the side of these great men even as Gautami did by the side of the seven Rishis. Your karma and vows have borne fruit, O Princess Krishnaa!’

O Rajan, the women praise her in this manner, and as a result of these praises, and their talk among one another, and the shouts of joy by the men, the city is filled with a reverberant uproar. After passing through the streets in a stately manner, Yudhishtira enters the beautiful palace of the Kurus adorned with all manner of ornaments.

The people of the city and the provinces, approaching the palace, praise him: ‘Through good fortune you have vanquished your enemies, Parantapa, and recovered your kingdom through virtue and energy. Be our king for a hundred years, and protect your people virtuously as Indra protects the inhabitants of heaven!’

Thus praised and blessed at the palace-gate, and accepting the benedictions of the Brahmanas from every side, the king, graced with victory and the blessings of the people, enters the palace that resembles Indra's own, and descends from his chariot. Entering the apartments, the blessed Yudhishtira worships the household gods, the kuladevas, with jewels, perfumes and garlands. He then comes out and sees a number of Brahmanas waiting with auspicious offerings in their hands, to pronounce blessings on him. Surrounded by them he appears like the full moon in the midst of the stars. Accompanied by his priest Dhaumya and his eldest uncle, he joyfully worships these Brahmanas with due rites, and gifts of sweets, gems, gold in profusion, cows, robes and other diverse things that they desire.

Then loud shouts of 'This is a blessed day!' fill the heavens, O Bhaarata. Sweet to the ear, the sacred sound is gratifying to the friends and well-wishers of the Pandavas. The king also hears these sounds, loud and clear like the calls of a flock of swans. He listens to these men familiar with the Vedas, whose speech is meaningful and rich with melodious words. Then, O Rajan, there is a roll of drums and a delightful fanfare of triumphal conches.

A little while later, when the Brahmanas become silent, a Rakshasa named Charvaka, who has disguised himself as a Brahmana, speaks. He is a friend of Duryodhana and stands there in the garb of a sannyasi. With a rosary, a tuft of hair on his head, and the triple staff in his hand, he stands proudly and fearlessly in the midst of all these Brahmanas, all devoted to penances and vows, who have come there in their thousands to bless the king. Charvaka the Rakshasa, wanting to do evil to the noble Pandavas, without consulting these Brahmanas, now tells the king, 'All these Brahmanas, making me their spokesman, say "Shame on you! You are an evil king. You are a slayer of kinsmen. What have you gained, O son of Kunti, by having exterminated your race? For having also slain your elders and guru it is proper for you to cast away your life."'

Hearing these words of that evil one, the Brahmanas present are deeply agitated and beak into a furious uproar. And all of them, including Yudhishtira, O Rajan, become speechless with shame and anxiety.

Yudhishtira says, 'I bow down to you and beg you humbly, to bear with me. It does not become you to shout at me. I will soon lay down my life.'

Then all the Brahmanas, O Rajan, cry loudly, 'These are not our words! Prosperity to you, O Rajan!'

These maharishis, all with knowledge of the Vedas and understanding rendered clear by tapasya, then penetrate the disguise of the speaker with their spiritual insight and declare, 'This is the Rakshasa Charvaka, Duryodhana's friend disguised as a sannyasi, who seeks the good of his dead friend. We have not, O Dharmatman, joined him in what he says. Let your anxiety be dispelled and let prosperity be with you and your brothers.'

The Brahmanas, insensate with rage, then utter the deadly sound 'Hunn'. Cleansed of all sins, they censure the sinful Rakshasa and slay him there with the very humkara. Consumed by the tejas of these Brahmavadis, Charvaka falls dead like a tree with all its roots and sprouts blasted by Vajra, the thunder of Indra. The Brahmanas go away, duly worshipped, having gladdened the king with their blessings. The royal son of Pandu and all his friends feel great happiness come over them."

Vaisampayana said, “Now Devaki’s son Krishna, Janardana of universal knowledge, says to King Yudhishtira and his brothers, ‘For me, in this world, Brahmanas are always to be worshipped. They are Devas on earth who have poison in their speech, but are exceedingly easy to gratify.

Once, in the Krita yuga, O Rajan, a Rakshasa named Charvaka performed austere tapasya for many years in Badari, Mahabaho. Brahma repeatedly told him to ask for boons. Finally, the Rakshasa asked for a vara that he should be freed from fear of any being in the universe. The Prajapati granted the boon, subject to the condition that he should be careful to not offend Brahmanas.

Having obtained the boon, the sinful and mighty Rakshasa, violent and powerful, began to harrass the Devas. Persecuted by the might of the Rakshasa, the Devas went to Brahma, for help to kill Charvaka.

Brahma told them, “I have already arranged to bring about the Rakshasa’s death. There will be a king named Duryodhana among men, who will become the friend of this devil. Bound by affection for him, the Rakshasa will insult some holy Brahmanas. Stung by the wrong, the Brahmanas, whose power reposes in speech, will curse him in anger and he will die.”

It is that Rakshasa Charvaka, O Rajan, who lies there dead, slain by the chant of the Brahmanas. Do not, Bharatarishabha, give way to sorrow. Your kinsmen, who perished in the observance of Kshatriya dharma, have all gone to Swarga. Attend to your duties now, and do not grieve. Kill your enemies, protect your subjects, and worship the Brahmanas.'" Vaisampayana said, “Yudhishtira, free from grief and the fever in his heart, sits down with his face turned eastwards, on a magnificent throne made of gold. On another blazing golden seat facing him sit the two Parantapas, Satyaki and Krishna. On either side of the king, Bhima and Arjuna sit on two other resplendent jewel-encrusted thrones. Pritha sits with Sahadeva and Nakula on a white throne of ivory decked with gold. Sudharman, Vidura, Dhaumya and the Kuru king Dhritarashtra, sit separately on other thrones that blaze with the radiance of fire. Yuyutsu, Sanjaya and the famed Gandhari, all sit around King Dhritarashtra.

Dharmaraja Yudhishtira first touches the beautiful white flowers, swastikas, vessels full of earth, gold, silver and gems placed before him. Then, led by the priest Dhaumya, his subjects approach him, bringing with them auspicious offerings: sacred earth, gold, many kinds of jewels and other things necessary for the performance of the coronation rites. There are golden pots brimming with water, copper, silver and earthen jars, flowers, fried paddy, Kusa grass, cow’s milk, sacrificial fuel of the wood of Sami, Pippala and Palasa, honey, clarified butter, sacrificial ladles made of Udumbara, and conches adorned with gold.

At the behest of Krishna, the priest Dhaumya constructs an altar according to the appropriate rules, gradually inclining towards the east and the north. He seats Yudhishtira with Krishnaa, the daughter of Drupada, on the resplendent throne called Sarvatobhadra, glowing golden, with feet covered with tiger-skin. He pours offerings of ghrita onto the sacred fire, chanting the proper mantras.

Yudhishtira, rising from his seat, takes up the sanctified conch and pours the water it contains over his head. Again at the behest of Krishna, the Rajarishi Dhritarashtra and all the people do the same. The son of Pandu, thus bathed with the sanctified water of the conch, looks radiantly handsome. The beating of panavas, anakas and other drums follows, as King Yudhishtira the Just accepts the gifts his subjects offer him. As is his wont, he in turn bestows gifts lavishly on his people. He gives a thousand nishkas to the Brahmanas, all endowed with wisdom and gentle conduct from their study of the Vedas, and they chant special blessings over him.

Happy with their gifts, the Brahmanas wish him prosperity and victory and, with voices melodious as those of swans, praise him, saying, 'Yudhishtira Mahabaho, by good fortune victory is yours, son of Pandu, and you have recovered your position through your prowess. By good fortune the wielder of Gandiva, Bhimasena, yourself, O Rajan, and the two sons of Madri, are all here with us, having slain your enemies and escaped alive from a war which caused the death of so many heroes. O Bhaarata! Do attend without delay to those karmas that you should perform next.'

Thus these pious men worship king Yudhishtira and his brothers and friends, and install him on the throne of a vast kingdom, O Bhaarata!"

Vaisampayana said, "Hearing these words of encouragement and support from his subjects, Yudhishtira says to them, 'Truly blessed are the sons of Pandu, whose merits, true or false, the best of Brahmanas assembled together enumerate. Without doubt, we have gained your favour, since you so freely attribute all these qualities to us.

However, King Dhritarashtra is our father and our lord and, if you wish to please me, obey him always and do what he likes. I live for him alone, having killed all my kinsmen, and my dharma is to always serve him punctiliously. If you, like my friends, think I am deserving of your favour, I beg you all to behave towards Dhritarashtra as you used to before. He is our lord and the whole world, along with the Pandavas, belongs to him. You should always bear this in mind.'

He then dismisses the citizens and the people of the provinces, and appoints his puissant brother Bhimasena as Yuvaraja, the most intelligent Vidura as chief advisor and, to oversee the six-fold needs of the state, the mature and accomplished Sanjaya as director and supervisor of finances. He appoints Nakula to keep the register of the military forces, to give the soldiers food and payment and to supervise other affairs of the army. He appoints Phalguna to defend the kingdom against hostile forces and to punish evil-doers, and Dhaumya, that best of priests, to attend daily to the Brahmanas of the kingdom, all rites in honour of the Devas and other religious duties. Sahadeva's duty is to always remain by Yudhishtira's side to protect him in all circumstances. The king also cheerfully employs others as he considers suitable.

Dharmarajan Yudhishtira commands Vidura and Yuyutsu, ‘You should always do everything that my royal father Dhritarashtra wishes with alacrity and attention and, after taking his permission, whatever needs to be done in respect of the citizens and the people of the provinces in your respective capacities.’” Vaisampayana said, "After this, the noble King Yudhishtira orders the Sraddha rites of each of his kinsmen slain in battle to be performed. King Dhritarashtra, for the good of his sons in the other world, gives away to the Brahmanas rich food, kine, vast wealth and many beautiful and costly gem-stones.

CANTO 43

Yudhishtira and Draupadi distribute wealth for the sake of Drona, the great Karna, Dhrishtadyumna, Abhimanyu, the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, son of Hidimba, Virata, and other well-wishers who had served the Pandavas loyally, as well as for Drupada and the five sons of Draupadi. For the benefit of each of them, the king gratifies thousands of Brahmanas with gifts of gold, jewels, cows and clothes.

He performs the Sraddha rite for the good of those in the next world, of all the kings who had died in battle without leaving kinsmen or friends behind. Further, for the souls of all his friends, he constructs halls for dispensing food, places for the distribution of water, and tanks to be dug in their names. Thus paying off the debt he owes them and avoiding censure in this world, the king is happy and continues to protect his people religiously.

He shows due honour, as before, to Dhritarashtra, Gandhari, Vidura, to all the great Kauravas and all his officials. Full of kindness, the Kuru king honours and protects all the women who lost their heroic husbands and sons in the war. With great compassion, he extends his favour to the destitute, the blind and the helpless by giving them food, clothes and shelter. Free from enemies and having conquered the whole world, Yudhishtira begins to live a life of happiness.”

CANTO 44

Vaisampayana said, “Having got back the kingdom, and after his coronation, the wise King Yudhishtira, with folded hands, says to the lotus-eyed Krishna of Dasarha’s vamsa, ‘O Madhava, through your grace, guidance, might, intelligence and prowess, I have won back my ancestral kingdom. I bow to you again and again, O Parantapa! You are the one and only Being, refuge of all worshippers, whom even the Rishis and Munis adore with innumerable names.

Salutations to you, O Prajapati, Creator of the Universe! You are the Atman of the Universe, which has sprung from you. You are Vishnu, you are Jishnu, you are Hari, you are Krishna, you are Vaikunta, and you are the best of all beings. As said in the Puranas, you have taken birth seven times in the womb of Aditi. It was you who took birth in the womb of Prishni.

The learned say that you are the three yugas. All your achievements are sacred. You are the lord of our senses. You are the great Lord worshipped in yagnas. You are called the Parama Hamsa. You are three-eyed Sambhu. You are One, though known as Vibhu and Damodara. You are the great Boar, you are Fire, you are the sun, you have the bull as your emblem on your banner, and you have Garuda also as your device.

You are, Parantapa, the Being who pervades every form in the universe, of irresistible power. You are the best of all things, you are fierce, you are the Senapati in battle, you are the Truth, you are the giver of food, and you are Guha the celestial Senapati. Unfading, you cause your enemies to fade and waste away.

You are the Brahmana of pure blood, as well as those who have sprung from mixed blood. You are great. You walk high, you are the mountains, and you are called Vrishadarbha and Vrishakapi. You are the Ocean, you are without attributes, you are the three peaks of Trikuta, you have three abodes, and you take human forms on earth, descending from Swarga.

You are the Emperor, you are Virat, and you are Swarat. You are the Lord of the Devas, and you are the cause for the birth of the universe. You are Almighty, you are existence in every form, and yet you are formless. You are Krishna, you are fire. You are the Creator, you are the father of the celestial physicians, you are the sage Kapila, and you are the Vamana. You are the Sacrifice embodied, you are Dhruva, you are Garuda, and you are Yajnasena.

You are Sikhandin, you are Nahusha, and you are Babhru. You are the constellation Punarvasu stretched across the sky. You are tawny in hue, you are the sacrifice known as Uktha, you are Sushena, you are the drum which resounds through all space. Light is the track of your chariot-wheels. You are the lotus of Prosperity, you are the cloud called Pushkara, and you are decked with garlands. You are opulent, you are powerful, you are the most subtle, and it is you whom the Vedas describe.

You are the Ocean, great receptacle of waters, you are Brahma, you are the sacred refuge, and you know the abodes of all. You are called Hiranyagarbha, you are the sacred mantras Swadha and Swaha, and you are Kesava. You are the cause of the birth of all, and you are its dissolution. In the beginning it is you who created the universe. It is under your control, O Creator! Salutations to you, wielder of the Saringa, the Sudarshana and the Kaumodaki!'

Thus praised in song by Yudhishtira Dharmatma in the midst of the Kuru sabha, the lotus-eyed Krishna is pleased. In turn, the greatest of the Yadavas then lauds the eldest son of Pandu with his own words of praise."

Vaisampayana said, “The king dismisses all his subjects, and they return to their homes. Comforting his brothers, Yudhishtira, blazing in splendour, says to the awesome Bhima, Arjuna and the twins, ‘In the Great War, our enemies have lacerated your bodies with different kinds of weapons and you are exhausted, as grief and anger have scorched your hearts. Through my fault, you, Bharatarishabhas, have suffered the privations and miseries of vanavasa like common men. In delight and ease now enjoy your victory. Meet me in the morning after you have rested and regained your strength.’

Then Mahabaho Bhima Vrikodara, like Maghavat entering his own beautiful temple, enters the grand palace that Yudhishtira has assigned to him with the approval of Dhritarashtra, the palace of Duryodhana, consisting of many large mansions and spacious chambers adorned with gemstones of diverse kinds, and thronged with servants, male and female.

The peerless Arjuna, at the command of the king, is given the palace of Dusasana, in no way inferior to Duryodhana’s, consisting of many magnificent edifices, with a gateway of gold, abounding in wealth and full of attendants and servitors, both men and women.

The palace of Durmarshana, superior even to that of Dusasana, ornamented with gold and every kind of gem, looks like Kubera’s own mansion. King Yudhishtira gladly gives this to the sensitive Nakula, whom the ordeals of vanavasa had affected the most.

The best of palaces, which once belonged to Durmukha, is embellished with gold and contains a plenitude of beds and beautiful women with eyes like lotus-petals. The king gives this to Sahadeva, who was always considerate to him. Sahadeva is as delighted as the Lord of Treasures was upon obtaining Kailasa.

Yuyutsu, Vidura and Sanjaya, O Rajan, and Sudharman and Dhaumya return to the abodes they owned earlier.

Like a tiger entering his cave in the hills, the Purushavyaghra Saurin, accompanied by Satyaki, enters the palace of Arjuna. Feasting on meat and drink kept ready for them, the princes pass the night happily. Awakening in the morning with rested and satisfied hearts, they present themselves before Yudhishtira."

CANTO 46

Janamejaya said, "You must tell me, O learned Brahmana, what Mahabaho Yudhishtira does after he regains his kingdom and also, O Rishi, what the heroic Hrishikesa, the supreme master of the three worlds, does after the war."

Vaisampayana said, "Listen to me, O Rajan, as I narrate in detail what the Pandavas, led by Vasudeva, do after the war. Having won back his kingdom, Kunti's son Yudhishtira enjoins each of the four varnas to perform their respective svadharma. Pandu's eldest son gives a thousand noble Brahmanas of the Snataka order a thousand nishkas each. He then gratifies the servants who are dependent on him and the guests who visited him, including men who are undeserving and those who have heterodox views, by fulfilling their wishes.

He gives his priest Dhaumya kine in thousands and great wealth, gold, silver and robes of diverse kinds. Towards Kripa, O Rajan, he behaves in the way one should towards one's acharya. Observing his vows, he continues to honour Vidura greatly. This most charitable king gratifies everyone with gifts of food, drink, fine robes of diverse kinds, beds and seats. Having restored peace to his kingdom, he pays due honour to Yuyutsu and Dhritarashtra. Placing his kingdom at the disposal of Dhritarashtra, Gandhari and Vidura, Yudhishtira continues to pass his days in peace.

After gratifying everyone, including the common citizens, O Bharatarishabha, Yudhishtira comes with folded palms into Vasudeva's presence where he sees Krishna, of the hue of a blue cloud, seated on a large throne adorned with gold and gems. Wearing yellow robes of silk and decked with celestial ornaments, Krishna blazes with splendour like a jewel set in gold and, with the crimson Kaustubha ruby adorning his chest, he looks like the Udaya mountain that adorns the rising sun. No metaphor in the three worlds can remotely describe his beauty.

Approaching Him who is Vishnu incarnate, Yudhishtira sweetly and smilingly asks, 'O most intelligent one, have you passed the night happily? You of unfading glory, are all your faculties in their full vigour, and is your understanding luminous? We have got back our kingdom and the earth has come under our sway. Refuge of the three worlds, O you of the Three Steps, through your grace we are victorious and have won great fame without violating our svadharma!'

To Parantapa Yudhishtira who addresses him in this strain, the divine Krishna does not say a word, for he is in deep meditation."

"Yudhishtira says, 'How wonderful is this, O you of immeasurable valour, that you are rapt in dhyana! O great refuge of the universe, is all right with the three worlds? When you withdraw yourself from the world into turiya, the fourth state, O bull among men, I am filled with wonder. You still the five life-breaths that move within the body and you focus your senses within your mind.

O Govinda, you concentrate both speech and mind within your understanding, and withdraw your senses into your Atman. Your body hair stands erect, your mind and understanding are both still, and you are as immobile now, O Madhava, as a wooden post. O illustrious Devadeva, you are as still as the flame of a lamp in a windless place, as unmoving as a stone.

I beg you as a favour to tell me the cause of your dhyana and dispel my doubts, unless it is a secret that I cannot share. You are the Creator and you are the Destroyer, you are destructible and you are indestructible. You are without beginning and you are without end, you are the first and the greatest of Beings. O Dharmatman, tell me the cause of your Yogic abstraction. I, your devoted worshipper, bow my head to you and ask your favour.'

Thus addressed, the illustrious younger brother of Vasava, recalling his mind, understanding and senses to their mundane sphere, says with a gentle smile, 'That Purushavyaghra Bhishma, who lies now on a bed of arrows and who is like a fire about to be extinguished, is thinking of me. So my mind was turned on him, the twang of whose bowstring and the sound of whose palms being clapped together Indra himself was unable to bear.

I was thinking of him who, having vanquished in a trice all the assembled kings at the Swayamvara of the daughters of the king of Kasi, abducted the three princesses to marry his brother Vichitravirya. I was thinking of him who fought for twenty-three days with Parasurama himself, and whom even Rama of Bhrigu's race was unable to overcome. Collecting all his senses and concentrating his mind through his understanding, he sought my refuge. It was for this that I turned my mind upon him.

I was thinking of him whom Ganga conceived and brought forth, and whom Vasishtha took as a disciple. I was thinking of that hero of powerful energy and great intellect who possesses knowledge of all the celestial weapons and of the four Vedas with all their branches. O son of Pandu, I was thinking of him who is the favourite disciple of Parasurama, son of Jamadagni, and who is the greatest of all men who know dharma; of him, Bharatarishabha, who knows the Past, the Future, and the Present.

When that Naravyaghra, as a result of his achievements, ascends to Swarga, O son of Pritha, the earth will seem a moonless night. Therefore, Yudhishtira, humbly approach Ganga's son, the mighty Bhishma, and question him about what you wish to learn. Ask him, O lord of the earth, about the four branches of knowledge, about the sacrifices and rites laid down for the four varnas, about the four modes of life, and about all kingly duties. When Bhishma, that Kurusthama, disappears from the world, every kind of knowledge will be lost with him. This is why I urge you to go to him now.'

Hearing Krishna's precious advice, the righteous Yudhishtira, his voice choked with tears, answers Janardana, 'What you say, O Madhava, about the eminence of Bhishma is perfectly true and I have not the slightest doubt about it. Indeed, I have heard from noble Brahmanas of the holiness and the greatness of the illustrious Bhishma.

You, Parantapa, are the Creator of all the worlds and there can be no doubt about what you say. If your heart be inclined to show grace, O Madhava, then let us go together to Bhishma, with you leading us. When the divine Surya turns towards the north, Bhishma will leave this world for those regions of bliss that he has won. Before this transpires, that Kurusthama deserves to see you. If you grant my prayer, Bhishma will have a glimpse of you, the first of the gods, destructible and indestructible. Indeed, O Lord, you are the infinite receptacle of Brahman.'" Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing these words of King Yudhishtira the Just, Krishna says to Satyaki who is sitting beside him, 'Let my chariot be yoked.' Satyaki quickly leaves Krishna's presence and, going out, commands Daruka, 'Let Krishna's chariot be made ready.'

Daruka swiftly yokes Krishna's ratha, the best of chariots, shining with gold, decked with emeralds, moon-gems, sun-gems, and furnished with golden wheels. Fleet as the wind, set with fantastic jewels, it is as beautiful as the morning sun. It has a radiant standard of Garuda flying, and is festooned with numerous other bright banners. It has yoked to it in trappings of gold, the best of steeds, swift as thought—Sugriva and Saibya, and two others. Having harnessed it, Daruka comes and, with folded hands, tells Krishna that his ratha awaits."

Janamejaya said, "How did the grandsire of the Bhaaratas who lay on a bed of arrows cast off his body, and what kind of Yoga did he adopt for this?'

Vaisampayana said, "Listen, O king, with pure heart and concentrated attention, to how the Mahatman Bhishma cast off his body. As soon as the sun, passing the solstitial point, entered Uttarayana, his northerly course, Bhishma, with the power of dhyana, caused his atman to enter his Atman. Surrounded by many of the foremost of Brahmanas, that hero, his body pierced with innumerable arrows, blazed forth in lustrous beauty like Surya himself with his innumerable rays. Surrounded by Veda Vyasa, by the Devarishi Narada, by Devasthana, by Asmaka, Sumantu, by Jaimini, by the high-souled Paila, by Sandilya, by Devarata, by Maitreya of great intellect, by Asita and Vasishtha and the high-souled Kausika, by Harita and Lomasa and Atri's son of genius, by Brihaspati and Sukra and the Maharishi Chyavana, by Sanatkumara and Kapila and Valmiki and Tumburu and Kuru, by Maudgalya and Rama of Bhrigu's vamsa, and the great Muni Trinabindu, by Pippalada and Vayu and Samvarta and Pulaha and Katha, by Kasyapa and Pulastya and Kratu and Daksha and Parasara, by Marichi and Angiras and Kasmya and Gautama and the sage Galava, by Dhaumya and Vibhanda and Mandavya and Dhaumra and Krishnanubhautika, by Uluka, that foremost of Brahmanas, and the mighty Markandeya, by Bhaskari and Purana and Krishna and Suta, surrounded by these and many other highly blessed powerful sages, and possessed of faith and self-restraint and tranquility of mind, the Kuru hero looked like the moon in the midst of the planets and the stars.

Stretched out on his bed of arrows, that Naravyaghra, Bhishma, with pure heart and palms joined, set his mind, thought and actions on Krishna. With a cheerful and strong voice he hymned the praises of the slayer of Madhu, the Master of Yoga with the lotus in his navel, the Lord of the universe, called Vishnu and Jishnu. With joined hands, that foremost of eloquent men, the puissant Bhishma of perfectly virtuous soul, praises Janardana.

Bhishma says, 'O Krishna, O foremost of Beings, be you pleased with these words that I utter, in brief and in detail, from my desire to hymn your praises. You are pure and purity's self. You transcend all. You are what people say to be THAT. You are the Supreme Lord. With my whole heart I seek your refuge, O universal Soul and Lord of all creatures!

You are without beginning and without end. You are the highest of the high and Brahman. Neither the Devas nor the Rishis know you. The divine Creator, called Narayana or Hari, alone knows you. Through Narayana, the Rishis, the Siddhas, the great Nagas, the Devas, and the celestial Rishis know a little of you. You are the highest of the high and know no deterioration. The Devas, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Pannagas do not know who you are and whence you came. All the worlds and all created things live in you and enter you when the dissolution comes. Like gems strung together on a thread, all things that have attributes reside in you, the Supreme Lord. Having the universe for your work and for your limbs, this universe consisting of mind and matter resides in your eternal and all-pervading soul like a multitude of flowers strung together by a strong thread.

You are called Hari, of a thousand heads, a thousand feet, a thousand eyes, a thousand arms, a thousand crowns and a thousand faces of great splendour. You are called Narayana, divinity, and the refuge of the universe. You are the subtlest of the subtle, grossest of the gross, the heaviest of the heavy and the highest of the high. In the Vaks, the Anuvaks, the Nishads, and Upanishads, You are regarded as the Supreme Being of irresistible force. In the Samans also, whose declarations are always true, you are regarded as Truth's self.

You are of quadruple soul. You are displayed in only the understanding of all creatures. You are the Lord of those that are bound to you in faith. O

God, you are adored by the faithful with four excellent, high, and secret names. Penances are ever present in you. Performed by other creatures to gratify you, penances live in your form. You are the Universal Soul. You are of universal knowledge. You are the universe. You are omniscient. You are the Creator of all.

Like a couple of kindling sticks generating a blazing fire, you have been born of the divine Devaki and Vasudeva for the protection of dharma on earth. For eternal salvation, the devout worshipper, with mind withdrawn from all else and casting off all desires, beholds you, O Govinda, that are the Primal Soul, in his own soul. You transcend Surya in glory. You are beyond the ken of the senses and the understanding. O Lord of all creatures, I place myself in your hands. In the Puranas you have been spoken of as Purusha. On occasions of the commencement of yugas, you are said to be Brahma, while on occasions of universal dissolution you are spoken of as Sankarshana. Adorable you are, and therefore I worship you.

Though one, you have yet been born in innumerable forms. You have your passions under perfect control. Your devout worshippers, faithfully performing the rites laid down in the scriptures, sacrifice to you, O granter of every wish! You are called the sheath within which the universe lies. All created things live in you. Like swans and ducks swimming on the water, all the worlds that we see float in you. You are Truth. You are One and undecaying. You are Brahman, you are That which is beyond Mind and Matter.

You are without beginning, middle or end. Neither the Devas nor the Rishis know you. The Devas, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Siddhas, the Rishis and the great Uragas always worship you with concentrated souls. You are the great panacea for all sorrow. You are without birth and death. You are divine. You are self-created. You are eternal. You are invisible and beyond ken. You are called Hari and Narayana, O puissant one. The Vedas declare you to be the Creator of the universe and the Lord of everything that exists in it. You are its Supreme protector. You know no deterioration and you are that which is called the highest. You are of the complexion of gold. You are the slayer of Asuras. Though One, Aditi brought you forth in twelve forms.

Salutations to you that are the soul of the sun! Salutations to you in your form of Soma, said to be the chief of all the regenerate ones, who gratifies with nectar the Devas in the lighted fortnight and the Pitris in the dark fortnight. You are the One Being of transcendent effulgence dwelling on the other side of dense darkness. Knowing you, one ceases to have any fear of death. Salutations to you in that form which is an object of knowledge!

In the grand Uktha sacrifice, the Brahmanas adore you as the great Rik. In the great fire-sacrifice, they sing of you as the chief Adhvaryu. You are the soul of the Vedas. The Riks, the Yajus and the Samans are your abode. You are the five kinds of sanctified libations used in sacrifices. Salutations to you!

You are the seven mantras used in the Vedas. Salutations to you in your form of Sacrifice! Libations are poured on the Homa fire to the accompaniment of the seventeen monosyllabic sounds. You are the soul of the Homa. Salutations to you! You are that Purusha of whom the Vedas sing. Your name is Yajus. The Vedic metres are your limbs. The sacrifices laid down in the three Vedas are your three heads. The great sacrifice called Rathantara is your voice, expressive of gratification. Salutation to you in your form of sacred hymns!

You are the Rishi that appeared during the Mahayagna, lasting for a thousand years, performed by the creators of the universe. You are the great swan with wings of gold. Salutations to you in your form of the Swan! The Mulas, the roots with all kinds of affixes and suffixes are your limbs. The Sandhis are your joints. The consonants and the vowels are your ornaments. The Vedas have declared you to be the divine word. Salutations to you in your form of the Word!

Assuming the form of the Boar, Varaha whose limbs were constituted by sacrifice, you raised up the submerged earth for the benefit of the three worlds. Salutations to you in your form of infinite prowess! You sleep in Yoga on your serpent bed shaded by the thousand hoods of Anantasesha. Salutations to you in your form of Sleep!

You build the bridge for the good to cross the sea of samsara with Truth, with those means by which Mukti can be obtained, and with the means by which the senses may be controlled. Salutations to you in your form of Truth!

Men practising diverse creeds, actuated by desire for diverse fruits, worship you with diverse rites. Salutations to you in your form of Creed!

From you all things have sprung. It is you that excite with desire all embodied creatures. Salutations to you in your form of Excitement! The great Rishis seek your unmanifest self within the manifest. Called Kshetrajna, you sit in Kshetra. Salutations to you in your form of Kshetra! You are always conscious and present in the self, and the Sankhyas still describe you as existing in the three states of wakefulness, dream and sound sleep. They further speak of you as possessed of sixteen attributes and representing the number seventeen. Salutations to your form as conceived by the Sankhyas! Casting off sleep, restraining breath, withdrawn into their own selves, Yogins of restrained senses behold you as eternal light. Salutations to you in your form of Yoga! Peaceful sannyasins, freed from fear of rebirth by the destruction of all their sins and merits, find you in liberation. Salutations to you in your form of Emancipation!

At the end of a thousand yugas, you assume the form of a blazing fire and consume all creatures. Salutations to you in your form of Fierceness! Having consumed all creatures and making the universe one vast expanse of water, you sleep on the waters in the form of a child. Salutations to you in your form as Maya! From the navel of the Self-born with eyes like lotus leaves, springs a lotus, on which is established this universe. Salutations to you in your form as Lotus!

You have a thousand heads. You pervade everything. You are of immeasurable soul. You have subjugated the four kinds of desire that are as vast as the four oceans. Salutations to you in your form of Yoga-nidra!

The clouds are in the hair of your head. The rivers flow in the several joints of your limbs. The four oceans are in your belly. Salutations to you in your form of Water! Birth and the change represented by death spring from you. All things, again, at the universal dissolution dissolve away in you. Salutations to your form as Cause! You sleep not in the night. You rest not by day. You observe the good and the evil actions of all. Salutations to you in your form of universal Witness! There is nothing, no deed, which you cannot do. You are, again, ever ready to accomplish actions that are righteous. Salutations to you in your form of Work, the form which is called Vaikuntha! In wrath you exterminated in battle twenty-one times the Kshatriyas who had trampled virtue and authority under their feet. Salutations to you in your form of Cruelty!

Dividing yourself into five portions you have become the five vital breaths that act within everybody and cause every living creature to move. Salutations to you in your form of Air! You appear in every yuga in the forms called month and season and half-year and year, and are the cause of both creation and dissolution. Salutations to you in your form of Time!

Brahmanas are your mouth, Kshatriyas are your two arms, Vaisyas are your stomach and thighs, and Sudras live in your feet. Salutations to you in your form of Caste!

Fire constitutes your mouth. The heavens are the crown of your head. The sky is your navel. The earth is your feet. The sun is your eye. The points of the compass are your ears. Salutations to you in your form of the Worlds! You are superior to Time. You are superior to Sacrifice. You are higher than the highest. Yourself without origin, you are the origin of the universe. Salutations to you in your form of the Universe! Men of the world, according to the attributes ascribed to you by the Vaiseshikas, regard you as the Protector of the world. Salutations to you in your form of Protector!

Assuming the forms of food, drink and fuel, you increase the humours and the life-breaths of creatures and uphold their existence. Salutations to you in your form of Life! To support the life-breaths you eat the four kinds of food. Assuming also the form of Agni within the belly, you digest that food. Salutations to you in your form of assimilating Heat!

Assuming the form of half-man and half-lion, Narasimha with tawny eyes and tawny mane, with teeth and claws for your weapons, you took the life of Hiranyakashyapu, the king of the Asuras. Salutations to you in your form of swelling Might! Neither the Devas, nor the Gandharvas, nor the Daityas, nor the Danavas, know you truly. Salutations to your form of exceeding Subtlety!

Assuming the form of the handsome, illustrious and puissant Ananta in the Patalas, you support the world. Salutations to your form of Might! You stupefy all creatures by the bonds of affection and love for the continuance of the creation. Salutations to you in your form of Stupefaction! Regarding that knowledge which is conversant with the five elements to be the true Self-knowledge, people approach you through knowledge! Salutations to you in your form of Knowledge! Your body is immeasurable. Your intellect and eyes encompass everything. You are infinite, being beyond all measures. Salutations to you in your form of Immensity!

You assumed the form of a recluse with a head of matted locks, a staff in your hand, a long belly and a begging bowl for your quiver. Salutations to you in your form of Brahma! You bear the trident, you are the lord of the celestials, you have three eyes, and you are high-souled. Your body is always smeared with ashes, and your linga is always turned upwards.

Salutations to you in your form of Rudra! The half-moon forms the ornament of your brow. You have snakes for the sacred thread circling your neck. You are armed with Pinaka and Trisula. Salutations to your form of Fierceness!

You are the soul of all creatures. You are the Creator and the Destroyer of all. You are without wrath, without enmity, without affection. Salutations to you in your form of Peace! Everything is in you. Everything is from you. You are Everything, Everywhere. You are ever the All. Salutations to you in your form of Everything! Salutations to you whose work is the universe, to you that are the soul of the universe, to you from whom has sprung the universe, to you that are the dissolution of all things, to you that are beyond the five elements that constitute all things!

Salutations to you that are the three worlds, to you that are above the three worlds! Salutations to you that are all the directions! You are all and you are the one receptacle of all. Salutations to you, O divine Lord, O Vishnu, and O eternal origin of all the worlds! You, O Hrishikesa, are the Creator, You are the Destroyer, and you are invincible. I cannot behold that heavenly form in which you are displayed in the Past, Present, and the Future. I can, however, behold truly your eternal form as manifest in your works.

You have filled heaven with your head, and the earth with your feet; with your prowess you have filled the three worlds. You are Eternal and you pervade everything in the universe. The directions are your arms, the sun is your eye, and prowess is your vital fluid. You are the lord of all creatures. You stand, shutting up the seven paths of the Wind whose energy is immeasurable. They are freed from all fears that worship you, O Govinda of unfading prowess, you that are clad in yellow robes of the colour of the Atasi flower. Even one genuflection to you, O Krishna, is equal to the completion of ten Horse-sacrifices. The man who has performed ten Horse-sacrifices is not freed from the obligation of rebirth. The man who bows to Krishna, however, escapes rebirth. They who have Krishna for their vow, they who think of Krishna in the night and upon rising from sleep, may be said to have Krishna for their body. Those people after death enter Krishna's self, even as libations of clarified butter sanctified with mantras enter the blazing fire.

Salutations to you that dispel the fear of hell, to you, O Vishnu, that are a boat unto those that flounder amid the waves of the ocean of worldly life!

Salutations to you, O God, that are the Brahmana's self, to you that are the benefactor of Brahmanas and kine, to you that are the benefactor of the universe, to you that are Krishna and Govinda! The two syllables Ha-ri constitute the monetary stock of those that sojourn through the wilderness of life, and the medicine that effectively cures all worldly predilections, besides being the means to alleviate sorrow and grief.

As truth is full of Vishnu, as the universe is full of Vishnu, as everything is full of Vishnu, so let my soul be full of Vishnu, and my sins be destroyed! I seek your protection, devoted to you, desirous of finding a happy end, O you of eyes like lotus petals. O best of gods, think of what will be for my good! Yourself without origin, O Vishnu, you are the origin of Knowledge and Penance. Thus are you praised! O Janardana, thus worshipped by me in the Sacrifice constituted by speech, be gratified with me, O God. The Vedas are devoted to Narayana. Penances are devoted to Narayana. The gods are devoted to Narayana. All is forever Narayana!'" Vaisampayana continued, "Having uttered these words, Bhishma, with mind concentrated upon Krishna, says, 'Salutations to Krishna!' and bows to him. Learning through his Yoga prowess of the devotion of Bhishma, Madhava, otherwise called Hari, entering his body, bestows upon him heavenly knowledge compassing the Past, the Present, and the Future, and then leaves. When Bhishma falls silent, those utterers of Brahman, the Brahmavadis that sat around him, with voices choked with tears, adored that high-souled great Lord of the Kurus in excellent speech. Those foremost of Brahmanas uttered the praises of Krishna also, that first of Beings, and continued in soft voices to laud Bhishma.

Learning of the devotion of Bhishma for him, that foremost of Beings Krishna climbs into his chariot. Kesava and Satyaki ride on one car. On another go those two illustrious Kshatriyas, Yudhishtira and Dhananjaya. Bhimasena and the twins ride on a third, while those bulls among men, Kripa and Yuyutsu, and that Parantapa, Sanjaya of the Suta varna, all ride their own rathas, each of which looks like a town. All of them, riding together, cause the earth to tremble with the rumble of their chariot-wheels.

Krishna, foremost of men, as he goes, cheerfully listens to the praises sung by the Brahmanas along the way. The slayer of Kesi with a glad heart salutes the people lining the streets with joined hands and bowed heads."

Vaisampayana said, "Krishna, Yudhishtira and all their men, led by Kripa, along with the four Pandavas in their rathas like fortified cities decked with standards and banners, fly to Kurukshetra on their swift horses. They descend on the field where millions of noble Kshatriyas have cast away their lives, and which is now covered with hair, marrow and bones and with hillocks formed of the bodies and bones of elephants and horses, scattered with human heads and skulls like conch-shells. With thousands of funeral pyres and with armour and weapons lying in heaps, the vast plain looks like the drinking garden of the Destroyer himself, used and recently abandoned. The Maharathas travel quickly, viewing the battlefield haunted by throngs of Pisachas and Rakshasas.

On the way, the mighty-armed Kesava, delighter of all the Yadavas, speaks to Yudhishtira about the prowess of Jamadagni's son, Parasurama, 'There, at a distance, O Kaunteya, are the five lakes of Rama, where he offered oblations of Kshatriya blood to the souls of his ancestors! It was there that the mighty Rama, having freed the earth of Kshatriyas twenty-one times, finally ceased his grisly task.'

Yudhishtira says, 'I have great doubts about what you say about Rama having extirpated the Kshatriyas twenty-one times. When Parasurama burnt the very Kshatriya seed, O Yadurishabha, how was it that the Kshatriya varna revived, how did the illustrious one exterminate the Kshatriya again and again, and how came it to rise yet again? In frightful chariot encounters he slew millions of Kshatriyas, and the earth was strewn with the corpses of warriors. For what reason did Dharmatman Parasurama Bhargava extirpate the Kshatriyas, O tiger among the Yadus? Clear my doubts, O you of Vrishni's race, for you know all things.'"

Vaisampayana said, "The bird-bannered hero, puissant elder brother of Baladeva, then narrates in full everything that happened on earth and how it was again peopled with Kshatriyas."

CANTO 50

"Vasudeva says, 'Listen, O son of Kunti, to the story of Parasurama's birth, his vitality, and prowess, as I learnt it from some great Rishis. Listen to the tale of how Jamadagni's son slew millions of Kshatriyas and repeatedly slaughtered those who sprang up again in the different royal houses of Bharatavarsha.

Jadu had a son named Rajas, whose son King Balakaswa had an upright and virtuous son named Kusika. Resembling the thousand-eyed Indra on earth, Kusika underwent many maha-tapasyas in order to petition the Lord of the three worlds for a son. Seeing him engaged in the severest tapasyas and well able to father a son, the thousand-eyed Purandara himself inspired the king with his force. The great Lord of the three worlds, Indra, tamer of Paka, was himself born as Kusika's son, O Rajan, and was named Gadhi.

Gadhi had a daughter called Satyavati. The powerful Gadhi gave her as wife to Richika, a descendant of Bhrigu. Richika was pleased with her for the purity of her character. He cooked a sacrificial payasa of milk and rice for Gadhi to obtain a son.

Calling his wife, Richika said, "You must take this portion of the sanctified payasa for yourself, and your mother must have this other portion. A son will be born to her who will blaze with tejas and be a bull among Kshatriyas. Invincible to Kshatriyas on earth, he will be the slayer of the greatest of them. As for you, O blessed Satyavati, your portion of the food will give you a very wise son, an embodiment of tranquillity, a Mahatapasvin, and the best of Brahmanas."

Having said these words to his wife, the blessed Richika of Bhrigu's vamsa set his heart on tapasya, and left for the vana. About the same time, King Gadhi, who was on a pilgrimage to the holy tirthas, arrived with his queen at the asrama of Richika. Seeing them, Satyavati fetched the two portions of the sanctified payasa, and told her mother what her husband had said. But, in her eagerness and haste, O son of Kunti, the queen-mother mistakenly gave the portion intended for herself to her daughter, and ate the portion intended for Satyavati. Thus, Satyavati, her body blazing with lustre, conceived a child of terrible form, born to become the exterminator of the race of Kshatriyas.

Seeing a Brahmana child lying within her womb Richika, that tiger among the Bhrigus, said to his wife Satyavati of divine beauty, "Your mother has deceived you by substituting the sanctified payasas, O blessed lady. Your son will become a man of cruel deeds and vindictive heart. Your brother, born of your mother, will be a Brahmana devoted to maha-tapasya. Into the sanctified food intended for you I placed the seed of the supreme and universal Brahman, while into that intended for your mother I mixed all the essence of Kshatriya energy. Now, O Satyavati, that which I had intended will not happen. Your mother will have a Brahmana child, while to you will be born a son who will become a Kshatriya."

Hearing this, the blessed Satyavati prostrated herself and, setting her head at his feet said, trembling, "It does not become you, O holy one, to tell me that my son will be a wretch among Brahmanas."

Richika replied, "I did not intend this for you, Satyavati. You have conceived a son of fierce deeds only because of the substitution of the payasas." Satyavati pleaded, "Maharishi, when you can create other worlds if you wish, why not a child? It is only right to give me a son who will be righteous and devoted to peace."

Richika said, "When I have never lied, even in jest, how can I lie about such a solemn matter as preparing sanctified food with Vedic mantras, after lighting a holy fire? Destiny ordained it, I have ascertained that through my tapasya. All the descendants of your father will be possessed of Brahmanic dharma."

Satyavati then said, "Mahatapasvin, let our grandson be like that, but let me have a son of tranquil pursuits."

Richika said, "O you of the fairest complexion, there is no distinction between a son and a grandson. It will be as you wish. Tathaastu!"

Then Satyavati gave birth to Jamadagni, a son in Bhrigu's race who was of regulated vows and devoted to tapasya and other tranquil pursuits. Kusika's son Gadhi had a son named Viswamitra. Possessed of every attribute of a Brahmana, this son, though born a Kshatriya, was equal to a Brahmana.

Richika's son Jamadagni, ocean of penances, later had a son of fierce deeds who mastered the shastras, including the science of arms. Like a fire, this son was Parasurama, exterminator of the Kshatriyas. Having gratified Mahadeva on the mountains of Gandhamadana, he begged weapons of the Great Deva, especially his axe of fierce power. With that unrivalled weapon of fiery splendour and irresistible sharpness, he became invincible and without peer on earth.

Meanwhile, the mighty son of Kritaviryarjuna of the Kshatriya varna, ruler of the Haihayas, endowed with great tejas, most virtuous in conduct, and possessed of a thousand arms through the grace of the great Rishi Dattatreya, had subjugated the whole world in battle, the earth with her mountains and seven islands. He became a powerful Rajadhiraja and finally gave away the earth to Brahmanas at an Aswamedha yagna.

Once, asked by the hungry god of fire Agni, this Arjuna, the thousand-armed, gave alms to the deity. Springing from the point of his shafts, the fierce Agni consumed what was offered, and incinerated villages, towns, kingdoms and hamlets of cowherds. Then with the help of the powerful Kritavirya, Agni consumed mountains and great forests.

With the help of the king of the Haihayas, the god of fire made the wind to blaze forth as flames, and to burn the uninhabited but delightful asrama of the noble Apava. Possessed of great tejas himself, Apava, seeing his hermitage consumed by the powerful Kshatriya, cursed him in wrath, O Mahabaho, saying, "Since you have burnt my beautiful wood, O arrogant Arjuna, Parasurama will cut off your thousand arms."

The charitable and brave Arjuna, always devoted to peace and considerate towards Brahmanas, who granted protection to all varnas, did not take the curse of Mahatman Apava seriously. Nevertheless, as a result of that curse, his powerful sons, always haughty and cruel, became the indirect cause of his death. These princes, O Bharatarishabha, seized and brought away the calf of Jamadagni's homa cow, without the knowledge of Kritavirya of the Haihayas, which resulted in a dispute between the noble Jamadagni and the Haihayas. Jamadagni's son, the powerful Rama, filled with wrath, hewed off the thousand arms of Arjuna and brought back his father's calf, which was wandering within the inner compound of the king's palace.

The foolish sons of Arjuna raided the asrama of the high-souled Jamadagni and struck off the Rishi's head with the points of their lances while the celebrated Parasurama was out fetching sacred fuel and grass. Inflamed with anger at the death of his father and burning for vengeance, Rama took up arms and vowed to free the earth of the very race of Kshatriyas. That tiger among the Bhrigus slaughtered all the sons and grandsons of Kritavirya. Massacring thousands of Haihayas in rage, he drenched the earth with blood and indeed stripped Bhumi of all her Kshatriyas. Filled then with remorse, he retired into the forest.

When some thousands of years had passed, the mighty Rama, wrathful by nature, had imputations of cowardice cast upon him by the grandson of Viswamitra and son of Raibya, a Maharishi called Paravasu. Raibya began saying in public, "O Rama, were not those righteous men, Pratardana and others, who were assembled at a yagna at the time of Yayati's fall, Kshatriyas by birth? Your vows, O Rama, are empty boasts among all people! You have taken to the mountains out of fear of Kshatriya heroes."

Parasurama, hearing these words of Paravasu, once more took up arms, and once more strewed the earth with thousands of Kshatriya corpses. However, some hundreds of Kshatriyas, whom he spared, multiplied in time and became mighty kings on earth. So Rama once again slaughtered them, not sparing even their offspring. Indeed, the earth was strewn again with the bodies of Kshatriya children, slain by Parasurama as soon as they were born.

Some Kshatriya women, however, succeeded in protecting their children from Rama's wrath. Having made the earth destitute of Kshatriyas twenty-one times, the powerful Bhargava, Parasurama, at the completion of an Aswamedha yagna, gave away the earth as a sacrificial gift to Kasyapa. In order to save the remaining Kshatriyas, Kasyapa pointed with his hand that still held the sacrificial ladle, and said, "O Maharishi, go to the shores of the southern ocean. It is not right, Rama, for you to dwell within my dominion." At these words, the Ocean instantly created for Jamadagni's son Parasurama, on his further shore, a realm called Surparaka.

Having accepted the earth as gift, O Rajan, Kasyapa gave it away to the Brahmanas of the world and entered the great forest. Then headstrong Sudras and Vaisyas began to ravish the wives of Brahmanas, O Bharatarishabha. When anarchy sets in on earth, the weak are oppressed by the strong, and no man is master of his own property. Unprotected by virtuous Kshatriyas, and oppressed by evil men, Bhumi started rapidly sinking to the lowest depths. Seeing this, Maharishi Kasyapa held her on his lap—his uru; thus is the earth known as Urvi. The Devi Bhumi gratified Kasyapa and begged him for a king for her protection.

Bhudevi said, "I have concealed a few important Kshatriyas among the women, O Muni. They were born in the race of Haihayas. Let them, O Rishi, protect me. There is one raised among the bears in the Rikshavat mountains, Viduratha's son, and he is of Puru's race. The powerful Parasara, ever engaged in yagnas, through compassion has protected the son of Saudasa. Though born in one of the regenerate orders, yet like a Sudra he serves the Rishi and for that has been named Sarvakarman.

Another is the strong son of Sibi, named Gopati, reared in the forest among kine. Let him, O sage, protect me. Let Pratardana's mighty son Vatsa, raised among calves in a cowpen, protect me. The sage Gautama has concealed and protected Dadhivahana's grandson and Diviratha's son on the banks of the Ganga, where wolves and the mountains of Gridhrakuta have sheltered him. His name is Brihadratha, and he is endowed with tremendous energy and many great qualities.

The Ocean has protected and nurtured many Kshatriyas belonging to the Marutta vamsa, equal in strength to the lord of Maruts. We hear of these children of the Kshatriya varna dwelling in different places among artisans and goldsmiths. If they protect me I will surely be safe gain. Rama of great prowess has slain their fathers and grandfathers for my sake. It is my duty, O Maharishi, to see that someone duly performs their funeral rites. I do not wish that my present rulers protect me, for they are all sinful. O Maharishi, I beg you to do what will enable me to live as before."

Kasyapa sought out the powerful Kshatriyas whom the Devi had named, and installed them as kings to protect her. The Kshatriya races that now exist are the progeny of those princes. This is the answer to your question, O son of Pandu, of what happened long ago.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Conversing thus with Yudhishtira, the greatest Dharmatman, the noble Yadava hero rides in his fleet chariot, illumining all the points of the compass like divine Surya himself."

Vaisampayana said, "King Yudhishtira, hearing of these feats of Parasurama, is filled with wonder and says to Janardana, 'O you of Vrishni's race, the prowess of the Dharmatman Rama, who in wrath freed the earth of Kshatriyas, is like that of Sakra himself. The fear of Parasurama has caused the scions of Kshatriyas to be raised in secrecy by the Ocean, kine, leopards, bears and apes. Worthy of every praise is this world of men, and fortunate are they who dwell in it, where a Brahmana has accomplished so awesome and dharmic a feat!'

Concluding their conversation, Krishna and Yudhishtira come to where the mighty son of Ganga lies on his bed of arrows, resembling in splendour the evening sun engulfed by its own rays. Many Rishis surround the Kurupravira, like the Devas of Swarga surrounding Indra of a hundred yagnas. The place where he lies, on the banks of the Oghavati river, is most sacred. Seeing him from a distance, Krishna, Dharma's royal son Yudhishtira, the four other Pandavas and the rest, led by Saradwat alight from their rathas and, controlling their restless minds and concentrating all their senses, approach the great Rishis.

Saluting the Maharishis headed by Vyasa, Govinda, Satyaki and the others approach the Ganga's son, and sit around him. Seeing Bhishma like a fire about to die out, Kesava addresses him sombrely.

Krishna says, 'Is your mind now as clear as before? I hope your understanding is not clouded, O greatest of eloquent men. I hope your limbs do not feel the pain of the arrows. The body becomes weak from mental affliction too. As a result of the boon granted to you by your father, the righteous Santanu, your time of death depends on your own will, O puissant hero. I myself do not have the punya through which you obtained this boon. When the minutest pin inserted in the body produces pain, what need then be said, O Rajan, of the hundreds of arrows that have pierced you? Surely, pain does not afflict you. You know enough, Bhaarata, to instruct the very Devas about the birth and death of living creatures. O you of great gyana, you know everything of the past, the future and the present, as well as about death and the rewards of dharma, for you are an ocean of dharma and karma.

When you were a powerful ruler and, though sound of body, perfectly healthy and surrounded by female companions, I saw you cleave perfectly to brahmacharya. We have never heard of anyone else in the three worlds other than you, O Santanu's heroic son Bhishma of great tejas, who is so devoted to dharma, your sole pursuit, that, lying on a bed of arrows and at the point of death, you still have mastery over your own death through the power of your tapasya.

We have never heard of anyone as devoted as you to truth, to tapasya, to giving dakshina and dana, to the performances of yagnas, to the astra shastra, to the Vedas, to defending men seeking protection; of one who is so harmless to all, so pure in behaviour, so self-restrained, so bent upon the good of all creatures, and also as great a Maharathi as you. I have no doubt that, from a single ratha, you can vanquish the Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras, Yakshas and Rakshasas.

The Brahmanas always speak of you, Mahabaho Bhishma, as the ninth of the Vasus. Through your virtues, however, you have surpassed them all and are equal to Vasava himself. I know, O best of men, that you are celebrated for your prowess even among the gods. Among men on earth, we have never seen or heard of another possessed of such attributes as you, O greatest of men. You have surpassed the Devas themselves. With your power of tapasya you can create a universe of mobile and immobile creatures. Though your dharma and righteous deeds, you have acquired many blessed realms. Dispel now the grief of Pandu's eldest son, who burns with sorrow on account of the slaughter of his kinsmen.

You know well the dharma of the four varnas, and the four varnasramas. O son of Ganga, you know everything in the four branches of knowledge, in the four Hotras, and also the eternal dharma in Yoga and Sankhya philosophy, the duties of the four varnas and the dharma consistent with their declared practices—all these, O Bhaarata, along with their interpretations. The dharma that has been laid down for those who spring from an intermingling of the four varnas, for particular countries, tribes and families, and what the Vedas and wise men declare, are well known to you. The Itihasas and the Puranas are all known to you. The shastras' treatment of dharma and practice is all in your mind.

None other than you, O bull among men, can remove the doubts that may arise in respect of these subjects of knowledge that one studies in the world. With your intelligence, O prince of men, rid Yudhishtira of his sorrow. Men possessed of such great and varied knowledge live just to comfort clouded minds.'" Vaisampayana said, "Hearing what Krishna says, Bhishma, raising his head a little, says with folded hands, 'Salutations to you, O divine Krishna! You are the origin and the dissolution of all the worlds. You are the Creator and the Destroyer. You, O Hrishikesa, cannot be vanquished by anyone. The universe is your handiwork. You are the soul of the universe and the universe has sprung from you. Salutations to you! You are the end of all created things. You are above the five elements. Salutations to you who are the three worlds and also beyond the three worlds!

O Lord of Yogins, salutations to you who are the refuge of everything! O Best of beings, what you say about me has enabled me to behold your divine attributes as manifest in the three worlds. Govinda, I also see your eternal form. You stand barring the seven paths of the Wind of immeasurable energy. The sky is your head, and the earth your feet. The points of the compass are your two arms, the sun is your eye, and Sakra constitutes your prowess. Attired in yellow robes that resemble the hue of the atasi flower, you appear to us like a cloud charged with flashes of lightning. O best of Devas, think of what would be good for this insignificant self which is devoted to you, which seeks your protection, and which desires to find a blissful end.'

Krishna says, 'O bull among men, since your devotion to me is so great, I have shown my Virata Rupa to you. I do not, O greatest of kings, display this form of mine to anyone who is not entirely devoted to me, or to a devotee who is not sincere, or, who does not have a disciplined heart. You are devoted to me and always follow the path of dharma. Of pure heart, you are always self-restrained and ever observant of tapasya and of charity. It is because of your tapasya that you are able to see me.

The regions from where there is no return are ready for you, O Bhishma. Fifty-six days still remain for you to live in this world O Kurusthama. You will then cast off your body and obtain the blessed reward of your karma. The Devas and Vasus, all in their fiery splendour, riding on their vimanas, await you invisibly until the moment the sun enters his northerly course. Subject to universal time, when the divine Surya turns to his Uttarayana, you, O greatest of men, will go to those realms from where no man of knowledge ever returns to this earth!

O Bhishma, when you leave this world, all true Knowledge will perish with you. It is for this that these men, assembled together, have approached you—to listen to your discourses on dharma. Do you, then, speak of dharma and Yoga to Yudhishtira, who is firm in truth but whose grief at the slaughter of his kinsmen has clouded his understanding. With your advice dispel his grief!'" Vaisampayana said, "Hearing these words of Krishna about dharma and artha, Bhishma answers him, 'Master of all the worlds, Mahabaho, Siva, Narayana, O you of unfading glory, I am filled with joy to hear you speak. But, Master of Speech, what words of instruction can I utter in your presence, especially when you have dealt with all of them? Whatever in either world is done, or should be done, proceeds from you, Deva! Only he who is competent to speak on the subject of Swarga in the presence of the Lord of the gods himself can discourse on dharma, kama, artha and moksha in your presence.

O slayer of Madhu, the pain of my arrow-wounds sorely agitates my mind; my limbs are weak, my understanding clouded. O Govinda, these shafts, like poison or fire, afflict me so that I no longer have the power of utterance. My strength is abandoning me and my life-breath is hurrying to leave me.

The very vitals of my body are afire. My understanding is hazy and my speech, from weakness, is becoming indistinct. How then can I venture to speak? Krishna, be gratified with me. I will say nothing, Mahabaho. Pardon my unwillingness. The very master of speech, Brihaspati, would hesitate to speak in your presence.

I can no longer distinguish the points of the compass, or the sky from the earth. Through your tejas, Madhava, I am barely alive. Do you, therefore, speak for the good of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, for you are the author of all laws. O Krishna, in the presence of you, the eternal Creator of the universe, how can someone like me discourse on such subjects, a mere disciple in the presence of the acharya?'

Vasudeva says, 'Your words are worthy of you, Kurusthama, you who are endowed with consummate tejas, Mahatman of great patience who has grasped every subject. As for the pain of your arrow-wounds, receive this boon that I grant you, Bhishma, O powerful one, of my grace.

Discomfort, stupefaction, burning, pain, hunger and thirst will not overcome you, O son of Ganga! Your perceptions and memory, sinless one, will not be clouded and your understanding will not fail you. Your mind, Bhishma, undarkened by passion, will remain subject to the radiance of goodness, like the moon emerging from clouds. Your understanding will penetrate whatever subject you think of connected with karma, dharma or artha. Purushavyaghra, obtaining preternatural vision, you will succeed in seeing the four varnas of created things. With your powers of perception, Bhishma, all things in creation that you summon to mind will be as clear to you as fish in a limpid stream!'

Then the assembled Maharishis, with Vyasa among them, worship Krishna with hymns from the Riks, the Yajuses and the Samans. A heavenly shower of flowers of every season falls on the spot where Krishna sits, with Ganga's son and the son of Pandu. Celestial instruments of every kind play in the firmament, and the chorus of Apsaras begins to sing.

No evil and no portent of any evil can be seen here. A pure, auspicious breeze springs up, laden with every kind of fragrance. All the points of the compass become clear and quiet and all animals and birds begin to rove in peace. Soon, like a fire at the extremity of a great vana, the divine Surya of a thousand rays descends to the west. The Rishis then rise and salute Janardana, Bhishma and Yudhishtira. Upon this, Kesava and the sons of Pandu, along with Satyaki, Sanjaya and Saradwata's son Kripa, bow in reverence to the sages. Devoted to the practice of dharma, these Rishis, thus venerated by Kesava and others, return to their respective abodes, saying, 'We will return tomorrow.'

Krishna and the Pandavas, saluting Bhishma and circumambulating him, get into their handsome rathas. The heroes depart, accompanied by a host of chariots decked with golden kuvaras, mettlesome elephants looking like mountains, steeds fleet as Garudas and foot-soldiers armed with bows and other weapons. At great speed, the army travels in two divisions, one in the van and the other in the rear of the princes. The scene resembles the two currents of the great Narmada at the point where it is divided by the Rikshavat mountains straddling it.

Gladdening the great host, the divine Chandramas rises before it in the firmament to moisten anew the terrestrial herbs and plants whose juices the sun had sucked up. Then Krishna, that bull of Yadu's race, and the sons of Pandu, entering the Kuru city whose splendour resembles that of the city of Indra itself, return to their respective mansions like tired lions seeking their caves."

CANTO 53

Vaisampayana said, "Madhava retires to bed and sleeps contentedly. Awaking when only half a yaama remains to usher in the day, he commences his meditation. Fixing all his senses, he meditates on the eternal Brahma.

Then a group of sweet-voiced men, versed in Stotras and the Puranas, begin to recite the praises of Vasudeva, the lord of all creatures and Creator of the universe. Others begin to chant melodious hymns, marking the beat by clapping their hands, while minstrels raise their voices in song. Thousands blow conch-shells and beat drums. The spacious mansion of Krishna, resounding with the delightful strains of vinas, panavas and bamboo flutes, seems to be laughing with music. In the palace of King Yudhishtira, too, are heard songs, musical instruments and harmonious voices expressing auspicious wishes.

Krishna performs his ablutions. Joining his hands, the Mahabaho of unfading glory silently recites his secret mantras and, kindling a fire, pours into it libations of clarified butter. Giving away a thousand cattle to a thousand Brahmanas accomplished in mastery of the four Vedas, he causes them to shower blessings upon him.

Then, touching diverse auspicious articles and viewing himself ceremonially in a clear mirror, Krishna says to Satyaki, 'Go, O descendant of Sini, to Yudhishtira's abode and ascertain whether that king of great tejas is ready to visit Bhishma.'

Satyaki hastens to the royal son of Pandu and says, 'The best of Krishna's chariots is ready, Rajan, for Janardana to go to see Ganga's son Bhishma. O Dharmarajan of great splendour, he awaits you. You must decide what to do now.'

Dharma's son Yudhishtira says, 'Arjuna, let my best chariot be made ready. Soldiers will not accompany us today, and we will go forth alone. We should not vex the greatest Dharmatman, Bhishma, with a large gathering. Since from today Ganga's son will speak of things that are great mysteries, O son of Kunti, let the guards stay back.'

Arjuna leaves and returns with the best chariot harnessed. Yudhishtira, the twins, Bhima and Arjuna, like the five elements, then go towards Krishna's abode. While the noble Pandavas are on their way, the sagacious Krishna, accompanied by the grandson of Sini, mounts his ratha. Exchanging salutions with one another from their chariots and enquiring whether the night had passed contentedly, they ride without stopping on their chariots which rumble like clouds. Daruka urges on Krishna's steeds—Balahaka, Meghapushpa, Saibya and Sugriva. Endowed with great strength and speed, they fly ahead, marking the earth with their hooves and devouring the very skies.

Traversing the sacred field of Kuru, the princes reach the spot where the powerful Bhishma lies on his bed of arrows, surrounded by the great Rishis, like Brahma himself in the midst of Devas. Krishna, Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna, the twins and Satyaki alight from their chariots and salute the Rishis by raising their right hands.

Yudhishtira, like Vasava walking towards Brahma, approaches Bhishma, surrounded by the Rishis like the moon thronged by stars. Overcome by apprehension, he timidly casts his eyes on the Mahabaho lying on his bed of arrows like the sun fallen from the sky."

Janamejaya said, "Tell me, O Maharishi, what discourse results in that meeting after the battle, between the son of Santanu and Ganga, named Devavrata or Bhishma of unclouded glory, the Dharmatman of immense tejas lying on a hero's bed, firmly cleaving to truth, his passions under complete control, and the sons of Pandu sitting around him."

Vaisampayana replied, "Many Rishis and Siddhas, led by Narada, arrive at the spot where Bhishma lies on his bed of arrows. The surviving kings assembled by Yudhishtira—Dhritarashtra, Krishna, Bhima, Arjuna and the twins—approach Bhishma Pitamaha, who resembles the sun fallen from the sky, and lament for him.

Then Narada of godlike aspect, after reflecting for a short while, addresses the Pandavas and the surviving kings: 'The time, I think, has come for you to question Bhishma on dharma and artha, for he is like the sun on the point of setting, about to leave us. He is soon to give over his life's breath. All of you should therefore ask him to speak to you. He is acquainted with the varied dharma of all the four varnas. Old in years, he will attain high regions of bliss after abandoning his body. Request him immediately to clear the doubts that exist in your minds.'

The princes approach Bhishma, but are unable to ask him anything and gaze mutely at one another till Yudhishtira, addressing Krishna, says, 'There is none but you who can question the Pitamaha, O greatest of Yadu's race. You are the highest among us all and know every duty and usage. Do you, Madhava, therefore speak first.'

Illustrious Kesava, of undimmed glory, approaching the unconquerable Bhishma, asks him, 'Have you, O best of kings, passed the night happily? Has your understanding become clear? Does your knowledge, sinless one, shine in you with inward light? I hope your heart no longer feels pain, and your mind is no longer agitated.'

Bhishma answers, 'Through your grace, Vasudeva, the burning, stupefaction, fatigue, exhaustion, illness and pain I felt have all left me in a single day. O you of incomparable splendour, because of your boon I see as clearly as a fruit placed in my hands all the past, future and present. All the dharma declared in the Vedas, all those laid down in the Vedantas, the dharma that virtuous men of learning have declared, I see clearly and remember, O you of unfading glory!

I also know, Janardana, the duties and practices prevailing in different countries and among particular tribes and families. Everything relating to the four varnas of life has come back to my memory. I am also acquainted with the dharma of kingship. I will say whatever should be said at the right time, Krishna, as by your grace I have acquired a blessed understanding. Strengthened by meditating on you, I feel as if I have become a young man again. Your favour has made me competent to hold a discourse on what is beneficial for the world. Why do you not yourself speak to Pandu's son on all that is good, O holy one? Please explain this, O Madhava!'

Vasudeva says, 'Recognize, Kurusthama, that I am the root of fame and of everything that leads to good. All things, good or bad, proceed from me. Who on earth will be surprised if the moon is said to be of cool rays? Similarly, I who have a full measure of fame already, can scarcely add to it by being described as the most illustrious one. It is your fame that I am resolved to enhance, and it is for this that I have inspired you with such prescience.

O Bhishma, lord of the earth, as long as the earth lasts will your fame travel with undiminished lustre through all the worlds. Whatever you say to the inquiring son of Pandu will be regarded everywhere to be as authoritative as the declarations of the Vedas. He who conducts himself according to your dictates here will obtain henceforth the reward of every meritorious action.

A man's achievements live as long as his prestige lasts in the world. For this reason, Bhishma, I have imparted to you divine understanding, so that your glory will be enhanced on earth. The surviving kings are sitting around you, eager to listen to your discourses on dharma and karma. Speak to them, O Bhaarata!

You are ripe in years and your life is consistent with the laws of the Srutis. You know well the duties of kings and every other aspect of dharma. No one has ever observed any transgression in you, from your very birth onwards. All the kings know that you have knowledge of all the sciences of dharma and karma. Like a father to his sons, advise them about the sanatana dharma.

You have always worshipped the Rishis and the Devas. You must talk about these in detail to men who wish to listen to your discourse on dharma and karma. A learned man should oblige, especially when asked by men of dharma. The Rishis have declared this a duty, O powerful one, and if you do not speak on these subjects, you will incur sin. Therefore, when your sons and grandsons ask you, O learned one, about the eternal duties of men, you must satisfy them, Bharatarishabha.'" Vaisampayana said, "Thus envigorated, Bhishma says, 'I will discourse on dharma. By your grace O Govinda, since you are the eternal atman of every being, my speech and mind have become steady. Let the Dharmatman Yudhishtira question me about dharma and karma, and I will be happy to speak on the subject.

CANTO 55

Let the son of Pandu question me, the Rajarishi whose birth filled all the Vrishnis with joy, and who has no equal among all the Kurus, among all dharmatman and among men of great fame.

Let Yudhishtira Brahmacharya, who has intelligence, self-restraint, forgiveness, righteousness, mental vigour and energy, question me.

Let Yudhishtira, who by his good offices always honours his relatives, guests, servants and others who are dependent on him, ask me questions.

Let Yudhishtira, in whom are truth, charity, asceticism, heroism, peacefulness, cleverness and fearlessness, ask me questions.

Let Yudhishtira the Dharmatman, whom kama, artha or fear can never influence to commit sin, ask me questions.

Let the son of Pandu, who is ever devoted to truth, forgiveness, knowledge and cordiality, and who always makes gifts to the righteous, ask me questions.

Let Yudhishtira, who is always engaged in tapasya, the study of the Vedas and the practice of dharma and duty; who is ever tranquil and who has heard all the mysteries, ask me questions.'

Krishna says to Bhishma, ‘King Yudhishtira the Just, overcome with mortification at having caused a great slaughter, and fearing your curse, dares not come near you. Having pierced with arrows those who deserved his veneration, those who were devoted to him, his acharyas, relatives, kinsmen and those worthy of his highest regard, he cannot pluck up the courage to approach you.’

Bhishma says, ‘O Krishna, just as the dharma of the Brahmanas consists of practising charity, study and tapasya, the dharma of Kshatriyas is to kill or die in battle. A Kshatriya should slay all who engage with him in unjust battle—fathers, grandfathers, brothers, gurus, relatives and kinsmen. This is his declared dharma.

That Kshatriya who kills in battle his very acharyas if they happen to be sinful, covetous and disregardful of restraints and vows, O Kesava, is only doing his duty.

That Kshatriya who slays in battle the man who from covetousness disregards the eternal strictures of virtue, knows his duty.

That Kshatriya knows his duty who in battle makes the earth a lake of blood, with the hair of slain warriors like grass and straw floating on it, dead elephants for its rocks and banners for trees on its banks. A Kshatriya, when challenged, should always fight a battle, since a combat for dharma leads him to both Swarga and fame on earth, as Manu has said.’

Hearing Bhishma speak thus, Dharma’s son Yudhishtira, with great humility, approaches the Kurupravira and stands in his range of vision. He falls at the feet of Bhishma, who in return gladdens him with words of affection, lovingly nuzzling his head, and asks him to take a seat, saying, Do not fear, Kurusthama! Ask me anything, O child, without any anxiety.’” Vaisampayana said, “Bowing to Hrishikesha, saluting Bhishma and taking the permission of all the seniors assembled there, Yudhishtira begins to question his Pitamaha.

Yudhishtira says, ‘Men with knowledge of dharma and niti say that Rajadharma constitutes the highest science of dharma. I, too, think that the burden of these duties is exceedingly onerous. Tell us about the dharma of kings in detail, Pitamaha.

Rajadharma is the refuge of the whole world and, with artha and kama, is dependent on kingly duties. It is also clear that the practices that lead to moksha are equally dependent on them. Just as reins control the horse, the ankush or iron hook the elephant, Rajadharma is what keeps the world restrained and in check. If one does not grasp the dharma observed by Rajarishis, chaos will ensue on earth, and all will become confusion and anarchy.

As the rising sun dispels inauspicious darkness, so does Rajadharma prevent every kind of evil in this world. Therefore, O Pitamaha, for my sake, discuss the subject of this dharma first, for you are the greatest of all men that know dharma. O Parantapa, Vasudeva has declared you the wisest of men and so all of us expect to learn the highest knowledge from you.’

Bhishma says, ‘Bowing to Dharma who is Supreme, Krishna who is entirely Brahman and to the Brahmanas, I will discourse on the eternal duties of men. Listen to me, Yudhishtira, with concentration, while I describe in precise detail the whole range of Rajadharma and other responsibilities that you wish to understand.

Firstly, O Kurusthama, the king, from a desire to please his subjects, should wait humbly upon the Devas and the Brahmanas, always abiding by the law. By worshipping them, the king pays off his debt to dharma and niti and receives the respect of his subjects.

You should always act promptly, Yudhishtira, for without timely action, mere destiny can never accomplish the objects cherished by kings. Effort and destiny are equal in their operation. Of the two, I regard action to be the superior, for destiny is contingent upon effort. Do not indulge in grief if what has begun at first ends disastrously, for you should then exert yourself on the same task with redoubled diligence. This is the great duty of kings.

There is nothing that contributes so much to the success of kings as Satya. The king devoted to Truth finds happiness both here and after death. For Rishis too, O Rajan, Truth is their greatest wealth. Similarly, there is nothing that inspires as much confidence in kings as Satya. The monarch who is possessed of every accomplishment and good conduct, who is self-restrained, humble and follows his dharma, who has his passions under control, who is personable and liberal, never loses prosperity.

By administering justice, by attending to three principles—concealment of his own weaknesses, discovery of the weaknesses of enemies and keeping his own counsel—and by the observance of straightforward conduct, the king obtains prosperity, O Kurusthama. If he is mild, everybody disregards him. On the other hand, if he becomes fierce, his subjects are troubled. Therefore, observe both kinds of policy.

Never punish the Brahmanas, for the Brahmana is the greatest of men on earth. The Dharmatman Manu sang two slokas in respect of your duties, which you should always bear in mind: “Fire has sprung from water, the Kshatriya from the Brahmana and iron from stone. The three—fire, Kshatriya and iron—can exert their force on every other thing, but when they come into contact with their respective progenitors, their force is neutralized.” When iron strikes stone, or fire combats water, or a Kshatriya cherishes enmity towards a Brahmana, all three become weak.

This being so, O Rajan, you will see that the Brahmanas are worthy of homage. Those who are the best among the Brahmanas are Devas on earth. Duly revered, they uphold the Vedas and the yagnas. But those who want to gain such honour but are impediments to the three worlds, Purushavyaghra, should always be subdued by the might of your arms.

Listen with concentrated attention to the two slokas sung by the great Rishi Usanas, in the olden days. “The righteous Kshatriya, mindful of his dharma, should punish a Brahmana, even though he may be the very master of the Vedas, if he rushes to do battle with an uplifted weapon.” The Kshatriya who upholds dharma when someone transgresses it, does not thereby become a sinner, for the rage of the assailant justifies the wrath of the punisher. Subject to these restrictions, you should protect the Brahmanas. If they become offenders, you should exile them from your dominions. But even when they deserve punishment, you should show them compassion.

No corporal punishment is for them. If a Brahmana is guilty of Brahmahatya, or of violating the bed of his acharyas or other revered seniors, or of causing miscarriage, or of treason against the king, his punishment should be banishment from your dominions. Those who show respect towards the Brahmanas should be favoured with offices in the state.

No treasure is more valuable to kings than the selection and keeping of servants. Among the six kinds of citadels cited in the shastras, the ready service and love of subjects is the most impregnable. Therefore, the wise king should always show compassion towards the four varnas of his subjects. The king who is a Dharmatman and truthful will succeed in gratifying his people.

However, you must not always forgive everybody, for the king who is mild is regarded like an elephant that is no longer bellicose. In the shastras, Brihaspati has composed a sloka which was applicable to this in ancient times. Listen as I recite it: “If the king happens to be always forgiving, the lowest of men prevail over him, like the man who sits on the head of the elephant he guides.”

The king, therefore, should not always be lenient, nor should he always be fierce. He should be like the vernal sun—neither cold, nor hot enough to produce sweat. He should judge friends and foes by the direct evidence of the senses, by conjecture, by comparisons and by the canons of the shastras, O Rajan.

O you of great kindness, avoid all those evil practices that are called Vyasanas. While it is not essential for you never to indulge in them, do not be attached to them, for everyone prevails over one who is addicted to these.

A king who has no love for his people fills them with anxiety. The king should always conduct himself towards his subjects as a mother towards her unborn child—as one who, for the good of her child, relinquishes those things that she herself most treasures.

For the sake of what will benefit his people, Kurusthama, a righteous king's behaviour towards them should always be as towards a cherished elder.

You should always be determined, O son of Pandu. The king who is possessed of fortitude and who is known to inflict punishment on wrong-doers has no cause of fear.

You should not indulge in jests with your servants, O foremost of speakers. Rajan, observe the drawbacks of such indulgence. If the master mingles too freely with them, they begin to disregard him and, forgetting their status, overstep that of the master. Ordered to do a job, they hesitate. They divulge the master's secrets. They ask for things that should not be asked for, and take the food intended for the master. They go to the extent of manifesting annoyance and seeking to outshine the master. They even seek to dominate the king by accepting bribes, practising deceit and obstructing state business. They cause the state to rot through abuses by falsification and forgeries.

They make love with the female guards of the palace and dress in the same style as their master. They become shameless enough to indulge in belching and the like, and expectorating in the very presence of their master. They do not fear to speak of him with levity before others. If the king becomes mild and disposed to jest, his servants, disregarding him, ride on horses and elephants and chariots as good as his. His counsellors, assembled in court, openly say to their sovereign, "This is beyond your capacity. This is a wrong course."

If the king becomes angry, they laugh. They are not contented even when favours are bestowed upon them, though they may express satisfaction for other reasons. They disclose the secret counsels of their master and talk about his evil deeds. Without the least anxiety, they annul the king's commands. If the king's jewels, or food, or the necessaries of his bath, or cosmetics are not forthcoming, the servants show no concern, even in his presence. Instead of taking what is rightfully theirs, they appropriate what belongs to the king. They wish to sport with him as with a bird tied with a string, always giving people to understand that he is very intimate with them and loves them dearly. If the king is easy-going and disposed to jest, O Yudhishtira, these and many other evils spring from his demeanour.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The king, O Yudhishtira, should always be ready for action. That ruler who, like a woman, is unfitted for exertion is not worthy of praise. In this connection, the holy Sanas quotes a sloka. Listen with attention, as I recite it to you: "Like a snake swallowing mice, the earth swallows these two—the king averse to battle, and the Brahmana excessively attached to wives and children." You should always bear this in mind, O Purushavyaghra.

Make peace with those enemies with whom you should make peace according to the laws, and wage war with whom you should wage war. Whether it is your guru or your friend, you should slay those who act inimically towards any of the seven limbs of your kingdom—the king, army, counsellors, friends, treasury, territory and forts.

There is an ancient sloka about the duty of kings, sung by King Marutta, which is in concord with Brihaspati's opinion. According to the shastras, there is punishment for even the acharya if he becomes haughty and disregardful of what should be done and what should not, and if he transgresses all restraints.

Jadu's wise son, King Sagara, out of benevolence towards his people, exiled his own eldest son Asamanjas. Asamanjas used to drown children in the Sarayu, for which his father repudiated him and sent him into exile. The Rishi Uddalaka cast off his favourite son Swetaketu, a mahatapasvin in his later years, because he used to deceive Brahmanas, after inviting them with promises of entertainment.

The eternal dharma of kings is the happiness of their subjects, observance of truth and sincerity of conduct. The king should not covet the riches of others, but rather, over time, distribute wealth. If he is proficient, truthful in speech and forgiving in temper, prosperity will always attend him. With his soul cleansed of vices, the king should be able to govern his anger, and all his decisions should be in conformity with the shastras. He should always pursue dharma, artha, kama and moksha judiciously, but conceal his counsel in respect of these.

No greater evil can befall the king than the disclosure of his counsel. Kings should protect the four varnas in the discharge of their dharma. It is their perpetual duty to prevent a confusion of dharmas in respect of the varnas. The king should not repose confidence in those other than his own servants, nor full confidence even in them.

He should, by his own judgement, use to advantage the merits and defects of the six essential requisites of sovereignty—peace with a stronger foe, war with one of equal strength, invading the dominions of one who is weaker, halting, seeking protection if weak in one's own citadel and sowing dissension among the chief officers of the enemy. The king who studies the lapses of his foes judiciously, pursues dharma, artha and kama, who sets clever spies to ascertain secrets and to wean away the officers of his enemies by gifts of wealth, deserves commendation.

The king should administer justice like Yama and amass wealth like Kubera. He should observe the merits and defects of his acquisitions and losses, as well as those of his own dominions. He should feed those who have not been fed and enquire after those who have been fed. He should be of sweet speech and speak with a smiling, not sour, countenance. He should always attend to his elders and repress procrastination. He should never covet what belongs to others, and should be careful to follow dharma in his conduct. He should never take wealth from dharmatmans but, instead, seize the wealth of those who do not follow dharma and give it to those who do.

The king should himself be skilful in taking strong action, but should also practise kindness. He should have his mind under control. He should dress magnificently, give gifts when required, have regular meals and be of good conduct. The king who desires prosperity should always have in his service men who are brave, devoted, incapable of being deceived by enemies, healthy, well-behaved, well-born and connected with families of impeccable conduct. They should be respectable, never insult others, possess knowledge of all the sciences, be familiar with the world and its affairs, be unmindful of the future, always do their duties honestly and remain as steadfast as mountains.

There should be no difference between the king and them as regards the objects of enjoyment. The only distinction should consist in his sphere of influence and his power of passing orders. His demeanour towards them, before or after, should be the same. The king who behaves in this way never comes to grief.

His own servants and relatives soon eliminate the crooked and covetous king who suspects everybody and who taxes his subjects heavily. The king who follows dharma and sets about attracting the hearts of his people never succumbs when enemies attack him. Even if overcome, he soon regains his position.

If the king is not wrathful, not addicted to evil ways and not severe in his punishments, if he keeps his passions under control, he becomes an object of confidence to all, as the Himavat mountain is to all creatures.

He is the best of kings who is wise, charitable, personable, prompt in action, ready to take advantage of the lapses of foes, who knows what is bad for each of the four varnas of his subjects, who has his anger under control and is not short-tempered or vindictive, who is high-minded and engages in yagnas and other religious rites, who is not given to boasting and who vigorously accomplishes all work that he commences.

He is the best of kings in whose dominions men live fearlessly, like sons in the house of their father. He is the best of kings whose subjects do not have to hide their wealth and who know what is good and bad for them.

He is a king indeed whose subjects are engaged in their respective svadharmas and do not fear to die in the line of duty, whose people, duly protected, are of peaceful behaviour, docile, tractable, unwilling to be drawn into disputes, and inclined to liberality.

That king earns eternal merit in whose dominions there is no wickedness, dissimulation, deception and envy.

That king truly deserves to rule who honours knowledge, who is devoted to the shastras and the good of his people, who treads in the path of dharma and is liberal.

That king deserves to rule whose spies, counsels and deeds, accomplished and unaccomplished, remain unknown to his enemies.

O Bhaarata, Usanas of Bhrigu's race, sang the following verse in olden days in the narrative called Ramacharita, on the subject of Rajadharma: "One should first select a king in whose dominions one would prefer to live, only then seek a wife and acquire wealth. If there is no king, what will become of wife and acquisitions?"

There is no dharma more obligatory for those who seek to rule than the protection of subjects. The shelter the king grants to his subjects upholds the world.

Manu, the son of Prachetas, sang two verses respecting the duties of kings. Listen to them with attention: "These six men should be avoided like a leaky boat on the sea: an acharya who does not speak, a priest who has not studied the shastras, a king who does not ensure protection, a wife who says what is disagreeable, a cowherd who prefers to rove within the village and a barber who longs to go to the the vana."""

"Bhishma says, 'Security of subjects, Yudhishtira, is the very essence of kingly duties. The divine Brihaspati does not applaud any duty as much as this one. The Mahatapasvi Kavi Usanas, the thousand-eyed Indra, Manu, the son of Prachetas, the divine Bharadwaja and the sage Gaurasiras, all devoted to Brahman and Brahmavadis, have composed treatises on the dharma of kings. All of them praise the duty of protection in respect of kings.

Yudhishtira, of eyes like lotus leaves and complexion of copper, listen to how you can fulfill the duty of safeguarding your subjects: by giving them their just dues without haughtiness, collecting taxes with consideration, never taking anything from them capriciously and without cause, selecting honest men for discharging administrative functions, seeking the good of the people, employing spies and servants, producing discord and disunion among the enemy by fair or unfair means; it requires adroitness in transacting business, heroism and truthfulness.

It also consists in inflicting corporal punishment and fines justly, never abandoning the honest, granting employment and shelter to men of respectable birth, storing what should be retained and keeping company with intelligent men.

It always includes the comfort of your troops, Yudhishtira, supervision of the people, steadiness in the transaction of business, filling of the treasury, absence of blind confidence in the guards of the city, fostering disloyalty among the citizens of a hostile town, supporting friends and allies living in the midst of the enemy's country, distrusting and strictly watching the servants and officers of the state, personally observing the city, comforting the enemy with assurances, steadily observing the dictates of policy, remaining ready for action, never disregarding an enemy, and eliminating those who are evil.

Brihaspati has said that readiness for action is the root of Rajadharma. Listen to the verses he sang: "Amrita was obtained by toil, the Asuras were slain by effort, Indra himself obtained sovereignty in Swarga and on Bhumi by exerting himself. The hero of work is superior to the hero of speech. The heroes of speech gratify and worship the heroes of work."

An intelligent king who does not exert himself is like a snake without poison, always overcome by his enemies. A king, however strong, should not disregard an enemy, however weak. A spark can kindle a conflagration, and a particle of poison can kill. With only one kind of force, an enemy from within a fort can hold off the whole country of even a powerful and prosperous king.

The secret utterances of the king, the amassing of troops for seizing victory, the crooked purposes in his heart for accomplishing particular objects, and the wrong deeds he does or intends to do, should be concealed by putting on an appearance of frankness. He should act righteously in order to rule over his people. Men of crooked minds cannot bear the burden of an extensive empire. A ruler who is mild cannot acquire superior rank, which depends upon hard work.

A kingdom coveted by all like meat can never be protected by candour and simplicity. Therefore, Yudhishtira, a king should always conduct himself with both frankness and crookedness. If in protecting his subjects a king falls into danger, he earns great merit. This is what the conduct of kings should be. I have now told you only a portion of the duties of kings. Tell me, Kurusthama, what else you wish to know.'

The illustrious Vyasa, Devasthana, Aswa, Vasudeva, Kripa, Satyaki and Sanjaya, all happy and with faces resembling full-blown flowers, exclaim, 'Excellent! Excellent!' and hymn the praises of Bhishma Purushavyaghra.

Then Yudhishtira, with a sorrowful heart and in tears, gently touches Bhishma's feet and says, 'Pitamaha, tomorrow I will ask questions about which I have doubts, for today the sun, having sucked the moisture out of all terrestrial objects, is about to set.'

Kesava, Kripa, Yudhishtira and others, saluting the Brahmanas assembled there and circumambulating Ganga's great son, cheerfully climb into their chariots. All of them, strict observers of vows, then bathe in the current of the Drishadwati. They offer oblations of water to their ancestors, silently reciting the sacred mantras. After performing the evening pujas, these Parantapas enter the city of Hastinapura."

Vaisampayana said, “Rising from their beds the next day and performing the morning pujas according to the shastras, the Pandavas and the Yadavas set out on their chariots, which resemble fortified towns, for the place where Bhishma lies. They ride to Kurukshetra, approach the sinless Bhishma and enquire whether the best of maharathas had passed the night happily. They then salute all the Rishis and, getting their blessings in return, the princes take their seats around Bhishma.

Then the Dharmarajan, Yudhishtira, after paying respects to Bhishma, says with joined hands, ‘Tell me O Bhaarata, when did the word Rajan—King—begin to be used on earth?

Parantapa, why does one man—the king, with hands, arms and neck like others, with understanding and senses like others, with a back, mouth, stomach, bones, marrow, flesh, blood and semen similar to those of the rest of the world, inhaling and exhaling like others, with life-breath and body like other men, resembling others in birth and death, subject to the same kinds of joy and grief, in fact, similar to all others in all attributes of humanity, come to govern the rest of the world containing many other men possessing equal intelligence and bravery?

Since when has one man ruled the wide world, teeming with brave, powerful and high-born men of dharma? Why do all men try to win his favour? Why is it that when this one man is delighted, the whole world is delighted, and if this one man is troubled, the whole world is troubled? I want to hear this in detail, Bharatarishabha! O greatest of speakers, tell me fully, for there must be a serious reason for all this, since we see that the whole world bows down to a single man as to a Deva.'

Bhishma says, 'With concentrated attention on every detail, listen to how sovereignty first began in the Krita yuga. At first, there was no sovereignty, no king, no punishment and no punisher. All men used to protect one another righteously. However, with time they found this task to be irksome. Uncertainty began to assail their hearts; their perceptions became clouded and their virtue began to decline.

When this happened, they became covetous. Because men sought to possess objects they did not own, another passion called greed seized them. When they became subject to kama, another passion, krodha or anger, soon tainted them. Once subject to wrath, they lost all consideration of what they should do and what they should not. Unrestrained sexual indulgence set in. Men began to speak as they pleased. All distinctions disappeared between clean and unclean food, between virtue and vice. When this confusion set in amongst men, the Vedas disappeared.

Upon the disappearance of the Vedas, dharma was lost. When both the Vedas and dharma were lost, the Devas were filled with dread. Overcome with fear, they sought the protection of Brahma.

Having gratified the divine Grandfather of the universe, the Devas sorrowfully said to him with folded hands, "O Devadeva, greed and error have crept into the eternal Vedas in the world of men, and we are terror-stricken. Through the loss of the Vedas, men have lost dharma too, because of which we fear that we ourselves are about to descend to the level of humans.

Men used to pour libations and feed us, while we used to pour rain downwards. But with the cessation of all pious pujas among men, great distress threatens us. O Pitamaha, think of what will benefit us, so that the universe which your power created will not be destroyed."

Thus addressed, the Swayambhuva and divine Lord said to them, "I will think of what should be done for the good to all. Best of Devas, let your fears be dispelled!"

Brahma then composed by his own intelligence a treatise consisting of a hundred thousand chapters. He treated in it three subjects, dharma, artha and kama, and designated it as the triune aggregate. He treated a fourth subject called moksha with opposite meaning and attributes. In it he dealt with the attributes of sattwa, rajas and tamas and a fourth—nishkama karma, the practice of dharma without hope of bliss or reward in this or the other world, which will lead to moksha, liberation.

He included another triple aggregate connected with punishment—conversation, growth and destruction—and in yet another an aggregate of six consisting of the hearts of men, place, time, means, overt deeds, alliances and causes. In it, Bharatarishabha, he laid down the religious rites prescribed in the three Vedas, knowledge and the actions necessary for the support of life—agriculture, trade and commerce, and the very extensive branch of learning called punitive legislation.

The treatise also dealt fully with the attributes of princes, behaviour towards counsellors, spies, secret agents envoys and agents of other kinds, of conciliation, fomenting discord, gifts and punishment, with toleration as the fifth one. He described in detail deliberation of all kinds, counsels for producing dissension, the errors of deliberation, the results of the success or failure of counsels, treaties of three kinds: bad, average and good, made through fear, good offices and gifts of wealth.

In it he also described in detail the four appropriate times for making journeys, three kinds of victory that one secures—righteously, by wealth, or by deceitful means, and also the three types of qualities—bad, average and good—of counsellors, kingdom, fort, army and treasury.

The treatise dealt in detail with the eight kinds of open punishment and the eight kinds of secret punishment. Chariots, elephants, horses, foot-soldiers, conscripted labourers and crews, the paid attendants of armies, guides taken from the country which is the theatre of war: these are the eight instruments, O Kauravya, of open punishment or forces acting openly.

The work also mentioned the three kinds of things—apparel, food and incantations—the use and administration of moveable and immoveable poisons, and delineated enemies, allies and neutrals.

Brahma discussed in the work, the diverse features of roads to be taken, depending on astrological configurations, the attributes of the soil on which to encamp, protection of oneself, superintendence of the construction of chariots and other machinery of war and their use, methods for protecting and improving men, elephants, chariots and horses, various kinds of battle formations, strategies and manoeuvres in war, planetary conjunctions foreboding evil and natural calamities such as earthquakes.

He wrote of skilful methods of warfare and retreat, knowledge of weapons and their proper upkeep, disorders of troops and how to be rid of them, the means of inspiring the army with joy and confidence, of diseases, times of distress and danger, of how to guide the army in battle, the methods of sounding alarms and notifying orders, how to cause fear in the enemy by display of standards, the diverse methods of afflicting the enemy's kingdom by means of robbers, fierce wild tribes, fire-raisers, poisoners and forgers.

He discussed how to produce disunion among the chief officers of hostile armies by cutting down crops and plants, destroying the efficiency of the enemy's elephants by sounding alarms, and honouring those among the enemy's subjects who are well disposed towards the invader.

The work discussed the growth, harmony and waste of the seven essential requisites of sovereignty: the capacity for projected works, the means of accomplishing them, the methods of extending the kingdom, the means of winning over men dwelling in the enemy's territory, the punishment and destruction of those who are strong, the exact administration of justice, the extermination of evil, wrestling, shooting, discharging weapons, the methods of making gifts and of storing requisite provisions and diverse matters.

Brahma wrote on the subject of feeding the hungry and supervising those whom one has fed, gifts of wealth in season, freedom from the vices called Vyasanas, the attributes of kings, the qualifications of military officers, the sources of the aggregate of three and its merits and demerits, diverse kinds of evil intents, the behaviour of dependents, suspicion against all, the avoidance of negligence, the acquisition of coveted objects, the improvement of objects already acquired and the gifting of them to deserving men, and the expenditure of wealth for religious purposes, for acquiring objects of desire and for dispelling danger and distress.

In the work, O Kurusthama, the Swayambhuva mentions the four kinds of vices which the learned say are born of kama—hunting, gambling, drinking and sexual indulgence—and the six kinds of vices born of anger—rudeness of speech, fierceness, severity of chastisement, infliction of pain, frustrating one's own objects and suicide.

The treatise describes diverse kinds of machines and their action. It deals with devastation of the enemy's territories, attacks upon enemies, the destruction and removal of landmarks, the cutting down of large trees to deprive the enemy and his subjects of their refreshing shade, the siege of forts, the supervision of agriculture and other useful operations, the storage of necessaries, the robes and attire for troops and the best means of manufacturing them, and the characteristics and uses of panavas, anakas, conches and drums.

The work duly deals, Yudhishtira, with the six kinds of articles—gems, animals, lands, robes, female slaves and gold—and the means of acquiring them for oneself or destroying them to injure the enemy, pacifying newly acquired territories, honouring the good, cultivating friendship with the learned, knowing the rules in respect of gifts and religious rites such as homa, and ceremonial touching of auspicious articles.

The work deals with how to pay attention to beautifying the body and the seventy-two actions laid down in medical works for the protection, exercise and improvement of the body, the manner of preparing and using food, piety of behaviour, the attainment of prosperity by following one path, truthfulness and sweetness in speech, observance of activities undertaken on festive occasions, social gatherings within and beyond the household, the open and secret actions of men in all places of meeting, the constant supervision of men's conduct, the immunity of Brahmanas from punishment, the reasonable infliction of punishment, and honours paid to dependents in consideration of kinship and merit. It also deals with the protection of subjects and the means of extending the kingdom, the counsels that a king who lives in the midst of a dozen kings should pursue in respect of the four kinds of enemies, the four kinds of allies and the four kinds of neutrals, and the practices of particular countries, tribes and families.

The work covers the subjects of dharma, artha, kama and moksha and lays down the desire for diverse kinds of wealth and the diverse means of its acquisition, the system of agriculture and other activities that form the chief source of revenue, various methods of producing and applying illusions and how one can render stagnant water foul. It describes the way, O Naravyaghra, by which men can be prevented from deviating from the path of dharma and honesty.

Having composed this highly beneficial treatise, the divine Lord cheerfully said to the deities led by Indra, "For the good of the world and for establishing dharma, artha and kama, I have composed this tract representing the very essense of speech. Assisted by punishment and dealing with rewards and punishments, this science will operate among men and will protect the world. Moreover, because men are led to the acquisition of the objects of their existence by punishment, which in fact leads or governs everything, this science will be known in the three worlds as Dandaneeti—the science of punishment.

Containing the essence of all the attributes of the six gunas, this science will always be highly regarded by all noble men. I have dealt in it with dharma, artha, kama and moksha."

After this, the lord of Uma—the divine and multiform Siva of large eyes, the source of all blessings, first studied and mastered it. However, in view of the gradual decrease of the life-span of human beings, the divine Siva abridged this great shastra that Brahma had compiled. Mahatapasvin Indra, devoted to Brahma, received the abridged version called Vaisalakasha, consisting of ten thousand lessons.

The divine Indra abridged it further into a treatise consisting of five thousand lessons and called it Vahudantaka. Later the powerful and intelligent Brihaspati further abridged the work into a treatise consisting of three thousand lessons and called it Barhaspatya.

Finally, the famous and immeasurably wise acharya of Yoga-Kavi reduced it further into a work of a thousand lessons.

Thus did the Maharishis abridge the work for the benefit of the world, in view of the shortening life-span of men and their general decline. The gods, then, approaching the lord of creatures, Vishnu, said to him, "Indicate, O Deva, the one among mortals who deserves to have superiority over the rest."

The divine and powerful Narayana, reflecting a little, by an order of his will created a son to be born of his energy, named Virajas. However, the highly blessed Virajas did not desire sovereignty over the earth, as he was inclined to the life of a sannyasi. Virajas had a son named Krittimat who also renounced pleasure and enjoyment. Krittimat's son Kardama also practised severe tapasya, but his son Ananga was pious, a protector of living things, and fully conversant with the Dandaneeti.

Ananga had a son named Ativala, well versed in policy. However, after inheriting an extensive empire at the demise of his father, he became the slave of his passions. Mrityu had a daughter born of his mind, named Sunita, who was celebrated throughout the three worlds. She was married to Ativala and gave birth to a son named Vena. Vena, a slave of wrath and malice, became vicious and sinful in his conduct towards all creatures.

The Rishis, Brahmavadis, slew him with weapons of blades of Kusa infused with their mantras. They pierced the right thigh of Vena and from that thigh emerged a short-limbed man resembling a charred brand, with bloodshot eyes and black hair.

These Brahmavadis said to him, “Nishida, sit here!” From him have sprung the Nishadas—those evil tribes that have the hills and the forests for their abode, and the hundreds and thousands of others called Mlechchas, who live in the Vindhya mountains.

The great Rishis then pierced the right arm of Vena, from where sprang a man who was a second Indra in form. Clad in mail, armed with swords, bows and arrows and adept in the science of weapons, he knew the Vedas and their branches thoroughly. He knew all the laws of the Dandaneeti, O Rajan, in their embodied forms.

The son of Vena then, with joined hands, said to these Maharishis, “I have attained an understanding that is keen and conforms to dharma. Instruct me in what I should do with it. I will accomplish without hesitation any task that you indicate.”

The Devas and the Rishis who were present there said to Vena’s son, “Fearlessly accomplish all those tasks in which dharma resides. Disregard what is dear and what is not, look upon all men with an equal eye. Cast away kama, krodha, lobha and distinction and always follow the dictates of dharma, punishing with your own hands the man, whoever he may be, who deviates from the path of duty. Swear that you will in thought, word and deed, always maintain the religion of the Vedas on earth. Pledge that you will courageously maintain the dharma laid down in the Vedas with the aid of the Dandaneeti, and will never act capriciously. O mighty one, acknowledge that Brahmanas are exempt from punishment, and vow also that you will protect the world from an intermixture of the castes.”

Thus addressed, Vena’s son Prithu replied to the assembled deities headed by the Rishis, “I will always worship those bulls among men, the greatly blessed Brahmanas.”

These Brahmavadis then said to him, “Tathaastu! Let it be so!”

Then Sukra, the vast receptacle of Brahman, became his priest. The Balakhilyas became his counsellors and the Saraswatas his companions. The great and illustrious Rishi Garga became his astrologer.

Men believe the high declaration of the Srutis that Prithu is the eighth from Vishnu. Before that, two men named Suta and Magadha were born, who became his bards and eulogists. Gratified, Prithu, the royal son of powerful Vena, gave to Suta the land lying on the sea-coast and to Magadha the country since known as Magadha.

We hear that the surface of the earth was once very uneven. It was Prithu who levelled it. In every Manvantara, the earth becomes uneven. Vena's son moved the rocky masses lying all around, O Rajan, with the horn of his bow. By this the hills and mountains became lofty.

Then Vishnu, the Devas of Indra, the Rishis, the Regents of the world and the Brahmanas assembled for the coronation of Prithu as the king of the world.

The earth herself, in her embodied form, came to him with a tribute of gems and jewels. Varuna, the lord of rivers, Himavat, the king of mountains and Sakra bestowed upon him inexhaustible wealth. The great Meru, the mountain of gold, gave him enormous masses of the precious metal. Divine Kubera, the lord of Yakshas and Rakshasas, gave him wealth, borne on the shoulders of human beings, enough to gratify the needs of dharma, artha and kama.

Millions of horses, chariots, elephants and men, O son of Pandu, sprang to life as soon as Vena's son Prithu thought of them.

Due to the protection promised by Prithu, neither old age, nor famine, nor calamity, nor disease on earth burdened mankind, nor fear of reptiles or thieves, or from any other quarter. When Prithu went to the sea, its water became solidified. The mountains gave him passage, and his standard was obstructed nowhere. He drew from the earth, like a milcher from a cow, seventeen kinds of crops for the food of Yakshas, Rakshasas, Nagas and other beings. That noble king caused all men to regard dharma as the best of all things and, because he gratified all the people, he was called Rajan, King; and because he also healed the wounds of Brahmanas, he earned the name of Kshatriya; and because the earth during his reign became celebrated for the practice of dharma, she came to be called Prithvi.

The eternal Vishnu himself, Bhaarata, confirmed his power, telling him, "No one, O Rajan, shall transcend you." As a result of the tapasya Prithu performed, the divine Vishnu entered his body. It is for this reason that the entire universe offers worship to Prithu and he is numbered among the gods.

Rajan, your kingdom should always be protected by the science of punishment, the Dandaneeti. By careful observation made through the movements of your spies, you must also ensure its safety in such a way that no one will be able to injure it. All good deeds, Rajan, lead to the benefit of the king. The conduct of a king should be regulated by his own intelligence and also by the opportunities and means that offer themselves. What cause can there be for the multitude to live in obedience to one, save the divinity of the king?

At that time, a golden lotus emerged from Vishnu's brow and the goddess Sree was born of the lotus. She became the spouse of sagacious Dharma. Sree and Dharma had a son Artha and all three, Dharma, Artha and Sree, became established in sovereignty.

Upon the exhaustion of his punya, a man comes down from heaven to earth and takes birth as a king who knows the science of danda. Such a man is endowed with greatness and is really an amsa of Vishnu on earth. He acquires great acumen and obtains superiority over others. The Devas establish him, so no one can transcend him. It is for this reason that everybody acts in obedience to such a one, and that the world cannot command him. Good actions, Rajan, engender good. It is for this that the multitude obeys the king's commands, though he belongs to the same world and is possessed of similar limbs and organs as all men.

He who once beheld Prithu's amiable face became submissive to him, esteeming him as handsome, wealthy and highly favoured. It is because of the might of his sceptre that the practice of dharma and just behaviour became so visible on earth and Bhumi was overspread with virtue.

Yudhishtira, Brahma's treatise contained the histories of all past events, the origin of the Maharishis, the holy waters, the planets, stars and astronomy, the duties in respect of the four varnas of life, the four kinds of Homa, the characteristics of the four orders of men and the four branches of learning. Whatever objects there are on earth he included in it: the Itihasas, the Vedas, the science of Nyaya, tapasyas, gyana, abstention from injury to all beings, truth, falsehood and mahadharma. He fully described in it reverence towards the elderly, gifts, purity of behaviour, alacrity in exertion and compassion towards all men. There is no doubt in this. Since that time, O Rajan, the learned began to say that there is no difference between a Deva and a Rajan.

I have now told you everything about the greatness of kings. What subject, O king of the Bhaaratas, shall I speak of next?'" Vaisampayana said, “After this, Yudhishtira salutes his Pitamaha Bhishma, the son of Ganga, attentively with joined hands and asks again, ‘What are the general duties of the four varnas and the special duties of each varna? What mode of life should each varna adopt?

What duties are especially called Rajadharma? By what means does a kingdom grow, and what are the means by which the king himself advances? How also, O Bharatarishabha, do the citizens and the servants of the king progress? What sorts of forts, treasuries, punishments, allies, counsellors, priests and acharyas, should a king avoid? Whom should the king trust in different kinds of distress and danger? From what evils should the king guard himself firmly? Tell me all this, O Pitamaha!’

Bhishma says, ‘I make my obeisance to dharma, who is great, and to Krishna who is Brahman. Having bowed also to the Brahmanas assembled here, I will discuss duties that are ananta—eternal. Suppression of anger, truthfulness of speech, justice, forgiveness, legitimate fatherhood, purity of conduct, avoidance of quarrels, simplicity and care for dependants—these nine duties belong equally to all the four varnas.

I will now tell you the responsibilities which belong exclusively to Brahmanas. Self-restraint, O Rajan, the shastras declare to be the first duty of Brahmanas. Study of the Vedas and patience in undergoing tapasya are also their responsibility. By carrying out these two, they accomplish all the dharma laid down for them. If, while engaged in the observance of his svadharma, and without doing anything improper, a peaceful, learned Brahmana acquires wealth, he should marry, procreate, practise charity and perform yagnas.

The wise declare that wealth thus obtained should be enjoyed by distributing it among deserving men and relatives. By his study of the Vedas, the Brahmana accomplishes all the pious work laid down for him. Whether or not he achieves anything else, if he devotes himself to the study of the Vedas, he becomes known as a Brahmana or friend of all creatures.

I will also tell you, Bhaarata, the dharma of a Kshatriya. A Kshatriya should give, not beg, should himself perform yagnas, but not officiate as a priest in the yagnas of others. He should never teach the Vedas but study them with the help of a Brahmana acharya. He should protect the people by exerting himself always to destroy robbers and evil-doers, and should demonstrate his prowess in battle.

Those among Kshatriya rulers who perform great yagnas, who are gyanis of the Vedas and who gain victory in battle, become foremost among those who acquire blessed realms in the hereafter through their punya. Men who know the ancient shastras do not applaud the warrior who returns unscathed from battle but, rather, declare him to be a paltry Kshatriya.

There is no higher duty for a Kshatriya than the suppression of brigands. Gifts, study and sacrifices bring prosperity to kings. Therefore, a king who desires to acquire punya should engage in battle. The king should ensure not only that all his subjects observe their respective duties, but also that they follow the dictates of dharma. If he only protects his subjects, whether or not he does anything else, he is considered to be one who has accomplished all meritorious deeds and is worthy of being called a Kshatriya, the greatest of men.

I will now tell you, Yudhishtira, what the eternal dharma of the Vaisya is. A Vaisya should give gifts, study the Vedas, perform sacrifices and acquire wealth by fair means. He should also protect and rear all domestic animals with proper care, like a father nurturing his sons. Anything else that he does will be inappropriate for him. By protecting his domestic animals, he will obtain great happiness, since the Creator, after fashioning these animals, bestowed their care upon the Vaisya. Upon the Brahmana and the Kshatriya he conferred the care of all living things.

I will tell you how the Vaisya is to earn the means of his sustenance. If he looks after six cattle for others, he can take the milk of one cow as his remuneration, and if he keeps a hundred cattle for others, he may take a single pair as his fee. If he trades with others' wealth, he can take a seventh part of the profits as his share. One-seventh also is his share in the profits arising from the trade in horns, but he should take one-sixteenth if the trade is in hooves. If he engages in cultivation with seeds supplied by others, he can receive a seventh part of the yield. This should be his annual remuneration. A Vaisya should always be ready to tend cattle. If he is ready to do so, no one else should be employed for the task.

I will tell you, O Bhaarata, what the duties of a Sudra are. The Creator intended the Sudra to become the servant of the other three varnas, so the service of the three other classes is his duty, one that will obtain great happiness for him. He should wait upon the three other classes according to their order of seniority. A Sudra should never amass wealth, lest he make the members of the three superior classes subservient to him. By doing so, he will incur sin. With the king's permission, however, a Sudra may earn wealth for performing religious acts.

I will now tell you the profession he should follow and the means by which he can earn his livelihood. The shastras say that the three other varnas should certainly maintain the Sudras. Worn-out umbrellas, turbans, beds and seats, shoes and fans should be given to Sudra servants. The Munis should give the Sudra torn clothes no longer fit to wear. These are the latter's lawful acquisitions.

Dharmatman decrees that if the Sudra approaches anyone belonging to the three orders of Munis from the desire of doing menial service, the latter should assign him proper work. To the sonless Sudra, his master should offer the funeral cake. The weak and old among them should be looked after. The Sudra should never abandon his master, whatever the nature or degree of the distress into which the latter may fall. If the master loses his wealth, the Sudra servant should support him zealously. A Sudra cannot have any wealth that is his own, since whatever he possesses belongs lawfully to his master.

The shastras lay down yagna as a duty of the three other varnas—even for the Sudra, O Bhaarata! A Sudra, however, is not competent to utter swaha and swadha, or any other Vedic mantra. For this reason the Sudra, without observing the vows laid down in the Vedas, should worship the gods in minor sacrifices called Paka-yagnas. The dakshina of such sacrifices is the gift called Purnapatra. It is said that in days of old a Sudra named Paijavana gave, in one of his yagnas, dakshina consisting of a hundred thousand Purnapatras, according to the law called Aindragni.

The Vedas prescribe yagnas as much for the Sudra as for the three other varnas. Of all yagnas, devotion is the best, since it is a high deity and cleanses all who perform yagnas. Then again, Brahmanas are the greatest of Devas to their respective Sudra attendants. They worship the gods in sacrifices, for the fruition of various wishes. The members of the three other varnas have all sprung from the Brahmanas. The Brahmanas are the gods of the very Devas. Whatever they say will be for your great good. Therefore, all kinds of yagnas naturally pertain to all the four varnas. The obligation is not optional and must be met. One should always worship as a god the Brahmana who knows the Riks, Yajuses and Samans. The Sudra, who is without Riks, Yajuses and Samans, has Prajapati for his god.

The shastras lay down mental sacrifice for all the varnas, O Bhaarata! It is not true that the gods and other Mahatmans do not wish to share the offerings in such sacrifices of even the Sudra. For this reason, it lays down for all the varnas the sacrifice that consists in devotion.

The Brahmana is the best of the gods. It is not true that they who belong to that varna cannot perform the sacrifices of the other orders. The fire called Vitana, though procured from Vaisyas and inspired with mantras, is still inferior. The Brahmana is the performer of the yagnas of the three other varnas. For this reason all the four orders are holy. All the varnas are related to each other by blood through the intermediate orders, as they have all sprung from Brahmanas. In ascertaining the priority of men in respect of their creation, it will appear that among all the orders, the first created was the Brahmana.

Originally, Saman was one; Yajus was one and Rik was one. In this connection, men who know ancient history sing a verse, O Rajan, in praise of a yagna performed by the Vaikhanasa Munis. Before or after sunrise, a person of subdued senses, with heart filled with devotion, pours libations on the sacrificial fire according to the law. Devotion is a mighty agent. With regard to homas again, the one called Skanna is the initial one, while that which is called Askanna is the last, but the greatest in point of merit.

Yagnas are multifarious, with different rites and fruits. The Brahmana who is devout, who is acquainted with all the shastras and possesses an understanding of them, is competent to perform yagnas. He who wishes to perform a sacrifice is regarded as righteous, even if he happens to be a thief, a sinner or the worst of sinners, and the Rishis applaud such a man. Without doubt they are right.

Thus, in conclusion, all the varnas should always, and by every means in their power, perform yagnas to the best of their abilities, as there is no equal to sacrifice in the three worlds. They should be performed with hearts free from malice, aided by devotion which is sacrosanct.'"

CANTO 61

"Bhishma says, 'O Mahabaho, listen now to me as I name the four varnas and their respective dharmas—Vanaprastha, Bhaikshya, Garhasthya of great merit and Brahmacharya which Brahmanas adopt. Having performed all the dharmas of the stage called Garhasthya—and after undergoing the purificatory pujas necessary to ordain matted locks, following the rites of regeneration and those relating to the sacred fire and study of the Vedas—with soul cleansed and senses restrained, a man should retire, alone or with his wife, to the forest for Vanaprastha.

Having studied the shastras called Aranyakas, drawn up his vital fluid and retired from all worldly affairs, the virtuous Vanaprastha can then attain absorption with the infinite and eternal Atman. This is what the Munis, who have drawn up their vital fluid, suggest that a recluse should practise and perform.

It is well known that the Brahmana who aspires to attain mukti is competent to adopt the Bhaikshya varnasrama after the stage of Brahmacharya. The Brahmana possessed of learning, with no desire to better his situation, wandering without a fixed abode and sleeping wherever he finds himself when evening comes, subsisting on whatever food is obtained in charity, given to contemplation, practising self-restraint with senses under control, free of all craving, without either appetite or aversion, and regarding all beings equally, by adopting this varnasrama attains absorption with the eternal soul that knows no decay.

The man entering the Garhasthya varnasrama, after studying the Vedas, should accomplish all the religious duties laid out for him. He should have children and enjoy pleasures and comforts. He should meticulously perform all the dharma of this varna that sages applaud, which is extremely difficult to observe with purity.

He should be satisfied with his own wedded wife and never approach her except during her season. He should observe the laws of the shastras and not be cunning or deceitful. He should be abstemious in diet, devoted to the gods, grateful, mild-mannered, kind and forgiving. He should be of tranquil heart, tractable and attentive in making offerings to the Devas and the Pitris and always hospitable to Brahmanas. He should be free of pride, not confine his charity to any one sect, and devoutly perform the Vedic rites.

In this connection, the illustrious Maharishis cite an important verse sung by Narayana himself, endowed with mahatapasya. Listen to it: "By truth, simplicity, proper reverence towards guests, acquisition of dharma and artha, and relish of one's own wives, one should enjoy diverse kinds of happiness, both here and in the hereafter." The Maharishis have said that support of sons and wives and study of the Vedas form the dharma of those who lead this great varnasrama.

The Brahmana who, engaged in the performance of yagnas, duly goes through this mode of life and properly discharges its dharma, obtains blessed recompense in Swarga. Upon his death, the rewards he desired become eternal. Indeed, these wait upon him for eternity like menials ever on the alert to execute the commands of their master.

Attending to the Vedas, silently reciting the mantras obtained from his acharya, worshipping all the deities, dutifully serving his guru, with his own body smeared with clay and dirt, the man following the Brahmacharya varna should always observe rigid vows, O Yudhishtira, and, with senses under control, pay heed to the instruction he has received. Reflecting on the Vedas, discharging all the duties of dhyana and karma, he should live dutifully, waiting upon his acharya and always submissive to him. Disengaged from the six kinds of work, such as officiating in the sacrifices of others, never attached to any actions, showing neither favour nor disfavour to any one, doing good even to one's enemies—this is the dharma the shastras lay down for a Brahmacharin!'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell us of those duties, in respect of men like ourselves, which are auspicious, produce future happiness, are benevolent, pleasant, agreeable and approved by all.'

Bhishma says, 'The other three orders do not adopt the four varnas that the shastras lay down for the Brahmana, O Bhaarata! I have already mentioned many deeds that lead to Swarga and are appropriate for the Kshatriya. These are not relevant to your present query, for the Vedas lay them down for those Kshatriyas inclined to ruthlessness.

The Brahmana who prefers the practices of Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, incurs censure in this world as a man of evil atman, and goes to Naraka in the next world. The names which men give to slaves, dogs, wolves and other beasts, O Pandava, are applied to the Brahmana who engages in pursuits improper for him.

The Brahmana who in all the four varnas is duly engaged in the six-fold deeds, of regulating the breath, contemplation and others, who performs all his duties and is tranquil, who has his passions under control, whose heart is pure and who is ever engaged in tapasya, who has no desire of bettering his prospects and who is charitable, receives inexhaustible regions of bliss in the other world. Everyone derives his own nature from his actions, through their circumstances, place, means and motives.

You should therefore, Rajan, regard the study of the Vedas, of such high merit, to be equal to the exertion of kingly power or the pursuits of agriculture, trade and hunting. The world is set going by Time, and the course of Time settles its operations. Man performs all his karma, good, bad and indifferent, entirely under the influence of Time. Among the good deeds of a man's past life, those that exert the greatest influence on the next are liable to be exhausted. Men, however, are ever engaged in those actions to which their propensities lead. These propensities draw a living entity in diverse directions.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Improper occupations for a Brahmana are drawing the bow-string, destroying foes, living off agriculture or trade, tending cattle or serving others for money. An intelligent Brahmana, leading a life of the grihasta, should perform the six Vedic deeds. One applauds the retirement of a Brahmana into the vana, after he has duly discharged all the garhapatyas.

A Brahmana should avoid service of the king, wealth obtained through agriculture, sustenance from trade, all kinds of crooked conduct, companionship with any but his wedded wives, and usury. The miserable Brahmana who falls away from his dharma and whose behaviour is impious becomes a Sudra, O Rajan.

The Brahmana who weds a Sudra woman or a dancer or a village servant, who becomes debased in conduct, or otherwise sins, becomes a Sudra. In that case, whether he recites the Vedas or not, he becomes equal to a Sudra, should be assigned a place among Sudras during feasts, and should be excluded from occasions of worshipping the gods. If one distributes food offered to the Devas and the Pitris to any Brahmanas who have transgressed due restraints, who have become impure or addicted to evil pursuits and cruel deeds, or who have fallen away from their legitimate dharma, the giver gets no punya.

For this reason, O Rajan, Brahma has laid down self-restraint, purity and simplicity as the dharma of a Brahmana. Besides these, he has also mentioned the duties of all the four varnas. For Brahma, one is truly a Brahmana who is self-restrained, has drunk the soma in yagnas, is of good conduct, has compassion for all beings and powers of endurance, is frank and simple, mild and forgiving, free from cruelty or any desire to acquire wealth to raise his status.

Men wanting to acquire virtue, O Rajan, seek the assistance of Sudras, Vaisyas and Kshatriyas. Therefore, Vishnu never extends his grace to the members of these three varnas who are not dutiful in helping others to acquire virtue. If one does not please Vishnu, one loses the happiness of all men in Swarga—the merit arising from karma laid down for the four varnas, the declarations of the Vedas, all kinds of yagnas and all other religious deeds and duties in respect of the several varnasramas.

Listen now, O son of Pandu, to those dharmas that you should observe in the four varnasramas. The Kshatriya who wants the members of the three other varnas in his kingdom to adhere strictly to the respective duties of their varnas, should know these.

For a Sudra who wishes to hear shastras that are not forbidden to him, who has accomplished his dharma, who has fathered a son and between whom and the superior varna there is not much difference in purity of conduct, all the varnasramas are for him, except the observance of universal peacefulness and self-restraint, which are not necessary for him.

For a Sudra practising all these, and also for a Vaisya and a Kshatriya, O Rajan, Brahma has laid down the Bhikshu varnasrama. Having discharged the dharma of his varna and having also served his family, a Vaisya of venerable years, with the king's permission, may adopt another varnasrama.

Having studied the Vedas duly and the treatises on the duties of kings, O sinless one, having fathered children and performed other karma of a like nature; having taken the soma and ruled over and protected all his subjects righteously; having performed the Rajasuya, the Aswamedha yagna and other great yagnas; having invited learned Brahmanas for recitation of the shastras, and having made gifts to them according to their desires; having obtained victories, small or great, in battle; having placed on his throne his natural son or some Kshatriya of good birth for the protection of his subjects; having honoured the Pitris with due rites laid down for them; having devoutly worshipped the Devas by performing sacrifices and the Rishis by studying the Vedas; the Kshatriya who in old age desires another varnasrama, can adopt it by leaving the one which immediately precedes it. Thereby he is sure to obtain success in his tapasya.

A Kshatriya, to lead the life of a Rishi, may adopt the Bhikshu varnasrama, but he should never do so for the sake of enjoyment. Having left the Grihastasrama, he can adopt the Bhikshu varna by seeking alms just enough to support his existence. Life as a sannyasi is not obligatory upon the three varnas—Kshatriya, Vaisya and Sudras. However, they can adopt it if they choose and, therefore, this varnasrama is open to the four orders.

Among men, the highest dharma is the one which the Kshatriyas practise. The whole world is subject to the might of their arms. The Vedas have declared that the observance of all the duties, principal and subordinate, of the three other varnas, depends on the duties of the Kshatriya. Know that just as the elephant's footprints encompass those of all other animals, the Kshatriya's duties engulf all the dharma of the other orders, in all circumstances.

Men who know the shastras say that the duties of the other three varnas afford small relief or protection and produce small rewards, while the responsibilities of the Kshatriya afford great relief and produce great rewards. Kingly duties, Rajadharma, are the foremost of all duties, for they protect all the varnas. Every kind of vairagya occurs in Rajadharma, O Rajan, and sannyasa is the eternal and the greatest of all virtues.

If the Dandaneeti, the science of punishment, disappears, the Vedas will disappear. All those shastras that inculcate the dharma of men will also be lost. Indeed, if one abandons the ancient dharma of the Kshatriyas, all the duties in respect of all the varnasramas will be lost.

One sees all kinds of renunciation in Rajadharma. In them occur all kinds of initiation, and connected with them are all kinds of learning and worldly conduct. As with animals, if the commoner slaughters them, it will destroy the virtue and religious actions of the slaughterers. Thus all other duties, deprived of the protection that Rajadharma gives, will fall prey to attack and destruction; anxious men will disregard the practices the Vedas lay down for them.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The duties in respect of all the four varnasramas, those of Yatis, O Pandava, and the customs relating to the conduct of men in general, are included in Rajadharma, kingly duties, as part of the Kshatriya's dharma. If the functions of royalty are disturbed, evil will overtake all beings.

The duties of men are not obvious, as they have many interpretations. Misrepresented by many false systems, their eternal nature is sometimes violated. Those who pin their trust on the conclusions men have arrived at without really knowing the truths that dharma and the shastras declare, find themselves stranded and confused by creeds whose ultimate ends are unknown.

The dharma imposed upon the Kshatriya is clear, produces great happiness, as is evident from its results, is free from deceit and beneficial to all. The whole world, with all good actions, is subject to Rajadharma, Yudhishtira, since the shastras say that the responsibilities of the three varnas, Brahmanas and of those who have retired from the world, are included within those of the sacred varnasrama called Garhasthya.

I have told you how, in olden days, many brave kings had approached the Lord of all creatures, the divine and mighty Vishnu of great prowess, to resolve their doubts about the Dandaneeti. Mindful of the declarations of the shastras reinforced by examples, those kings waited upon Narayana, after having weighed each of their actions against the duties of each of the varnas. These gods, the Sadhyas, the Vasus, the Aswins, the Rudras, the Viswas, the Maruts and the Siddhas, the first of Devas created in olden days, all observe the Kshatriya's dharma. I will now recite to you a history, rich in inferences, of both dharma and artha.

In olden days, when the Danavas had multiplied and swept away all barriers and distinctions, O Rajan, the powerful Mandhatri became king. He performed a great yagna from a desire to behold almighty Narayana, the God of gods without beginning, middle and end. At this yagna, he humbly worshipped the great Vishnu.

The Supreme Lord, assuming the form of Indra, showed himself to the monarch. Accompanied by many worthy kings, Mandhatri offered worship to the mighty god. An elevated discourse followed between this lion among kings and the illustrious Deva in Indra's form, regarding Vishnu of great effulgence.

Indra asked, "What is your object, O Mahatman, in seeking to behold that Ancient and First of Devas, Narayana of inconceivable tejas and infinite maya? Neither I, nor Brahma himself, can obtain a sight of the God of universal form. I will grant you any other wish of your heart, for you are the greatest of mortals: your soul abides in peace; you are devoted to dharma; you have your senses under control; and you are possessed of heroism. You are unflinching in wanting to do what is agreeable to the Devas. For your intelligence, devotion and high faith as well, I will grant you whatever boon you desire."

Mandhatri replied, "I bow my head to you, O divine Lord. Certainly I desire to see the foremost of Devas! Casting off all earthly longings, I wish to earn punya and to lead the most important varnasrama, the path of the good esteemed by all. By exercising the mahadharma of a Kshatriya, I have spread my fame and earned many realms of inexhaustible merit in the next world. I do not, however, know how to discharge the duties flowing from the first of Devas, which are the best in the world."

Indra said, "They who are not kings, however observant they may be of their duties, cannot easily attain the highest rewards of dharma. Kingly duties first flowed from the original God, while other dharma followed later from his body. Many were other responsibilities of the Vanaprasthasrama, which God later created, but the fruits of all these are exhaustible. Rajadharma, however, is esteemed above them since it subsumes all other duties. For this reason, the shastras consider the Kshatriya dharma to be the highest.

In olden days Vishnu, acting according to the Kshatriya dharma, forcibly suppressed and destroyed his foes and thereby afforded relief to the Devas and the Maharishis. If the divine Vishnu of inconceivable tejas had not slain all his enemies among the Asuras, then the Brahmanas as well as Brahma, the Creator of the world, would have been destroyed. The Kshatriya dharma and the responsibilities that first flowed from the Paramatman would all have been lost.

If the first and foremost of Devas had not by his prowess subjugated the earth's Asuras, they would have destroyed the Brahmanas and, as a consequence, all the dharma of the four varnas, the four varnasramas and the sanatana dharma. They were revived through the exercise of the Kshatriya dharma.

In every yuga, the dharma of Brahmanas in respect of attaining Brahman is prescribed first. However, since kingly duties protect all, we regard them as the most important. Death in battle, compassion for all beings, knowledge of the affairs of the world, protection of men from danger, relieving the distressed and the oppressed, all are part of the Kshatriya dharma that kings practise.

Men who disregard wholesome restraints, whom lust and wrath govern are kept from sin by the fear of kings. As a result, others who are docile men of dharma are able to perform all their responsibilities.

For this reason, we regard Kshatriya duties as righteous. Without doubt, all beings live happily in the world, protected by kings exercising the Kshatriya dharma, like children protected by their parents. The Kshatriya dharma is eternal and the greatest of all duties, and one regards it as the best in the world, as it embraces the protection of every being. Itself eternal, it leads to eternal mukti.'"

'Indra said, "The Kshatriya dharma, possessing such energy, including in its application all other dharmas and being the greatest of all dharmas, should be observed by men who are like you, O Rajan, noble and always in quest of the good. If these duties are not properly discharged, ruin will overcome all living things. Kings who have compassion for all beings should regard the following to be the most important of their duties: reclaiming the land for cultivation and fertilizing it, performing great purificatory yagnas, protecting their subjects and disdaining beggary.

The best dharma, the Rishis and Munis say, is to give. Of all gifts, that of one's body in battle is the greatest. You have seen yourself how the rulers of the earth, ever observant of the Kshatriya dharma, having duly waited upon their acharyas and acquired great learning, in the end cast off their bodies in battle. The Kshatriya wanting to acquire punya, after having gone through the Brahmacharyasrama, should lead a life of a grihasta, which is always meritorious.

In adjudicating ordinary questions of right and wrong between his subjects, the king should be thoroughly impartial. The shastras declare that, to ensure that the varnas observe their respective duties, for the protection of all, for diverse schemes and stratagems and competence in accomplishing objectives, most important is the Kshatriya dharma, which includes all other duties within its scope.

The other varnas are able to observe their respective dharmas due to Rajadharma. For this reason, the former are said to be dependent upon the latter in respect of the merit they produce. Those who disregard all wholesome restraints and are attached to the pursuit of worldly objects are brutes in nature. The exercise of kingly duties compels them to act righteously. These duties therefore, are of the greatest importance.

Every Brahmana who follows the three Vedas should observe the course of conduct prescribed for him, as well as the varnas that the scriptures lay down for his varna. If a Brahmana acts in any other way, he should be treated like a Sudra.

A Brahmana should follow the dharma of the four varnas and the rituals prescribed in the Vedas, beyond which he has no duties. A Kshatriya should not make any arrangement for the sustenance of a Brahmana who lives in any other way. His religious merit grows as a result of his actions. A Brahmana is like dharma's self and, if he is employed in deeds that are not appropriate for him, he deserves no respect and should not be trusted.

These are the duties that pertain to the several orders, and it is the responsibility of the Kshatriyas to protect them so that their observance can be improved. For these reasons, Rajadharma, I believe, is the most significant duty of heroes, who are foremost in practising it."

Mandhatri then asked, "What are the duties that should be performed by the several castes that have sprung up from Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and the Sudras, who reside in the dominions of Arya kings—the Yavanas, Kiratas, Gandharvas, Chinas, Savaras, Barbaras, Sakas, Tusharas, Kankas, Pathavas, Andhras, Madrakas, Paundras, Pulindas, Ramathas, Kambojas? What is the dharma of kings like us regarding the tribes who subsist by robbery? I want to hear about this. O illustrious Deva, instruct me since you are the friend of us Kshatriyas."

Indra said, "All the robber tribes should serve their mothers, fathers, their acharyas and other elders, as well as Rishis and Munis living in the vana and their kings. They should also follow the duties and rites prescribed in the Vedas. They should perform yagnas in honour of the Pitris, dig wells and dedicate them to universal service, give water to thirsty travellers, give away beds and make other appropriate gifts to Brahmanas.

Duties that every person of this class who desires his own prosperity should practise are truth, abstention from injury, suppression of wrath, support to Brahmanas and kinsmen by giving them their due, maintenance of wives and children, purity, peacefulness and presenting gifts to Brahmanas at yagnas of every kind. Such a person should also perform all kinds of Paka-yagnas with costly gifts of food and wealth. These and similar duties the shastras lay down from olden days, for those of this class. The robber class should also perform all these actions which the shastras lay down for all others, O Rajan."

Mandhatri said, "In the world of men, such wicked men may be seen living in disguise among all the four varnas and in all the four varnasramas."

Indra said, "Upon the disappearance of Rajadharma and the Dandaneeti, all creatures are exceedingly afflicted by the tyranny of kings. After the end of this the Krita yuga, confusion will set in regarding the different varnas, and innumerable Bhikshus will appear with sectarian marks of different kinds. Disregarding the Puranas and the high truths of religion, men, driven by lust and anger, will deviate onto erroneous paths.

When Mahatmans restrain sinful men from evil deeds with the aid of Dandaneeti, which is paramount, eternal and the source of all, virtue becomes firmly established. Gifts, libations and offerings to the Pitris of any man who disrespects the ruler become fruitless. The very Devas do not disregard a Dharmarajan, who is truly an eternal god. The divine Lord of all, having created the universe, intended the Kshatriya to rule men's inclinations in respect of duties. I revere and worship one who employs his understanding to watch over the course of duties that men perform. Upon such supervision rests the Kshatriya dharma."'

Bhishma continues, 'Having uttered these words, the divine and mighty Narayana, in the form of Indra, accompanied by the Maruts, returned to his eternal abode of inexhaustible happiness. When such was the manner in which the virtuous practised duties in the olden days, which learned Mahatman can disregard the Kshatriya?

Like blind men lost on the way, living beings acting or abstaining in an unrighteous manner meet with destruction. O Naravyaghra, adhere to the circle of dharma the ancients first set going. I know you are capable of doing so.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'You have spoken about the four varnasramas of human life. Please expand on them further, as I seek to know more.'

Bhishma replies, 'O Yudhishtira Mahabaho, you know all the duties that Dharmatman practise in this world just as well as I do. Listen, and I will explain to you the merit acquired by a king on account of the duties practised by those leading other varnasramas, O foremost of virtuous men. All the merit that belongs to men practising the obligations of the four varnasramas accrues to Dharmarajans. A king free of lust and hate, who rules with the aid of Dandaneeti and looks equally on all creatures, fulfils the objective of Bhaikshyasrama.

An adept ruler who makes gifts to deserving men on proper occasions, who knows how to favour and to punish, who conducts himself in all things according to the injunctions of the shastras, and who has tranquillity of soul, attains the object of Garhasthyasrama. The king who venerates those who deserve worship by giving them their due, completely fulfils the objective of Bhaikshyasrama.

The monarch who strives to rescue from distress his kinsmen, relatives and friends, O Yudhishtira, fulfils the objective of Vanaprasthasrama. The king who on every occasion honours the noblest among men and the best among Yatis, meets the objective of Vanaprasthasrama, as does the king who daily makes offerings to the Pitris and generous offerings to all living beings. The king who subdues other kingdoms to protect the righteous, O Naravyagahra, also attains the object of the same mode of life.

For shielding all creatures, as well as properly defending his own kingdom, a king earns the merit of as many yagnas as the number of beings protected, and accordingly attains the objective of the Sannyasasrama.

The daily study of the Vedas, propitiation and worship of acharyas and services rendered to one's own guru, lead to attainment of the objective of the Brahmacharyasrama.

The king who silently recites his mantras every day and worships the Devas according to the law, O Naravyaghra, attains the objective of the Garhasthyasrama.

The king who engages in battle resolved to protect his kingdom or meet death, who is liberal to men leading Vanaprasthasrama and to Brahmanas versed in the three Vedas, attains the objective of the Vanaprasthasrama.

The king who is merciful towards all creatures and abstains from cruelty attains the objective of all the varnasramas. The king who shows compassion to the young and the old under every circumstance fulfils the objective of every varna, O Yudhishtira.

The king who affords relief to all oppressed people seeking his protection, who defends all creatures, mobile and immobile, and honours them as they deserve, attains the purpose of Garhasthyasrama.

Bestowing favours and inflicting punishment upon wives and brothers, older and younger, and upon sons and grandsons, are the Garhapatya of a king and constitute his best penances. By honouring those who are righteous and deserving of reverence, and by protecting those who have by their penances acquired knowledge of self, O Purushavyaghra, a king attains the purpose of the Garhasthyasrama.

The Garhapatya of a king, Bhaarata, lies in inviting to his home and feeding men who have taken themselves to Vanaprastha and other modes of life. The king who duly adheres to the duties laid down for him by the Creator obtains the blessed merits of all the varnas. The virtuous king is the greatest of men, and the learned say that such a king in effect accomplishes Vanaprastha and all the other varnasramas.

The king who duly honours the office or rank, the race or family, of veterans deserving of honour, it is said, O Kaunteya, lives in all the varnasramas. The king, by observing the duties of his country and those of his family, acquires the merits of all the modes of life. The king who on proper occasions bestows upon men of dharma wealth or gifts of value, earns the merits of all the modes of life. The king who, while overcome with danger and fear, nevertheless keeps his eye on the duties of all men, earns the merits of all the varnas.

The king obtains a share of the merit earned under his protection by men of dharma in his realm. On the other hand, if kings do not protect the righteous within their dominions, Naravyaghra, they take upon themselves the sins of omission and commission. The men who assist kings in protecting their subjects also become equally entitled to a share of the merit earned by others, by virtue of the protection granted.

The learned say that the Garhasthya, which we have adopted, is superior to all the other varnas. In this respect, the conclusions are clear and hallowed. The man who regards all creatures as himself, who does no harm and has his anger under control, obtains great happiness both here and hereafter. A king can easily cross the ocean of samsara with kingly duties, urged on his fast boat by the breeze of gifts, with the shastras for its tackle and intelligence for the strength of its helmsman, kept afloat by the power of righteousness.

When he withdraws from every earthly object the feeling of desire in his heart, he is regarded as resting on his understanding alone. In this state, he soon attains Brahma. Becoming beatific by meditation, by restraining desire and other passions of the heart, O Naravyaghra, a king engaged in discharging the duty of protection will obtain great merit. Therefore, O Yudhishtira, work carefully to protect pious Brahmanas and those devoted to the study of the Vedas, as well as other men. Merely by exercising the duty of extending shelter, the king earns merit a hundred times greater than Munis can earn in their asramas within the vana.

I have now described the various duties of men, O eldest son of Pandu. You must adhere to Rajadharma that is eternal, which great men have practised since olden days. If you occupy yourself with concentration with the duty of protecting your subjects, Naravyaghra, you will obtain the merits of all the four varnasramas and of all the four varnas!'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'You have told me the dharma of the four varnasramas and the four varnas. Tell me now, O Pitamaha, the principal duties of a kingdom.'

Bhishma replies, 'The selection and coronation of a king is the first duty of a kingdom, as anarchy makes it weak and robbers soon come to infest it. In states racked by anarchy, righteousness cannot dwell and inhabitants destroy one another. It is the worst possible state for a kingdom.

The Srutis declare that in the coronation of a king, it is Indra himself who is crowned in the person of the king. A man who desires prosperity should worship the king as he would Indra. No one should dwell in kingdoms where anarchy prevails, because Agni does not convey to the Devas the libations that people there offer. If a powerful king desires to annex kingdoms weakened by anarchy, the people should go forward and receive the invader with respect, for this is consistent with wisdom. There is no evil greater than anarchy, but only if the powerful invader is inclined to equity will everything be set right, otherwise he could annihilate all.

The cow that cannot be easily milked has to endure great pain, whereas the cow lending itself to being easily milked does not suffer at all. The iron that bends easily does not need to be heated. The tree that bends easily does not suffer at the hands of the gardener. Guided by these instances, O Kshatriya, men should bend before the powerful. He who bows to a powerful man actually bends his head to Indra. For these reasons, men who wish for prosperity should elect and crown someone as their king.

Men who live in countries where anarchy prevails cannot enjoy their wealth and wives, because the lawless man derives great pleasure from robbing them. However, when others steal his own ill-gotten wealth, he wishes for a king. It is evident, therefore, that in times of anarchy, even evil men cannot be happy, because two evil men together may snatch away the wealth of a third, and many men banding together may in turn rob those two of their wealth. Such evil men could enslave those who are free, and forcibly abduct women. For these reasons, the Devas created kings to protect the people.

If there were no kings on earth to wield the Dandaneeti, the strong would then prey on the weak, as fish do in water. We have been told that in olden days of anarchy, men destroyed one another like stronger fish devouring weaker ones. We hear that a few among them then joined together to make certain compacts, saying, "We will cast off one who becomes harsh in speech or violent in temper, one who seduces or abducts other men's wives or who robs others of their wealth."

They made such an agreement to inspire confidence in all classes of people. However, after some time, they found the arrangement unsatisfactory and approached Pitamaha Brahma, saying, "Without a king, O divine lord, we are facing doom. Appoint someone as our king so that all of us will revere him and he will protect us."

The Pitamaha requested Manu but he did not assent, saying, "To govern a kingdom is exceedingly difficult, especially among men whose ways are always false and deceitful. I fear all sinful deeds."

The inhabitants of the earth then said to him, "Do not fear. Sins that men commit will affect only those who commit them, without tarnishing you in the least. To increase your treasury, we will give you a fiftieth part of our animals and precious metals, and a tenth part of our grain. When our maidens wish to marry, we will give you the most beautiful ones among them. Those among men who are foremost in the use of weapons, in riding and driving chariots will follow you as the Devas do Indra.

With your strength so enhanced, you will become invincible and powerful. As our king, you will protect us gladly, like Kubera protecting the Yakshas and the Rakshasas. A fourth part of the punya men will earn under your protection will be yours. Strengthened by the punya that you will so easily obtain, protect us, O Rajan, as he of a hundred yagnas protects the gods. Like the sun scorching all with his rays, go and win victories. Crush the pride of your foes and let dharma always triumph in the world."

Thus addressed by the inhabitants of the earth, the tejasvi Manu of high lineage appeared, accompanied by a large force, blazing with power. Beholding the might of Manu, like the Devas perceiving the might of Indra, the inhabitants of the earth became quiet and set their minds to their respective duties. Manu then went through the world like a rain-charged cloud in its mission of beneficence, keeping evil in check and getting all to perform their respective dharma.

The men on earth who desire prosperity, Yudhishtira, should first choose and crown a king for the protection of all. Like disciples prostrating themselves in the presence of the acharya, or the Devas in the presence of Indra, all should humble themselves before the king. A ruler honoured by his own people becomes an object of respect for his enemies, while a king disappointing his people is overthrown, despised by his subjects.

Therefore, parasols, chariots, outward ornaments, meat, drink, mansions, seats, beds and all utensils for use and show, should be assigned to the king. By such means he will succeed in discharging his dharma as protector and become irresistible. He should speak with smiles and, addressed sweetly by others, should in turn address others amiably. Grateful to those who serve him, firmly devoted to those who deserve his respect, and with passions under control, he should give all their due. Looked after by others, he should look upon them mildly, sweetly and generously.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Why, O Bharatarishabha, have the Brahmanas said that the king, the ruler of men, is a god?'

Bhishma replies, 'There is an old story concerning this about a discussion between the wise Brihaspati and the intelligent king of Kosala, Vasumanas. The king, aware of the value of humility, ever devoted to the welfare of all and desirous of securing the happiness of men, duly observed the proper obsequies, circumambulating the great sage and bowing to him, and questioned the virtuous Brihaspati about the laws of a kingdom.

Vasumanas asked, "By what means do creatures grow, and what destroys them? O you of deep understanding, whom should they worship in order to find eternal happiness?"

Thus questioned by the Kosala king of infinite tejas, the wise Brihaspati conversed with him calmly about the respect that one should pay kings.

Brihaspati said, "The duties of all men, O sagacious one, can be seen to have their root in the king. It is only through fear of the king that men refrain from destroying one another. It is the king who brings peace on earth, through due observance of dharma, and by curtailing lawlessness and all kinds of lust. When he achieves this, he shines in glory.

O Rajan, if the sun and the moon do not rise, all creatures are unable to see one another in utter darkness, just as fish in shallow waters and birds in sanctuaries swim and rove without restraint, attacking and oppressing one another till they meet with extinction. Men, too, like a herd of cattle without a herdsman to look after them, will sink into utter darkness and certain destruction if they have no king to protect them.

If the king did not exercise the duty of protection, the strong would by force appropriate the possessions of the weak and, if the latter refused to surrender them readily, take their very lives. Nobody then would be able to say of anything, ‘This is mine.’ Wives, sons, food, all kinds of property, would not exist. In the absence of royal protection, ruin would overtake everything: evil men would forcibly appropriate the carriages, robes, ornaments, precious stones and other kinds of property belonging to others, and all kinds of oppression would fall upon those who were righteous, forcing them to take to the path of adharma. Men would disregard or even injure their own aged parents, their very acharyas, guests and elders.

If the king did not offer protection, all those possessing wealth would have to encounter death, confinement and persecution, and the very idea of property would disappear. Everything would be destroyed prematurely, brigands would overrun the country and everybody would fall into hell.

If the king did not offer protection, all restrictions of marriage and intercourse due to consanguinity and other kinds of kinship would dissolve. All affairs relating to agriculture and trade would fall into confusion. Dharma would sink and be lost, and the three Vedas would disappear. Yagnas completed with gifts according to the law would no longer be performed; no marriage would take place, and society itself would cease to exist. If the king did not exercise the responsibility of protection, the very bulls would not cover cows, milk-jars would not be churned and people living by rearing cattle would be ruined. In the absence of royal protection, all creatures, howling and frantic through fear and anxiety, would meet their end in no time at all. No sacrifices extending for a year and completed with gifts according to the shastras would occur.

In the absence of royal protection, Brahmanas would never study the four Vedas or undergo austerities or be cleansed by knowledge and rigid vows, and the slayer of a man guilty of Brahmahatya would not obtain any reward, while the perpetrator would enjoy perfect immunity.

In the absence of royal protection, men would snatch others’ wealth, wholesome barriers would be swept away, everybody, terrified, would seek safety in flight and all kinds of injustice would set in. An intermixture of castes would take place and famine would ravage the kingdom.

Were the king to exercise the responsibility of royal protection, men everywhere could sleep at their ease without shutting up their houses and bolting and barring their doors. Nobody would hear evil talk, or fear actual attacks. Women decked with ornaments could confidently wander anywhere without male relatives to escort them. Men would adopt the path of dharma and serve one another because the king exercised his duty of protection. The members of the three varnasramas would be able to perform great yagnas and concentrate on acquiring learning. The Vedas protect the world that depends on farming and trade.

The king duly protects all people by following his principal dharma with the aid of a mighty force and, by taking a heavy load upon himself, enables his subjects to live in happiness. Who will not worship the king whose existence allows people to survive and in whose downfall they are ruined? Those who do what is agreeable and beneficial to the king, and who share the burden of royal duties that overawe every varna, conquer both this and the next world. He who even thinks of doing an injury to the king will certainly come to grief and go to hell hereafter.

No one should disregard the king by taking him for a mere man, for he is in truth a divinity in human form. The king assumes five different forms according to five different occasions. He becomes Agni, Aditya, Mrityu, Vaisravana and Yama. When, confronted by falsehood, he burns the offenders before him with his fierce energy, he assumes the form of Agni. When he scrutinizes through his spies the actions of all men and does what is necessary for the general good, he assumes the form of Aditya. He assumes the form of the Destroyer when in wrath he cuts down hundreds of evil men with their sons, grandsons and relatives. He assumes the form of Yama when he restrains the evil by inflicting severe punishments on them and favours the righteous by bestowing rewards upon them. He assumes the form of Kubera on earth, O Rajan, when he gratifies with profuse gifts those who have rendered him valuable service and confiscates the wealth and jewels of those who have offended him, when he bestows prosperity upon some and takes it from others.

No one who is clever, who is capable of work, who aspires to virtue and is free from malice, should ever spread evil reports about the king. No man by acting against the king can ever be happy, even if he happens to be the king’s son, brother, companion or one whom the king regards as his second self. Where Agni, assisted by Vayu, blazing forth among inflammable things, may leave a remnant, the wrath of the king leaves nothing to the man who incurs it.

One should turn away at a distance from whatever belongs to the king, as though from death itself, else one will meet a speedy end like a deer at the touch of poison. The man of intelligence should protect as his own whatever belongs to the king, else he will sink senseless into a deep hell of eternal gloom and infamy.

Who will not worship a king whom such terms adorn as ‘delighter of the people’, ‘giver of happiness’, ‘possessor of prosperity’ and, most important of all, ‘healer of injuries’, ‘lord of earth’ and ‘protector of men’?

Therefore, one should always attach to the king a minister who is solicitous of his prosperity, who observes all wholesome restraints, who has his soul under control and is master of his passions, who has intelligence and memory, and who is adept in the transaction of business.

The king should duly honour a minister who is grateful, endowed with wisdom, large-hearted, loyal, possessed of mastery over his senses, virtuous and observant of the dictates of policy. He should entertain the man who is loyal, grateful, virtuous, possessed of self-control, brave, magnanimous in his deeds and competent to accomplish tasks without assistance.

Knowledge makes men proud, while the king makes men humble. The man whom the king chastises can never find happiness, while one whom the king favours, rejoices. The king is the heart of his people; he is their great refuge; he is their glory and their greatest happiness. O Rajan, men who are attached to the king succeed in conquering both this and the other world. Having governed the earth with the aid of self-restraint, truth and friendship, and having adored the Devas with great yagnas, the king, earning great glory, obtains an eternal abode in Swarga.”

Being thus instructed by Brihaspati, son of Angirasa, the heroic Vasumanas, ruler of Kosala, the best of kings, from then on, began to protect his subjects.’”

"Yudhishtira asks, 'O Bhaarata, what other special duties remain for the king to discharge? How should he protect his kingdom and subdue his foes? How should he employ his spies? How should he inspire confidence in the four varnas of his subjects, his own servants, wives and sons?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O Rajan, with attention to the diverse duties of kings, to the work which the king, or one who is in the position of a king, should first do. The king should first master himself, and only then seek to subdue his foes. How will a king who has not been able to conquer himself be able to conquer his enemies? The conquest of the five senses is regarded as the conquest of self, and the king who successfully subdues his senses is competent to resist his enemies.

He should place foot-soldiers within his own palace, in his forts, frontiers, towns, parks, pleasure gardens and also in all places he personally visits. He should employ as spies men who look like simpletons or appear to be blind and deaf. They should all be adroit men who have been thoroughly tested for their abilities, and who are able to endure hunger and thirst. With proper attention, the king should set his informers upon all his counsellors, friends and sons, as well as in his city, in the provinces and in the dominions of the chieftains under him.

His agents should be so employed that they do not know one another. He should also, O Bharatarishabha, discover the spies of his enemies by setting informers in shops, places of amusement where people congregate, among beggars, in his pleasure gardens and parks, in meetings and conclaves of the learned, in the country, in public places, in places where he holds his own court and in the homes of the citizens. In this way the intelligent king will discover the agents his foes dispatch and will derive great benefit, O Pandava.

When the king, through a survey of his own, finds himself weak, he should, after consulting his counsellors, make peace with an enemy who is stronger. The wise king should quickly make peace with a foe, even when he knows that he is not weak, if any advantage can be derived from it. He should be engaged in protecting his kingdom righteously, and should make peace with those rulers who are accomplished, capable of great exertion, virtuous and honest.

When the king finds himself threatened with danger and on the verge of ruin, he should kill all offenders whom he had overlooked in the past and all those the people identify as being his enemies. A king should ignore men who can neither benefit nor injure him, or those who cannot rescue themselves from distress.

As regards military operations, a king who is confident of his own strength should, after first making arrangements for the protection of his own capital, march at the head of a large force, cheerfully and bravely, without declaring his destination. He should attack those who are without allies and friends, or those already at war with another and therefore careless of danger from another quarter, or those weaker than himself.

A king should not forever live in subjection to another more powerful. Though weak, he should resolve to undermine the stronger, while continuing to rule his own kingdom. He should subvert the stronger by means of weapons, fire, application of poison and fomenting discord among his counsellors and servants.

Brihaspati has said that an intelligent king should always avoid war for acquisition of territory. The wise king should acquire dominions by means of conciliation, gifts and stirring up dissension.

The king should take a sixth of the incomes of his subjects as tribute to meet the expenses of safeguarding them, O Kurusthama. For the protection of his subjects, he should also forcibly take away wealth, much or little as the case may be, from the ten kinds of offenders mentioned in the shastras. A king should certainly look upon his subjects as his own children. However, in determining their disputes, he should not exhibit emotion. To hear complaints and responses of disputants in judicial suits, the king should always appoint wise men possessing knowledge of the affairs of the world, for the state in truth rests upon the proper administration of justice. The king should have honest and trustworthy men supervise his mines, salt, grain, ferries and elephant corps.

The king who always properly conducts the Dandaneeti earns great punya. Regulation of punishment is the lofty duty of kings and deserves acclaim. The king should be conversant with the Vedas and their branches, possess wisdom, engage in tapasya, be charitable and devoted in performing yagnas. All these traits should always be present in a king, for if he fails to administer justice he can attain neither Swarga nor fame.

If a stronger king attacks a weaker the latter, if intelligent, should seek refuge in a fort. Assembling his friends for consultation, he should devise proper means to defend himself. Adopting the policy of conciliation and sowing discord among his enemies, he should devise means to wage war with the assailant. He should set the inhabitants of the woods on the high roads and, if necessary, cause whole villages to be removed, transplanting all the inhabitants to minor towns or the outskirts of great cities. Reassuring his wealthy subjects and the principal officers of his army, he should cause the inhabitants of the open country to take refuge in forts that are well protected.

He should himself withdraw all stores of grain from the open country into his forts. If that becomes impossible, he should destroy them completely by fire. He should set men to destroy the enemy's crops by producing disunion among the enemy's subjects or else, if he fails to do so, he should have those crops destroyed by his own troops. He should demolish all the bridges over the rivers in his kingdom. He should empty the waters from all the tanks in his dominions or alternatively, have them poisoned.

Disregarding the duty of protecting his friends, in view of both present and future circumstances, he should seek the protection of another ruler who is the enemy of his enemy, and who may be strong enough to vanquish his rival on the field of battle. He should destroy all the smaller forts in his kingdom and cut down all the smaller trees and branches of the larger trees, but he should not touch even a leaf of the Chaitya tree.

He should raise outer ramparts round his forts with enclosures in them and fill his trenches with water, pointed stakes at their base and crocodiles and sharks. He should keep small openings in his walls to enable sallies from his fort and make careful arrangements for their defence like that of the greater gates. At all his gates and on the ramparts of his forts he should place weapons and destructive engines such as the Sataghnis.

He should store wood for fuel and dig and repair wells for supply of water to the garrison. He should cause all houses made of grass and straw to be plastered over with mud and, if it is summer, withdraw to a place safe from fire all the stores of grass and straw. He should order all food to be cooked at night so that no fire is lit during the day except for the daily homa. Particular care should be taken of fires in smithies and dormitories, and fires kept within the houses of the inhabitants should be well covered. For the effectual protection of the city, he should proclaim that severe punishment will be meted out to anyone who lights fires during the day.

During such times, O greatest of men, you should drive out of the town all beggars, eunuchs, lunatics and mimes, for if you permit them to remain, evil will follow.

Into places of public resort, tirthas, assemblies and in the houses of the citizens, the king should send competent spies. He should cause wide roads to be constructed and order shops and places for the distribution of water to be opened at proper stations. Depots of diverse necessaries, arsenals, camps and quarters for soldiers, stables for horses and elephants, trenches, streets and bypaths, houses and gardens for retirement and pleasure, should be so ordered that their sites are concealed.

A king threatened by a hostile army should gather and store wealth, oil, fat, honey, clarified butter, medicines of all kinds, charcoal and fuel, grass and leaves, munja grass, arrows, poisoned arrows, weapons of every kind such as darts, swords, lances and others. He should especially keep ready drugs of every kind, roots and fruits, the four kinds of physicians, scribes, draftsmen, actors, dancers, athletes and men capable of assuming diverse disguises. He should decorate his capital and cheer all his subjects.

The king should lose no time in bringing under his control men of whom he has reason to be afraid, be they his servants, counsellors, citizens or neighbouring monarchs. When any assigned task of the king is performed, he should reward those who helped him to accomplish it with wealth, proportionate gifts and words of gratitude. The shastras say that a king pays off his debt when he oversets his enemy or slays him outright.

Listen to me as I recite the seven things a king should take care of. They are his own self, his counsellors, his treasury, his machinery for meteing out punishments, his friends, his provinces and his capital. He should take care to protect these seven limbs of his kingdom. The king who is conversant with the aggregate of six, the triple aggregate and the high aggregate of three, will succeed in winning the sovereignty of the whole earth.

Listen, O Yudhishtira, to what is termed 'the aggregate of six'. These are: ruling in peace after concluding a treaty with the foe, marching to battle, producing disunion among the enemy, concentrating forces for inspiring fear among his enemies, preparing for war with readiness for peace and alliance with others.

Listen now attentively to what is termed 'the triple aggregate'. They are: decreasing what is, maintaining it and increasing it. The 'high aggregate' of three consists of dharma, artha and kama. These should be pursued judiciously. With dharma, a king will succeed in ruling the earth for ever.

On this subject, Angirasa's son Brihaspati himself has sung the following two verses which you should hear: "Having discharged all his duties and protected the earth as well as his cities, a king will attain great happiness in Swarga. What is tapasya to the king who protects his people properly, and what need has he of yagnas? Such a king should be regarded as one who knows every dharma!"'

Yudhishtira says, 'There is the Dandaneeti, the Raja and the Praja. Tell me, O Pitamaha, what advantage they derive each from the other.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to me, O Bhaarata, as I expound in sacred and solemn words the great blessedness of the Dandaneeti. Dandaneeti forces all men to observe the svadharma of their varnas. Properly administered, it compels people to be virtuous.

Understand that men become truly happy when the four varnas attend to their respective duties, when they maintain all wholesome boundaries, when peace and happiness are brought to flow from Dandaneeti, when the people are freed from all fear, and the three higher varnas endeavour, according to their respective duties, to maintain harmony.

You should entertain no doubt about the question whether it is the king who makes the age, or the age that makes the king. The truth is that the king makes the age. When the king rules with a complete and strict reliance on Dandaneeti, one says that the foremost of ages, called the Krita yuga prevails, where dharma rules and adharma does not exist.

The hearts of men belonging to all the four varnas take no pleasure in adharma. Assuredly, all men succeed in acquiring the objects they desire and preserving those acquired. All the Vedic rites become punya karma, all the seasons become delightful and free from evil, and the voices, enunciation and thinking of all men become clear and cheerful. Diseases disappear and all men become long-lived. Wives do not become widows and no one is a miser. The earth yields crops without being tilled, and herbs and plants grow in luxuriance. Trees, leaves, fruits and roots become vigorous and abundant. No evil is to be seen, and only dharma exists.

These are the characteristics, O Yudhishtira, of the Krita or Satya yuga. When the king relies upon only three parts of Dandaneeti, leaving out the fourth, the yuga called Treta sets in. A fourth part of adharma follows in the train of such observance of the great science by three-fourths. The earth yields crops only if tilled, and herbs and plants grow depending upon tillage.

When the king observes only a half of the great science, leaving out the other half, then the yuga that sets in is called Dwapara. Adharma follows in the train of such observance. The earth requires tillage, and yields crops by half.

When the king, abandoning the great science totally, oppresses his subjects by evil means of diverse kinds, one calls the yuga that sets in Kali. During the Kali yuga, adharma becomes pervasive and nothing of dharma is seen. The hearts of men of all the varnas fall away from their respective dharmas. Sudras live by adopting lives of mendicancy, and Brahmanas live by serving others. Men fail to acquire the objects they desire and preserve those already acquired.

Intermixture of the four varnas takes place. Vedic rites fail to produce fruit. All the seasons cease to be delightful and become laden with evil. The voices, enunciation and minds of men lose vigour. Diseases appear and men die prematurely. Wives become widows and one sees many cruel men. The clouds do not rain in season, and crops fail. When the king does not protect the subjects with proper attention to the great Dandaneeti, drought sets in.

The king is the creator of the Krita yuga, the Treta and the Dwapara. He is the cause of the fourth yuga called Kali. If he causes the Krita yuga, he attains everlasting Swarga. If he causes the Treta yuga, he acquires Swarga for a period that is limited. If he causes the Dwapara, he attains to blessedness in Swarga according to the measure of his merits. By causing the Kali yuga, the king incurs a heavy load of sin. Tarnished by evil, he rots in hell for innumerable years and for the sins of his subjects, he himself incurs great sin and infamy.

Keeping the great science in mind, the learned Kshatriya should satisfy his Purusharthas and protect those he has already acquired. Dandaneeti, which establishes all men in the observance of their respective duties, which is the groundwork of all wholesome distinctions and which, if properly administered, truly upholds the world and sets it going, shields all men like a mother and father protecting their children. Understand, O Bharatarishabha, that the very lives of creatures depend upon it.

The highest merit a king can acquire is to acquaint himself with Dandaneeti and administer it properly. Therefore, O scion of Kuru, protect your subjects righteously with the aid of the great science. By doing so and ruling with dharma, you will surely attain blessedness in Swarga.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'O Pitamaha, since you are familiar with every kind of conduct, tell me if, by adopting the way of Dandaneeti, a king can succeed in easily acquiring happiness in the end, both here and hereafter.'

Bhishma says, 'A king should observe these thirty-six virtues which are connected with thirty-six others. By attending to these qualities a dharmatman can certainly acquire great merit. The king should observe his dharma without anger or malice and adhere to kindness. He should have faith and acquire wealth without persecution and cruelty. He should pursue pleasure without attachment.

He should cheerfully utter agreeable words and be brave without bragging. He should be liberal, but should not make gifts to undeserving men. He should exercise his powers without cruelty, make alliances, avoid those who are evil, not behave with hostility towards friends, never employ as spies and secret agents men not devoted to him, and never try to accomplish his objectives by persecution.

He should never disclose his purposes before evil men and should speak of the merits of others, never of his own. He should take wealth from his subjects but not from those who are good, and should never employ or take the help of base, vile men.

He should not inflict punishment without careful enquiry, never disclose his counsels and give generously, but not to covetous men. He should repose confidence in others, but never in those who have injured him. He should not be malicious. He should protect his wedded wives and not indulge too much in female companionship. He should take only wholesome food, not things that harm him.

He should be pure, and not be swayed by emotion. He should pay reverence humbly to those who deserve it and serve his acharyas and elders sincerely and meekly. He should worship the Devas without pride, seek prosperity, but never do anything that brings infamy.

He should be clever in business but always wait for the proper time. He should comfort men, never send them away with hollow words and, having shown favour to someone, he should not abandon him. He should not strike out in ignorance and, once having slain his foe, he should never indulge in remorse. He should display temper, but not without occasion. He should be mild, but never to those who have committed offences.

While ruling your kingdom, conduct yourself in this manner, if you wish to have prosperity. The king who behaves otherwise incurs great danger, while the king who observes all these virtues that I have mentioned, reaps many blessings on earth and great rewards in Swarga.'

Earnestly attending to these instructions of Santanu's son, the perspicacious king Yudhishtira, protected by Bhima and others, worships his Pitamaha and from that time on begins to rule according to his teachings."

CANTO 71

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, in what way should the king protect his subjects without causing grief and violating his dharma?'

Bhishma says, 'I will recite the eternal duties in brief, O Rajan, for if I were to list them in detail, I would never reach the end. You must revere learned Brahmanas who are devoted to their dharma, regular in worshipping the Devas, observe stringent vows and have other accomplishments, and employ them to officiate in your yagnas when they come to your abode.

With your priest accompanying you, you should rise when they approach, touch their feet in reverence and do everything else that is necessary. Performing these acts of piety and discharging other karma that are for your own good, you should, by giving them gifts, make them shower blessings on you for the success of your enterprises.

O Bhaarata, you should be sincere, wise and intelligent and adopt satya while avoiding kama and krodha. The foolish king who pursues artha without driving away kama and krodha fails to acquire dharma, and ultimately sacrifices artha as well. Never employ those who are covetous and foolish, in matters connected with kama and artha. You should always employ in all your work those who are not covetous and possess intelligence. Sullied by kama and krodha and unskilled in the transaction of business, foolish men, if vested with authority in matters of artha, always oppress the people by diverse methods which lead to mischief.

A king should fill his treasury with a sixth part, upon fair calculation, of the yield of the soil as his tribute, with fines and forfeitures imposed upon offenders, with levies according to the shastras upon merchants and traders, in return for the protection he grants them.

Realizing this just tribute and governing the kingdom properly, the king should meticulously work so that that his subjects do not feel the pressure of want. Men become deeply devoted to the king who discharges the duty of protection properly, who is endowed with charity, steady in the observance of dharma, vigilant and free from lust and anger.

Never seek to fill your treasury through adharma or from lobha, greed. The king who does not rule in accordance with the shastras fails to earn wealth and religious merit. The king who is mindful only of acquiring wealth can never acquire religious merit as well. The wealth that he acquires by such means is lavished on unworthy objects.

The avaricious king who, through folly, oppresses his subjects by levying taxes that the shastras do not sanction, wrongs his own self. Just as a man wanting milk cannot obtain any by cutting off the udders of his cow, a kingdom ruled by improper means never yields any profit for the king. As one who treats a milch cow with tenderness always gets milk from it, a king who rules his kingdom wisely reaps the rewards.

By protecting a kingdom properly and ruling it judiciously, a king will always obtain great wealth, O Yudhishtira. The earth well protected by the king yields crops and gold to ruler and ruled alike, like a gratified mother yielding milk to her child. Imitate the example of the gardener who waters his trees and plants and gathers only their produce, O Rajan, not of the charcoal-maker who uproots trees and plants and burns them for making coal. Thus, by discharging the duty of protection, you will be able to enjoy the earth forever.

If in attacking an enemy's kingdom your treasury is exhausted, you may refill it by taking wealth from all except Brahmanas. Do not let your heart be moved, even when you are in great distress, upon seeing wealthy Brahmanas. I need not speak then of what you should do when you are in affluence. You should give them wealth as they deserve and you can afford, and protect and comfort them on all occasions. Thereby you will gain regions after death that are most difficult to attain.

With such dharma you will gain fame that is great, pure and everlasting. Follow your dharma and shield your subjects from injury, O son of Pandu, and you will have no feelings of regret or pain, since virtuous men regard protection and compassion to all creatures as the highest merit of a king.

The sin incurred by a king for failing for a single day to defend his subjects from fear is such that he has to suffer for it in hell for a thousand years, while the merit he earns by protecting them for a single day is reward in Swarga for ten thousand years. A king soon acquires, by this dharma, all the regions that men find who lead the Garhasthya, the Brahmacharya and the Vanaprastha varnasramas.

O son of Kunti, observe painstakingly the duty of protection and you will gain the reward of righteousness. No grief or pain will afflict you and you will obtain great prosperity in Swarga. It is impossible for men who are not kings to acquire punya like this. None other can earn such rewards. Because of your wisdom, you have gained a kingdom. So, safeguard your subjects through dharma, gratify Indra with offerings of soma and fulfill the desires of your friends and well-wishers.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The king should appoint as his priest one who will protect the good and punish the evil, O Rajan. In this regard, there is told an old story about the discourse between Pururavas, the son of Aila, and Matariswan.

Pururavas asked Matariswan, "From where have the Brahmana and the three other varnas sprung, and why has the Brahmana become the foremost?"

Matariswan answered, "The Brahmana has sprung from the mouth of Brahma, the Kshatriya from his two arms and the Vaisya from his two thighs. In order to wait upon these three varnas a fourth, the Sudra, sprang to life, created from the feet of Brahma.

Thus the Brahmana takes birth on earth as the lord of all creatures, his duty being the custody of the Vedas and the other shastras. Then, to rule the world, wield the Danda and protect all creatures, Brahma created the second varna, the Kshatriya. He created the Vaisya to support the two other varnas and his own by cultivation and trade and, finally, he ordained that the Sudra should serve the three other varnas as a menial."

Pururavas said, "Tell me truly, O god of winds, to whom does this earth rightly belong—to the Brahmana or to the Kshatriya?"

The god of winds said, "Everything that exists in the universe belongs to the Brahmana as a result of his birth and precedence according to the Dharmatmans. What the Brahmana eats is his own, the place he inhabits is his own and what he gives away is his own. He deserves the veneration of all the other varnas, as he is the first-born and the foremost.

Just as a woman, in the absence of her husband, accepts his younger brother in his place, the earth, because of the refusal of the Brahmana, has accepted his next-born, the Kshatriya, for her lord. This is the first rule. In times of distress, however, there is an exception to this rule. If you seek to discharge the duties of the order and wish to obtain the highest place in Swarga, then give the Brahmana all the land you conquer, provided he possesses learning and virtue, knows his duties, observes penances, is satisfied with his svadharma and not greedy for wealth.

Wise and humble, the well-born Brahmana by his own perspicacity guides the king in every matter. By his sound counsels he brings prosperity to the king and instructs him in his dharma. As long as a wise king observes the dharma of his varna and is willing to listen to the advice of the Brahmana without pride, he is honoured and enjoys fame. The king's priest, therefore, has a share in the merit that the king acquires. When the king himself behaves thus, all his subjects, relying upon him, become virtuous in their behaviour, attentive to their duties and free from every fear.

The king obtains a fourth part of those righteous deeds which his subjects, properly defended by him, perform in his kingdom. The Devas, Manushyas, Pitris, Gandharvas, Uragas and Rakshasas, all depend upon the offerings made at yagnas for their support and subsistence. Yagna, therefore, depends upon the king and in a country without a king there can be no yagnas.

In the summer season, men seek comfort from the shade of trees, cool water and cool breezes, while in the winter they derive comfort from fire, warm clothes and the sun. The heart of man may find pleasure in sound, touch, taste, vision and scent, while the man who is afraid finds no pleasure in these things. Therefore, he who dispels the fears of men obtains great merit. There is no gift more valuable in the three worlds than the gift of life. The king is Indra. The king is Yama. The king is dharma. The king in different forms sustains and supports everything.'""

"Bhishma says, 'With an eye on both punya and artha, whose considerations are often complex, the king should without delay appoint a learned priest who has thorough knowledge of the Vedas and other shastras. Those kings who have mahatmans as priests familiar with policy and who have similar qualities themselves, enjoy prosperity in every way. Both priest and king should have qualities worthy of respect and should observe vratas and tapasya. They will succeed in supporting and pleasing their praja, their Pitris and the Devas.

The shastras lay down that the Brahmana and Kshatriya should possess similar feelings and should be friends, as a result of which their subjects become happy. If they do not respect each other, destruction will overtake the people, for the shastras say that the Brahmana and the Kshatriya are the progenitors of all men.

In this connection, listen, Yudhishtira, to an old story about the discourse between Aila's son and Kasyapa.

Aila asked Kasyapa, "When the Brahmana forsakes the Kshatriya, or the Kshatriya abandons the Brahmana, who among them should be regarded superior, and upon whom should the other varnas rely and maintain themselves?"

Kasyapa answered, "Ruin overtakes the kingdom of the Kshatriya when the Brahmana and Kshatriya fall out, for when confusion prevails, thieves and brigands soon infest the kingdom and all good men regard the ruler as a Mlechcha, devoid of dharma. Neither their oxen nor their children thrive.

No one churns their pots of milk and no one performs yagnas. In kingdoms where Brahmanas abandon Kshatriyas, wealth does not increase, children do not study the Vedas or shastras or perform yagnas. The Kshatriyas who abandon Brahmanas become impure in blood and assume the nature of robbers.

The Brahmana and the Kshatriya are connected with each other naturally; each protects the other and each is responsible for the other's growth. When each helps the other, both attain great prosperity. If their friendship, existing from days of old, breaks, chaos sets in. No one who wants to cross the ocean of life succeeds in his task, like a small boat floating on the bosom of the sea.

The four varnas become confused and ruin overtakes all. If one protects the Brahmana who is like a tree, it showers gold and honey. If the Kshatriya does not protect him, the tree sheds tears and sorrow. In the absence of a Kshatriya ruler, if Brahmanas abandon the Vedas and the protection of the shastras, Indra does not bless them with rain, and all kinds of calamities ceaselessly afflict the kingdom.

When, having slain a woman or a Brahmana, a vile sinner does not face disgrace and shame in society and is not afraid of the king, danger threatens the Kshatriya king. As a result of the evils that sinful men perpetrate, Rudra, the god of vengeance, appears in the kingdom to destroy everyone, the honest and the evil alike, without distinction."

Aila then asked, "From where does Rudra spring, and what is his form? One sees creatures killing other creatures. Tell me everything, O Kasyapa!"

Kasyapa answered, "Rudra exists in the hearts of men and he destroys the bodies in which he dwells and also the bodies of others. Rudra is like atmospheric visitations and his form is like that of the god of winds."

Aila said, "Neither does the wind, by blowing, visibly kill men on all occasions, nor does the god of the clouds do so by rain or floods. On the other hand, one sees that men slay each other through lust and malice."

Kasyapa said, "Fire, blazing forth in one house, burns a whole quarter or an entire village. Similarly, this Deva stupefies the senses of a few men and soon that confusion touches all—the honest and the evil alike, without any distinction."

Aila asked, "If as a result of the sins committed by the evil, punishment touches all, the honest and the wicked alike, why should men, do good deeds? Why should they not wantonly sin?"

Kasyapa replied, “By avoiding all connection with the sinful, men become pure and untainted. However, if they are interpolated with the sinful, punishment will overtake them, just as fire consumes even wood that is wet, if it is stored with wood that is dry. The sinless, therefore, should never mingle with the sinful.”

Aila said, “The earth contains the honest and the evil, for whom the sun shines, the wind blows and water cleanses, equally.”

Kasyapa said, “Such indeed, is the course of this world, O Rajan! However, it is not so in the other world, where there is a great difference between the dharmatman and the sinner. The regions that good men acquire are full of honey, possessed of the splendour of gold or of a fire upon which one pours clarified butter, similar to the navel of ambrosia. The good man enjoys great happiness as death, old age and sorrow do not there exist. The place for the sinful is Naraka—hell, and it is full of sorrow, darkness and ceaseless pain. Sinking in infamy, the man of sin suffers with remorse in hell for many years.

Thus, as a result of disunion between Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, unbearable grief comes to afflict the people. Knowing this, a king should appoint an experienced and sagacious Brahmana priest. He should install the priest before even his own coronation, as laid down by the laws proclaiming the Brahmana as the best of all creatures.

Men who know the Vedas say that Brahma first created the Brahmana and invested in him all things that are good in this world and made him the rightful owner of all the best things that have flowed from the Creator, because of the precedence of his birth. Consequently, he is worthy of the respect and the worship of all creatures.

A king, however powerful, should bestow upon the Brahmana according to the dictates of the shastras, whatever is best, distinguished and above others. The Brahmana and the Kshatriya contribute to increasing each others’ wealth, prestige and power. Therefore kings should, above all, always worship the Brahmanas.”””

"Bhishma says, 'The preservation and growth of the kingdom rest upon the king, while the protection and development of the king rest upon the king's priest. That kingdom enjoys true happiness where the Brahmana dispels the invisible fears of his subjects and the king dispels all their visible fears by the might of his arms. Listen to this old tale of the discussion between King Muchukunda and Vaisravana.

King Muchukunda, having subjugated the whole earth, went to Vaisravana, the lord of treasures and the lord of Alaka, to test his strength. King Vaisravana created by his ascetic power a large force of Rakshasas, who annihilated the forces of Muchukunda. Seeing the slaughter of his army, Muchukunda began to rebuke his own learned priest, Vasishtha. The Dharmatman Vasishtha sat in severe tapasya and, causing the Rakshasas to be slain, ascertained the true reason behind Muchukunda's action.

While his Rakshasas were being slaughtered, Vaisravana showed himself to Muchukunda and said to him "Many ancient kings, more powerful than you, aided by their priests, have approached me, but never like this. All of them, mighty and skilful warriors, regarded me as the granter of happiness and sorrow and came to me to offer worship. In truth, if you have might of arms, by all means, display it. But why, aided by a Brahmana's might, do you act so proudly?"

Muchukunda boldly replied in apt and just words: "The swayambhuva Brahma created the Brahmana and the Kshatriya and they have a common origin. If they applied their forces separately, they would never be able to defend the world. He bestowed upon Brahmanas the power of tapasyas and mantras, and upon Kshatriyas the power of arms and weapons. Supported by both kinds of might, kings should protect their subjects. This is the reason why I am doing what I do. Why do you, O Lord of Alaka, then rebuke me?"

Vaisravana said to Muchukunda and his priest, "Understand that I neither bestow sovereignty upon anyone without Brahma's command, nor do I ever take it away! You are free to rule the whole world."

Muchukunda replied, "'Rajan, I want to enjoy sovereignty obtained by the might of my own arms, not as a vara from you!" Vaisravana, seeing the king fearless in the observance of Kshatriya duties, was filled with surprise.

King Muchukunda, devoted to Kshatriya dharma, continued to rule all the earth obtained by the might of his own arms. So the Dharmaraja who rules his kingdom, helped by and yielding precedence to the Brahmana, will succeed in subjugating the earth and achieving great fame. The Brahmana should perform his religious rites every day and the Kshatriya should always be armed. Between them they are the rightful owners of everything in the universe.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me O Pitamaha, about the conduct by which a king can make his people great and thereby earn regions of felicity in the other world.'

Bhishma says, 'The king should be liberal, perform yagnas, O Bhaarata, do tapasya, observe vows and remain devoted to the duty of guarding his subjects by following the path of dharma. He should honour all men of dharma by standing up when they come, and by giving them gifts.

If the king follows dharma, it is respected everywhere. Whatever work and other things the king likes, his subjects too like. To his enemies the king should always be like Death, with the Dandaneeti uplifted in his hands. He should exterminate bandits everywhere in his kingdom and never pardon anyone impulsively.

The king earns a fourth part of the punya that his subjects earn under his protection, O Bhaarata, and by protecting them, he obtains a fourth part of the merit that his subjects acquire through study, by giving gifts, by pouring libations and by worshipping the Devas. The king acquires a fourth part also of the sins that his subjects commit, if there is any distress in the kingdom arising from his neglect in discharging his duty. Some say that the king gains a half, and some say the full measure, of whatever sins he earns by becoming cruel and untruthful in speech.

Attend now to the means by which the king can be cleansed of such sins. If he fails to restore to a subject the wealth that thieves have stolen, he should compensate the victim from his own treasury or, in case he is unable to do so, with wealth obtained from his dependants.

All the varnas should protect the property of a Brahmana, just as they would the Brahmana's son or his life. The man who offends Brahmanas should be exiled from the kingdom, for everything is saved by guarding the Brahmana's wealth. Through the grace of the Brahmana thus obtained, the king is crowned with success. Men seek the protection of an able king like creatures seeking relief from clouds or birds seeking refuge in a large tree. A cruel and covetous king with a lustful soul, always seeking the gratification of his desires, will never be able to protect his subjects.'

Yudhishtira says, 'I do not for a moment wish for the happiness that sovereignty bestows, or sovereignty for its own sake; I desire it for the punya I can acquire from it. It seems to me that the shastras attach no punya to sovereignty, hence I have no need for kingship. I will retire into the sacred vanas, lay aside the danda, subdue my senses and seek to acquire the merit of dharma by becoming a Rishi subsisting upon fruit and roots.'

Bhishma says, 'I know your heart, Yudhishtira, and how inoffensive your nature is. However, by inoffensiveness alone you will not succeed in ruling your kingdom. Your heart is inclined to mildness; you are compassionate, honourable, virtuous and full of mercy. People, therefore, do not regard you much.

Follow the example of your father and your Pitamaha. Kings should never adopt the conduct which you espouse. Do your duty and never be touched by anxiety or adopt such inoffensiveness, for by doing so you will not earn the merit of following your dharma, which arises from protecting your subjects.

The behaviour you wish to adopt, impelled by your own intelligence and wisdom, is not consistent with the blessings which your father Pandu or your mother Kunti prayed for to the Devas. Your father always prayed that you become courageous, mighty and truthful, while your mother Kunti prayed that you become high-minded and liberal.

The Pitris and the Devas always ask for the offerings with Swaha and Swadha in sraddhas and yagnas from children. Whether gifts, study, sacrifices and the protection of subjects are meritorious or sinful, you have been born to practise and perform them. O son of Kunti, the fame of those men who fail to bear the burdens placed on them and to which they are yoked in life, is tarnished.

When a properly trained horse can successfully bear a burden without falling down, why cannot a man like you? Success depends upon work and words, and one incurs no censure as long as one's deeds and words are proper. No one, be he a man virtuously following the Grihastasrama, or a king, or a Brahmacharin, has ever succeeded without failing at some time.

It is better to do some work which is good and in which there is small merit, for total abstention from karma is most sinful. When a high-born dharmatman becomes affluent, his king will obtain prosperity in all his affairs. A Dharmarajan, having obtained a kingdom, should seek to subdue some enemies by gifts, some by force and some by sweet words.

There is no one more virtuous than one upon whom noble and learned men rely, from fear of losing their means of sustenance, and upon whom they depend to live in contentment.'

Yudhishtira asks, 'What actions, O Pitamaha, lead to Swarga? What is the nature of the great happiness that one derives from them? What is the high prosperity that one can then obtain? Tell me all this, if you know.'

Bhishma says, 'Anyone amongst us who is able to give a moment of relief to someone afflicted with fear is worthy of Swarga. This is verily so, Yudhishtira; hence, gladly be the king of the Kurus, protect the good and slay the evil, gain Swarga.

Let your friends and all honest men derive their support from you, like creatures from the deity of the clouds and like birds from a large tree with delicious fruits. Men seek his protection who is dignified, courageous, capable of punishing, compassionate, with senses under control, affectionate towards all, equitable and just.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'O Pitamaha, among Brahmanas some engage in duties proper to their varna, while others engage in other work. Tell me the difference between these two classes!'

Bhishma says, 'Rajan, the Brahmanas who are learned and magnanimous, and who look impartially upon all creatures, are equal to Brahma. They who know the Riks, the Yajuses and the Samans and who devote themselves to the practices of their order are equal to the very Devas. However, those among them who are not well-born, not devoted to the duties of their varna and take to evil practices, are like Sudras.

A virtuous king should realize tribute from, and press into public service without remuneration, Brahmanas who do not possess Vedic knowledge or their own fires for worship. Those who are employed in courts of justice for summoning people, who perform worship for others for a fee, who perform the yagnas of Vaisyas and Sudras, who officiate in yagnas on behalf of a whole village and who make voyages on the ocean—these five are regarded as Chandalas among Brahmanas.

Among the Brahmanas, those who become Ritwikas, Purohitas, counsellors, envoys and messengers, become equal to Kshatriyas. Those among them who ride horses, elephants, chariots or become foot-soldiers, become equal to Vaisyas.

If the king's treasury is not full, he can realize tribute from these, but should exclude the Brahmanas who, because of their conduct, are equal to the Devas or Brahma. The Vedas say that the king is the lord of the wealth belonging to all the varnas, except Brahmanas. He can take the wealth of those Brahmanas who stray from their svadharma. But the king should never be indifferent towards those Brahmanas who do not observe their duties. For the sake of making his people virtuous, he should punish and separate them from their superiors.

The learned regard the king in whose territories a Brahmana becomes a thief, as responsible for the sin, O Rajan. Men who know the Vedas declare that if a Brahmana well versed in the Vedas, who observes vows but, through want of sustenance, becomes a thief, it is the duty of the king to provide for his support. If even after he has obtained provision for his support, the Brahmana does not abstain from theft, O Parantapa, he should be banished from the kingdom with all his kinsmen.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, O Bharatarishabha, of whose wealth is the king regarded to be the lord, and what conduct should he adopt?'

Bhishma says, 'The Vedas declare that the king is lord of the wealth that belongs to all men, except Brahmanas, and also of those Brahmanas who do not follow their dharma. The king should not spare such Brahmanas, and the sages say that this is the ancient custom of kings.

One regards the king in whose dominion a Brahmana becomes a thief, to be responsible for that misdeed, O Rajan, and to have become sinful and worthy of reproach on that account. Therefore, all kings who follow dharma provide Brahmanas with the means of sustenance.

There is an old story of what a king said to a Rakshasa when the latter was about to abduct him. Once a Rakshasa forcibly seized the king of the Kaikeyas who observed strict vratas and had mastered the Vedas while living in the forest.

The king said, "There is no thief in my territories, nor any evil person, nor any one who drinks alcohol. There is no one in my dominions who has not his sacred fire or who does not perform yagnas. How then have you been able to possess my heart?

There is no Brahmana in my realm who is not learned or who does not observe vows or who has not drunk soma. How then have you been able to possess my mind?

In my dominions, no one performs a sacrifice without completing it with dakshina, or studies the Vedas and does not observe vows. How then have you been able to possess my soul?

The Brahmanas in my kingdom teach, study, sacrifice, officiate at others' sacrifices, give and receive gifts. All of them observe these six sacred karmas and all are devoted to the performance of their swadharma. Venerated and provided for, they are mild and truthful in speech. How then have you been able to possess my atma?

The Kshatriyas in my kingdom are all devoted to their swadharma. They never beg but give, and are truthful and virtuous. They never teach but study, and perform sacrifices but never officiate at the yagnas of others. They protect the Brahmanas and never flee from battle. How then have you been able to possess my atma?

All the Vaisyas in my dominion follow their svadharma. With simplicity and without deceit, they derive their sustenance from farming, cattle-rearing and trade. They are all careful, observe all religious rites, keep admirable vratas and are truthful in speech. They give to atithis their due and are self-restrained, pure and close to their relatives and kinsmen. How then have you been able to possess my heart?

The Sudras in my kingdom observe their svadharma, humbly and duly serve and wait upon the other three varnas without entertaining any malice towards them. How then have you been able to possess my heart?

I support the helpless and the old, the weak, the ill and women without guardians, by supplying them with all the necessities of life. I have never destroyed any customs of families or of countries existing from ancient days. How then have you been able to possess my heart?

I protect and worship the Mahatapasvins in my kingdom and honour and entertain them with food. I never eat without feeding others from my table. I never go to other men's wives and never sport or recreate alone. How then have you been able to possess my heart?

No one in my kingdom who is not a Brahmacharin begs his food, and no one who leads the Bhikshu varnasrama wishes to be a Brahmacharin. No one who is not a Ritwij pours offerings of clarified butter upon the sacrificial fire. How then have you been able to possess my soul?

I never disregard the learned, the old or those who are engaged in tapasya. When the whole world sleeps, I keep awake and vigilant. How then have you been able to possess my heart?

My priest possesses knowledge of the Self. He is given to tapasya and is a man of dharma. Highly intelligent, he has absolute power over my kingdom. By gifts I aspire to acquire knowledge, and by truth and the protection of Brahmanas I aspire to attain regions of blessedness in Swarga. By service, I attach myself to my acharyas. I have no fear of Rakshasas.

In my kingdom there are no widows, no evil Brahmanas, no Brahmana who has deviated from his dharma, no deceitful men, no thief, no Brahmana who officiates in the yagnas of people for whom he should never officiate and no perpetrator of sinful deeds. I have no fear of Rakshasas. There is no space in my body, of even two fingers' breadth, that does not bear the scar of a weapon-wound. I always fight for the cause of dharma. How have you been able to possess my heart?

The people of my kingdom ever invoke blessings upon me, that I may be always able to protect cattle and Brahmanas and perform sacrifices. How then have you been able to possess me?"

The Rakshasa answered, "Since you observe your dharma under all circumstances, O king of the Kaikeyas, go back to your home. I set you free. Blessed are they who protect cattle, Brahmanas and all their subjects, for they have nothing to fear from Rakshasas and even less from sinful men. Those kings who support the Brahmanas, whose might depends upon that of the Brahmanas and whose subjects discharge the duties of hospitality, will always succeed in acquiring Swarga."

You should, therefore protect the Brahmanas. They will protect you in return. Their blessings will surely descend upon kings of dharma.

For the sake of dharma, Brahmanas who do not observe their swadharma should be punished and segregated into a distinct class from their superiors. A king who conducts himself in this way towards the people of his kingdom obtains prosperity here and lives in Swarga with Indra.'"

CANTO 78

"Yudhishtira asks, 'The shastras say that, in times of adversity, a Brahmana can support himself by doing the work of a Kshatriya. Can he, however, at any time support himself by doing the work of Vaisyas?'

Bhishma replies, 'When a Brahmana loses his means of support and falls into distress, he can certainly do the work of a Vaisya and derive his support from farming and keeping cattle, but only if he is not competent to perform Kshatriya dharma.'

Yudhishtira then inquires, 'If a Brahmana does the work of a Vaisya, O Bharatarishabha, what trade can he engage in without losing his prospect of Swarga?'

Bhishma responds, 'A Brahmana in all circumstances should avoid trading in wine, salt, sesamum seeds, animals with manes, bulls, honey, meat and cooked food, Yudhishtira, for by selling these he will go to Naraka.

A Brahmana, by selling a goat, incurs the sin of selling Agni Deva; by selling sheep, the sin of selling Indra, the god of rain; by selling a horse, the sin of selling Surya Deva; by selling cooked food, the sin of selling land; and by selling a cow, the sin of selling sacrifice and the soma rasa. Therefore a Brahmana should not sell these things. Good men do not approve the purchase of uncooked food by giving cooked food in exchange. Uncooked food, however, can be exchanged for cooked food, O Bhaarata.

“We will eat your cooked food if in exchange you cook these raw things that we give you,” is an acceptable arrangement bearing no sin.

Listen, Yudhishtira, I will tell you the age-old practice of men following approved customs. “I will give you this, and you will give me this in return.” Such barter is permissible. To take things by force, however, is sinful. This is the convention the Rishis and others followed and, without doubt, this is righteous.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘When all the varnas disregard their svadharma and take up arms against the king, of course the power of the king will decrease. How then can he become the protector and refuge of the people? Clear my doubt, Pitamaha, by explaining this to me in detail.’

Bhishma says, ‘All the varnas that the Brahmanas head should, on such occasions, seek their own good by gifts, tapasya, yagnas, peacefulness and self-restraint. Those who have Vedic strength should rise up on every side and like the Devas strengthening Indra, contribute by Vedic rites to enhance the strength of the king.

One says that the Brahmanas are the refuge of the king when his power wanes. A wise king seeks the enhancement of his power through that of the Brahmanas. When the king, crowned with victory, seeks the re-establishment of peace, all the varnas then take themselves to their swadharma. When bandits and thieves, breaking all restraints, spread devastation, all the varnas should take up arms. They incur no sin by doing so, O Yudhishtira!’

Yudhishtira says, ‘If all the Kshatriyas become hostile towards the Brahmanas, who then will protect the Brahmanas and their Vedas? What then should be the duty of the Brahmanas, and who will be their refuge?’

Bhishma says, ‘By penances, Brahmacharya, weapons and physical might, applied with or without the aid of deceit, they should subjugate the Kshatriyas. If the Kshatriya himself commits sins especially towards Brahmanas, the Vedas themselves will subdue them.

The Kshatriyas have sprung from the Brahmanas, fire from water, and iron from stone. The energy of fire, the Kshatriya and iron, are irresistible. But when these come into contact with the sources of their origin, their force becomes neutralized. When iron strikes stone, or fire battles with water, or the Kshatriya becomes hostile to the Brahmana, the strength of each of these three is destroyed. Thus, Yudhishtira, the strength and might of Kshatriyas, however great and irresistible, become quelled as soon as they are directed against the Brahmanas.

When the energy of the Brahmanas turns mild, when Kshatriya energy turns feeble, when men misbehave towards the Brahmanas, those who engage in battle then without fear of death, in order to protect the Brahmanas, dharma and their own selves—these men, moved by righteous indignation and possessed of great strength of mind, will win high regions of bliss hereafter.

Everybody should take up arms for the sake of Brahmanas, because those brave men who fight for them attain a felicitous region in Swarga reserved for men who have always studied the Vedas attentively, who have performed the severest tapasya and who have, after fasting, cast their bodies into blazing fires.

The Brahmana, by taking up arms for the three varnas, does not incur sin, for people say there is no higher duty than casting away life under such circumstances. I bow to them, and blessed be they who so lay down their lives in seeking to destroy the enemies of Brahmanas. Let us attain the realm intended for them. Manu himself has said that these heroes go to Brahmaloka. Just as men become cleansed of all their sins by undergoing the final bath in an Aswamedha yagna, men who die at the edge of weapons while fighting evil are cleansed of their sins.

Dharma becomes adharma, and adharma becomes dharma, according to circumstances. Such is the power of place and time in determining the character of human actions. Friends of humanity, even if they have been cruel, have attained Swarga. Kshatriyas of dharma have attained blessed ends, even by sinning. By taking up arms on three occasions—to protect himself, to compel the other varnas to do their dharma and to punish brigands—the Brahmana does not incur sin.'

Yudhishtira asks, 'When robbers raise their heads and Kshatriyas become incompetent, and an inter-mixture of varnas begins as a result of chaos, what happens if some powerful man other than a Kshatriya tries to subdue these outlaws for the sake of protecting the people? Indeed, if this powerful man happens to be a Brahmana, a Vaisya or a Sudra, O best of kings, and if he is successful in protecting the people through dharma by applying the Dandaneeti, is he justified, or do the laws restrain him? It seems that others should take up weapons, when the Kshatriyas prove unworthy.'

Bhishma says, ‘Be he a Sudra or a member of any other varna, he who becomes a raft on a raftless current, or a means of crossing where there are none, certainly deserves respect in every way. He by whose aid helpless men whom brigands have oppressed and made wretched come to live happily, O Rajan, deserves to be lovingly revered by all as if he were a near kinsman.

O Kurusthama, he who dispels the fears of others always deserves respect. Of what use are bulls that do not bear burdens, cows that do not yield milk or a wife who is barren? Similarly, what need is there of a king who is not able to provide protection? Are not a Brahmana void of Vedic lore and a Kshatriya incapable of granting protection like an elephant made of wood, a deer made of leather, a man without wealth, a eunuch or a sterile field? Both of them are like a cloud that does not yield rain.

He who always protects the good and restrains the evil deserves to become a king and to rule the world.’”

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me O Pitamaha, what should be the work and behaviour of men employed as priests in our yagnas, and what sort of men should they be?'

Bhishma says, 'The shastras decree that those Brahmanas who are eligible to act as priests should know the Chhandas, including the Samans, and all the rites prescribed in the Srutis, and be able to perform all religious karma and kriya that lead to the prosperity of the king.

They should be devoted and loyal, and should shower eulogies on their kings. They should also be friendly towards one another and treat everybody equally. They should be devoid of cruelty and truthful in speech. They should never be money-lenders and always be simple and sincere.

One who has a peaceful temperament, is without vanity, modest, charitable, self-restrained, contented, intelligent, knowledgeable, truthful, observant of vows, harmless to all creatures, without lust and malice, endowed with the three excellent qualities and devoid of envy, deserves the seat of Brahma himself. Men with such qualities make the best priests and deserve all respect.'

Yudhishtira says, 'There are Vedic texts about giving Dakshina at sacrifices, but there is no law which lays down how much should be given on such occasions. This law about Dakshina has not proceeded from motives connected with the distribution of wealth. The command of the law, because of the provision in cases of incapacity, is terrible and is blind to the ability of the sacrificer. The prescription of the Vedas is that one should perform a sacrifice with devotion. But what can devotion do when the sacrificer is deceitful?'

Bhishma says, 'No one acquires punya by disregarding the Vedas, by deceit or falsehood. Do not ever think so. Dakshina is one of the limbs of sacrifice and contributes to the nourishment of the Vedas. A yagna without Dakshina can never lead to moksha. However, the worth of a single Purnapatra—two hundred and fifty-six handfuls of rice, is equal to that of any Dakshina, however lavish. Therefore, everyone belonging to the three varnas should perform yagnas.

The Vedas say that, to the Brahmanas, soma is like the king himself. One can sell it for performing sacrifices, but never for gaining a livelihood. Maharishis who agree on the dictates of dharma have declared that a yagna performed with the proceeds of the sale of soma serves to extend sacrifices. However, these three—man, sacrifice and soma—must be of good character. A man of bad character is neither for this nor for the other world. We have heard that the sacrifice great Brahmanas perform by wealth earned by excessive physical labour does not produce great punya.

The Vedas declare that tapasyas are higher than yagnas. Pay attention to me, O learned prince, while I tell you about tapasyas. The wise regard as penances not the emaciation of the body, but refraining from causing injury, truthfulness in speech, benevolence and compassion. Disregard of the Vedas, disobedience of the dictates of the shastras and violation of all wholesome restraints lead to self-destruction.

Listen, O son of Pritha, to what those who pour ten libations upon the fire ten times a day have laid down. For those who perform the sacrifice of tapasya, the Yoga they endeavour to effect with Brahma is their ladle; the heart is their clarified butter; and great knowledge constitutes their Pavitra. For them all kinds of crookedness mean death, and all kinds of sincerity are Brahma. This is the subject of knowledge which the rhapsodies of system-builders cannot affect.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'No man can accomplish even the most trifling work, O Pitamaha, without help. How then can a king manage, who has to rule a kingdom? What should be the conduct and the work of the king's minister? In whom should the king repose confidence, and in whom should he not?'

Bhishma says, 'Kings, O Rajan, have four kinds of friends: those who have the same objective, those who are devoted, those related by birth and those won over by gifts and kindness.

A Dharmatman who will serve only dharma is the fifth kind. With such a man, the king should never disclose his full intention, since it might not enlist his sympathy.

Kings who want success are obliged to adopt both kinds of paths—of dharma and of adharma. Of the four kinds of friends, the second and the third are best, but he should always regard the first and the fourth with suspicion. However, he should not trust any of the four with work that he is required to do himself.

The king should never be careless in the matter of watching his friends, as he could be overthrown. An evil man assumes the garb of honesty, and he who is good becomes dishonest. An enemy will become a friend and a friend an enemy, for a man cannot always be of the same mind. Who can trust him completely? A king should ensure that his chief works are carried out in his own presence. A complete reliance on his ministers will destroy both dharma and artha.

However, a want of trust in respect of everyone is worse than death. Trustfulness is premature death and dangerous. If one trusts another completely, it is said, one lives at the mercy of the trusted person. For this reason, everyone should be trusted and at the same time viewed with suspicion. This eternal rule of policy should always be kept in view.

One should always mistrust the man who is covetous of wealth, for the wise declare such a man to be one's enemy. A person whose joy knows no bounds upon seeing the elevation of the king, and who is made miserable by the king's downfall, is one of the best friends. You should trust completely one whose fall is linked to your own, as you would trust your own father. You should promote him to the best of your power when you are successful.

He who seeks to rescue you from harm in your religious rites will try to rescue you from harm in every other business. You should regard such a man as your best friend. They who wish you harm, on the other hand, are your enemies. One says that a friend filled with dread when calamity overtakes you and with joy when prosperity shines on you is like your own self. A handsome man, fair-complexioned, of excellent voice, liberal, benevolent and of good birth, cannot be such a friend.

An intelligent man with a good memory, who is clever in the transaction of business, who is by nature not cruel, never angry and never dissatisfied, whether given recognition or not, be he your priest, acharya or honoured friend, should always receive your regard, if he accepts the office of your counsellor and lives in your home. Such a man can be trusted with your most secret counsels and the true state of all your affairs, religious or pertaining to matters of business. You may confide in him as you would in your own father.

One task should be given to one man and not to two or three, because they may not tolerate each other and will generally disagree among themselves. Your leading minister should be one who achieves celebrity, observes all restraints, is never jealous of others, is able and competent, does no evil, never abandons dharma from lust, fear, greed or wrath, is clever in the transaction of business and possesses the gift of wise and weighty speech.

You should appoint as ministers to supervise all your affairs men of good birth and good conduct, liberal, not boastful, brave and respectable, learned and resourceful. They will work for your good and be of great help to you if you honour them and reward them with wealth. Appointed to offices connected with revenue and other important matters, they will always bring great prosperity. Motivated by healthy rivalry, they will discharge all duties connected with profit, consulting with one another when necessary.

You should fear your kinsmen as you would death itself. A kinsman can never bear another relative's prosperity, just as a feudal chieftain cannot bear to see the prosperity of his overlord. None but a kinsman can feel joy at the destruction of a relative blessed with sincerity, mildness, liberality, modesty and truthfulness of speech.

No one, on the other hand, can be more pitiable than those who have no kin, for they are unhappy and easily overcome by enemies. Kinsmen are the refuge of one assailed by other men, for relatives will not tolerate seeing outsiders destroy a kinsman. When even his friends trouble a kinsman, any relative of the persecuted person would regard it as a personal injury.

In having kinfolk, therefore, there are both merits and faults. A man without relatives neither bestows favours nor humbles himself to anyone. One should, for this reason, always honour and respect one's kinsmen in words and deeds and give them agreeable offices, never injuring them in any way. Remaining sceptical at heart, one should behave towards them as if one completely trusted them. If one reflects upon their nature, it would seem that they have neither faults nor merits. One who mindfully conducts himself in this way will find even his enemies disarmed of hostility and converted into friends. One who always behaves thus to kinsmen and relatives and treats his friends and enemies accordingly, will win everlasting fame.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'If one does not gain influence over one's kinsmen and relatives by this method, they become enemies. How then should one conduct oneself so that the hearts of both friends and foes can be won?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to an old discourse between Krishna and the Devarishi Narada.

Once, Krishna told Narada, "Neither an illiterate and foolish friend, nor a learned friend of fickle soul, deserves to know one's secret counsels. Because of your friendship with me, let me tell you something, O Muni who can visit Swarga at will!

One should speak to another only if one is convinced of his intelligence. I never flatter my kinsmen by complimenting them on their prosperity. I give them half of what I have and forgive their evil words. As a man who wants to light a fire grinds a fire-stick, my kinsmen grind my heart with their cruel words. Indeed, O Maharishi, these burn my heart every day.

Might resides in Sankarshana, mildness in Gada and, as for Pradyumna, he surpasses even me in personal beauty. Although I have all these on my side, yet I am helpless, O Narada! Many others among the Andhakas and the Vrishnis possess great prosperity, power, enduring courage and perseverance. He who does not side with them meets with death, while he whom they support achieves everything.

Dissuaded in turns by both Ahuka and Akrura, I do not support either of them. What can be more painful for one than to have both Ahuka and Akrura on his side or against him? I am like the mother of two brothers gambling against each other, invoking victory for both. Both afflict me, O Narada. Only you can tell me what is good for both my kinsmen and me."

Narada replied, "Calamities are of two kinds, O Krishna, external and internal. They arise, O Vrishni, from one's own actions or from the deeds of others. The calamity that has now overtaken you is an internal one and is born of your own actions. Baladeva and others of the Bhoja race are supporters of Akrura and have taken his side, either for the sake of wealth, or out of mere impulse, or moved by words, or by hate. As for you, you have given away to another the wealth that you have obtained. Though you have men who should be your friends, you have by your own actions brought calamity on your head. You cannot take back that wealth, just as one cannot swallow again the food one has vomited.

O Krishna, you cannot take back from Babhru and Ugrasena the kingdom you gave them, for fear of creating internal strife. Even if you succeed, it will be after much trouble and with great difficulty. A great slaughter and loss of wealth will ensue, perhaps even total annihilation. Use, then, a weapon that is not made of steel, that is very mild and yet capable of piercing all hearts. Sharpening and re-sharpening this weapon, correct the evil tongues of your kinsmen."

Krishna said, "What is this weapon, O Muni, which is not made of steel, which is mild, which still pierces all hearts and which I should use to correct the tongues of my kinsmen?"

Narada said, "Distributing food to the best of your power, forgiveness, sincerity, mildness and honour to whom honour is due—these constitute a weapon that is not made of steel. With soft words alone turn away the anger of kinsmen who say cruel things, and mollify their hearts, minds and slanderous tongues.

None other than a great man, accomplished, with a pure soul, who has friends, can bear such a heavy burden. Take up this great weight of governing the Vrishnis and bear it on your shoulders. All oxen can carry heavy loads on a level road, but only the strongest can sustain such burdens on a difficult road. From disunity will spring destruction and overtake all the Bhojas and the Vrishnis.

You, O Kesava, are the greatest among them. Work in such a manner that the Bhojas and the Vrishnis will not be destroyed. Naught but intelligence and forgiveness, restraint of the senses and liberality operate in a wise man. Advancing one's own race is always praiseworthy, glorious and conducive to a long life. Therefore, Krishna, act in such a way that your clan will not be destroyed.

There is nothing, Lord, that you do not know of policy and the art of war. The Yadavas, the Kukuras, the Bhojas, the Andhakas and the Vrishnis all depend on you, Mahabaho, as do the worlds and all the regents of the worlds. The Rishis always pray for your success, O Madhava. You are the lord of all creatures. You know the past, the present and the future. You are the greatest among all the Yadavas, and they rely on you to live in happiness."'"

"Bhishma says, 'I have told you what constitutes the first method. Listen now, Yudhishtira, to the second one. The king should always defend those who seek to advance his interests.

If someone who is paid or unpaid comes to tell you of the damage being done to your treasury by a minister who is embezzling its resources, you should grant him an audience in private and protect him from the accused minister, since officials guilty of misappropriation will seek to kill such informants. They who plunder the royal treasury combine together to oppose the man who seeks to protect it, and if you leave him defenceless he is sure to be finished.

Listen to an old story of what the sage Kalakavrikshiya once narrated to the king of Kosala. Once upon a time, the Rishi Kalakavrikshiya came to Kshemadarsin who had ascended the throne of the kingdom of Kosala. Wanting to examine the conduct of all the officers of Kshemadarsin, the Rishi, with a crow in a cage in his hand, repeatedly travelled through every part of the king's dominions, telling all men, "Study the corvine science. The crows tell me the present, the past and the future."

Proclaiming this in the kingdom, the sage, accompanied by a large number of men, began to observe the misdeeds of all the officers of the king. Having examined all the affairs of the kingdom and having learnt that all the officers of the king were guilty of wrongdoing, the Rishi of stern vows, with his crow, came to the king and said to him, "I know everything about your kingdom."

In the presence of the king, he said to his appointed minister that his crow had informed him that the minister had committed a crime in a particular place and that such and such men knew that he had plundered the royal treasury.

"My crow tells me this. Admit or prove the falsehood of the accusation quickly," he told the minister. The sage then proclaimed the names of other officers who had similarly been guilty of embezzlement, adding, "My crow never says anything that is false."

Thus accused and arraigned by the Muni, all the officers of the king, O Kurusthama, united and killed the crow while the sage slept at night. Seeing his crow pierced with a shaft within the cage, the Maharishi went to Kshemadarsin in the morning and said to him, "O king, I seek your protection. You are all-powerful and the master of the lives and wealth of all. With your permission, I will tell you what is good for you.

Grieved on your account, I have come to you, whom I regard as a friend, impelled by devotion and ready to serve you with my whole heart. You are being plundered of your wealth and I have come to you to disclose the truth without showing any consideration for the robbers. Like a rider who urges a good steed, I have come here to awaken you, whom I regard as a friend. A friend who is alive to his own interests and wants his own prosperity and growth, should forgive another who intrudes, urged by devotion and anger, for what is beneficial."

The king replied, "Why should I not listen to what you say, since I am not blind to what is for my good? I grant you permission, O Maharishi! Tell me what you please and I will certainly obey your instructions."

The Rishi said, "I have come to you compelled by my devotion, to tell you everything about your servants after ascertaining their merits and faults, and also the dangers you incur at their hands. Our ancient Rishis have described the plight of those who serve others. The condition of men who serve the king is painful and wretched, akin to associating with virulently poisonous snakes. Kings have many friends and also many enemies; so they who serve kings have to fear all of them, including the king himself, O Rajan.

A man serving the king cannot with impunity be guilty of negligence in doing the king's work, especially one who wants to win prosperity. His inattention can move the king to wrath and may bring down doom upon him.

One should learn to behave in the presence of the king as one would in the presence of a blazing fire. Prepared to lay down life itself at any moment, one should serve the king attentively, for he is all-powerful and master of the lives and the wealth of all, therefore like a venomous snake. One should always be afraid to speak evil before the king, to sit gloomily or in irreverent postures, to wait in attitudes of disrespect, to walk disdainfully or display insolent gestures and motions of the limbs. If the king becomes gratified, he can shower prosperity like God. If he becomes enraged, he can consume a man to the very roots, like a blazing fire.

Yama said this, O Rajan. Its truth is seen in the affairs of the world. By these precepts, I will now do that which will enhance your prosperity. Friends like us can give you the aid of their intelligence in times of peril. They have killed my crow for serving you. I cannot, however, blame you for this. Those who killed this bird do not love you.

Ascertain who your friends are and who your enemies. Do everything yourself without surrendering your intelligence to others. I have incurred the hostility of your servants, who are all embezzlers and do not desire the good of your subjects. Conspiring with those among them who have constant access to you, they covet your kingdom by planning your downfall. However, on account of unforeseen circumstances, their designs have not succeeded.

Through fear of these men, O Rajan, I will leave this kingdom for some other refuge. I have no worldly desire, yet these deceitful men have shot this shaft at my crow, despatching the bird to Yama's abode. I have seen this, O king, with eyes whose vision tapasya has rendered keen.

With the help of this single crow I have crossed your kingdom that is like a river abounding with alligators, sharks, crocodiles and whales. Indeed, with the help of the bird, I have passed through your dominions as if to a Himalayan valley, impenetrable and inaccessible because of fallen tree trunks, scattered rocks, thorny shrubs, lions, tigers and other beasts of prey.

The learned say that a region inaccessible on account of darkness can be passed through with the aid of a torch and a wide river can be crossed by a boat. No means, however, exist for penetrating or passing through the maze of kingly affairs.

Your kingdom is like an inaccessible forest enveloped in darkness. When you who are the lord cannot trust it, how then can I? Here you view good and evil in the same light, so staying here cannot be safe. Here a Dharmatman meets with death, while a sinner incurs no danger.

Justice requires that you slay a man of adharma but never a Dharmatman. It is not proper for me to stay long in this kingdom, and a sensible man should leave it quickly. There is a river called Sita, O Rajan, where boats sink. Your kingdom is like that, for a net of ruin seems to have been cast over it.

You are like the fall from the tree that awaits collectors of honey, or like delectable food containing poison. Your nature now resembles that of dishonest men, not the good. You are like a pit abounding with snakes of virulent venom, or a river full of sweet water but exceedingly difficult to access, because of its steep banks overgrown with kariras and thorny canes.

You are like a swan surrounded by dogs, vultures and jackals. Grassy parasites, deriving their sustenance from a mighty tree, swell into luxuriant growth and finally overspread it completely. A forest conflagration breaks out and, catching these grassy plants first, consumes the lordly tree along with them. Your ministers, O Rajan, resemble those parasites of which I speak. Check and correct them.

You have nourished them, but conspiring against you, they are destroying your prosperity. Concealing from you the faults of your servants, I live in your palace in constant dread, like a man inhabiting a room with a snake, or like the lover of a hero's wife.

My object is to ascertain the conduct of the king who is my fellow-lodger. I want to know whether he has his passions under control, whether his servants are obedient to him, whether they love their king and whether he loves his subjects. It is to ascertain all this that I have come to you.

As food to a hungry person, you have become dear to me. However, I dislike your ministers as one whose thirst, once slaked, feels averse to drink. They find fault with me because I seek your good—there is no other cause for their hostility towards me. I do not have any hostile intentions towards them. I am engaged only in pointing out their faults. As one fears a wounded snake, one should fear an evil-hearted enemy."

The king said, "Dwell in my palace, O Brahmana! I will always treat you with respect and honour and venerate you. They who dislike you will not live with me. You may do whatever is necessary to those of whom you have spoken. Ensure that the Dandaneeti is wielded appropriately and that everything is orderly in my kingdom. Please reflect upon all this and guide me so that I obtain prosperity."

The sage said, "Shut your eyes to their first offence—the slaughter of my crow, and gradually weaken them one by one. Prove their faults and then strike them, one after another. When many men are guilty of the same offence, they can, by acting together, soften the very sharpness of thorns.

In the case of those of your ministers whom you suspect work against you and disclose your secret counsels, I advise you to proceed with caution. As for us, we are Brahmanas, naturally compassionate and unwilling to cause pain to anyone. We desire your good and also the good of others, just as we wish our own.

I speak of myself, O Rajan! I am your friend. I am known as the Rishi Kalakavrikshiya and I always adhere to truth. Your father regarded me affectionately as his friend. When this kingdom was in distress during your father's reign, I performed many tapasyas to drive it away, abandoning every other karma. I tell you this from my affection for you, so that you may not repeat the fault of reposing confidence in undeserving men. You have gained a kingdom without trouble, so reflect upon everything connected with its welfare. You have ministers in your kingdom but why, O Rajan, should you be guilty of negligence?"

After this, the king of Kosala chose a minister from the Kshatriya varna and appointed him as his minister and the sage Kalakavrikshiya, bull among Brahmanas, as his Purohita. Following these changes, Kshemadarsin, the king of Kosala, subjugated the whole earth and acquired great fame. The Rishi Kalakavrikshiya worshipped the Devas with many grand yagnas performed for the king. Having benefited from the Rishi's counsels and conquered the earth, the king of Kosala ruled his kingdom exactly as the Rishi directed.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'What should be the characteristics, O Pitamaha, of the legislators, the ministers of war, the courtiers, the warlords and the counsellors of a king?'

Bhishma says, 'You should have as your legislators men of modesty, self-restraint, truthfulness and sincerity, who have the courage to say what is proper. O son of Kunti, for ministers of war at times of distress, look for those who like you and will be always by your side, who are courageous, by nature Munis, and are learned and persevering.

You should have as courtiers those who are of noble birth and who, treated with honour, always put forth their utmost powers for you, O Bhaarata, and who will never abandon you in good or bad times, sickness or death. You should employ as officers of your army, noble men born in your kingdom, who are wise, handsome, learned, dignified and loyal to you. Men of low descent and covetous dispositions, who are cruel and shameless, will court you only as long as they stand to gain from you.

The king should appoint as ministers in all his affairs those who are of good birth and conduct, who are shrewd and pragmatic, not cruel, and who always seek the good of their master. Those whom you have won over with gifts of wealth, honours, public regard, and whom you can regard as men from whom you will benefit in all your affairs, should always be given a share of your happiness.

Those who are steadfast, learned, well-behaved, large-hearted and truthful in speech, and those who observe solemn pledges, will always be attentive to your affairs and will never abandon you. On the other hand, you should always restrain those who are disreputable, profligate, immoral and inclined to evil.

When you have to choose between two parties, you should not side with one man and abandon the majority. However, when one man's accomplishments transcend all the others', you should abandon the many for him. Ability, self-discipline and devotion to work that brings fame should be regarded as marks of superiority.

You should employ as your counsellors those who honour all able men, who are never jealous of persons of merit, who do not abandon dharma from the urges of kama, bhaya, krodha or lobha, who are humble, truthful in speech and forgiving in temper, who have their soul under control, who have dignity and whom you have tried in every situation.

High descent, purity of blood, forgiveness, sagacity and purity of soul, bravery, gratefulness and truth, O son of Pritha, are marks of superiority and goodness. A wise man who conducts himself thus will disarm his enemies and convert them into friends.

A king who has his atman under restraint, who is wise and who wants prosperity, should carefully examine the merits and flaws of his ministers. A king who wants prosperity and to shine among his contemporaries, should have for ministers men connected with his trusted friends who are noble, born in his own kingdom, incorruptible, untarnished by adultery and similar vices, well-tested, who belong to good families, are descendants of former ministers and are learned and humble.

The king should employ five men to look after his affairs who are intelligent, not proud, who have a pleasant disposition, who are energetic, patient, forgiving, pure, loyal, firm, courageous, mature, responsible, free from deceit, capable of hard work, and whose merits and faults have been well tried. The king should employ in all affairs of the kingdom men who are wise in speech, heroic, resourceful, of noble origin, truthful, intelligent, free from cruelty, pragmatic and who desire the good of their sovereign.

One who is lethargic and abandoned by friends can never work with perseverance. Such a man, if employed, fails in almost every business. A minister who possesses little learning, even if noble and attentive to dharma, artha and kama, becomes incompetent to choose a proper course of action. Similarly, a man of low descent, even if learned, will always err in all actions requiring dexterity and foresight, like a blind man without a guide. A man who is indecisive, even if intelligent and learned, and even if he has the means, cannot be successful for long. An evil-hearted man who is not learned will set his hand to work but will fail to foresee the results of his work.

A king, should never repose trust in a minister who is not devoted to him and should, therefore, never disclose his counsels to such. An evil minister, combining with the other ministers of the king, can ruin his master, like a fire helped by the wind consuming a tree by entering its entrails through holes in its trunk. Giving way to rage, a master can one day pull down a servant from his office or reprove him in harsh words, and restore him to power again. None but a servant devoted to the master will endure and forgive such treatment.

Ministers can sometimes become highly offended with their royal masters. The king should consult in all his affairs only one who can control his resentment from a desire of doing good to his master and sharing with the king his good and ill fortune.

The king should never consult one who is crooked, even if he is devoted to his master, is clever and possesses numerous virtues. He who is allied with foes, and who does not regard the interests of the king's subjects, should be considered an enemy. The king should not consult him, or anyone who is not learned, who is not pure, who is arrogant, who courts the king's enemies, or is boastful, hostile, wrathful and covetous.

The king should not consult one who is a stranger, even if he is devoted to him and greatly learned in his affairs, although he may honour him and employ him. Nor should he ever consult a man whose father had been unjustly banished by royal edict, even if the king may have subsequently bestowed honours upon him and employed him. The king should not consult a well-wisher whose property he had once confiscated for a slight transgression, even if he has every accomplishment.

He who is a wise man, intelligent and learned, who is born within the kingdom, who is pure and righteous in all his actions, deserves to be consulted by the king. One who is knowledgeable and judicious, who understands the dispositions of his friends and enemies, who is like a second self to the king, deserves to be consulted. One who is truthful in speech, modest and mild, who is contented and honoured, truthful and dignified, who hates evil and bad men, who knows policy and is pragmatic and courageous, and who is a hereditary servant of the king, deserves to be consulted.

The king who wants to rule according to the dictates of Dandaneeti, O Rajan, should consult those who are competent to win over all men by conciliation, in whom the inhabitants of both the capital and the provinces repose confidence for their dharma, who are competent to fight and who know the rules of policy.

Thus, the king should honour and appoint as his ministers men who have such qualities, who discern the dispositions of all and want to achieve great deeds. Their number also should not be less than three. The king should employ ministers to observe the lapses of their masters, of themselves, of subjects and of the foes of their lord.

The kingdom has its root in the counsels of policy that flow from ministers, and its growth proceeds from the same source. Ministers should work in such a way that the enemies of their monarch will not detect his lapses. On the other hand, when their shortcomings become visible, they should be prosecuted. Like the tortoise protecting its limbs by withdrawing them into its shell, ministers should keep their own counsels and conceal their lapses. Those ministers of a kingdom who can conceal their counsels are wise.

Counsels constitute the armour of a king and the limbs of his subjects and officers. A kingdom has its roots in spies and secret agents and its strength in counsels of policy. If master and ministers depend on one another for support, subduing pride, anger, vanity and envy, they will all become happy.

A king should also consult ministers who are free from the five kinds of deceit. He should ascertain first the different opinions of the three among them whom he has consulted, and for all subsequent deliberations consult his priest, informing him of their opinions and his own. His guru should be a Brahmana well versed in all matters of dharma, artha and kama, and the king should, with collected mind, ask his opinion. When he arrives at a decision after deliberation with his priest, the king should then carry it out impartially.

They who know the conclusions of the science of consultation say that kings should always hold consultation in this manner. Having settled counsels in this way, they should then be reduced to practice, for then they will be able to win over all the subjects.

There should be no dwarfs, hump-backed men, no one of an emaciated constitution, no lame or blind men, no idiots, no women or eunuchs in the place where the king holds his consultations. Nothing should move there: before or behind, above or below, or in transverse directions. Getting up on a boat, or going to an open and bare space without grass or undergrowth, from where he can clearly see the surrounding land, the king should hold his consultations at the proper time, avoiding faults of speech and gesture.'"

"Bhishma says, 'An ancient tale has been told, O Yudhishtira, about a conversation between Brihaspati and Indra.

Indra asked Brihaspati, "O Maharishi, what single act should a man accomplish to become famous and an object of regard for everyone?"

Brihaspati replied, "Only by agreeable and pleasant speech, O Indra, can a man become an object of regard for all, acquire great celebrity and give happiness to all. With this sole skill, one can always obtain everybody's love. Everyone dislikes the man who does not speak a word, whose face is always furrowed with frowns and who cannot make agreeable conversation. He who, upon meeting others, addresses them first and does so with a smile, will please everyone.

Even gifts, if not made with pleasant words, are like rice without curry and do not delight the recipients, O Sakra, whereas if someone even takes away the possessions of men with sweet words, they become reconciled to the robbery. A king, therefore, even when he wants to punish, should use kind words. Sweetness of speech never fails in its purpose and never pains any heart. A man of good deeds and agreeable and pleasing words has no equal."

Thereafter, Indra began to follow the advice of his guru. O son of Kunti, you too should practise this virtue.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'O greatest of kings, by what method can a ruler obtain great blessings and eternal fame?'

Bhishma says, 'A king of cleansed soul, who attends to the duty of protecting his subjects, by conducting himself as a man of dharma will earn merit and fame, both here and hereafter.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O wise one, tell me how a king should behave and with whom, for I believe that the desirable virtues which you have already described in a man, cannot be found to exist in any single individual.'

Bhishma says, 'You are very intelligent, O Yudhishtira; it is just as you say. A man who has all these good qualities is very rare. To be brief, such good conduct in one possessing all the virtues mentioned, is most difficult to find even after diligent searching. I will however, tell you what kind of ministers you should appoint.

Four Brahmanas, learned in the Vedas, dignified, belonging to the Snataka order, of untainted behaviour; eight physically strong Kshatriyas, capable of wielding weapons; twenty-one wealthy Vaisyas and three humble Sudras of pure conduct, devoted to their daily duties, and one of the Suta caste, with knowledge of the Puranas and the eight cardinal virtues, should be your ministers.

Each one of them should be fifty years of age, possess a sense of dignity, be free from envy, familiar with the Srutis and the Smritis, humble, impartial, competent to make ready decisions in the midst of disputes, suggesting different courses of action, free from covetousness and from the seven dreadful vices called Vyasanas. The king should consult with those eight ministers and lead them. He should then publish, for the information of the subjects in his kingdom, the results of such deliberation.

You should always watch over your subjects and never confiscate what they deposit with you, or appropriate disputed things. Such conduct will tarnish the administration of justice, and you and your state will incur sin, instilling fear in your subjects akin to what little birds feel at the sight of a hawk. Your kingdom will then sink like a boat wrecked at sea. If a king governs his subjects without dharma, fear will take possession of his heart and the door of Swarga will be closed to him.

A kingdom, O Bharatarishabha, has its root in dharma. The minister or the king's son occupying the seat of justice who works without dharma, and those officers who, having accepted charge, act unjustly, moved by self-interest, all go to hell, along with the king himself. Those helpless men whom the powerful oppress and who lament piteously and copiously, look to the king for protection. In cases of dispute between two parties, the decision should be based upon the evidence of witnesses. If one of the disputants has no witnesses and is helpless, the king should give the case his best consideration.

The king should punish offenders according to the measure of their offences. The wealthy should be punished with fines and confiscations; the poor, with loss of liberty. He should mete out corporal punishments to those who are evil. He should cherish all good men with praise and gifts of wealth.

He who plans the death of the king should be punished with death, to be effected by varied methods. The same should be the punishment of one who becomes guilty of arson, or theft, or co-habitation with women which may lead to a confusion of varnas. A king who inflicts punishments appropriately according to the dictates of Dandaneeti, incurs no sin by the deed, but earns eternal merit. The foolish king who inflicts punishments capriciously earns infamy in this world and sinks into hell hereafter.

A king should not punish a man for the fault of another. A man should be convicted or acquitted, purely based upon the criminal law. A king should never slay an envoy under any circumstances, else he will go to hell with all his ministers. The king who espouses the Kshatriya code, if he kills an envoy who is only faithfully delivering the message entrusted to him, stains the reputation of his ancestors with a sin equal to the sin of killing a foetus.

An envoy should possess these seven accomplishments: he should be of a noble family, eloquent and of sweet speech, faithful in delivering the message with which he is charged, clever and possessing a good memory. The king's bodyguard and the governor of his capital or citadel should have similar qualities.

The king's minister should know the conclusions of the shastras and be competent in directing wars and making treaties. He should also be intelligent, possess courage, be modest and capable of keeping secrets. He should also be of high birth, with a strong mind and pure in conduct. If he possesses these qualities, he should be regarded as worthy.

The commander of the king's forces, his Senapati, should possesses similar accomplishments. He should also be an expert in different kinds of battle array and in the uses of war engines and weapons. He should be able to bear exposure to rain, cold, heat and wind and remain watchful of the movements of his enemies.

The king, O Rajan, should be able to lull his foes into a false sense of security. He should not however, himself trust anyone, including his own son. I have now, O sinless one, explained to you what the conclusions of the shastras are. The refusal to trust anyone is said to be one of the highest mysteries of the ways of a king.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, in what kind of city should the king himself dwell? Should he select an already made one or should he get one constructed?'

Bhishma replies, 'It is proper, O Bhaarata, to enquire about the conduct one should follow and the defences that one should adopt for the city in which a king lives. I will talk to you about it, referring especially to the defences of forts, so that you will know and do what is necessary.

Keeping his eye on the six different kinds of citadels, the king should build his cities abounding in every kind of necessity and comfort. The six kinds are: water-citadels, surrounded on all sides by a river, earth-citadels, built on plains fortified with high walls and encircled with trenches; hill-citadels, human-citadels, unfortified cities properly protected by guards and a loyal population, mud-citadels and forest-citadels.

Along with ministers and an army completely loyal to him, the king should have a citadel with impenetrable walls and a trench. It should be well provisioned with an abundant stock of rice and weapons, teem with elephants, horses and chariots and be inhabited by skilled men also versed in the mechanical arts.

The city should have a population that is virtuous and clever in business and consists of strong and energetic men and animals. Blazing with beauty and resounding with music and song, it should contain many open squares and rows of well-stocked shops.

The houses where many brave and wealthy men live are all spacious and echo with the chant of Vedic hymns; there are frequent festivities and celebrations and the inhabitants always worship the gods. Here all men follow dharma, peace prevails and no danger exists. Dwelling here, the king should employ himself in filling his treasury, increasing his forces, enhancing the number of his friends and establishing courts of justice.

He should check all abuses and evils in his cities and his provinces and employ himself in filling his arsenals with care, in collecting provisions of every kind and increasing his store of rice and other grain, and in strengthening his councils with wise men. He should further enhance his supplies of fuel, iron, chaff, charcoal, timber, horns, bones, bamboo, marrow, oils and ghee, fat, honey, medicines, flax, resinous exudations, weapons, shafts, leather catgut for bow-strings, canes, strings and cords made of munja grass and other plants and creepers.

He should also increase the number of tanks and wells with large quantities of water, and protect all shady fruit trees. He should entertain with honour and attention acharyas of different sciences, Ritwijas, other priests, mighty bowmen, architects, astronomers, astrologers, physicians, all wise and intelligent men who are self-restrained, clever, courageous, learned, noble, energetic of mind and capable of close application to all kinds of work. He should honour men of dharma and punish the unrighteous.

Working with determination, the king should set the several varnas to their respective duties. Ascertaining diligently through spies the outward behaviour and the state of mind of the inhabitants of his city and provinces, he should take necessary action based on what he learns.

The king should himself supervise his spies and advisors, his treasury and the agencies for inflicting punishments, for everything depends upon these. With spies acting as his eyes, the king should watch all that his enemies do and intend, as well as his friends and neutrals. He should then carefully plan his own course of action, honouring those who are loyal to him and punishing those who are hostile.

The king should worship the Devas in yagnas and distribute gifts without hurting anybody. He should protect his subjects, never doing anything to obstruct or thwart dharma, always supporting and protecting the helpless, the masterless, the old and widows.

The king should honour Rishis and give them gifts of clothes, vessels and food at appropriate times. The king should take care to inform the Munis who live within his dominions of his own condition, of all his actions and of the state of the kingdom, and should always behave with humility in their presence. When he sees noble Rishis or Munis of high birth and great learning who have abandoned all earthly goods, he should honour them with gifts of food, beds and seats.

Whatever the nature of the distress into which he may fall, he should confide in a Rishi, for even robbers trust such men of character. The king should place his wealth in charge of a Muni and should glean wisdom from him. He should not, however, always show favour to such men or pay homage to them on all occasions, as it might expose them to robbers.

From among those living in his own kingdom, he should select one sage as a friend. Similarly, he should choose another Muni who lives in the kingdom of his foe, as a friend. He should pick a third from among those dwelling in the vana and a fourth from the kingdoms paying tribute to him. He should show hospitality, bestow honours and give them the means for their sustenance.

He should behave towards the Rishis dwelling in the kingdoms of his enemies and in the forests, in the same way as towards those who live in his own kingdom. Engaged in tapasya and rigid vows, they will, if calamity befalls the king and he solicits their protection, grant him his wish.

I have now summarized for you the features of the city in which the king should dwell.'"

"Yudhishtira asks 'I want to know how a kingdom can be consolidated and protected. Tell me all about this, O Bharatarishabha!'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to me with concentrated attention while I tell you how this can be done. A headman should be selected for each village, and over ten headmen there should be one supervisor, and over two such supervisors there should be one officer who controls twenty villages. Above him should be appointed men to oversee a hundred villages, and above them officers who control a thousand villages.

The headman should ascertain the characteristics of everyone in the village and also all the faults that need correction. He should report everything to the supervisor above him in charge of ten villages, who again, should report the same to the officer above him, in charge of twenty villages. This officer, in his turn, should report the conduct of all men within his dominion to the one above him who is in charge of hundred villages.

The village headman should have control over all the produce and property of the village. Every headman should contribute his share for the use of the lord of ten villages, and the latter should do the same to support the lord of twenty villages. The lord of a hundred villages should receive every honour from the king and should have for his support a populous, wealthy and large village. Such a village, so assigned to a lord of hundred villages, should be within the control of the lord of a thousand villages.

The lord of thousand villages should have a minor town for himself and he should enjoy the grain, gold and other produce from it. He should perform all the duties that pertain to it, such as conduct of wars and other internal affairs.

A virtuous minister should exercise strict supervision over the administration and mutual relations of officers. Again, in every town, there should be an officer to attend to all matters in his jurisdiction. Like some fearsome planet moving above all the stars below, this officer should be placed with comprehensive powers over all the officers subordinate to him. He should ascertain the conduct of those under him through his spies and protect the people from all deceitful men, those of murderous disposition or evil deeds, robbers and those possessed by demons.

Taking note of sales and purchases, the state of the roads, stocks of food and clothing and the profits of traders, the king should levy taxes on them. He should first ascertain the extent of production, the receipts and expenses of those engaged in trade, and the condition of the arts, and only then levy taxes upon the various artisans.

The king can levy high taxes, O Yudhishtira, but never such that will emasculate his people. He should levy no tax on a product without ascertaining the output and the amount of labour that has gone into it, for nobody will produce anything without a sufficient margin of profit. The king should thoughtfully levy taxes so that both he and the man who produces the article taxed share the profit.

The king should not, on account of greed, destroy his own foundations along with those of others. He should always avoid deeds which will make his people detest him, and try instead to win their approval. Subjects hate a ruler who is rapacious in the matter of taxes and levies. How can a king who becomes an object of hatred have prosperity? Such a ruler can never acquire any wealth.

An intelligent king should treat his kingdom like a calf. If you permit the calf to suckle, it grows strong and can carry heavy loads. If, on the other hand, O Yudhishtira, you milk the cow too much, the calf grows up weak and incapable of doing much work for the owner. Similarly, if you drain the kingdom, the subjects fail to prosper. The king who protects his kingdom himself, is considerate to his subjects in the matter of taxes and duties, and collects only what he can easily obtain, will achieve great success.

This should not lead to the king obtaining so much wealth that the entire kingdom becomes his treasury and his treasury becomes his bedchamber. If the inhabitants of the cities and the provinces are poor, the king should show them compassion to the best of his powers, whether they are dependent upon him or not.

The king should punish all bandits who infest the outskirts of his villages, protect his people and make them happy. The subjects then become partners in the king's welfare and feel exceedingly obliged to him.

To accumulate wealth in the first instance, the king should visit the prosperous areas of his kingdom, one after the other, and endeavour to alarm the people. He should tell them, "Calamity threatens us and there is a great danger from our enemies. However, there is every reason to hope that the danger will pass, for the enemy, like a bamboo that has flowered, will very soon meet his end. Many enemies of mine have combined with a large number of brigands to destroy our kingdom. In view of this imminent danger, I need your wealth to devise your protection. When the danger passes, I will return what I now take.

Remember, our enemies will not give back what they will forcibly take from you if unopposed, but will kill all your relatives, even your wives. You desire wealth only for the sake of your children and wives. I am glad at your prosperity and I entreat you as I would my own children, allow me to take from you what is within your power to give. I do not wish to trouble any one, but in times of calamity and danger, wealth should not be so dear to you and you should, like strong bulls, bear such burdens."

A king who understands the circumstances that change with time, should send his agents to collect taxes from his people with agreeable, sweet and complimentary words. He should point out to the Vaisyas of his realm the need for him to repair his fortifications and to meet the expenses of his establishment and other heads, alarm them with an impending foreign invasion and impress them with the need for protection which will allow them to live in peace. If he disregards them, they will abandon his dominions, take to the forests and become lost to him. He should therefore behave with leniency towards the Vaisyas, conciliate and protect them, give them a sense of security and always do what is agreeable to them, to ensure that they enjoy their possessions.

The king, O Bhaarata, should always work in such a way towards the Vaisyas that their productive powers can grow. Since the Vaisyas increase the strength of a kingdom, improve its agriculture and develop its trade, a wise king should always gratify them. Acting with thoughtfulness and leniency, he should levy mild taxes upon them. It is always easy to behave with kindness towards the Vaisyas, as there is nothing more profitable for a kingdom.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, what the king should do if, despite his great wealth, he desires more.'

Bhishma replies, 'A king who wants to earn religious merit should devote himself, to the best of his abilities, to the good of his subjects and protect them, taking existing circumstances into account. He should adopt all such measures in his dominions that he estimates will secure their mutual good.

A king should exploit his kingdom like a bee gathering honey from plants, without injuring the source. He should be like a dairy farmer, who milks his cow without injuring her udders, or starving her calf. In the matter of taxes, the king should work like the leech drawing blood mildly. He should conduct himself towards his subjects like a tigress carrying her cubs, touching them with her teeth but never piercing them. He should be like a mouse, which, despite having sharp and pointed teeth, nibbles the feet of sleeping animals in such a manner that they remain unaware of it.

A flourishing subject should be shorn little by little, the demand increased gradually until what is taken assumes a fair proportion. The king should enhance the burden of his subjects by degrees, like a man gradually increasing the load on a young bullock. If in the end he gently and carefully puts the harness on them, they will accept it without complaint.

Indeed, adequate measures should be employed for making the people obedient, for mere entreaties will not reduce them to subjection. Since it is impossible to behave equally towards all men, the common people should be compelled to be obedient by appeasing their leaders. After using the leaders to bring about disunity among the people who bear the burden, the king should himself come forward to conciliate them. He will then be able to enjoy without trouble what he can extract from them.

The king should never enforce taxes unreasonably and on men unable to bear them. He should impose them progressively, at the proper time, formally and with conciliation. The methods that I tell you are legitimate means of Rajadharma, and are not considered deceitful.

He who wants to control horses by violent methods only makes them furious. Drinking shops, public women, pimps, actors, gamblers and keepers of gambling houses and others of this kind, who are sources of disorder to the state, should all be checked. Dwelling within the realm, they cause trouble and harm the better class of subjects.

Manu himself in the olden days has laid down the injunction that nothing should be asked of anyone when there is no distress. If all men were to abstain from work and take to demanding and begging, the world would certainly come to a stop.

The king alone is competent to control and regulate. Since the Srutis declare that the king who does not restrain his subjects earns a fourth part of the sins that they commit, due to the absence of royal protection, he should check his subjects who are sinful. The king who neglects to restrain them becomes sinful and earns a fourth part of their sins, just as he would otherwise have earned a fourth part of their merits. The evil that a man governed by passion will do will impoverish everyone. Such men, capable of anything, indulge in stimulants and meat, appropriate the wives and the wealth of other men, and set a bad example for others.

Those who do not live on alms may beg in times of distress. The king should observe true dharma and give gifts to them from compassion, but not from fear. Let there be neither beggars nor robbers in your kingdom. It is robbers, not virtuous men, who give alms to beggars, for such givers are not real benefactors of men.

Let the men who live in your dominions be such as advance the interests of others and bring them benefit, not such as exterminate them. The officers who take from subjects more than what is due, Rajan, should be punished and replaced by others who will collect only what is due.

Agriculture, rearing of cattle, trade and other work of similar nature should be popularized, based on the principle of the division of labour. If a man engaged in agriculture, cattle-rearing or trade feels a sense of insecurity on account of thieves and tyrannical officers, the king will be disgraced. He should always honour his subjects who are rich and say to them, “Advance the interest of the people with me.”

In every kingdom, the wealthy are assets to the realm and without doubt constitute its foremost estate. He who is wise or courageous, wealthy or influential, righteous, engaged in penances, truthful in speech or gifted with intelligence, assists in protecting his fellow men.

For these reasons, O Rajan, love everyone and display the qualities of truth, sincerity, absence of anger and abstention from doing injury. You should wield the Dandaneeti and swell your treasury, support your forces and friends and thus consolidate your kingdom!’”

"Bhishma says, 'Do not cut down the fruit trees in your dominions, Yudhishtira. Fruits and roots are the property of the Brahmanas. The sages have declared this to be a law of dharma. The surplus, after supporting the Brahmanas, should go to meet the needs of other people. Nobody should take anything by doing an injury to Brahmanas.

If a Brahmana wants to leave the kingdom because he has been unable to find any livelihood in it, the king should, with affection and respect, provide him the means of sustenance. If he still wants to leave, the king should call an assembly of Brahmanas and say, "If such a Brahmana leaves the kingdom, the people lose in him a friend, teacher and guru. In whom will my people then find an authority to guide them?" If even after this, he does not give up his intention to leave, the king should ask his forgiveness and say to him, "Forget the past."

This, O son of Kunti, is the eternal way of Rajadharma. The king should further tell him, "Indeed, O Brahmana, people say that only as much should be assigned to a Brahmana as will be just sufficient to maintain him. I do not accept this opinion, but think rather that a Brahmana should be given the means to procure even items of luxury, if he so wishes," and he should be requested to stay.

Agriculture, cattle-rearing and trade provide all men with the means of livelihood. Knowledge of the Vedas however, provides them with the means to reach heaven. Therefore, one regards those who obstruct the study of the Vedas and Vedic practices as enemies of society. It is for their extermination that Brahma created Kshatriyas. Subdue your foes, protect your subjects, worship the Devas in sacrifices and fight battles with courage, O Kurupravira!

A king should shield those who deserve protection, and he who does this is the best of rulers. The kings who do not exercise this duty live in vain.

For the benefit of his subjects, the king should always try to discover the behaviour and thoughts of all, through informers and secret agents. Look after your people, O Yudhishtira: protect others from your own, your own from others, others from others and your own from your own.

Wise men say that everything has its root in the self. The king should first protect himself and then the earth. The king should always reflect upon what his shortcomings are, what bad habits he is addicted to, and what the sources of his weakness and faults are. He should employ trusted agents to wander through the kingdom and ascertain whether his conduct of the previous day has met with the approbation of the people of the provinces, and whether or not he has earned a good name in his kingdom.

Among those who are wise and virtuous, Yudhishtira, you should not disregard those who never retreat from battle, those who do not live in your kingdom, those who are dependent on you, those who are independent of anyone, those who are your ministers and those who praise or blame you. No man can earn the good opinion of everybody in the world, since everyone has friends, foes and those who are neutrals.'

Yudhishtira asks, 'Among men equal in might of arms and accomplishments, how does one gain superiority over all the others and succeed in ruling over them?'

Bhishma replies, 'Creatures that are mobile devour things that are immobile; animals that have teeth devour those that have no teeth; poisonous snakes devour smaller ones of their own species. Similarly, among human beings too, the king who is strong preys upon weaker ones. He should always pay attention to his subjects and his enemies, or else they will fall upon him like vultures.

Take care, Yudhishtira, that the imposition of heavy taxes does not crush the traders in your kingdom. They buy diverse goods at varying prices, high and low, to sell, and in the course of their journeys have to seek repose in forests and inaccessible areas and undergo many privations.

Let not your farmers desert your kingdom due to oppression, for they, too, bear the burdens of the king and support the other inhabitants of your land. The gifts you make in this world support the Devas, Pitris, Manushyas, Nagas, Rakshasas, birds and animals. These are the methods of governing a kingdom and protecting its rulers. I will talk to you again on the subject, O son of Pandu!'"

"Bhishma says, 'I will tell you now, O Yudhishtira, everything that Utathya of Angirasa's race, the leading authority on the Vedas, once told Yuvanaswa's son, King Mandhatri.

Utathya said, "One becomes a king in the interests of dharma and not to indulge in caprice. Understand this, O Rajan: the king is indeed the protector of the world. If he acts righteously, he attains the position of a Deva and goes to heaven, and if he does not, he sinks into hell. All creatures rely upon dharma, which in its turn, depends upon the monarch. The ruler, therefore, who upholds dharma is truly a king.

The king who is a Dharmatman and has every kind of grace is said to be an embodiment of virtue. If a king fails to punish adharma, the Devas desert his palace and he comes to be defamed among men. The efforts of men who observe their swadharma will always be crowned with success. For this reason, all men seek to obey the dictates of dharma, which is the root of prosperity. When one continues to sin, adharma increases greatly and righteousness comes to an end.

The scriptures lay down that when one does not restrain adharma, no one can claim the rights of property and say, 'This is mine and this is not mine.' Men cannot enjoy ownership of their wives, animals, fields and houses; the Devas receive no worship, the Pitris no offerings, the Atithis no hospitality; the Dvijas do not study the Vedas or observe great vratas, or perform yagnas. When one does not restrain adharma, the human mind becomes weak and confused, O Rajan, like the minds of wounded men.

The Rishis, with their eyes on both worlds, made the king the superior being, intending him to be the embodiment of dharma on earth. They called him Rajan—one in whom righteousness shines. The king in whom there is no dharma they call a Vrishala. Divine dharma or righteousness has another name, Vrisha, and he who weakens Vrisha is Vrishala. All creatures grow in the development of righteousness and decay with its decline. A king should, therefore, advance the cause of dharma, and should never permit it to deteriorate.

We call righteousness dharma because it fosters the acquisition and preservation of wealth—dhana. The Rishis have declared, O Rajan, that dharma restrains and limits all evil actions of men. The Swayambhuva Brahma created dharma for the advancement and growth of men. So a king must work according to the dictates of dharma—the greatest of all things, for the benefit of his subjects.

The best of men who rules his subjects righteously is called a king. Disregard kama and krodha, and observe the dictates of dharma. It is the greatest above all things, O Naravyaghra, that contribute to the prosperity of kings. Dharma, again, has sprung from the Brahmana. For this reason, one should always revere the Brahmana. You should humbly satisfy the wishes of Brahmanas, O Mandhatri. By neglecting to fulfill their wishes, the king draws danger to himself, because he fails to gain any more friends, while his enemies increase in number.

Once upon a time, Lakshmi, the goddess of prosperity, became enraged and left the Asura Bali—the son of Virochana, with whom she dwelt—because of his malice towards the Brahmanas, and went to Indra, the chief of the Devas. Seeing the goddess living with Indra, Bali was filled with vain regret. This is what comes of malice and pride. Wake up, O Mandhatri, so that the Devi of prosperity does not desert you in wrath!

The Srutis declare that Adharma fathered on Lakshmi Devi a son named Ahamkara, Pride. This Ahamkara led many amongst the Devas and the Asuras to ruin. Many Rajarishis also suffered destruction due to him. Wake up O Rajan! He who can conquer Ahamkara becomes a king, while he whom Ahamkara conquers becomes a slave. If you wish for a life of eternal happiness, live as a king who does not indulge in these two—Ahamkara and Adharma.

Abstain from becoming friends with one who is proud, dishonest, mocks faith, or is cold-blooded, and on no account keep company with anyone who has all of these faults. Keep yourself aloof from ministers whom you have once punished, from women too, and stay away from mountains, uneven lands, inaccessible fastnesses, elephants, horses and poisonous snakes.

You should also give up wandering in the night, and avoid being stingy, vain, boastful or angry. Never have intercourse with those who are lewd or of ambiguous sex, unknown women, the wives of other men or virgins. When the king does not restrain vice, a confusion of castes follows and sinful Rakshasas, hermaphrodites, crippled children, or thick-tongued imbeciles and idiots begin to take birth even in respectable families.

Therefore the king should take particular care to act with dharma for the benefit of his subjects. If he acts thoughtlessly, great evil follows and adharma increases, causing a confusion of castes. Cold sets in during the summer months and disappears when its proper season comes. Drought, flood and pestilence afflict the people. Ominous stars arise, terrifying comets appear and other portents are seen, indicating destruction of the kingdom.

If the king does not take measures for his own safety and protect his subjects, the latter meet with destruction, followed by the king himself. Two men get together to snatch the wealth of a single individual, many join hands to rob them in turn, and men rape maidens. One says that such a state of affairs arises from the king's fault in abandoning dharma and being thoughtless, and consequently, all rights of property and dhana come to an end among men.'"

'Utathya said, "If Indra, the Deva of the clouds, ensures rain at the right season, and if the king works with dharma, the prosperity that follows will bring happiness to his subjects. The washerman who does not know how to wash out the dirt from cloth without fading it is not skilled in his profession. The king becomes a Sudra, as among the Brahmanas, Kshatriyas or Vaisyas, one who has disregarded the proper duties of his varna can be compared to a washerman.

Menial service is for the Sudra; agriculture for the Vaisya; the Dandaneeti for the Kshatriya; and Brahmacharya, penances, mantras and truth for the Brahmana. The Kshatriya who knows how to correct the faults in the behaviour of the other varnas and to wash them clean like a washerman, is really their father and deserves to be their king.

The four yugas called Krita, Treta, Dwapara and Kali are all dependent on the conduct of the king, O Bharatarishabha, for it is he who constitutes the yuga. The four varnas, the Vedas and the dharma of the four varnasramas, all become confused and weakened when the king behaves carelessly. The three kinds of Agni, the three Vedas and yagnas with dakshina, all are lost when the king becomes heedless.

The king is the creator of all creatures and he is their destroyer. One regards the king who is a Dharmatman as the creator, and a sinful king as the destroyer. The king's wives, sons, kinsmen and friends all become unhappy and grieve when the king becomes neglectful. Elephants, horses, cattle, camels, mules, asses and all other animals lose their vigour when the king becomes unrighteous.

Brahma created Shakti, which the king represents, O Mandhatri, in order to protect weakness. He who defends the weak wins heaven, while he who persecutes weakness goes to hell. Weakness is indeed a great being, for everything depends upon it.

All men worship the king and are the children of the king. If, therefore, the king takes the path of adharma, all men come to grief. One should regard as terrible the reproachful eye of the weak, the curse of a Muni and the bite of a deadly poisonous snake. Do not, therefore, make an enemy of the weak, or forget that the weak are always subject to humiliation. Make sure that the curse of the helpless does not turn you and your kinsmen to ashes. No children are born in a lineage which has been cursed by the weak, for they destroy the family to its very roots. Hence, do not earn the ill-will of the weak, for weakness is more powerful than even the greatest power and can even totally exterminate it.

If one who has been humiliated or beaten cries out in vain for help and fails to obtain a protector, divine punishment will overwhelm the king and destroy him. While you enjoy power, do not take wealth from the weak. Take care that the curses of the weak do not burn you like a blazing fire. The tears shed by men wronged through falsehood slay the children and livestock of those who have lied.

A sin does not produce immediate consequences. It is like a cow, and the sinner has to wait for milk till it calves. If the effects are not evident in the sinner himself, one notices it later in his progeny or descendants. When a weak person fails to find a protector, divine punishment falls on the king. When distress reduces all subjects of a king to penury and obliges them to live by begging like Brahmanas, it will bring destruction upon the king.

When all the officers of the king posted in the provinces unite and act unjustly, it is the king who becomes responsible for the great evil that will visit his kingdom. When his officers, by unfair means, or from kama or lobha, extort wealth from men who piteously solicit mercy, then a great destruction is sure to befall the king.

O Mandhatri, when a mighty tree first sprouts into life and grows large, numerous creatures come and seek its shelter. When, however, it is cut down or consumed in a fire, all those who took shelter become homeless.

When the subjects of a kingdom perform righteous deeds, carry out religious rites and applaud the good qualities of the king, the latter reaps the rewards. On the other hand, if they take to adharma, due to ignorance, the king will suffer. When you allow sinful men, known for their misdeeds, to move among the righteous without being punished, Kali then overpowers the rulers of those realms; while the king who punishes all evil men thrives in prosperity.

The king who pays proper honours to his ministers, employs them in matters of policy and in battles, enjoys the wide earth forever and his kingdom certainly thrives. The ruler who duly rewards all good work and words, earns great merit. Enjoyment of good things after sharing them with others, paying proper respect to the ministers and subjugating vain and powerful men, constitute the responsibility of a king.

Protecting all men by words and physically by deeds and pardoning no one who has committed an offence, be it even his own son, constitute the great obligation of the king. To share his possessions with those who are weak and thereby to increase their strength, to support them and protect the kingdom, to exterminate thieves and to conquer on the battlefield, embody the duty of the king.

Never to forgive anyone, however dear, if he has offended by deed or word, constitutes the mahadharma of the king. His duty is to protect those who seek shelter, as he would his own children, never to deprive anyone of the honours to which he is entitled, to worship the Devas with devotion in yagnas completed by gifts and to subdue lust and envy.

His duty is also to wipe the tears of the distressed, the helpless and the old and to make them rejoice, to praise friends, to weaken foes and to honour the good, and to observe with alacrity the obligations of truth. To make gifts of land, to entertain guests and to support dependants are also duties of the king.

The king who shows favours to the deserving and disciplines those who deserve punishment, earns great merit both here and hereafter. He is Yama himself, O Mandhatri, the Deva incarnate to all, because they expect everything from him. By controlling his senses he will acquire great wealth and by not subduing them, he incurs sin.

The duty of the king is to pay proper honours to Ritwijas, priests and gurus and to do good work for them. Yama governs all creatures with an even hand, without prejudice. The king should do the same in dealing with all his subjects. It is said that the king resembles the thousand-eyed Indra in every respect, and that one should regard as righteous those whom Indra regards as such, O Bharatarishabha.

You should carefully cultivate forgiveness, intelligence, patience and love towards all creatures. You should also ascertain the strengths and weakness of men and learn to distinguish between right and wrong. Conduct yourself with propriety towards all, give gifts and say agreeable and sweet words. You should maintain the people of your city and the provinces in happiness.

A king who is not clever will never be able to protect his subjects. Sovereignty is a very happy burden to bear, but only a wise and courageous king who knows Dandaneeti can protect a kingdom. One who is without energy and intelligence, and who is not well versed in this great science, is incompetent to bear the burden of sovereignty.

Aided by handsome, learned and devoted ministers of noble birth, who are clever in business, you should examine the hearts and actions of all men, including the Rishis in the vana. If you conduct yourself in this manner, you will be able to learn the duties of all varnasramas. This will help you to observe your svadharma when you are in your country, or when you go to other lands.

Among dharma, artha and kama, dharma—virtue—is the greatest, and a dharmatman obtains great happiness both here and hereafter. If you treat men with respect, they will even, for the sake of the honour you give them, abandon their own wives and sons.

A king can win great prosperity by attracting good men to himself by such favours as gifts, sweet words, thoughtfulness and purity of behaviour. Do not, therefore, O Mandhatri, take these qualities and actions lightly.

The king should never be unconcerned about his own shortcomings or those of his enemies. He should act in such a way that his foes are not able to detect his lapses and he should attack them when theirs become evident. This is the way in which Indra, Yama, Varuna and all the Rajarishis have fought. Do you likewise, O Rajan, quickly adopt this behaviour and take the heavenly road which the Rajarishis followed. The Devas, the Rishis, the Pitris and the Gandharvas, of great tejas, sing the praises, both here and hereafter, of the king whose conduct accords with dharma.”’

Bhishma continues, ‘Mandhatri unhesitatingly did as Utathya directed and became the sole lord of the wide earth. Therefore, O Rajan, take the path of dharma like Mandhatri. After ruling the earth, you will find a home in Swarga.'"

CANTO 92

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, how should a righteous king behave who wants to adhere to the path of dharma?'

Bhishma replies, 'An old story has been told of what the wise, all-knowing, mahatapasvin Rishi Vamadeva related long ago to the knowledgeable, courageous and chaste king, Vasumanas, who entreated him, "Guide me, O holy one, in morality, on how I should conduct myself, so that I do not fall away from the dharma prescribed for me."

The mahatapasvin Vamadeva said to the handsome golden-complexioned Vasumanas of great tejas, seated at his ease like Yayati, son of Nahusha, "Act with dharma, as there is nothing superior to righteousness. The kings who are righteous are able to conquer the whole world. The king who regards dharma to be the most effective means to accomplish his objectives, and who conducts himself according to the counsels of men of dharma, blazes forth with righteousness. The king who disregards dharma and works with brute force soon falls away from righteousness and loses both dharma and artha.

His subjects should slay that king with his entire family who acts on the advice of a vicious and sinful minister and thus destroys dharma. The ruler who is not competent to discharge his duties of Rajaneeti, whom caprice governs in all actions and who brags, very soon meets with destruction, even if he happens to be the ruler of all the earth.

On the other hand, the king who wants prosperity, who is free from malice, who has his senses under control and who is gifted with intelligence, thrives and is prosperous, like the ocean swelling with the waters discharged into it by a hundred rivers. He should never regard himself as possessing enough virtue, pleasures, wealth, intelligence and friends.

Upon these depends the conduct of the world. By listening to these counsels, a king gains fame, achievements, prosperity and subjects. Devoted to dharma, the king who seeks wealth only by such means and who begins all his enterprises after reflecting on their objectives will obtain great prosperity. The king who is illiberal, without affection, who inflicts undue punishments on his subjects and is rash in his actions, soon meets with destruction. The king who is not intelligent fails to see his own faults. Covered with dishonour in this world, he sinks into hell hereafter.

If the king pays due honour to those who deserve it, gives gifts and, recognizing the value of sweet words, always uses them, his subjects will take on any calamities that might overcome him, as if these had fallen upon themselves.

The king who has no acharya to instruct him on the ways of dharma, who never asks others for advice and who seeks to acquire wealth as his fancy suggests, will not long enjoy happiness, while one who listens to the instructions of his gurus in matters of dharma, who supervises the affairs of his kingdom himself, and whom dharma guides in all his acquisitions, will possess happiness for a long time.'"

'Vamadeva continued, "When a powerful king behaves with adharma towards the weak, others, including his descendents, emulate his conduct. The universal imitation of such a king soon brings destruction upon the kingdom.

While men in general will accept as a role model in conduct a king who observes his proper duties, his very kinsfolk will not tolerate a king who strays from dharma. The rash king who disregards the injunctions of the shastras and rules his kingdom high-handedly very soon meets with ruin.

The shastras say that the Kshatriya who does not follow the conduct observed traditionally by other Kshatriyas, victor or vanquished, fails in his dharma. Having captured in battle a royal foe who had done some favour to the conqueror in the past, if he, out of malice, does not pay him honour, he has failed in his Kshatriya dharma.

The king should display his power, live happily and do what is necessary in times of danger. Such a ruler becomes beloved of all and prosperity never abandons him. If you do a disservice to anyone, you should, when the opportunity arises, make amends and do him some favour.

He whom no one loves becomes an object of love if he does what is pleasant. Avoid empty words. You should do good to others without being asked, and never abandon dharma from kama or krodha. Do not reply harshly when someone questions you, or speak in an undignified manner. Never be in a hurry to do anything, or indulge in malice. This is how you can win over an enemy.

You should neither be overcome with joy when anything agreeable occurs, nor overwhelmed with sorrow when anything unpleasant happens. Never be grieved when you face financial distress, and always remember the dharma of doing good to your subjects. The kind king who does what is beneficial will succeed in all his endeavours and remain prosperous.

The king should always cherish the devoted servant who works for his benefit and refrains from doing anything to injure his master. He should appoint to all great affairs of his kingdom devoted men who have control over their senses, who are loyal, virtuous and competent. In addition, they should please the king and should never be thoughtless in looking after his interests. The king loses his prosperity if he appoints to important offices foolish men who are slaves to their senses, covetous, disreputable, deceitful, hypocritical, malicious, evil, ignorant, low-minded, or drunkards, gamblers, womanizers or addicted to shikar.

The king who first protects himself and then others who deserve protection, will have the satisfaction of finding his subjects growing in prosperity and will attain greatness. He should watch over the conduct and deeds of other kings, so that he can gain superiority over them through devoted secret agents. Having injured a powerful king, he should not develop a false sense of security by the great distance between them. Such an affronted king could very well fall upon him like a hawk swooping down upon its prey. A ruler who has consolidated his power and is confident of his own strength should attack a neighbour who is weaker than himself, never one who is stronger.

A king devoted to dharma, having acquired the sovereignty of the earth by his prowess, should protect his subjects righteously and destroy his enemies in battle. In this world, everything is destined for destruction, as nothing here is durable. But one who pays heed to five imperatives is the best of kings and will succeed in safeguarding and enlarging his kingdom. These five are defence of forts, administration of justice, conduct of war, consultations on questions of policy and keeping subjects happy.

It is impossible however, for one man alone to oversee all these matters. Handing over such supervision to his ministers, a king can rule the earth forever. The people want a liberal man as their king who shares all objects of enjoyment with others, who has a mild disposition, who is virtuous and who will never abandon his subjects.

People in the world obey one who accepts wise advice, abandoning his own opinions. The ruler who does not tolerate and attend to the advice of a well-wisher because it is contrary to his own views, and who does not follow the conduct of mighty and noble men, victor or vanquished, strays from the path of the Kshatriya dharma.

The king should always be careful to protect himself, from ministers whom he has earlier punished, from the arts of women, and while he is climbing mountains or entering inaccessible regions such as forests and wooded valleys. He should not ride untamed elephants or horses and should guard himself against poisonous reptiles.

The king who, abandoning his chief ministers, favours base men, soon falls into difficulties and never fulfills his plans. The weak-souled ruler who yields to the influence of anger and malice and does not love and honour his kinsmen who have noble qualities, lives on the very verge of destruction; while the king who attaches to himself accomplished men by showing them favour, even though he might not like them at heart, enjoys lasting fame.

Never impose taxes unseasonably. You should neither grieve if anything disagreeable occurs, nor rejoice exceedingly if anything agreeable happens. Try and accomplish good deeds. Ascertain who among the dependent kings is truly devoted to you, who is loyal to you from fear, and who among them has faults.

Even a powerful king should not trust a weak one, for in moments of inattentiveness the weak may assail the powerful like a flock of vultures seizing their prey. A sinful man seeks to injure his master even if the latter is sweet-tempered and possesses every virtue. Do not, therefore, place your confidence in such men. In declaring the mysteries of Rajaneeti, Nahusha's son Yayati said that a ruler should slay enemies who are contemptible.'"

'Vamadeva said, "The king should win victories without battles. The wise do not speak highly of victories that wars achieve, O Rajan. Till a king's sovereignty is established, it is not proper for him to make any new conquests.

The authority of a king is established when his dominions are wide and abound with wealth, when he has a large number of officers and his subjects are loyal and contented. Even with a small force, a king can subjugate the very earth, if his soldiers are happy with pay and plunder and are competent to deceive foes. The power of the king is established when his subjects, whether of the cities or the provinces, have compassion for all creatures, are wealthy and possess grain.

When the king thinks that his power is greater than that of an enemy, he should intelligently set out to acquire the latter's territories and wealth. A king whose resources are increasing, who is compassionate to all creatures, who never loses time by procrastination and who is careful in protecting himself, makes progress indeed. The king who betrays his own innocent people injures himself like a man cutting down a forest with an axe. If he does not always attend to the task of slaying his foes, they will not diminish. The king who knows how to control his own temper will have no enemies. If he is wise, he will never do anything that good men disapprove. He will, on the other hand, always engage himself in work that will benefit him and others.

The king who, having accomplished all his duties, is happy in the approval of his own conscience, has never to incur the reproach of others nor feel any regrets. The monarch who observes such conduct towards men will subjugate both the worlds and enjoy the fruits of victory."'

Bhishma continues, 'King Vasumanas did as Vamadeva directed him. Without doubt, you, too, by following such advice will conquer both worlds.'"

CANTO 95

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, how should a Kshatriya who has conquered another Kshatriya in battle behave after the victory?'

Bhishma replies, 'The sovereign, with or without an army at his back, should enter the dominions of the king he has subjugated and say to all the people, "I am your king and I will always protect you. Give me just tribute or encounter me in battle."

If the people accept him as their king, there is no need to fight, for kings should only fight other kings. If men who are not Kshatriyas by birth show signs of hostility, he should restrain them by every means, as the shastras do not prescribe the practice of warfare for them. People of the other varnas sometimes do take up arms to resist the invader if they find that their Kshatriyas are unarmed, unprepared and afraid to protect them.'

Yudhishtira says 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, how a Kshatriya king should conduct himself in war against another Kshatriya king.'

Bhishma replies, 'A Kshatriya must not put on armour to fight another Kshatriya who is not clad in mail. He should engage him in single combat and stop when the opponent is disabled. If the enemy comes clad in mail, he should also put on mail. If the enemy advances with an army, he should, taking his own army, challenge him to battle.

If the enemy fights with deceit, he should be similarly met. If, on the other hand, he fights fairly, you should engage him by fair means. You should not ride on horseback against a war chariot, for only a Maharatha should battle another Maharatha. You should not attack an unhorsed enemy, a vanquished opponent, one who has lost his chariot or weapons, or one who is frightened.

Neither poisoned nor barbed arrows should be used, as these are the weapons of the evil. You should fight righteously, without yielding to anger or wanting to kill. You should not slay a weak or wounded man; one who does not have an heir; one whose weapon has broken; one who is wounded; one whose bow-string has been cut; or one who has lost his ratha. You should send a wounded opponent to his own home or, if you bring him to your own, you should get skilful surgeons to attend to his wounds.

When, in a battle between kings who follow dharma, a righteous warrior is wounded and falls, you should have his wounds attended to and, when healed, you should set him free. This is the eternal duty and Manu, the son of the Swayambhuva Brahma, has said that battles should be fought fairly. The upright should always be righteous towards those who follow dharma, adhering to it without destroying it.

If a Kshatriya, whose duty is to fight nobly, wins a victory by adharma, he becomes sinful. A man of deceitful conduct in effect kills himself, for he practises evil. Even those who are iniquitous should be subdued only by fair means.

It is better to lay down your life in the observance of dharma, than to win victory by sin. O Rajan, sin when committed does not produce its effects immediately but overwhelms the sinner after eating away his roots and branches. A sinful man acquiring wealth by sinful means rejoices greatly, but in the process becomes wedded to sin. Thinking that dharma has no value, he jeers at men of upright conduct. Disbelieving in dharma, he meets in the end with destruction. Though enmeshed in Varuna's noose, he still regards himself immortal.

Like a large leather bag puffed up with wind, the sinner dissociates himself entirely from dharma. Soon, however, he disappears like a tree on the riverside washed away from its very roots. Then people compare him to an earthen pot broken on a stony surface and say that he deserved it. The king should, therefore, seek both victory and enrichment by just means.'"

"Bhishma says, 'A king should never try to subjugate the earth through adharma, even if it makes him the supreme sovereign. Which king will rejoice after having won victory by unfair means? A victory achieved through adharma is uncertain and never leads to Swarga because, O Bharatarishabha, it weakens both the king and the country.

A warrior whose armour has fallen off, or who begs for quarter saying, "I am yours," or by joining his hands has surrendered, should simply be captured, never killed. If the troops of the invader vanquish a hostile king, the invader should not himself fight his vanquished enemy. On the other hand, he should bring him to his palace and for a whole year, try and persuade him to admit, "I am your slave!" Whether he says this or not, the vanquished enemy, by living for a year in the house of his victor, gains a new lease of life.

If a king brings by force a maiden from his vanquished foe's house, he should keep her for a year and ask her whether she will marry him or anyone else in his kingdom. If she does not agree, she should then be sent back. You should behave similarly in respect of all other kinds of wealth, such as slaves, that you acquire by force.

The king should never appropriate wealth confiscated from thieves or men awaiting execution. Cattle forcibly taken from the enemy should be given to Brahmanas so that they can drink their milk. Bulls taken from the enemy should be sent for agricultural work or returned to the enemy.

The shastras lay down that a king should fight only another king, and that one who is not a king should never strike a king. If a Brahmana desirous of peace fearlessly goes between two contending armies, both should immediately stop the battle. If any Kshatriya commits Brahmahatya or wounds a Brahmana, he breaks an eternal law and earns the contempt of his varna.

The Kshatriya who destroys dharma and transgresses all reasonable restrictions does not deserve to be considered a Kshatriya, and should be banished. A king who wants victory should never follow such conduct.

What gain can be greater than victory won fairly? It is good policy for the triumphant king to conciliate the frightened people of a kingdom recently conquered, be it with soothing words or with gifts. If he rules these conquered people roughly, they will leave the kingdom to side with his enemies and wait for a chance to strike back. Then in times of danger other discontented men, watching for such an opportunity, O Rajan, will promptly side with the king's foes.

An adversary should not be deceived through unfair means and in no case should he be wounded mortally in a fight. If a lesser king is happy, he too, will also regard life as great. That king, it is said, has his roots firm whose dominions are extensive and wealthy, whose subjects are loyal and whose servants and officers are all contented.

That king, it is said, knows the ways of the world, whose Ritwijas, priests, acharyas and others about him are well-versed in all shastras and in whose kingdom the deserving are honoured and duly respected. Indra thus won the sovereignty of the worlds, and earthly kings will gain the status of Indra if they conduct themselves in this way.

Similarly, King Pratardana, subjugating his foes in a great battle, took all their wealth, including their very grain and medicinal herbs, but left their land untouched. King Divodasa, however, after subjugating his enemies, brought away the very remnants of their sacrificial fires, their clarified butter intended for libations and their food. For taking what he should not have seized, he lost all the merit of his conquests.

King Nabhaga, after his conquests, gave away entire kingdoms, except the wealth of learned Brahmanas and Munis, along with their rulers, as sacrificial gifts to the Brahmanas. The conduct of all ancient kings was irreproachable, O Yudhishtira, and I completely approve of it. The king who desires his own prosperity should seek to conquer through every kind of excellence but never by deceit or with pride.'"

CANTO 97

"Yudhishtira asks, 'There is no dharma more sinful than that of the Kshatriyas, for the king kills multitudes in wars. Tell me, O Bharatarishabha, by what deeds, then, can the king win realms of felicity?'

Bhishma says, 'Kings become purified by punishing the evil, by attracting and cherishing the good, through yagnas and charity. It is true that kings who desire victory cause suffering to many creatures, but after that they change and improve the conditions of all.

By the power of dana, yagnas and tapasya, they destroy their sins and their punya swells so as to enable them to do good to all. The farmer who weeds his paddy field takes up the blades of the paddy, as well as the weeds. His action, however, does not destroy the blades or paddy, but makes them grow more vigorously.

Those who wield weapons destroy many who deserve destruction, but that does not retard the growth and advancement of those who remain. One who protects the people from plunder, slaughter and affliction by brigands is regarded as the giver of wealth, life and food, and similar to one who performs a yagna yielding punya.

By thus worshipping the Devas, by unifying all yagnas whose dakshina is the dispelling of fear, the king enjoys every kind of happiness here and lives in Swarga hereafter.

One regards the king who lays down his life in battle for the sake of Brahmanas as the embodiment of a yagna with limitless gifts. If a king with his quivers full of arrows shoots them fearlessly at his enemies, the very gods will not find anyone on earth superior to him. He will enjoy eternal realms of felicity, in which his wishes will be granted, equal in number to the shafts with which he pierced the bodies of his enemies.

The blood that flows from his body cleanses him of all his sins, along with the pain that he feels. Authorities on the shastras say that the pain a Kshatriya suffers in battle operates as penance to enhance his punya. Timid men of dharma stay in the rear and beg the Kshatriyas who have rushed into battle for their lives, as men solicit rain from clouds. Great becomes their merit if they protect these fearful men and go forward themselves to face the danger.

These timorous men can free themselves from fear only if they do what is proper and just, which is to appreciate such valorous deeds and always respect their defenders. There is a great difference between men apparently equal. Some rush into battle, amid its terrible din, against armed ranks of enemies. Indeed, the Kshatriya who charges hosts of enemies takes the road to Swarga.

He who feels dread seeks safety in flight and deserts his comrades in danger. Let not such wretches be born as Kshatriyas. The very Devas, with Indra at their head, send calamities to those who desert their comrades in battle and return without a wound. One should beat with sticks or pelt with stones, or roll in a mat of dry grass and burn to death, one who deserts his comrades to save his own life. One should kill like animals any among Kshatriyas who are guilty of such conduct.

It is sinful for a Kshatriya to die in bed, spitting phlegm and passing urine, uttering piteous cries. Men who know the shastras do not applaud the death of an uninjured Kshatriya. The death of a Kshatriya at home is not praiseworthy. They are heroes, and any action that is not heroic is sinful and inglorious. In disease, he may be heard to lament, "What misery! What agony! I must be a great sinner." With a face emaciated and a stench issuing from his body and clothes, the sick man plunges his relatives into grief. Coveting the condition of those who are healthy, such a man amidst his tortures repeatedly wishes for death. He who is a hero, dignified and proud, does not deserve such a dishonorable end.

A Kshatriya should die by the sword, surrounded by kinsmen and slaughtering his enemies in battle. Frenzied with battle lust, he fights furiously and does not feel the wounds his enemies inflict on him. If he encounters death in battle, he earns that high punya filled with the fame and respect of the world due to him, and ultimately gains a place in Swarga.

The Kshatriya who does not show his back but fights with all his might at the forefront of the battle, utterly reckless of his very life, obtains the companionship of Indra. All Kshatriyas who die in the midst of their enemies without displaying shameful fear or despair earn admittance to the realms of eternal bliss.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, to what realms do Kshatriyas go who encounter death in battle?'

Bhishma, replies, 'There is an old story, O Yudhishtira, of a conversation which took place long ago, between Ambarisha and Indra. Ambarisha, the son of Nabhaga, went to Swarga and in those heavenly regions, so difficult to reach, he saw his own powerful general Sudeva in the company of Indra, in a celestial form blazing with every kind of energy and travelling in a very beautiful vimana. Seeing the prosperity of his Senapati and observing how he was journeying further up towards still loftier regions, the noble Ambarisha, filled with surprise, questioned Indra.

Ambarisha said, "Having ruled the whole earth bounded by the seas and wanting to earn punya, I practised all the dharma that the shastras declare are common to the four varnas. I practised with strict austerity the dharma of Brahmacharya. I waited with dutiful obedience upon my acharyas and other reverend elders and studied with due observances the Vedas and the shastras on Rajadharma. I gratified the Devas with many mahayagnas, Atithis with food and drink, the Pitris with offerings in Sraddhas and the Rishis with attentive study of the scriptures, after proper initiation into religious mysteries.

I duly observed the Kshatriya dharma according to the injunctions of the scriptures. I fearlessly faced hostile armies and won many victories in battle. This Sudeva, O Indra, was once the general leading my forces. It is true that he was a warrior of tranquil soul, but how has he exceeded me? He never worshipped the Devas in mahayagnas or gratified the Brahmanas with frequent and costly gifts according to the laws. Why then has he succeeded in surpassing me?"

Indra replied, "Sudeva has often performed the great yagna of battle, like anyone who engages in battle. Every warrior wearing armour who advances against his foes in battle array becomes installed in the yagna. Indeed, such a man is indisputably regarded as the yajamana of the yagna of battle."

Ambarisha said, "What constitutes the libations in this yagna? What constitutes its liquid offerings? What is its dakshina? Who, again, are its Ritwijas? Tell me all this, O performer of a hundred yagnas."

Indra said, "Elephants constitute the Ritwijas of this sacrifice and horses are its Audharyus. The flesh of enemies constitutes its libations and blood is its liquid offering. Jackals, vultures, ravens and also arrows, constitute its Sadasyas as they drink the remnants left of the liquid offering in this yagna and eat the remnants of its offerings. Heaps of lances, spears, swords, darts and axes, blazing, sharp and well-tempered, constitute the ladles of the sacrificer. Straight and well-tempered arrows with keen points that can pierce the bodies of enemies, loosed from well-stretched bows, constitute its large double-mouthed ladles.

Swords kept in sheaths of tiger skin, with handles made of ivory and capable of cutting off the elephant's trunk, form the Sphises of this sacrifice. Strokes inflicted with blazing and keen lances, arrows, swords and axes, all made of hard iron, constitute its great wealth collected from illustrious people by agreement regarding the amount and period.

The blood that runs over the battlefield from the fury of an attack constitutes the final libation, full of great punya and capable of granting every wish, in the homa of this yagna. Cries that one hears in the front ranks such as 'Cut!' and 'Pierce!' constitute the Samans that its Vedic chanters sing in the abode of Yama. The front ranks of the enemy's battle array form the vessel to store its libations.

The herd of elephants, horses and men equipped with shields one regards as the Syenachita fire of the sacrifice. The headless trunks that rise up after thousands have been slaughtered constitute the octagonal stake, made of Khadira wood, for the Kshatriya who performs the sacrifice. The screams of elephants goaded with hooks constitute its Ida mantras. The drums struck by palms forming the Vashats, O Rajan, are its Trisaman Udgatri.

When someone takes away the property of a Brahmana, the man who sacrifices his own body, so dear to him, in order to protect that property, thereby acquires the guna of a sacrifice with infinite gifts. The Kshatriya who, for the sake of his master, displays prowess at the van of the army and does not show his back through fear, earns those regions of felicity that are mine.

He who strews the altar of the battle yagna with swords cased in blue scabbards and severed arms resembling heavy bludgeons, will win regions of happiness like mine. The warrior who, intent upon victory, penetrates into the midst of the enemy's ranks without waiting for any help, succeeds in winning regions of bliss like mine.

The warrior who in battle creates a river of blood, terrible and difficult to cross, with kettle-drums for its frogs and tortoises, bones of heroes for its sands, blood and flesh for its marsh, swords and shields for its rafts, the hair of slain warriors for its floating weeds and moss, herds of horses, elephants and chariots for its bridges, standards and banners for its rushes, the bodies of slain elephants for its boats and huge alligators, swords and scimitars for its larger vessels, vultures, kankas and ravens for the rafts that float upon it, obtains regions of felicity like mine.

The warrior who creates such a river, difficult of passage even for those who possess courage and power, filling all timid men with dread, is said to complete the sacrifice by performing its final ablutions. The Kshatriya whose altar in such a yagna is strewn with the severed heads of enemies, horses and of elephants, obtains regions of happiness like mine.

The Rishis say that the warrior who regards the vanguard of the hostile army as his antapura, the front of his own army as the vessel for the sacrificial offering, the warriors standing to his south as his Sadasyas and those to his north as his Agnidhras, and who looks upon the hostile forces as his wedded wife, will attain all realms of happiness.

The open space between the two hosts drawn up for the battle constitutes the altar of such a sacrificer and the three Vedas are his three sacrificial fires. Upon this altar, aided by the chanting of the Vedas, he performs his yagna.

There is no doubt that the cowardly warrior who runs away from the fight in fear and is slain by the enemy sinks into hell, while the combatant whose blood drenches the sacrificial altar already strewn with hair, flesh and bones is sure to attain Swarga.

The powerful warrior who, having slain the commander of the hostile army, mounts the ratha of his fallen antagonist, is regarded as possessing the power of Vishnu himself and the intelligence of Brihaspati, the guru of the Devas. He who can capture alive the commander of the hostile army, or his son, or some other honoured leader, will win regions of happiness like mine.

One should never grieve for a hero slain in battle. A slain hero, if nobody grieves for him, goes to Swarga and earns the respect of its habitants. Neither do men desire to dedicate food and drink for the hero's salvation, nor do they bathe after receiving the news of his death, nor go into mourning for him.

Listen to me as I enumerate the joys that are in store for such a man. The best of Apsaras, numbering thousands, rush out to receive the spirit of the slain hero, coveting him for their lord. The Kshatriya who does his duty in battle acquires the punya of tapasya and of dharma, since his conduct conforms to the sanatana dharma. Such a man gains the punya of all the four varnasramas.

You should not kill the aged, children or women; those who flee, one who holds a straw in his lips to indicate unconditional surrender, or one who says, 'I am yours.' After killing in battle Jambha, Vritra, Vala, Paka, Satamaya, Virochana, the irresistible Namuchi, Sambara of innumerable illusions, Viprachitti—all these sons of Diti and Danu and also Prahlada, I myself have become the Lord of the Devas."

King Ambarisha came to understand by these words of Indra how, by means of fighting battles, Kshatriyas can win the blissful regions of Swarga.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Let me tell you the old story of the battle between King Pratardana and Janaka, the Dharmarajan of Mithila. Janaka, who knew the truth of everything, showed both Swarga and Naraka to his own warriors and gladdened them on the eve of the battle.

He told them, "Look, these are the regions of great splendour for those who fight fearlessly. Full of Gandharva girls, these realms are eternal and grant every wish. There, on the other side, are the regions of hell, intended for those who flee from battle. They will have to rot there for eternity in everlasting disgrace. Resolve, then, to cast away your very lives and conquer your enemies. Do not fall into inglorious hell. The laying down of life in battle is the happy door to heaven for Kshatriyas."

Thus addressed by their king, O subjugator of hostile towns, the warriors of Mithila vanquished their enemies in battle and gladdened him. Those who are resolute should take their stand in the forefront of battle. The maharathas should be placed in the midst of elephants, with the horsemen behind them. At their back should be the foot-soldiers, all clad in mail. The king who forms his battle vyuha in this manner will vanquish his enemy. O Yudhishtira, you should always adopt this vyuha formation.

Filled with rage, heroes want to earn punya in Swarga by fighting fairly. Like makaras agitating the ocean, they charge the ranks of the enemy, exhorting one another, so that they hearten even those among them who are slackening.

The victor should protect the newly conquered land from aggression. Rajan, you should not allow your troops to hound the vanquished foe too far, since the enemy who rallies after being routed is desperate for safety, and will assail pursuers ferociously. Another reason why you should not pursue the defeated enemy is that brave warriors do not strike at those who run away.

Creatures who are mobile devour things that are immobile; those that have teeth devour those that are toothless; the thirsty drink water; heroes devour cowards. Cowards ensure defeat though they have the same limbs, backs and stomachs as the victors. Those who are afraid join their hands and bend their heads before the courageous.

This world rests on the arms of Kshatriyas, like a son on those of his father. Hence, he who is a Kshatriya deserves respect under every circumstance. There is nothing higher in the three worlds than heroism. The heroic Kshatriya protects and cherishes all, and all things depend upon him.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, how kings who want victory, should lead their troops in battle, Bharatarishabha, even if they have to offend dharma slightly!'

Bhishma replies, 'Some say that one makes dharma secure by truth; some by upapatti or reasoning; some by good conduct, and some by the application of authority. I will now tell you what the method and strategy of authority are which produce immediate results.

Robbers who break all laws very often become destroyers of property and punya. Listen to me and I will tell you about the successful methods the shastras prescribe for resisting and restraining them. The king should be acquainted with both kinds of wisdom—straight and crooked—but never apply dishonest means to injure others, only to defend himself against the dangers that may overtake him. Enemies frequently undermine a king by sowing seeds of disunity among his ministers, troops, allies or subjects. The king, aware of such deception, may use deception to counter these foes.

You should manufacture and store in abundance armour made of leather for protecting the bodies of elephants and bulls, bones, thorns and keen-pointed weapons made of iron, coats of mail, yak-tails, sharp and well-tempered weapons, all kinds of yellow and red armour, banners and standards of diverse hues, sharp swords, lances, scimitars, battle-axes, as well as spears and shields. The weapons should all be properly whetted and the warriors filled with courage and resolution.

It is proper to start your campaign and move your troops in the month of Chaitra or Agrahayana, when crops ripen and water is not scarce. This time of year, O Bhaarata, is neither very cold nor very hot. If, however, the enemy is in trouble, troops should immediately be set in motion without waiting for a favourable season. These two are the best times to start a campaign to subjugate your enemies.

While moving your troops, you should take that road which has an abundance of water and grass, which is level and easy to march on. You should ascertain the route in advance, through skilful spies who have intimate knowledge of the adjoining terrain and forests. Kings who want victory should march their armies along good roads and not through forests like animals. In the van should be an akshauhini, a division of brave and strong men of noble birth.

Regarding forts, only those which have walls, a moat and a single entrance are favourable, because resistance can be offered from within them against invading armies.

Experienced warriors consider an area lying near a wood much better for pitching a camp than one under the open sky, so that the foot-soldiers are in a position which they can defend. Danger and distress can be warded off if they engage with the enemy as soon as it comes.

If the warriors fight keeping the Saptarishis behind them and take up their stand, immoveable as the hills, they will vanquish even irresistible foes. You should have the army in such a position that the wind will blow, and the sun and the planet Saturn shine, from behind them. As a force for ensuing victory, O Yudhishtira, the wind is superior to the sun, and the sun is superior to Sukra.

Warriors prefer for the operations of cavalry a region that is not miry, soggy, uneven or full of bricks and stone, while a field free from mire and holes is suitable for rathas. A region overgrown with bushes and large trees and one under water is appropriate for elephant-warriors, while an area that has many inaccessible spots, that is overgrown with large trees and groves of cane or is a mountainous or woody tract is well-suited for the operations of infantry.

One regards an army with a large infantry force as very strong, O Bhaarata, and one in which chariots and horsemen predominate as very effective on a clear and sunny day. An army in which foot-soldiers and elephants predominate is effective in the rainy season.

Having attended to these points about the character of various forces and the manner of marching, quartering and leading them, the king should turn his attention to the characteristics of place and time. He should set out on his expedition on an auspicious day, determined by the phases of the moon and the positions of stars and planets. This will ensure that if he leads his troops adroitly, he will gain victory.

No one should kill one who is asleep, thirsty, fatigued, disarmed or one who has his heart set on nirvana, one fleeing, one walking unsuspecting along a road, one drinking or eating, one deranged, one mortally wounded or severely weakened by his wounds, one who is unaware of the fight, one who is conducting a yagna, one who is an expert in some special art like mining, one who is in mourning, one who is out of the camp foraging, men who set up camps or are camp-followers, dwarapalakas of the king or his ministers, or those who do menial services for the chieftains of the army, or the overseers of such servants.

You should honour and double the pay of those warriors who break the ranks of enemies, or rally your retreating troops with food, drink and seats equal to your own. You should promote those among them who are chiefs of ten warriors to chiefs of a hundred, and the Kshatriya who is the chief of a hundred warriors, to chief of a thousand.

Gathering together your principal warriors, you should address them saying: "Let us swear to conquer, and never to desert one another. Let those who are afraid remain here, who will cause their chiefs to be slain by being cowardly in the cauldron of battle. Let such men come who will never break in battle or cause their own comrades to be slain, for they can protect themselves as well as their comrades and will certainly kill the enemy in a fight. The consequences of fleeing from battle are reproach and infamy, loss of wealth and death. He who flees from battle, who is shameless, who casts away his weapons or is captured by the enemy, will have to hear sharp words. Let such evil always befall the warriors of our enemies."

Those who flee from battle are the most despicable of men. They are a shame on earth and devoid of true manhood, here or hereafter. Bards sing the praises of victorious warriors who readily pursue their fleeing enemies with taunts. In battle, when an enemy tarnishes the fame of a man, the misery he feels is more painful than death itself.

Understand that victory is the root of punya and of every kind of happiness. Kshatriyas bear cheerfully that which cowards regard as the highest pain. One should be resolved to fight on, regardless of life itself, determined to conquer or die and attain a blessed end in heaven."

Having sworn such an oath and prepared themselves to throw away life itself, Kshatriyas should valiantly charge the enemy's ranks. In the van you should place an akshauhini of men armed with swords and shields, and in the rear the ratha akshauhini. In between you should position other kinds of warriors. This should be the array for attack.

Battle-hardened veterans should fight in the van so that they can protect their comrades behind them. Those who are afraid should be solicitously cheered and encouraged. You should position the strongest and most courageous men in the van. You should keep the weaker men on the field without withdrawing them, at least to make the army appear larger to the enemy.

If your troops are few, you should draw them close together for the fight or, if their leader wants, the close vyuha can be extended. When a small number of troops fight with a greater army, you should form the Suchimukha vyuha, in which you draw up the warriors into a wedge-like formation.

When you engage a small force with a large one, the leader of the former should shake his men's hands and utter loud cries saying, "The enemy has broken! The enemy has broken!" Those who are strong should stand firm against the enemy and shout loudly to their comrades, "Fresh comrades have arrived! Fearlessly strike our foes!"

Those who are in advance of the rest should utter loud shouts and make all kinds of noises and blow and beat krakachas, cow-horns, drums, cymbals and kettle-drums.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Of what temperament, behaviour and physique should warriors be, and how clad and armed so that they are fit for battle?'

Bhishma replies, 'Brave soldiers, when they engage in battle, use those weapons and chariots with which they are familiar.

The Gandharvas, the Sindhus and the Sauviras are brave and very strong and fight best with their swords and lances. Their armies are capable of vanquishing all forces. The Usinaras possess great strength and are skilled in all kinds of weapons. The Easterners are accomplished in fighting from elephant-back and also know how to fight unfairly. The Yavanas, the Kambojas and those who dwell around Mathura are skilled in fighting with bare hands, and the Southerners with swords.

It is well known that strong and courageous men are born in almost every country. Listen, and I will describe their distinguishing features. Those who have voices, eyes and bearings like those of the lion or the tiger, and those who have eyes like those of the pigeon or the snake, are all Kshatriya parantapas, while those who sound like the deer and have eyes like those of the leopard or the bull, are highly energetic. Those who have voices that resemble the sound of bells are excitable, malevolent and wrathful, while those who have voices deep as that of the clouds, visages angry or like those of camels' hooked noses and tongues, possess great speed and can shoot or hurl their weapons great distances.

Those who have bodies curved like a cat, thin hair and skin, possess great speed and are eager, near-invincible in battle, while some of those who have eyes closed like those of the iguana, a mild disposition and the speed and voice of a horse, can face all foes.

Those who are handsome, well-built with symmetrical frames, broad chests, who become angry upon hearing the enemy's drum or trumpet, who delight in affrays of every kind, who have grave eyes, eyes that bulge, or green eyes, or eyes like those of the mongoose, who have faces darkened with frowns, are all brave and will gladly give their lives in battle.

Those who have crooked eyes, broad foreheads and cheekbones not covered with flesh, arms strong as thunder-bolts and fingers bearing circular marks with arteries and nerves that are visible, will rush in with great speed when the clash of battle takes place. They then resemble infuriated elephants and become irresistible.

Those who have greenish hair ending in curls, flanks, cheeks and faces plump and fleshy, elevated shoulders, thick necks, fat calves, who have fearful visages and are fiery like Vasudeva's horse Sugriva, or like the offspring of Vinata's son Garuda, or have round heads, large mouths, faces like those of cats, shrill voices and quick tempers, who rush wildly into battle guided by its din, who are evil and full of haughtiness, who have fearsome faces and who live in the outlands, are all reckless of their lives and never retreat from battle.

You should keep such troops in the vanguard. They always slay their foes or die without turning back. Of wild conduct and outlandish manners, they regard soft speech as a sign of weakness. If treated mildly, they show contempt towards their king.'"

"Yudhishtira says 'I would like to know the well-known signs, O Bharatarishabha, that portend the success of an army.'

Bhishma replies, 'I will tell you all the well-known indications that predict the success of an army. A learned astrologer and a wise priest see the future with the eye of celestial knowledge and can perform various auspicious karmas and expiatory rites, including homa and the silent recitation of mantras, to ward off calamities that unpropitious fate and the wrath of the Devas may have in store.

The army where the troops and animals are all happy and cheerful, Yudhishtira, is sure to win a decisive victory. The wind blows favourably behind such troops, rainbows appear in the sky, the clouds cast their shadows upon them and at times the sun shines upon them. Jackals, ravens and vultures become auspicious to them. When these show such regard to the army, great victories are sure to be won.

Their yagna fires blaze up with a pure splendour, the light going upwards and the smokeless flames slightly bending towards the south. The libations poured on it emit an agreeable fragrance; the conches and drums, blown and beaten, send forth sonorous peals, and the warriors are inspired with eagerness. These are indications of success.

If we see deer and other quadrupeds behind or to the left of those who have already set out for battle, or of those who are about to set out, we regard them as auspicious. If they appear to the right of the warriors when they are about to engage in battle, we regard it as an indication of success.

If, however, they make their appearance in front, it indicates disaster and defeat. If certain birds, swans, cranes, satapatras and chashas utter auspicious cries and all able-bodied warriors become lively, these are omens of success.

The vyuha, which blazes with splendour and becomes terrible to look at because of the reflection from its weapons, war-machines, armour, standards and the radiant faces of the warriors who stand within the formation, will always succeed in vanquishing its enemies. If they are of pure conduct, modest deportment and attend to one another with loving kindness, it as an indication of success to come.

If because of the agreeable commands and connections the warriors become grateful and patient, we can know this as the root of success. A crow on the left of a warrior engaged in battle and on the right of him who is about to engage in it, we regard as favourable; again, if it appears at his back, it indicates failure, while its appearance in front forebodes danger.

Even after enlisting a large army consisting of the four kinds of forces, you should strive to make peace, O Yudhishtira. Only if your efforts for peace fail should you engage in battle. The victory won by battle is inferior because it is dependent on luck or destiny.

When a large army breaks and the troops begin to flee, it is exceedingly difficult to check its flight. The spontaneity of the flight resembles that of a powerful current of water or of a frightened herd of deer. If a single division takes flight the rest will follow, because fear is contagious. Some armies have broken without adequate cause, while others break even when they are brave and skilled in battle.

A great army consisting of even brave soldiers is like a large herd of Ruru deer. Sometimes even fifty men, resolute and relying upon one another, confident and prepared to lay down their lives, succeed in routing enemies numerically far superior. Sometimes even five, six or seven great Maharathas, unyielding and standing close together, can vanquish large armies.

Armed conflict is never desirable if it can be avoided. You should first try the policy of conciliation, or causing internal dissension and giving gifts as bribes; battle should be the last resort. At the very sight of a hostile force, fear paralyses the timid, like the sight of a blazing bolt from heaven. They ask, “Oh, upon what will it fall?”

Once a battle is raging, sweat drenches the limbs of those who go to join it, and of those who are winning. The entire country where a war rages, with all its resident and floating population, O Rajan, is agitated and affected. The very marrow of living men scorched by the heat of action suffers intense pain.

So a king should on all occasions adopt conciliatory methods, mixing them with severity. Men always show a disposition to make peace when an enemy oppresses them. Send secret agents to create dissension among the allies of the enemy. Discord having been kindled, the enemy will want peace with the king who is more powerful than himself, whom he once sought to crush.

If the invader does not proceed in this manner, he can never completely conquer his foe. In dealing with the enemy, take care to hem him in from all sides. Forgiveness always comes to those who are good and never to those who are evil. Listen now, O Partha, to the uses of forgiveness and sternness. The fame of a king who displays clemency after a conquest spreads widely. The very enemies of a man who is of a forgiving disposition trust him, even when he commits a grave transgression.

Sambara has said that an enemy should be subjugated first and compassion shown afterwards, for a wooden pole, if made straight without the application of heat in the first instance, very soon assumes its former crookedness. However, men skilled in the shastras do not advocate this or regard it as an indication of good kingship. Rather, they say, an enemy should be subdued and disciplined as a father does a son, without anger and without destroying him.

If a king is cruel, O Yudhishtira, he becomes a universal object of hatred. If, on the other hand, he becomes mild, everybody disregards him. Do, therefore, practise both severity and mildness. Before striking, O Bhaarata, and while striking, utter sweet words; and having struck, show your enemies compassion and let them understand that you grieve for them.

After he has vanquished an army, the king should address the survivors and say, “I am not glad that my troops have slain so many of you. Alas, they did not listen to me, though I repeatedly dissuaded them. I wish that all your dead were all alive. They did not deserve such deaths. They were all good men and true, who did not retreat from battle. Such men are rare. I surely do not approve of those who have slain such kshatriyas in battle.”

Having spoken thus to the survivors of the vanquished enemy, the king should, in secret, honour those among his own troops who bravely slew the foe. To soothe the wounded slayers from their sufferings at the hand of the enemy, and to win them over, the king should even weep, seizing their hands affectionately. Thus, in all circumstances, the king should behave with conciliation.

A Dharmarajan who is fearless becomes trusted and beloved of all. Winning the people's faith, he succeeds in ruling over the earth as he pleases. If he wants to rule the earth, the king should abandon deceit, attempt to gain the trust of all and try to protect his subjects from fear.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, how should one behave towards an enemy who is mild, one who is fierce and towards one who has many allies and a large force?'

Bhishma replies, 'There is an old tale, Yudhishtira, of a conversation between Brihaspati and Indra which took place long ago. Once upon a time, Indra, the lord of the Devas, approached Brihaspati and, saluting him with folded palms, said, "How, O Maharishi, should I behave towards my enemies? How can I subdue them other than by killing them? In a war between two armies, either side can win. What should I do so that I do not lose this blazing wealth that I have won from my enemies, that scorches them?"

The wisest Brihaspati, skilled in dharma, artha, kama and rajadharma, replied, "One should never seek to subdue one's foes by force. Only boys, cruel and volatile by nature, pick an open fight. One who wants to destroy an enemy should not put him on his guard and should never exhibit anger, fear or joy, but should conceal these within oneself. Without actually trusting one's enemy, one should behave towards him as if one trusts him completely.

One should always speak sweetly to one's enemy and never do anything displeasing to him. One should abstain from pointless hostility and from insolent speech. Just as a fowler, carefully imitating the cries of the birds he wants to catch or kill, lures and captures them, a king should first lull his enemies and then strike them down, if he so chooses.

Having overcome one's enemies, one should not sleep at ease. A foe who is evil raises his head again, like a carelessly put out fire flaring up later. When either side can win, you should avoid a battle. Lull an enemy into a false sense of security and then overpower him and gain your objective.

Consult your ministers and intelligent men who understand statecraft. If you disregard and forget an enemy who has actually not been subdued at heart, he will lie in wait and strike at you at an opportune moment, especially when you take a false step. Such an enemy can employ his own trusted agents and by sowing dissension, neutralize your forces.

Feelings of hostility towards his enemies should be nourished in secret by a king, and at the same time he should collect definite information about his enemy and learn everything he can about him. He should undermine his adversary's forces by bribery, poisoning and fomenting discord.

A king should never be too friendly with his foes, but wait patiently for the right opportunity, so that he can strike at a time when he is least expected to, and then make his kill. He should never slay too large a number of the enemy's troops, although he must certainly ensure a decisive victory. He should neither do an injury to his enemy that would rankle in the latter's heart, nor cause needless hurt by insults or rudeness.

If the opportunity to strike comes, he should not let it slip. This is what a king who wants to annihilate his enemies should do, O Indra, because if such a chance is missed, it will never come again.

A king should consult his advisors and only break the strength of his enemy. However, he should neither try to accomplish this when the opportunity is unfavourable, nor persecute his enemy even when the opportunity is at hand. The king should work carefully, giving up kama, krodha and ahamkara and all the while continually watch for any lapses by his enemy.

Extreme mildness, harshness of punishments, idleness, and recklessness: these four faults, and the deceit of his enemy, will ruin a foolish ruler, O king of the Devas. The king who can eradicate these and counteract the cunning of his enemies will certainly succeed in vanquishing all.

When one minister can accomplish the king's secret project without any help, the king should consult him and no other. If many ministers are consulted, they will endeavour to pass the responsibility to one another and even give publicity to a project which should have been kept secret. Only if there is a need to consult another should the king do so.

When the enemy is invisible, you should invoke the Brahmadanda divine punishment, upon them; when visible, the army consisting of four kinds of forces should be deployed on the field. The king should first try and create dissension, as well as use conciliation, depending upon the need of the moment.

At times the king should even abase himself before a powerful enemy. He should work carefully and seek to ensure the victor's destruction when the latter becomes careless. One should humble oneself before a more powerful king by prostrating oneself, with gifts of tribute and by uttering sweet words when the occasion demands, never doing anything to arouse the suspicions of a powerful enemy. The weaker ruler, under such circumstances, should carefully avoid every action that can awaken doubts.

A victorious king, again, should not trust his defeated enemy, for they who are vanquished always remain alert. Men of a restless nature find it hard to acquire wealth, Devaraja, so their very existence is dangerous. Kings should carefully ascertain who their friends are and who their enemies.

If a king is mild, people disregard him, but if he is fierce, he instills fear in them. Therefore, instead of being either fierce or mild, be both. As a rapid current ceaselessly eats away a high river-bank and causes large land-slips, carelessness and mistakes ruin a kingdom. Never attack many enemies at the same time. By adopting a policy of conciliation, giving gifts or creating dissension, O Purandara, you should subdue them one by one.

As for the rest, when they are few in number the victor should behave peacefully towards them. An intelligent king, even if he is able to do so, should not try to crush all his enemies at once. He should openly strike without hesitation only when he thinks he is superior to his enemy in many respects, when he has a large army packed with the six-fold forces, consisting of foot-soldiers, horses, elephants, rathas, war engines, treasure and traders following the camp, all loyal to him.

If the enemy is strong, adopting a strategy of conciliation towards him would be a mistake. On the other hand, you should plan to harass such enemies by secret means and not try to be mild in your conduct to him. Repeated expeditions would also be a blunder, for you would be risking the loss of your crops, the poisoning of your wells and tanks, and suspicion in respect of the seven branches of administration.

On such occasions, you should apply diverse kinds of deception, various methods for setting your enemies against one another and different forms of misinformation. You should also ascertain, through trusted agents, what is happening in the cities and provinces of your enemies, Kings, after pursuing their enemies and entering their forts, O slayer of Bala and Vritra, should sack, pillage, plunder and simultaneously devise proper plans to safeguard their own cities and dominions.

Making gifts of wealth to them in private and confiscating their possessions publicly, proclaiming them as offenders punished for their misdeeds without injuring them physically, kings should send their agents to the cities and provinces of their enemies. At the same time, in their own cities, they should arrange for killing rites to be performed for the enemy, by means of powerful mantras through men who are accomplished, learned, authorities in the shastras and acquainted with the regulations of the sacred books."

Indra said, "O best of Munis, what are the signs of an evil person? Tell me how I am to identify a wicked man."

Brihaspati said, "An evil man is one who proclaims the faults of others behind their backs, who is consumed with envy at the accomplishments of others and who remains silent, reluctant to join in when someone proclaims the merits of others in his presence. Mere silence on such occasions is no indication of wickedness; however, an evil person at such times breathes heavily, bites his lips and shakes his head.

Such a man always mixes in society, speaks irrelevantly, never does what he promises when the eye of the man to whom he has made the pledge is not upon him, or even allude to the subject in his presence. He eats by himself and not with others at the same table and finds fault with the food set before him, saying, 'All is not right today, as on other days.' His disposition shows itself when he sits, lies down or rides.

Mourning on occasions of sorrow and rejoicing on occasions of joy are the signs of a friend, while the opposite behaviour indicates an enemy. Keep in mind, O ruler of the Devas, that the nature of evil men can never be concealed. I have now told you, O greatest of deities, what the signs of an evil man are. Now that you have heard the truths that the shastras lay down, follow them duly."

Purandara, when the opportunity came, conducted himself strictly according to the advice of Brihaspati and, determined to be victorious, the Parantapa successfully reduced all his enemies to subjection.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What should a Dharmaraja do to acquire happiness whose own officers oppose him, whose treasury and army are no longer under his control and who has no wealth?'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen, Yudhishtira, to the oft-told story of Kshemadarsin, the Kosala Rajan. Long ago, Kshemadarsin lost his power and fell into great distress.

He went to the Rishi Kalakavrikshiya and, saluting him humbly, asked, "What should a man like me do who deserves wealth but who has failed to recover his kingdom despite repeated efforts; what should I do other than commit suicide or theft, take sanctuary with others or resort to other such degrading actions? O Brahmana, tell me, for one like you, who knows dharma and is full of kindness, is the refuge of a man suffering from mental or physical illness.

I have heard that a man like me should give up his desires, abandon joy and sorrow, and he will find happiness after he has earned the plenitude of knowledge. I grieve for those who believe that worldly happiness is dependent on wealth, which after all vanishes like a dream. Those who can abandon vast riches achieve a difficult feat, because we are unable to give up even wealth which has been lost. I have lost all my prosperity and fallen into a miserable and joyless existence. Tell me, O Brahmana, what happiness I should still strive for."

The sage said, "You have already understood, it seems. You are wise and should do as your intellect tells you. You are right in your belief that all that you see, as well as yourself and everything that you have, are evanescent, as am I and all that I have. Know, O Rajan, that those things which you regard as substantial, are in reality non-existent. The wise man knows this and is never troubled when confronted by sorrow.

Once you know what everyone should know, which is that whatever has happened and whatever will take place, all are unreal, you will be freed from adharma and its misery.

Whatever those who came before earned and acquired, and whatever those who succeeded them got, all have perished. Reflecting on this, who will yield to misery? Things that were are no more. Things that are will again not exist. Sorrow has no power to restore them. One should not, therefore, indulge in grief.

Where, is your father today, O Rajan, and where is your grandfather? You do not see them now, nor do they see you. If you think of your own instability, for whom then do you mourn? Reflect carefully and you will understand that it is certain that you will cease to exist. I, you, your friends, your enemies and indeed everything, will without any doubt cease to be. Those men who are now twenty or thirty years of age will all definitely die within the next hundred years.

If a man does not have the heart to give up his possessions, he should then endeavour to regard them as being not his own, and with that seek to do good. One should regard future acquisitions as well as those that have disappeared as being not one's own, of destiny as being all-powerful. Those who reason thus are wise, and the habit of seeing things like this an attribute of the good.

Many men who are equal or superior to you in intelligence and application, though deprived of wealth, are not only alive but are not kings. But unlike you, they are not unhappy. So, stop distressing yourself in this way. Are you not superior to these men, or at least equal to them in intelligence and hard work?"

The king said, "I won my kingdom and everything else with no great effort. However, all-powerful Time has swept it away as a river does sand, O Maharishi, and I am obliged to subsist on charity."

The Muni Kalakavrikshiya said, "Your frame of mind, based on the knowledge of reality, should be such that you never mourn for anything in life, O prince of Kosala, either in the past or the future. Your desire should be to obtain only that which is attainable, and so to enjoy your present possessions, not to suffer for what is not there.

Be delighted, O Kosala Rajan, with whatever you easily win. Even if you become poor, do not grieve, but seek to preserve a pure character. Only a foolish man, when he loses his wealth, instead of being contented with his remaining possessions censures the Supreme Ordainer. Such a man regards others, however undeserving, as blessed. For this reason, they suffer more who are malicious, vain and filled with self-importance.

However, such vices do not tarnish you, O king, so endure the wealth of others although you are poor. The wise succeed in enjoying the riches of others, while prosperity deserts the man who envies others.

Men of dharma and wisdom who know the duties of Yoga renounce of their own accord material possessions, as well as sons and grandsons. Others who know earthly wealth to be unstable and unattainable, dependent as it is upon ceaseless action and effort, also renounce it. You appear to be wise; why then do you grieve and yearn for things undesirable and dependent on others?

You wish to know that frame of mind which would enable you to enjoy happiness despite the loss of your possessions. My advice is that you renounce all these objects of desire.

Objects that should be avoided appear attractive, while objects that should be pursued appear undesirable. Some lose their wealth in the pursuit of riches, while others regard wealth as the root of infinite happiness and pursue it avidly. Again, some delighted with wealth think nothing superior to it and a man, in his eagerness to acquire material goods, loses all the other purusharthas.

If a man loses his hard-earned and legitimate riches, he despairs, falls inert and gives up all hope of material possessions. Some noble men of dharma pursue virtue and renounce every kind of worldly pleasure, from a desire to win felicity in the other world.

Some men lay down life itself to amass riches, for they think life without affluence is useless. Look at their pitiable condition, their foolishness. When life is so short and uncertain, these men, moved by ignorance, set their eyes on wealth. Who would set his heart upon hoarding possessions when destruction is their end, upon life when death is its end, and upon union when separation is its end?

Sometimes a man renounces wealth, and sometimes wealth abandons a man. What wise man would mourn the loss of wealth? There are many others in the world who lose their worldly possessions and friends. Use your intelligence, O Rajan, and you will understand that the calamities which overtake men are all due to their own conduct.

The remedy is to restrain your senses, mind and speech, for if those become weak and inclined to evil, there is no man who can keep himself free from the temptation of external objects which always surround him. As no one can form an adequate idea of the past or foresee the future because of the mutability of time and place, a wise man like you who has such an ability should never grieve for union and separation, for good or evil.

A man of mild disposition such as you, mature and with a disciplined soul, observant of brahmacharya, never gives in to woe or becomes restless from a desire to acquire or a fear of losing anything of little value.

It is not proper for a man like you to adopt a deceitful life of begging, a life that is sinful, evil, cruel, which only a wretch deserves. Take refuge in the great vana and lead a life of happiness there, alone, subsisting upon fruit and roots, restraining your speech and soul and filled with compassion for all creatures. He is wise who cheerfully leads such a life in the forest, with great-tusked elephants for companions, with no human being by his side, contented with the produce of the wilderness.

A large lake, when it becomes turbid, also becomes clear by itself. Similarly, a wise man, when disturbed in such matters, will become tranquil on his own. I know that someone who has fallen into a plight such as yours can still live happily. When it is near-impossible for you to recover your wealth, and when you have no ministers and counsellors, such a path opens to you.

Do you hope to reap the benefits that destiny has in store for you?'"

CANTO 105

'The Rishi Kalakavrikshiya said, "On the other hand, O Kshatriya, if you think that you still have any ability, and if you want me to, listen attentively while I disclose to you in detail the strategy you can adopt to have vast riches and, indeed, to recover your kingdom, kingly power and great prosperity."

King Kshemadarsin replied, "Tell me, O holy one, what you want me to know. I am eager to listen and do whatever you say. Let my meeting with you today prove fruitful to my enterprise."

The sage said, "Renounce ahamkara, moha, krodha, sukha and bhaya; humble yourself and wait upon your very enemies with folded hands. Serve Janaka, the king of Mithila, by always doing pure and goodly deeds. Firmly devoted to truth, you will then gain the trust of everyone and become as that king's right hand, and the Rajarishi of Videha will certainly give you great wealth.

As a result, you will gain many valiant and resolute allies, pure as fire in their deeds and free from the seven principal faults. A man of disciplined soul, with his senses under control, who adheres to his karma, will raise himself and gladden others. Honoured by the intelligent and prosperous Janaka, you will certainly become the right hand of the king and enjoy the confidence of all.

Then muster a large force, consult able ministers, bring about dissension among your enemies, set them against one another and break them all, like one who breaks a hard bilwa fruit with another. Or, make peace with the enemies of your opponent and destroy the latter's power. Arrange for your enemy to become addicted to such things as are not easily attainable—beautiful women, inordinately expensive clothes, beds, seats, carriages, mansions, birds and animals of diverse species, juices, perfumes and fruits, so that he ruins himself through indulgence.

You could either deal with your enemy thus, or show him indifference. One who wants to pursue a successful strategy should never alert the enemy to his intentions.

Follow the conduct that the wise approve of, enjoy every kind of pleasure in the dominions of your enemy, imitate the ways of the dog, the deer and the crow and behave with apparent friendship towards your enemies. Induce them to undertake tasks that are grand and difficult to accomplish. See, also, that they engage in hostilities with other powerful enemies.

Draw their attention to pleasant gardens and costly beds and seats; offer them objects of enjoyment and thereby drain your enemy's treasury. Advise him to perform sacrifices, make gifts and gratify Brahmanas to excess. Since they received the gifts through you, they will do good to you in return and perform tapasyas, Vedic yagnas to devour your foes like wolves. Without doubt, a dharmatman of virtuous deeds will earn realms of the highest felicity in Swarga.

If you cause the treasury of your enemies to be exhausted, every one of them can be subdued. The exchequer is the root of felicity in Swarga and victory on earth, and it is because of their treasuries that enemies enjoy such happiness. You should, by any means, drain their coffers.

Do not praise Parishrama or exertion in the presence of your enemies but speak highly of Vidhi or destiny. Without doubt, the man who relies too much on the worship of the Devas soon meets his destruction. Get your enemy to perform the great Viswajit yagna and by that strip him of all his possessions. Thus, your objective will be fulfilled.

You should then inform your enemy that the best men in his kingdom are being oppressed with levies to refill the exhausted coffers, and suggest some eminent Rishi who knows the duties of Yoga, who will then wean him away from his earthly possessions. Your enemy will then want to adopt renunciation and retire to the vana to seek mukti. You should then, with the help of drugs prepared by boiling potent poisonous herbs and plants with artificial salts, kill the elephants, horses and men of your enemy's dominions.

These and many other well-devised schemes are available, all connected with fraudulence. An intelligent man can destroy the entire population of a hostile kingdom with poison."

CANTO 106

'King Kshemadarsin said, "I do not desire to live by deceit or fraud, O Brahmana, for I do not want wealth, however great, earned other than through dharma. When we began our discussion I explained that I will live in this world only by means that would benefit me but not lead to censure, and I will only do things that have no harmful consequences. I am incapable of following the strategy that you recommend. Indeed, your advice does not become you."

Rishi Kalakavrikshiya replied, "Your words prove, O Kshatriya, that you are truly a man of dharma in temperament and understanding. I will strive for the benefit of both you and Janaka, the ruler of Videhas. I will arrange a bond, eternal and unbreakable, between you and him.

Who is there that would not be glad to have a minister like you, born of a noble race, learned, who follows dharma, abstains from cruelty, is versed in the art of governance and knows how to pacify everyone? I say this because, though dispossessed of your kingdom and plunged into great misery, you still want to follow dharma. Janaka, who firmly adheres to truth, will come soon to my asrama. I have no doubt that he will do what I ask of him."

The sage then summoned Janaka and said to him, "Kshemadarsin is of royal birth. I know his very heart and soul are as pure as the surface of a mirror or the disc of the autumn moon. I have tested him in every way and I do not see any fault in him. You should be friends. Repose in him the same confidence that you have in me.

A king who is without a competent minister cannot rule his kingdom for even three days. The minister should be courageous and highly intelligent. With these two attributes you can conquer both the worlds. Understand, Janaka, that these two qualities are essential to rule a kingdom and Dharmarajans have no greater support than a minister who possesses them.

Kshemadarsin is of royal birth and walks the path of dharma. He who always has dharma in his mind is a valuable acquisition. If you treat him with honour, he will reduce all your foes to subjection. If he fights you, he will do what a Kshatriya should. Indeed, like his father and grandfathers, if he fights, it will be to conquer you, and it will then be your duty to fight him, observing the Kshatriya dharma.

However, listen to my advice and you will benefit if you employ him and refrain from fighting him in battle. Keep your eyes always on dharma and renounce greed, for it is inappropriate for you to abandon the duties of your varna from lust for battle.

Neither Jaya nor Parajaya, victory or defeat, are predictable. Remember, peace should be made with an enemy by giving him food and wealth. One can see victory and defeat in Kshemadarsin's own case. Those who seek to destroy an enemy are sometimes themselves destroyed."

King Janaka saluted and gave due honour to the Maharishi and replied, "You are immensely learned and wise and I have no hesitation in saying that your sincere advice is sure to be advantageous for us both."

King Janaka then addressed the prince of Kosala, "I have conquered the world through the Kshatriya dharma and with the help of Neeti. However, Rajan, you have conquered me with your qualities. If you remain by my side, I will honour you and you will live with me as a victor—a Praptajaya. I honour your intelligence and your prowess, and I will not slight you by saying that I have conquered you. Live with me in my home with honour, and as a victor."

Both kings then performed obsequies to Rishi Kalakavrikshiya and, with mutual trust, went to the capital of Mithila. King Janaka invited Kshemadarsin into his home and duly honoured him with water to wash his feet, honey, curds and the other customary offerings. King Janaka also gave him the hand of his own daughter, as well as all kinds of gems and jewels. The establishment of peace is the greatest dharma of kings, since victory and defeat are both uncertain.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have, O Pitamaha, described the path of dharma, the general conduct, the means of livelihood of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, and its consequences. You have also spoken about the duties of kings, of their treasuries and the means to fill them, and about conquest and victory.

You have explained the character of ministers, the measures that lead to the betterment of one's subjects, the characteristics of the six-fold limbs of a kingdom, the qualities of armies, how to identify evil, the marks of those who are good, the attributes of those who are equal, inferior or superior to oneself, how a king who desires progress should conduct himself towards his people, and the manner in which the weak should be protected and cherished.

You have discussed all these subjects and laid down instructions that are lucid and as prescribed in the sacred texts. You have also discussed what kings should do if they wish to conquer their enemies.

Tell me now, Pitamaha, how I should behave towards the multitude of noble Kshatriyas that gather round a king's court. I want to know how their number can be increased, how they can be made loyal to the king, and how they can subjugate their enemies and acquire friends. It seems to me that disunity alone can bring about their destruction.

I also think that it is difficult to keep a secret that concerns many men. I would like to hear about all this in detail, Parantapa. Tell me also how to prevent the nobles from becoming inimical towards the king.'

Bhishma replies, ‘Lobha and krodha, greed and anger, O Rajan, cause enmity between noblemen and kings. If the king yields to greed, the nobles become angry, and if each works with intent to weaken and harm the other, both are destroyed. The two sides war with each other; they employ spies, use ploys, physical force, adopt the strategy of conciliation, offer bribes, cause disssension, try to weaken each other, pillage and spread fear.

The noblemen of a kingdom, a close-knit body, will dissociate themselves from the king if he tries to take too much from them. Once distanced from the king, all of them become dissatisfied and, from fear, will side with the enemies of their ruler. If the Kshatriyas are not united amongst themselves, they will fall easy prey to ouside enemies and will be destroyed. The nobles should always work in concert; by their strength and prowess they can acquire wealth, and many outsiders will seek their alliance.

Men of knowledge laud those noblemen who are united with bonds of love. If they stand together, they will all prosper and, by their example, establish dharma in the kingdom. They become prosperous if they restrain their sons and brothers, if they teach them their dharma, and behave kindly towards all men who have disciplined their ahamkara through gyana.

The nobles become prosperous if they ensure that their spies are active, Mahabaho, if they formulate policy, fill their treasuries, show proper reverence to the wise, the courageous and the persevering, and display steady proficiency in work.

By being wealthy and resourceful, through their knowledge of the shastras, the arts and sciences, the aristocracy rescues the ignorant masses from suffering and danger. A show of anger by the king, disagreement, terror, punishment, persecution, oppression and executions, O chief of the Bhaaratas, speedily cause the nobility to break from him and side with his enemies.

The king should honour the leaders among the nobility, for Rajaneeti depends to a great extent on them. You should hold consultations with only those who are the leaders, Parantapa, and have secret agents to watch them. The king should not consult every member of the nobility, O Bhaarata, but work together with the leaders and do whatever is for the good of the entire Kshatriya varna.

When the nobility fall out or become disunited and leaderless, you should adopt other methods, for if they quarrel and act independently without unity, their prosperity dwindles and they fall prey to all kinds of evil. Those among them who are learned and wise should quell a dispute as soon as it arises, because if the elders of a royal house look on with indifference, such quarrels will soon destroy them and disunite the entire varna of Kshatriyas.

Fears that arise from outside are of little consequence, Rajan, but protect yourself from all fears that arise from within, for this can cut your very roots in a single day. When men equal to one another in family and blood, provoked by the wrath and greed inherent in their nature, cease to speak with one another, it is an omen of imminent defeat and destruction.

It is not by employing courage, intelligence, beauty, or wealth that enemies destroy the nobility. It is only through conflict and bribery that they can be subjugated. For this reason, one says that unity is the greatest protection of the nobility.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'The path of dharma is long, O Bhaarata, and has many branches. Which are the most important duties that I must practise to earn the highest punya, both here and hereafter?'

Bhishma replies, 'I think that the worship of Mata, Pita and guru is most important. The man who attends to this duty here will acquire great fame and many regions of felicity hereafter. Yudhishtira, you should revere them and obey unhesitatingly whatever they command, be it consistent with dharma or not! One should never do what they forbid.

They are the three worlds, the three varnas, the three Vedas and the three sacred fires. The Pita, one's father, one says is the Garhapatya fire; the Mata, mother, the Dakshina fire, and the guru is that fire upon which you pour libations. These are pre-eminent and, if you attend attentively to these three fires, you will conquer the three worlds.

If one serves one's father steadfastly, one can cross this sea of samsara. If one serves one's mother in the same way, one can attain regions of felicity in the next. If one serves one's acharya with devotion, one can obtain the realm of Brahma. Behave properly towards these three, O Bhaarata, and you will gain great fame in the three worlds and be forever blessed.

Great will be your punya and reward. Never disobey them in any matter. Never eat before they eat, or eat anything that is better than what they eat. Never blame them for anything, and always serve them humbly. You can earn fame, merit, honour and regions of felicity hereafter, if you perform these deeds of great punya.

All the worlds honour those who revere these three. On the other hand, those who disregard these three will fail to find any punya, fame or merit from his karma, either in this world or in the next.

All that I have given away in honour of these three has returned a hundredfold or a thousandfold to me. It is because of this punya, O Yudhishtira, that even now the three worlds are clearly before my eyes. One acharya is superior to ten Brahmanas learned in the Vedas, and one Upadhyaya superior to ten acharyas. The father, again, is superior to ten Upadhyayas, and the mother greater in importance than ten fathers or perhaps the whole world. It is said that no one deserves as much reverence as the mother.

In my opinion, however, the guru is worthy of greater reverence than the father or even the mother. The father and the mother are authors of one's being, O Bhaarata, but they only create the body. The life of the spirit, on the other hand, one receives from one's Acharya, and that is divine. It is subject to no decay and is immortal.

You should never injure your father and mother, however much they offend you, and one does not incur sin if one refrains from punishing a parent, even if punishment is deserved. Indeed, a parent who enjoys impunity does not tarnish the image of a king, and the Devas and the Rishis do not withhold their favours from men who strive to cherish reverently even sinful fathers.

One should regard as both father and mother those who favour us and impart to us true and immortal knowledge of the Vedas. The disciple in gratitude should never do anything that would injure the acharya.

Those who do not respect the acharyas who instruct them, and do not obey them dutifully in thought and deed, incur the sin of killing an unborn, and there is no greater sinner in this world. Gurus always show great affection for their shishyas, so the latter should show their acharyas equal reverence. He who wishes to earn this great punya, which has existed from ancient days, should revere and love his acharyas and cheerfully share with them every object of enjoyment.

He who makes his father happy pleases Prajapati himself, and he who pleases his mother gratifies the earth herself, but he who pleases his guru gratifies Brahma by his karma. For this reason, the acharya is worthy of greater reverence than either the father or the mother.

If you worship your acharyas, the very Rishis and the Devas, together with the Pitris, all are pleased. The guru is worthy of the highest reverence and the shishya should never disregard him in any manner. Neither the mother nor the father deserves as much respect as the acharya. One should never insult the father, the mother or the guru, or find fault with anything they do.

The Devas and the great Rishis are pleased with one who behaves with reverence towards his gurus. Those who hurt in thought or deed their acharya, father or mother, incur the sin of killing a foetus in the womb, and there is no sinner in the world equal to them. The son of the father's loins and the mother's womb, raised by them, who does not support them in his turn when he comes of age, incurs the sin of killing an unborn child, and there is no greater sinner in the world than him. We have heard that these four, he who injures a friend, he who is ungrateful, he who kills a woman and he who kills his guru, will never be able to purify themselves.

I have now told you generally all that a man should do in this world. Besides these duties that I have indicated, there is nothing that will bring greater happiness. I have told you the essence of all dharma.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You are wise, O Bhaarata, so tell me how one who wants to adhere to dharma should work. Truth and falsehood exist in all the worlds. Which of these two should a man of dharma accept? What is truth, what is falsehood and what is sanatana dharma? When can a man tell the truth and when an untruth?'

Bhishma replies, 'To speak the truth is consistent with dharma, because there is nothing higher than truth. I will now tell you that which men do not generally know. You should not speak the truth where falsehood can appear to be the truth. Then again, you should even lie where truth will appear to be false.

The ignorant man incurs sin when he tells a truth which is not connected to dharma. He who can distinguish truth from falsehood knows dharma. Even a disreputable, cruel man with an evil, impure soul, can earn great punya, like the hunter Valaka, who killed the blind beast that threatened to destroy all creatures.

It is extraordinary that even a Rishi, though foolish, who wanted to acquire punya by tapasya, could incur the sin of murder by telling the truth to a company of robbers and pointing out the place where certain innocent men were hid.

Again, an owl who did an evil deed and with his beak broke a thousand eggs on the banks of the Ganges, obtained great punya and went to Swarga, because the eggs were of a deadly poisonous she-serpent.

The question you have asked me is a complex one, and no one who discusses the subject can define dharma accurately. Brahma declared that whatever leads to the advancement and growth of all creatures is dharma. He declared that whatever restrains creatures from injuring one another is dharma.

Dharma is so called because it supports all creatures. Some say that dharma is in the Srutis, while others do not agree. I would not fault those who disagree, since the Srutis do not lay down every duty.

Sometimes brigands seek information to help them identify a victim to rob. It is one's duty never to answer such queries. If by one's silence, a victim can escape, one should remain silent. If, on the other hand, one's silence at a time when one must speak rouses suspicion, it would be better to tell a lie.

It is accepted that there is no sin if one can escape from evil men even by swearing a false oath. One should not give wealth to sinful men, for that affects even the giver. If a creditor desires to enslave a debtor unable to pay off his debt, the witnesses should all lie if the creditor summons them to establish the truth of the contract. When life is at risk, or on a matter of marriage, one can lie.

One who seeks dharma does not commit a sin by telling a lie if he says it to save the property of others, or for sake of dharma. One is liable to fulfill all promises to pay one's debts and, upon failure, the defaulter may be forcibly enslaved. If a man does not fulfill his responsibilities, he should certainly be punished with the Dandaneeti.

A deceitful man who fails in all the duties of his own varna will begin to adopt practices of Asuras and live dishonestly. You should never tolerate such men but kill them by any means, for they think there is nothing in this world higher than wealth. No one should eat with them, and you should regard them as inhuman evildoers—pisachas shut out from the grace of the gods. Since they do not perform yagnas or tapasya, stay away from their companionship for, if they lose their wealth, they will even perform that most wretched act, suicide. Among these evil men, there is no one to whom you can say, "This is your duty. Let your heart turn to it." Their strong belief is that there is nothing in this world equal to wealth. He who slays such a creature would incur no sin, for his own karma has killed him, and he is already dead.

He who swears to slay these mindless men should keep his vow. Such evil men are like the crow and the vulture, dependent on deceit for their living, and after the dissolution of their human bodies they are reborn as crows and vultures. You should behave towards others in the same manner as they behave towards you. You should deal with one who practises deceit with deceit, and treat an honest man honestly.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'We see men suffer almost continually on various counts. Tell me, O Pitamaha, in what way can one overcome all these travails?'

Bhishma replies, 'The Rishis who duly practise the dharma decreed by the scriptures for the several varnasramas surmount all their difficulties. Those who never practise deceit, who are disciplined and who are in control of their worldly desires, master all their troubles.

Those who do not respond even when provoked, who do not injure others though they are themselves hurt, who give but do not take, overcome all hardships. Those who are always hospitable to guests, who are not malicious, who regularly study the Vedas, overcome all their difficulties. Those who know their duties, behave appropriately towards their parents, who do not sleep during the day, master all their troubles. Those who do not commit any kind of sin in thought, word or deed, who practise ahimsa, overcome all tribulations.

Kings who are not influenced by moha and lobha, who do not levy oppressive taxes and protect their own dominions, overcome all problems. Those who go to their own wedded wives in season and do not seek the companionship of other women, who are honest and attentive to their Agnihotras, surmount all difficulties.

Those who are courageous and engage in battle by fair means, unmindful of death, overcome all troubles. Those who always adhere to truth in this world, even when life is at stake, and who are models for all men to imitate, overcome all obstacles. Those who never deceive by their actions, whose words are always agreeable and whose wealth is always well spent, overcome all ills.

Those Brahmanas who study the Vedas only at hours intended for study and who practise tapasya with devotion, overcome all obstacles. Brahmanas who take to a life of celibacy and brahmacharya, who perform tapasya and whom learning, Vedic knowledge and proper vows have cleansed, overcome all travails.

Those who have controlled the gunas of rajas and tamas, are Dharmatmans who practise the quality of sattva, and they can overcome all pain and sorrow.

Those whom no creature fears, who do not themselves fear any, and look upon all creatures as their own selves, overcome all difficulties. Those bulls among men who are good, who are not envious of other people's prosperity and who are noble in their conduct, overcome all difficulties.

Those who bow to all the Devas and listen to the doctrines of all dharmas, have faith and tranquil souls, and overcome all troubles. Those who do not desire honour for themselves, who reward others, who bow down to those deserving of their worship, overcome all difficulties.

Those who perform sraddhas on the proper lunar days with pure minds for the sake of progeny are blessed with fine children. Those who restrain their own anger and pacify the wrath of others, who never lose their temper, overcome all difficulties. Those who abstain all their lives from honey, meat and intoxicants, overcome all grief.

Those who eat only in order to support life, who seek the companionship of women only for the sake of begetting children, and who open their lips only to speak the truth, overcome all difficulties. Those who worship with devotion Narayana, the Supreme Lord of all creatures and the origin and destruction of the universe, overcome all trials.

This Krishna here, of eyes red as the lotus, clad in yellow robes, this Mahabaho who is our well-wisher, brother, friend and relative, is Narayana of unfading glory. He covers all the worlds like a leather case, at his own pleasure. He is the powerful Lord of unimaginable Soul. He is Govinda, the greatest of all beings. This Krishna who always does what pleases and is beneficial to Vishnu and also to you, Yudhishtira, is the first and best of all beings, the irresistible one, the abode of eternal felicity.

Those who devoutly seek the refuge of Narayana, also called Hari, will overcome every obstacle. Those who read these verses about how to surmount difficulties, who recite them to others and speak of them, will surely overcome.

I have now, O sinless one, told you all those acts by which men can transcend all their woes and sorrows, both here and hereafter.'"

CANTO 111

"Yudhishtira says, 'Many men here who are not serene souls outwardly appear calm, while others who are really peaceful souls appear otherwise. How, O Pitamaha, can we distinguish between them?'

Bhishma replies, 'Let me relate, O Yudhishtira, a conversation between a tiger and a jackal.

Long ago, in a prosperous city called Purika, there was a king named Paurika. He was the worst of men, exceedingly cruel, who delighted in causing injury to others. On the expiry of his lifespan he died miserably and, as a result of the evil deeds of his human life, was reborn a jackal.

He, however, remembered his former prosperity and in grief, gave up meat even when others of his kind brought it to him. He became compassionate to all creatures, truthful in speech, firm in the observance of strict vratas, and ate only wind-fallen fruits from the trees. The jackal continued to live in the vast crematorium where he was born and never wished to change it for a better locality.

Unable to suffer the purity of his conduct, the other members of his species tried to make him change his resolve and told him with humility, "Though you dwell in this terrible smasana, you still want a lofty life. Isn't this a perversity, since you are by nature a carrion-eater? Be like us. All of us will give you food. Eat what is your natural diet, and abandon this virtuous conduct."

The jackal listened attentively and replied reasonably in these words of ahimsa, “I am of low birth, but it is conduct that determines varna, not varna that decides conduct. I wish to live in such a way that my fame will spread.

Although I dwell in this smasana, I observe my vratas according to dharma. One is the cause of one’s karma and the varnasrama one takes is not for religious deeds. If one who follows any varnasrama kills a Brahmana, will he not incur the sin of Brahmahatya? If, on the other hand, one gives away a cow, though one does not observe any particular varnasrama, will that pious gift yield no punya?

Motivated by selfish needs, you only want to fill your stomachs. You are confused and foolishly do not see the three sins that will be the final result. I do not want to adopt the life you lead, which is evil both here and hereafter and will surely lead to discontentment, temptation and loss of virtue.”

A renowned tiger happened to overhear this conversation and, finding the jackal to be a learned one of pure conduct, greeted him respectfully and said, “Righteous one, I know what you are. Come and share the duties of kingship with me as my minister. Enjoy whatever you wish and leave behind what you do not want. But let me tell you that tigers are known to be fierce. If you behave with mildness, you will reap the benefits.”

The jackal, flattered by these words of the mahatman among animals, hung his head a little and said humbly, “O king of beasts, I thank you for your kind words. Your wish to seek ministers of pure conduct, familiar with dharma and worldly affairs, does you credit. You cannot remain a great leader without a pious minister, or with an evil one who is on the lookout to destroy you.

You should regard the ministers who are devoted to you, who understand policy, who are independent, who want to crown you with victory, who are not greedy, who are free from deceit, wise, ever engaged in your welfare and have mental vitality, just as you look upon your acharyas or your parents.

But as I am perfectly happy with my present position, I do not want to change it for anything else. I do not covet luxury or the happiness associated with it.

My conduct will not agree with that of your old servants. If they are evil, they will produce discord between us. It is not desirable or praiseworthy to depend upon another. I am a Dharmatman and highly blessed. I cannot show severity even to sinners. I have foresight and a capacity for great exertion and do not look at insignificant things. I possess great strength, follow dharma and never work fruitlessly. I have every object of enjoyment and am never satisfied with a little.

I have never served another and am unskilled in the matter. I live according to my pleasure in the vana. All those who dwell with kings have to endure great apprehension because of evil talk against them. Vanavasis pass their days fearlessly, without anxiety and contentedly in the observance of vratas, living on fruits and roots, with no fear that arises in the heart of one whom the king summons.

Reflect, and you will see that simple food and drink obtained without effort, and sumptuous food procured with fear, differ widely from each other. I am of the opinion that happiness prevails where there is no anxiety. Only a few among those who serve kings are justly punished for their offences. A large number of them are falsely accused and suffer death.

If you still appoint me as your minister, O king of beasts, I want to make a compact with you regarding your conduct towards me. You should always heed my advice, which will ever be for your good. You will not interfere later with the arrangements that you will make for me.

I will never consult your other ministers because, if I do, they will find various faults in me to put me down. I will meet you alone, in secrecy, and advise you. In all matters regarding your kinsmen, you will not seek my advice. After you have consulted me, you will not punish your other ministers later in rage, nor will you punish my followers and dependants."

To this the king of beasts answered, "Tathaastu, let it be so!" and showed him every respect. The jackal then became the minister of the tiger.

When they saw the jackal treated with respect and honour, the previous servants of the king conspired together and began to show their hatred towards him. These evil servants at first tried to gratify and win him over with friendly overtures so that he would permit the misappropriation and abuse of the property of others, which they had so long enjoyed.

When they were unable to do as they pleased, they began to lure him with sweet talk and large bribes, but the wise jackal showed no signs of yielding to these temptations. Then some of them colluded to destroy him, stole the well-dressed meat intended for the tiger and placed it secretly in the jackal's house. The jackal knew who had stolen the meat and who the conspirators were, but he did nothing because of his covenant with the king.

When he was made a minister, he had said, "You want my friendship, O Rajan, but you will not mistrust me without cause."

When the king of beasts, feeling hungry, came to eat, he did not see any meat for his dinner and roared, "Find the thief!"

His deceitful ministers reported to him that his learned minister, the jackal, who was so proud of his own wisdom, had stolen the meat. Hearing this, the tiger became filled with rage and ordered his jackal to be seized. Seeing their opportunity, the former ministers told the king, "The jackal is always ready to steal our food."

They spoke of the jackal robbing the king of his food and said, "Such then is he! What is there that he would not venture to do? He is not as you had heard. He is righteous in speech but he is sinful and has disguised himself by putting on the garb of dharma. For selfish reasons he has practised austerities in diet and vows. If you do not believe us, we will show you proof."

They then caused the meat to be discovered in the jackal's home and reported it to the king. Based on this evidence and the complaints of his old servants, the king ordered the jackal to be executed.

The venerable mother of the tiger heard of this and came to awaken his good sense with wise advice. "Son, you should not accept this deceitful accusation. Evil men, out of envy and rivalry, impute faults to an honest man, as they cannot endure his exploits and success.

They ascribe faults even to a Dharmatman engaged in tapasya. Even for a Muni in vanavasa, harmlessly practising his svadharma, friends, neutrals and foes spring up. They who are greedy hate those who are pure; the idle hate the active; the uneducated hate the learned; the poor hate the rich; the evil man hates the man of dharma; and the ugly hate the beautiful. Many among the learned, the ignorant, the rapacious and the deceitful, would falsely accuse an innocent one, even if the latter possessed the virtues and intelligence of Brihaspati.

If the meat has really been stolen from your house, remember, while you search for the thief, that the jackal never takes any meat that anyone gives him. We notice that evil men sometimes appear good, and the good sometimes appear evil. A thorough examination is absolutely necessary.

The sky appears to be the solid base of a vessel and the firefly a spark of actual fire. In reality however, the sky has no base and there is no fire in the firefly. Ensure that there is close scrutiny, even of what appears to the eye, so that you don't regret it later.

It is not at all difficult, O son, for a master to put his servant to death. Forgiveness in the powerful, however, is always laudable and celebrated. You appointed the jackal as your prime minister and earned great fame among all our neighbouring jungle kings. A good minister cannot be found easily and, since the jackal is your well-wisher, you should support him.

The king who condemns an innocent one falsely accused by his enemies soon meets destruction at the hands of evil counsellors who influenced that decision."

After the tiger's mother had spoken, a good servant of the jackal, stepping out of the ranks of his foes, described how his enemies had fabricated the false accusation. The jackal's innocence was proved and the tiger acquitted and feted him, affectionately embracing him again and again.

The jackal, who knew Rajaneeti, however, burned with grief. He saluted the king of beasts and sought his permission to give up his life by observing the praya vrata. The tiger looked at the virtuous jackal, his eyes brimming with affection, and respectfully sought to dissuade him.

The jackal, seeing his master emotional, bowed to him and in a voice choked with tears, said, "You first honoured and later insulted me. Your conduct towards me is calculated to make me your enemy. It is not proper that I should stay with you any longer.

Servants who are discontented, who have been stripped of their office or deprived of their honour, who have been impoverished or whose enemies have ruined them through their master's anger, who have been weakened, who are rapacious, enraged, alarmed, deceived by their employers, whose property has been confiscated, who are proud and want to achieve great feats but do not have the means to earn wealth, and who burn with grief or rage due to some injury done to them, always hope for calamities to overcome their masters. Deceived, they leave their masters and become effective instruments in the hands of enemies.

You have insulted me and pulled me down from my place. How will you trust me again? How will I on my part continue to stay with you?

You thought me competent and gave me high office. However, you violated our compact and humiliated me. If you refer to someone as a Dharmatman, you should not then term him evil, if you want to maintain your steadfastness.

You no longer have any confidence in me, and this fills me with alarm and anxiety. Your suspicion and my fear will give our enemies opportunities to injure us, leaving your subjects uneasy and anxious.

Such a state of affairs has many faults, and the wise do not regard a situation as happy in which there is honour first and dishonour later. It is difficult to reunite two that you have separated, just as it is difficult to separate two who are united. If men reunite after separation, their conduct will not be affectionate.

There is no servant who does anything only to benefit his master. Service proceeds from the motive of doing good to the master, and also to oneself. One lives from selfish motives, because unselfish deeds or motives are rare, almost unknown. Kings whose hearts are restless and unquiet cannot acquire a true knowledge of men. Only one in a hundred can be found to be able or fearless. The prosperity of men and their fall, adversity and greatness, all proceed from weakness of understanding."

These conciliatory words of advice about dharma, kama and artha made the king happy. The intelligent jackal then left for the forest. Disregarding the entreaties of the king of beasts, he sat in praya, cast off his body and went to Swarga as the reward for his good karma on earth.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me in detail, O Dharmatman, what efforts a king must make to be happy.'

Bhishma replies, 'I will tell you the established truth about what a king should do in this world, and his dharma, so that he can be happy. Yudhishtira, a king should not behave like the camel in the story that I am about to relate to you!

There was, in the Krita yuga, a huge camel who could recollect all the events of his former life. He sat in tapasya and observed the most rigid vratas in the vana. This pleased the great Brahma so much that he granted him a boon.

The camel said, "Let my neck become long by your grace, O Holy One, so that I may be able to reach food that lies even at the end of a hundred yojanas."

The Mahatman, giver of boons said, "Tathaasthu!" and granted the wish.

Having obtained the boon, the camel returned to his own vana. The foolish animal, from the day of gaining the boon, became idle and did not go out to graze. One day, while the animal had extended his neck of a hundred yojanas and was grazing without any effort, a great storm arose. The camel, placing his head and a portion of the neck within the cave of a mountain, resolved to wait till the storm passed.

Meanwhile, it began to pour in torrents, inundating the whole terrain. A jackal, with his wife, drenched by the rain and shivering with cold, dragged himself with difficulty towards the very same cave and ran into it for shelter. Living as he did upon meat, and famished and tired as he was, O Bharatarishabha, the jackal, seeing the camel's neck, began to eat as much of it as he could. The camel strove desperately to shorten it, but the jackal and his wife did not lose their hold. Within a short time the foolish camel was dead. Having eaten the camel's head and throat, the jackals came out of the cave after the storm had abated. Thus the stupid camel met its death, which followed in the train of idleness.

As for yourself, control your senses, avoiding idleness, and do everything in the world conscientiously. Manu himself has said that victory depends upon intelligence. All karma accomplished with your intelligence is regarded as the best; karma achieved with the help of arms is average; that attained by the use of feet is inferior, while work done by carrying loads is the lowest. If the king is clever in the transaction of business and restrains his senses, his kingdom will thrive.

Manu has also maintained that with intelligence an ambitious man can achieve victory. Sinless one, in this world those who listen to advice that is not generally known, who have allies and who act only after careful consideration, achieve all their goals and rule the earth.

Yudhishtira, you who are powerful as Indra himself, the wise men of ancient times who know the shastras have held this view and I, too, say the same to you: In this world, Rajan, think before you act!'"

CANTO 113

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Bharatarishabha, how a ruler who has won possession of a precious kingdom behaves towards a powerful enemy.'

Bhishma replies, 'Let me relate to you the old story of the conversation between the Ocean and the rivers.

Long ago, the eternal Ocean, the lord of rivers, the refuge of the foes of the Devas, asked all the rivers to clear a doubt that had arisen in his mind. "I see that all you rivers bring away along with your rapid currents large tree trunks, torn off with their roots and branches. However, you do not ever bring me the cane that grows on your banks, which is thin and not strong. Tell me, do you refuse to uproot it out of contempt, or because it is of no use to you? Indeed, why do you not wash away the stalks of cane uprooted from the banks where they grow?"

The Ganga river replied to the Ocean, the lord of all rivers, wisely and sensibly: "Trees stay in one place and do not yield the spot where they stand. As a result, they resist our currents and we are obliged to uproot them. The cane, seeing the swelling currents, behaves differently. It bends and after the flood has subsided, resumes its former posture. The cane knows the virtues of time and opportunity, kaala and avasara. It is docile and obedient, yields without being obstinate and inflexible, and so remains where it grows, without us carrying it away. The plants, trees and creepers that bend and rise before the force of wind and water have never to suffer the fate of being uprooted."

He who does not yield to the power of an enemy greater in might, and in a position to imprison or kill him, soon meets with destruction. The wise man who acts only after he has fully ascertained the relative strengths and weaknesses, the stamina and energy, of himself and his enemy, has never to suffer embarrassment. An intelligent man, when he finds his enemy to be more powerful than himself, should be like the cane. This is true wisdom.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'How should a learned and modest man behave, O Bhaarata, when an ignorant and conceited braggart assails him with harsh words in a gathering?'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen, O lord of the earth, to what the shastras prescribe as the conduct of a mahatman when he is confronted in this world by abuse from unintelligent men. If he does not yield to anger, he is sure to take away the punya of all the good karma of the abuser. The sufferer in such a case transfers the paapa of all his own bad karma to the angry abuser. An intelligent man should disregard insulting language, which, after all, is merely like the screeching of a tittibha bird.

He who yields to hate, lives in vain. A fool can often be heard to say, "I addressed that respectable man in these words before an assembly of men," and to even boast of that vicious deed. He will add, "Abused by me, the man remained silent as if dead with shame."

A shameless man brags about something of which no one should boast. You must disregard such a wretch. The wise man should endure anything that fools say, for what can a vulgar fellow achieve by his praise or blame? He is like a crow that caws pointlessly in the vana.

If those who accuse others verbally could establish the charges by some means, then perhaps their words would be of some value. But empty words are as effective as those spoken by fools invoking death upon those they abuse.

Such a man only proclaims his own bastardy by his vile conduct; he is like a peacock that dances displaying its intimate body parts, which should properly be concealed. A man of pure conduct should never even speak with such sinful men, who have no scruples and say or do anything without shame.

He who speaks of someone's merits when his eyes are upon him, and speaks ill of him behind his back, is truly like a dog. Such a man loses prospect of bliss in Swarga as well as the fruits of any knowledge and dharma that he has earned. He who speaks ill of others behind their backs soon loses the punya earned from all his yagnas, libations and gifts made even to a hundred men.

A wise man should unhesitatingly avoid one who is sinful at heart and shunned by all honest men, just as he would avoid eating the flesh of a dog. The evil one who proclaims the faults of a Mahatman, actually demonstrates his own vile nature, just as a snake displays his hood when others excite it. The sensible man who seeks to rebut such a back-biter at his favourite work, is like a donkey sunk in a heap of ashes.

A man who always speaks ill of others should be avoided like a ferocious wolf, an infuriated elephant which trumpets in madness, or a rabid dog. Shame on the sinful, mean men who take to such a senseless path and abandoning all wholesome restraints and modesty, who always do what is injurious to others without care for their own welfare.

If an honest man wants to bandy words with such despicable men when they set out to humiliate him, you should advise him: "Do not allow yourself to be upset." Men of calm temperament never approve of an argument between a high and a low man. We know that an angry, slanderous, enraged man can slap another, pelt him with dirt, frighten him with snarls or grind his teeth at him. He who endures the complaints and abuse of evil men made in public, or who frequently reads these injunctions, never suffers any distress through verbal abuse.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Wise Pitamaha, as you care for the future of our family, you must clear some other doubts that perplex me, apart from how to deal with evil men who speak maliciously about us. I want to ask you further about what would be beneficial to a kingdom and will produce happiness, benefits and advancement in the present and the future to the royal line, about beneficial food and drink, and about a healthy body.

How should a ruling king, surrounded by friends, ministers and servants, make his people happy? The king who becomes a victim of his baser passions falls into evil company, looks for debased companions, finds that all his noble, wellborn and moral servants have abandoned him, and so loses their good advice. Such a king never succeeds in gaining the objectives whose accomplishment depend upon having good men around him.

You are equal to Brihaspati himself in intelligence and must explain to me the Rajadharma, which is difficult to understand. You, Naravyaghra, are constantly striving to achieve the good of our vamsa and advise us about the dharma of Rajaneeti.

The learned Kshatri Vidura, too, gives us valuable instructions. I could pass my days in happiness like a man who has quaffed amrita, listening to your teachings that are so beneficial to us Kshatriyas and the kingdom.

Which class of servants can one regard as inferior and which competent? What type of retainers, of what birth, can help us discharge our Rajadharma? If the king chooses to work alone and without assistance, he will never succeed in protecting his people. All noble men of high birth covet the power of sovereignty.'

Bhishma replies, 'The king, O Bhaarata, cannot rule his kingdom alone. Without retainers to help him, he cannot accomplish any goal. Even if he succeeds in gaining his objective, he cannot retain it alone. The king whose servitors are all knowledgeable and wise, devoted to the good of their master, of noble birth and of tranquil disposition, succeeds in enjoying the happiness of sovereignty.

That king enjoys the satisfaction of sovereignty whose ministers are of high birth, who cannot be lured away from him by bribes and other influences, who live with him and give him advice, who are wise, good, and have a knowledge of how matters are interrelated, who can provide for future events and contingencies, who have knowledge of the virtues of Time and never grieve for what is past. The king whose officials share with him his joys and sorrows, who are all faithful, strive to please him and direct their attention to the accomplishment of their master's objectives, enjoys the happiness that comes with sovereignty.

That king enjoys the true happiness of power whose subjects are always cheerful, distinguished and tread the path of dharma. He is the best of kings if contented and trustworthy men, experts in matters of finance, manage and supervise all the sources of his income. The king acquires wealth and great punya when incorruptible, trustworthy, devoted and generous servants supervise the replenishment of his granaries and stores.

The king who in his city administers justice lawfully and delivers criminal law in the manner of Sankha and Likhita, earns the punya of kingship. The king who binds his subjects to himself through kindness, who knows the Rajadharma, earns the punya of sovereignty.'"

"Bhishma says, 'An ancient tale relevant to our subject has been told which good and wise men regard as an important precedent. I heard many Maharishis recount it in the asrama of Rama, the son of Jamadagni.

In a certain large vana, uninhabited by humans, there dwelt a Rishi who, with his senses under control, lived upon fruit and roots and observed rigid vratas. He was a most perspicacious man, of tranquil and pure soul, who always recited the Vedic mantras, observed strict laws and self-restraint and, with a heart cleansed by fasts, lived a life of kindness towards all creatures.

When he sat in tapasya, all the creatures that lived in the forest who knew of his goodness and wisdom would approach him with affection. Fierce lions and tigers, huge choleric elephants, leopards, rhinoceroses, bears and other fierce carnivores, blood-drinkers, came and conversed with the Rishi, who knew all their tongues. They would greet him courteously and depart. Indeed, they always did what pleased him and behaved towards him like disciples.

One domestic animal, a dog, lived there permanently. He had a heart like that of a human being, was devoted and exceedingly attached to the Rishi and never left him at any time. Weak and emaciated with fasts, he subsisted upon fruit, roots and water. He was tranquil and inoffensive in nature and always lay at the feet of the great sage because of the love he received.

One day, a vicious leopard of cruel intent, always on the lookout for prey, a veritable second Yama, arrived hungry and thirsty, with slavering jaws, his tail flicking from side to side, and eyed the dog for his prey.

When he saw the fierce beast coming, O Rajan, the dog, in fear of his life, said to the Rishi, "O Maharishi, this leopard is an enemy of all dogs and it wants to kill me. Save me from this beast, wise Mahabaho!"

The Rishi could read the thoughts of every animal and understood that the dog had ample cause for fear. Possessed of the six attributes and fluent in the voices of all creatures, the Rishi said, "You will have no fear of death from leopards any longer. Let your natural form disappear and become a leopard, my son!"

Instantly, the dog was transformed into a leopard with skin bright as gold, spots on his body and large fangs, and thereupon began to live in the vana fearlessly. Meanwhile, the predatory leopard, seeing before him an animal of his own species, lost all feelings of animosity towards it.

Some time later a fierce and hungry tiger visited the asrama and padded with open mouth towards the dog that the Rishi had transformed into a leopard. Seeing the hungry tiger, the transfigured leopard sought the Rishi's protection. The Rishi, who had great affection for the leopard because it lived with him, now changed him into a powerful tiger. The other tiger, when he saw a beast of his own species, Rajan, did him no injury.

In course of time, the dog, now turned into a powerful carnivore, gave up his former diet of fruit and roots. Indeed, from that time, Rajan, the transformed tiger lived upon the flesh of other animals of the forest, like a true king of beasts.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The transfigured tiger, replete with the flesh of slain animals, slept easy. One day, as he lay in the yard, an infuriated elephant who looked like a great cloud, with rent cheeks, a lofty forehead, freckled with the dust of lotus filaments on his body, with long curved tusks and a trumpet deep as thunder, came to the asrama.

The tiger saw the enraged elephant approach him and, frantic with fear, sought the protection of the Rishi. The Rishi transformed the tiger into an elephant. The real elephant, when he saw one of his own kind, big as a mass of clouds, was scared away. The Rishi's elephant from then on frolicked in lakes overgrown with lotuses and wandered on their banks riddled with rabbit holes.

A considerable time elapsed in this way. One day, as he cheerfully strode along near the asrama, he was confronted by a maned mountain lion accustomed to killing elephants. When he saw the lion coming, the Rishi's elephant trembled with fear and sought the sage's protection. The Rishi transformed that prince of elephants into a lion. As the wild lion was of the same species, the Rishi's lion no longer feared him. On the other hand, the wild lion, seeing a stronger beast of his own kind before him, was intimidated.

The Rishi's lion began to live in the asrama within the forest, which the other animals no longer ventured to approach as they all feared for their lives. One day, a fierce Sarabha with eight legs and eyes on its forehead, who preyed on all other animals and petrified them with fear, came to that asrama hunting the Rishi's lion. The Rishi transformed his lion into a fiercer and more powerful Sarabha, who quickly put the other to flight.

Thereafter it lived happily with the Rishi in the asrama and all the animals that dwelt in the forest were afraid of it. Their dread and desire to save their lives led them to flee the vana. The Sarabha blithely continued every day to kill animals for his food and became a carnivorous beast, as it no longer cared for the fruit and roots upon which it had once subsisted.

One day, that ungrateful creature who had first been a dog but who was now a Sarabha, thirsting for blood, wanted to kill the Rishi. The wise Rishi, through his ascetic power, understood the intentions of the beast and cursed him, "O dog, I first converted you into a leopard and then into a tiger. From a tiger I changed you into a bull elephant in musth, and then into a lion. From a mighty lion I transformed you into a Sarabha. I changed you into these diverse shapes out of affection for you. You never belonged by birth to any of these species. Since you now want to kill me, one who has done you no injury, O sinful one, become a dog again!"

Immediately, the low, foolish and wicked animal resumed his own natural form of a lowly dog.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The dog, after he assumed his natural form, was very cast down. The Rishi reprimanded him and drove the sinful creature away from his asrama.

Guided by this precedent, an intelligent king should appoint servants fit for the office assigned to each and exercise proper supervision over them. He should first ascertain their truthfulness, purity, sincerity and general disposition, knowledge of the shastras, conduct, birth, self-restraint, compassion, strength, energy, dignity and forgiveness. A king should never appoint a minister without first evaluating him.

If a king gathers round him men of low birth, he will never be happy. A man of noble birth, even if unfairly persecuted by his royal master, will never try to injure him, while one of mean and low birth who becomes rich and powerful through his royal connection, will become his master's enemy even if only verbally rebuked.

A minister should be of high birth and strength; he should be forgiving, self-restrained, with his senses under control; he should not be greedy but contented with his just acquisitions, delight in the prosperity of his master and friends and know the requirements of time and place—kaala and avasara.

He should always recruit useful men who keep their lord's dharma in mind, remain attentive and faithful in the discharge of their svadharma, are masters in the strategy of war and peace, and are loved both by the citizens and the inhabitants of the provinces.

The minister should be a master of all kinds of vyuhas that can cleave and shatter his enemies' ranks, a general skilled in leading the army on the march, able to inspire his master's army with courage and to read signs and gestures, adept in the art of training elephants, confident of his own powers, free from pride and clever in the transaction of business.

He should always do what is right, follow svadharma, select noble friends, be sweet of speech, good-looking, with marked qualities of leadership, well-versed in policy, accomplished, energetic in action, active, ingenious, of a sweet temper, modest in appearance, patient, brave, rich, and adaptable to the requirements of time and place. The king who finds such a minister will never be humiliated or overpowered by anyone. Indeed, his kingdom will gradually spread over the earth like the light of the moon.

A king who knows the shastras, who recognizes the supremacy of dharma, who always protects his subjects and who has the following virtues, obtains the love of all. He should be patient, forgiving, pure in conduct, severe when required, believe in hard work, be respectful towards all his elders, know the shastras, remain ready to listen to those who are competent to instruct, to give advice and be able to judge correctly between conflicting courses of action suggested to him.

He should be intelligent, have a retentive memory, be just in action, self-restrained, sweet-spoken, forgiving even to enemies, practise personal charity and have perfect faith in God. He should be of pleasing aspect, ready to extend a helping hand to men in distress, be free from egoism, never without a wife, refrain from acting in haste, and appoint ministers who always seek his good.

He should always reward his ministers when they achieve anything singular. He should avoid idleness, attract men to himself by doing them good and cherish those devoted to him. He should always be cheerful and attentive to the wants of his servants, and never give way to anger. He should be magnanimous and wield the Dandaneeti justly. He should make all men around him follow dharma.

He should use spies for his eyes, to supervise his subjects' concerns and all matters connected with their dharma and artha. A king who has these hundred qualifications earns the love of all, so every ruler should strive to emulate him.

The king who wants his own advancement should never disregard his army and should enlist able warriors to help him protect his kingdom. If his commanders are brave in battle, grateful, well versed in the shastras, if the foot-soldiers are familiar with the treatises on religion and dharma, if the elephant-warriors are fearless, if the Maharathas are skilled archers and can wield other weapons, he will conquer the whole world.

The king who strives to win over all men, who is ever eager for hard work, who has many friends and allies, becomes the greatest of rulers. A king who can bond all men to himself, will conquer the whole world, O Bhaarata, with just a thousand brave horsemen.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The king who is guided by the moral of this dog's story and appoints his courtiers to offices for which they are fit, enjoys the happiness that comes with sovereignty. You should not praise and elevate a dog in a position above his competence because he will become intoxicated with pride. Ministers should be appointed to offices for which they are fit and should be suitably qualified for their occupations. The wise do not approve appointments of unworthy men.

The king who confers on his servitors offices for which each is competent will enjoy the happiness that comes with sovereignty. A Sarabha should occupy the position of a Sarabha; a lion should bristle with the might of a lion; a tiger should be a tiger, and a leopard should remain a leopard.

Ministers and servitors should be appointed to offices for which each is suitable according to the law. If you want to achieve success, never appoint them to situations higher than their deserving. The foolish king who, ignoring precedent, appoints servants to offices for which they are unfit, will not please his subjects.

A king who wants accomplished retainers should never appoint unintelligent, petty-minded men who cannot control their senses and who are of low birth. Men who are honest, of noble birth, brave, learned, devoid of malice and envy, lofty-minded, pure in conduct and clever in business matters, deserve to be appointed as ministers.

Humble men, prompt in discharging their duties, tranquil in disposition, pure in mind, with diverse natural abilities and who are above reproach should be advisors to the king.

A lion should always have only a lion as a companion, otherwise the companion will earn all the advantages of the lion, and the lion, none. The lion that has only a pack of dogs for his associates will never benefit from such a friendship in accomplishing his dharma.

A king can succeed in subduing the whole world if he has for his ministers men of courage, wisdom, learning and high birth. Yudhishtira, kings should never keep counsellors who are not learned, sincere, wise and wealthy. Men who devote themselves to the service of their master are never hindered by any impediments, so kings should always speak to them in peaceful terms.

The king should look after his treasury with great care and always try to augment it, since therein lie his roots. Let your granary be filled with corn and increase your wealth; but let their supervision be entrusted to honest retainers.

Let your officers be always attentive to their work, acquire skill in battle and in managing horses. Yudhishtira, look after the interests of your kinsmen and friends, always be in their midst and seek the good of your city.

With this story of the dog, I have instructed you about your dharma towards your subjects. What else do you want to hear?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have, O Bhaarata, discoursed upon the many duties of Rajaneeti that wise men who knew the Rajadharma of old observed and passed down. You spoke in detail of those duties that they approved. Will you now give me a summary of all this, O Bharatarishabha, so that I can commit it firmly to memory?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, Rajan, to how the protection of all creatures, the greatest duty of the Kshatriya, is to be exercised. A king who knows his duties should assume many forms, like the peacock that puts forth plumes of diverse hues. Keenness, crookedness, truth and sincerity, are the qualities that should be present in him.

With thorough impartiality, he should practise the qualities of goodness, if he is to earn happiness. He must assume that particular hue or form which is suitable for the particular object he seeks to accomplish. A king who can adopt diverse forms will be able to carry out even the most subtle objectives. Dumb like the peacock in autumn, he should conceal his counsel. He should speak little and the little he speaks should be sweet. He should be attractive and well versed in the shastras.

He should always carefully guard those gates through which danger can overcome him, like men taking care of breaks in embankments through which the waters of large tanks can rush out and flood their fields and houses. He should seek the refuge of Mahatman Brahmanas, like men who seek the refuge of great rivers engendered by rainwater collected in mountain lakes.

The king who wishes to amass wealth should behave like religious hypocrites who wear a coronal lock. He should retain the danda of chastisement uplifted in his hands and levy taxes only after he has carefully examined the incomes and expenses of his subjects, as one selects a full-grown palmyra tree for drawing its juice.

He should behave equitably towards his own subjects, get his cavalry to trample the crops of his enemies, march against foes when his own wings have become strong and, most of all, understand his own weakness. He should proclaim the faults of his enemies, crush their supporters and collect wealth from outside like a man who plucks flowers from the vana. He should destroy the mightier kings who stand with uplifted heads like mountains, by placating the governors of their citadels and the garrisons, and by ambuscades and sudden attacks.

He should enter his nightly quarters alone and unseen, like the peacock in the rainy season, and enjoy within his inner apartments the companionship of his wives. He should protect himself, not take off his armour, and avoid the nets that spies and secret agents of his enemies spread for him. He should also win over the spies of his enemies, but kill them when an opportunity occurs.

Like the peacock, the king should kill his powerful and angry foes of crooked policy, destroy their forces and drive them away from their homes. Similarly, he should do what is good for himself and gather wisdom from everywhere, as the peacock collects insects from the forest.

A wise king should thus rule his kingdom and adopt a policy that is beneficial to him. He should exercise his own acumen, decide what to do, and then consult others to either abandon or confirm such decisions. The shastras are useful because they sharpen the intellect and help one to choose a proper course of action.

By the art of conciliation, a king should inspire confidence in the hearts of his enemies. He should display his own strength, form his own conclusions, and judge different courses of action in his own mind, using his intelligence. The king should be wise and well-versed in the arts of diplomacy; he must do what is necessary and avoid what is not.

A wise and intelligent man does not require advice or instruction. If, for instance, a man like Brihaspati is disgraced, he soon regains his natural disposition, like heated iron dipped in water. A king should accomplish all objectives, his own or those of others, in accordance with the shastras. A king who knows to acquire wealth should always employ men who are of mild disposition, courageous, wise and powerful. When he sees his servitors employed in activities for which each is fit, he should work in harmony with all of them, like the several strings of a musical instrument tuned to their intended tones.

He should do good to all and never transgress the dictates of dharma. The king of whom everybody thinks, "He is mine," stands unshaken like a hill. When he adjudicates between litigants, he should not differentiate between whom he likes and dislikes, but uphold justice.

He should appoint to all his offices men who know the characters of particular families, of the masses of the people and of different countries; who are mild in speech; of middle age; who have no faults; who are devoted to good work; who are never careless; who are free from greed; who are learned and self-restrained; who are firm in virtue and always prepared to uphold the interests of both dharma and artha. Thus, when he has decided on his courses of action and their final objectives, he should proceed to achieve them carefully and, advised by his spies in all matters, he can live happily.

The king who never gives way to wrath and joy without sufficient cause, who supervises all his actions himself and personally controls his income and expenditure, will find great wealth in this world. It is said that the king who rewards his officers and subjects publicly for any good they do, who chastises those who deserve punishment, who protects himself and his kingdom from every evil, knows the dharma of Rajaneeti. Like the sun, who casts his rays upon everything below, the king should always look after his kingdom himself and, using his intelligence, supervise all his agents and officers.

The king should take wealth from his subjects at the proper time and never publicize what he does. Like an able man who milks his cow, he should milk his kingdom every day. As the bee collects honey from flowers, the king should draw wealth little by little from his kingdom and store it. After he has kept apart a sufficient portion, the remainder should be spent on the acquisition of punya and the gratification of kama. A sensible king who knows his dharma would never waste what he has stored, or disregard any wealth for its meagreness; he should never ignore enemies for their being powerless; he should exercise his own intelligence, be self-aware and never repose confidence in stupid men.

Steadiness, cleverness, self-restraint, intelligence, health, patience, bravery and attention to the demands of time and place: these eight qualities lead to the increase of wealth, be it small or great. A little fire, fed with clarified butter, may blaze forth into a conflagration. A single seed may produce a thousand trees. A king, therefore, even when he hears that his income and expenditure are great, should not disregard what appear to be small things. Just as an enemy, whether he happens to be a child, a young man, or an aged one, can kill a careless man, an insignificant enemy, when he becomes powerful, can exterminate a king. A king who is conscious of the requirements of time is the best of all rulers.

A strong or weak enemy can very soon out of malice destroy the reputation of a king, obstruct his acquisition of religious punya, and even deprive him of his vitality. Therefore, a king with a disciplined mind should never be heedless of his foes.

If a disciplined king desires riches and victory, he should, after he has evaluated his expenditure, income, savings and administration, make either peace or war. For this reason, the king should seek the help of a clever minister, because shrewdness weakens even a mighty protagonist; power that is increasing will be protected by astuteness; a growing enemy is weakened through cunning. Every action that is undertaken intelligently is praiseworthy.

A patient and impeccable king can satisfy all his wishes even with the support of a small force. However, the king who is vain and covetous, who surrounds himself with self-seeking flatterers, will never prosper in the least. For these reasons, the king should act with consideration when he taxes the wealth of his people, for if he continually oppresses them, he will be destroyed like a flash of lightning that blazes forth for only a moment.

Knowledge, tapasya, riches, indeed everything, can be earned through hard work. Parisrama, as it occurs in living creatures, is governed by intelligence, and one should regard it as the greatest of all things. In the human body live many intelligent entities of great energy, like Sakra, Vishnu and Saraswati. An intelligent man, therefore, should never disregard the body.

A greedy man can be dominated by constant gifts, as he is never satisfied with seizing the wealth of others. However, everyone becomes jealous in the matter of enjoying happiness. If a man becomes poor, he loses both dharma and kama, which are objects that artha can attain.

An envious man will try to take the wealth, the enjoyments, the sons and daughters and the affluence of others. We can see every kind of fault in covetous men, so the king should never take such a man for his minister or officer.

A wise king lacking proper agents should despatch even a low functionary to ascertain the disposition and actions of his enemies, in order to frustrate their efforts and designs. The trustful and noble king who seeks the advice of learned and virtuous Brahmanas, and who is protected by his ministers, will be able to keep all his vassals and chieftains under control.

Rajan, I have briefly spoken to you of all the duties laid down in the shastras. Attend to them intelligently, for the king who does so, in obedience to his acharya, will surely rule the whole world. The king who disregards the satisfaction that comes from following a plan, and depends upon what chance will bring, neither enjoys the happiness of kingship nor wins the regions of bliss hereafter.

A king who is vigilant and attentive to the requirements of war and peace will be able to destroy even enemies who are famed for their wealth, who are esteemed for their intelligence and good conduct, who are brave in battle, accomplished and hard-working.

A king should discover the consequences of different kinds of activities and procedures, and never depend upon destiny. One who sees defects in faultless men cannot become prosperous and famous. When two friends try to complete the same work, a wise man always commends the one who takes upon himself the heavier share. Practise this Rajadharma that I have told you, be determined to do your duty to protect all your subjects, and you will easily obtain the rewards of dharma.

All the regions of felicity in the hereafter depend upon dharma and punya!'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, you have finished your discourse on Rajadharma. From what you have said it is clear that Neeti has a crucial position and is the key, for everything depends upon chastisement. It seems that Neeti possesses great energy, is omnipresent and is the greatest among the Devas, Rishis, high-souled Pitris, Yakshas, Rakshasas, Pisachas and Sadhyas, or any of the living beings in this world, including beasts and birds.

You have said that the entire universe, mobile and immobile, including Devas, Asuras and Manushyas, depends upon danda. I now want to know from you, O Bharatarishabha, who Neeti is truly, of what kind, of what form and disposition. Of what is he made, what is his origin, what are his features and his grandeur? How does he manage to remain eternally wakeful among living creatures, protecting this universe? Who is he, this supreme personage called Neeti? Upon what does Neeti depend, and what is his path?'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen, Kurusthama, to who Neeti is and why he is also called Vyavahara, and why danda is that upon whom Vyavahara depends. Law, sometimes called Vyavahara, is that which upholds the dharma of a vigilant and alert king.

In olden days, Manu first declared this truth: "He who protects all creatures, the loved and the hateful equally, impartially wielding the Dandaneeti, is the embodiment of dharma."

Since Manu began with these words, they are known as the first words and represent the transcendent word of Brahma. Since it is with the Dandaneeti that we stop the misappropriation of people's possessions, we call it Vyavahara. The traiguna always rests on well-administered chastisement.

Danda is a great Deva. In form, he looks like a blazing fire. His complexion is dark like that of the petals of the blue lotus. He has four teeth, four arms, eight legs and many eyes. His ears are pointed like shafts and his hair stands upright. He has matted locks and two tongues. His face is the hue of copper and he is clad in a lion's skin. This irresistible deity assumes a fierce shape.

Danda moves in the world assuming the form of the sword, the bow, the mace, the dart, the trident, the mallet, the arrow, the bludgeon, the battle-axe, the discus, the noose, the heavy club, the rapier, the lance and in fact of every kind of weapon that exists on earth. Indeed, punishment moves on earth, piercing, cutting, smiting, lopping, dividing, striking, slaying and attacking his victims.

These, Yudhishtira, are some of the names which Danda bears: Sword, Sabre, Dharma, Fury, the Irresistible, the Parent of Prosperity, Victory, Punisher, Checker, the Eternal, the shastras, Brahmana, Mantra, Avenger, the Greatest of First Legislators, Judge, the everlasting God, the One whose course is irresistible, the Unceasing, the First-born, the individual without affections, the Soul of Rudra, the eldest Manu and the great Benefactor.

Dandaneeti is the holy Vishnu, the powerful Narayana, and because he always assumes a terrible form, he is called Mahapurusha. His wife Dharma is also known by the names of Brahmana's daughter, Lakshmi, Vriti, Saraswati, and Mother of the universe. Dandaneeti thus has many forms.

Blessing and curse, pleasure and pain, dharma and adharma, strength and weakness, fortune and misfortune, merit and demerit, virtue and vice, desire and aversion, season and month, night, day and hour, care and carelessness, joy and anger, peace and self-restraint, destiny and exertion, salvation and condemnation, fear and fearlessness, injury and ahimsa, tapasya, yagna and nirvritti, poison and healthy food, the beginning, the middle and the end, the result of all murderous deeds, insolence, insanity, arrogance, pride, patience, policy, disorder, powerlessness and power, respect, disrespect, decay and stability, humility, charity, timeliness and untimeliness, falsehood, wisdom, truth, belief, disbelief, impotence, trade, profit, loss, success, defeat, ferocity, mildness, death, acquisition and loss, agreement and disagreement, that which should be done and that which should not, strength and weakness, malice and good-will, disgrace and honour, modesty, prosperity and adversity, energy, action, learning, eloquence, keenness of understanding: all these, Yudhishtira, are the multiple forms of the Dandaneeti in this world.

If the Law had not existed, all living creatures would have harassed or killed one another, for it is fear of punishment that restrains them. When the Dandaneeti protects subjects it enhances the might of their ruler, for Danda is the best refuge of all.

It quickly sets the world on the path of dharma, which depends upon satya and dwells in Brahmanas. Empowered by dharma, the greatest of Brahmanas become attached to the Vedas. From the Vedas the sacrifices flow which please the Devas. The gratified Devas then recommend the inhabitants of the earth to Indra, who gives them food in the form of rain, without which crops and vegetation would fail. The life of all creatures depends upon food which provides them with nourishment for growth.

For this purpose, Danda assumes among them the form of a Kshatriya ruler, who remains alert, protecting them, always vigilant and never failing.

Law has these other eight names—God, Man, Life, Power, Heart, the Lord of all creatures, the Atman of all things, and the Living Entity. God gave both wealth and the rod of chastisement to the strong king in the form of military forces which are a combination of five constituents: Dharma, Vyavahara, Dandaneeti, Ishwara and Prani.

Yudhishtira, the king should seek noble blood, wealthy ministers, knowledge, power in the form of strength of body and energy of mind, with the eight instruments—elephants, horses, chariots, foot-soldiers, boats, slaves as camp followers for doing other work, increase of population and cattle—and the other force which depends upon a well-filled treasury.

The army accoutered in mail and livery, with Maharathas, elephant-warriors, cavalry, infantry, officers and surgeons constitute the limbs. Beggars, principal judges, astrologers, priests who perform propitiatory and Atharvan rites, the treasury, allies, grain and all other requisites, composed of seven attributes and eight limbs, constitute the body of a kingdom. Law is another powerful limb of a kingdom and in the form of an army is the very creator of a kingdom. God himself has with great care sent Danda for the use of the Kshatriya, and this eternal universe is impartial Neeti's self.

There is nothing more worthy of respect by kings than Danda, by which the ways of dharma are defined. Brahma, for the protection of the world and for establishing the dharma of different individuals, created chastisement. The common law or Vyavahara, arising out of the dispute of litigants, has also sprung from Brahma.

When a suit, civil or criminal, is instituted, the king or those who work in the king's name must call for evidence and decide in favour of one or the other party. There follows danda or punishment. Principally characterized by a belief in either of the two parties, this Vyavahara is seen to bring about good. There is another kind of Vyavahara which has the Vedas for its soul and its cause. There is a third kind of Vyavahara, O tiger among kings—Kulachara, which deals with family customs consistent with the shastras.

Vyavahara, based on the belief that either of two litigant parties is right, is inherent in the king, and should be also known as Evidence. Although judgement and punishment are regulated by Evidence, yet one says it has its soul in Vyavahara, which is based upon Vedic precepts.

That Vyavahara which has the Vedas for its soul, is dharma or duty, and benefits all men who believe in it. Mahatmans have spoken of the Vyavahara as they have done of ordinary law.

The third kind of Vyavahara is also an acharya of men and also has its roots in the Veda, O Yudhishtira. It upholds the three worlds. It has Truth for its soul and produces prosperity. That which is Danda we have seen to be the eternal Vyavahara and is actually the Veda, dharma and duty.

That which is morality and duty is the path of dharma from the beginning, and is Pitamaha Brahma, the Lord of all creatures. Brahma is the Creator of the entire universe with the Devas, Asuras, Rakshasas, Manushyas, Nagas, and of every other entity. Hence the Vyavahara which is based on the belief that either of two litigant parties is right, also flows from Him.

For this reason Manu has laid down the following in respect of Vyavahara: Neither mother, nor father, nor brother, nor wife, nor priest, are above punishment by the king who rules strictly according to his dharma.'"

"Bhishma says, 'An old story is told about great Vasuhoma, king of the Angas. He and his queen were always engaged in pious work and practised the most rigid tapasya.

He went to Munjaprishtha, held in high esteem by the Pitris and the Devarishis, where on the summit of Himavat, near the golden mountains of Meru, the great Brahmana Rama had sat under the shade of a renowned banyan tree, his hair matted in jata. Rishis of rigid vratas call Munjaprishtha the favourite haunt of Rudra.

King Vasuhoma lived there, acquired many spiritual powers, gained the esteem of the Brahmanas and came to be regarded as a Devarishi. One day, the great Parantapa King Mandhatri, the mighty friend of Indra, came to the mountain retreat and stood before Vasuhoma of austere tapasya in an attitude of humility.

Vasuhoma offered arghya to his guest and water to wash his feet, and enquired about the well-being of all seven limbs of his kingdom. He then asked his royal guest, who faithfully followed the practices of the ancient men of dharma, "What can I do for you, O Rajan?"

Mandhatri, the best of kings, highly gratified, answered the wise Vasuhoma seated at his ease, "You have studied all the doctrines of Brihaspati, Rajan, and those laid down by Usanas. I want to know what the origin of Neeti is. What was awake before Chastisement? What is said to be its end? How did Danda come to depend upon the Kshatriya? Tell me all this, O you of great wisdom! I come to you as a shishya, acknowledge you as my guru and am ready to give you gurudakshina."

Vasuhoma said, "Listen, Mandhatri, to how Neeti, the upholder of the world, arose. The soul of dharma is eternal, ananta, and was created to uphold the appropriate governance of all creatures. We hear that, once upon a time, the Pitamaha of all the worlds, the divine Brahma, wanted to perform a sacrifice, but failed to find a priest whose competence equalled his own.

He then conceived such a priest in his head and held the embryo there for long years. After a thousand years had passed, the great God sneezed, and the embryo fell out of his head. The divine being that thus took birth from Brahma came to be called Kshupa, a great lord of creatures, who possessed enormous powers and became the priest at the yagna of the Mahatman Pitamaha.

When the yagna began, Brahma assumed the mild and peaceful aspect of a sacrificer and Chastisement, which had dwelt in his furious form, disappeared, causing great confusion among all creatures. There was no longer any distinction between what should be done and what should not, between clean and unclean food, and between what drink was permissible and what was not.

All creatures began to do violence to one another, and there were no restraints in the matter of the union of the sexes. All ideas of property ceased, all creatures began to rob and lawlessly take meat from one another. The strong began to kill the weak, and nobody had the slightest consideration for his neighbour.

The Pitamaha then worshipped the divine and eternal Vishnu, the great boon-giver and said, "Kesava, show mercy and remove this pervasive chaos."

Thus addressed, the best of gods, Vishnu, reflected long and created his own self in the form of Danda. From that form, which had Dharma for its legs, Goddess Saraswati created the Dandaneeti, the science of Punishment, which soon became celebrated the world over. Mahavishnu again reflected awhile and appointed some among the Devas as the lords or rulers of their respective varnas.

It was then that he made the divine Indra, the thousand-eyed, the king of the Devas; Yama, the son of Vivaswat, the lord of the Pitris; Kubera, the lord of treasures and of all the Rakshasas; Meru, the king of mountains; and Sagara, the lord of rivers. He installed the powerful Varuna with the sovereignty of the waters and the Asuras, made Yama the lord of life and all living things and Agni the lord of all things possessed of energy.

He made the powerful Isana, Mahatman and eternal Mahadeva of three eyes, the lord of the Rudras; Vasishtha, the lord of the Brahmanas, and Jatavedas the chief of the Vasus; Surya, the lord of all luminous bodies, Chandramas, the king of stars and constellations, Ansumat, the lord of all herbs; and the mightiest of deities, Kumara or Skanda, of twelve arms, the chief of all the spirits and ghostly beings, the ganas that wait upon Mahadeva.

He made Kaala, Time, who possesses the seeds of both destruction and growth, the sovereign of all creatures and also of the four portions of Death—weapons, diseases, Yama and deeds and, lastly, of grief and joy. The Srutis declare, Rajan, that the supreme God Mahadeva, the Lord of Lords armed with his Sula, is the lord of the Rudras. The danda of punishment was given to Brahma's son Kshupa, the lord of all creatures and the best of all Dharmatmans.

On the completion of the yagna according to the prescribed rites, Mahadeva Brahma, with due reverence, gave Neeti, the protector of dharma, to Vishnu. Vishnu gave it to Angiras Maharishi, who in turn passed it down to Indra and Marichi. Marichi gave it to Bhrigu, who gave the Dandaneeti, meant for the protection of dharma, to all the Rishis. The Rishis gave it to the regents of the world and the Lokapalas gave it again to Kshupa. Kshupa then gave it to Manu, the son of Surya and Manu, the Deva of Sraddhas, gave it to his sons for the sake of true dharma and artha.

Chastisement, which is intended to restrain evil, should be applied with discrimination, always guided by dharma and not by caprice. Fines and forfeitures are meant to strike fear, and not to fill the king's treasury. Sentences of maiming a person's body or inflicting death or physical pain by various means, hurling from mountain-tops and banishment, should never be imposed for trivial causes. Surya's son Manu gave the Dandaneeti to his sons for the protection of the world. Danda in the hands of its successive bearers remains awake to protect all creatures.

Above, the divine Indra is awake with the Dandaneeti; below him, Agni of blazing flames; followed by Varuna, then Prajapati, then Vairagya, whose essence is restraint and discipline, after whom come Dharma, the son of Brahma, the eternal Neeti, and then Tejas, always awake and employed in the work of protection.

After Tejas, come the herbs offered in yagnas to support the Devas and used as food and medicines; after the herbs, the mountains; after the mountains, all kinds of juices and their essences; after these, the Devi Niriti; after Niriti, the planets and the luminous bodies in heaven; after these, the Vedas; after the Vedas, the powerful Vishnu as Hayagriva; after him, the almighty and eternal Pitamaha Brahma. After Pitamaha, the divine and blessed Mahadeva; after Mahadeva, the Viswadevas; after them, the Maharishis; after the Rishis the divine soma; after soma, the Nitya Devas; after them, know that the Brahmanas are awake.

After the Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas righteously protect all creatures. The Kshatriyas keep awake the eternal universe, which consist of mobile and immobile creatures, and Chastisement is awake among them. With magnificence akin to that of Pitamaha himself, Neeti keeps together and upholds everything. Kaala, O Bhaarata, is always awake, in the beginning, the middle and the end. The master of all the worlds, the lord of all creatures, the powerful and blessed Mahadeva, the Devadeva, is always awake. He is called by these names also—Kapardin, Sankara, Rudra, Bhava, Sthanu and Umapati, the lord of Uma. Thus, Danda also keeps awake in the beginning, the middle and the end. A king of dharma should rule justly, guided by the Dandaneeti."

He who listens to this teaching of Vasuhoma and conducts himself according to its spirit is sure to have all his wishes fulfilled. O Bharatarishabha, I have now, told you everything about Danda—the restrainer of the universe, which is governed by dharma.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I want to hear, O Pitamaha, the generally accepted conclusions on the subject of dharma, artha, kama, their respective roots and outcomes. On which of these does the course of life depend? We sometimes observe them to mingle with one another and sometimes to exist separately, independent of one another.'

Bhishma replies, 'When men in this world endeavour with good intentions to earn artha with the help of dharma, then the three, dharma, artha and kama, will co-exist in a state of union in respect of time, cause and action.

Artha has its root in dharma and kama is the fruit of artha. All three again have their root in will. Will is concerned with objects. All objects, again, in their entirety, exist for gratifying kama. Upon these does the traiguna depend. Complete withdrawal from all objects is mukti.

Dharma is needed for the protection of the body, artha for the acquisition of dharma, and kama for the gratification of the senses. All three have the quality of rajas or passion.

If one seeks dharma, artha and kama for the sake of Swarga or other such rewards, they are remote because the rewards themselves are distant. When one seeks them for the sake of the Knowledge of the Self, the rewards are immediate. One should seek dharma only for achieving purity of soul; artha to devote to work undertaken without desire of any reward, and kama only to support the body.

One should not cast off dharma, artha and kama even mentally, until one has freed oneself through tapasya. The aim of the first three purusharthas is the fourth one, mukti, if only man can obtain it!

Actions, undertaken and completed even with intelligence, may or may not yield the expected results. Dharma is not always the root of artha, for things other than virtue lead to wealth, such as service and agriculture. There is also a contrary opinion, for some say that one acquires wealth through chance, or birth, or other like causes. In some instances, the attainment of artha produces evil, while others hold the view that artha spent on sacrifices has led to the acquisition of dharma.

Therefore a dullard, whose understanding ignorance has debased, can never acquire the highest aim of dharma and artha, which is mukti. Dharma is worthless if sought for reward; artha is impure if wealth is hoarded; but when purged of these impurities, they produce great results.

A discussion is said to have taken place long ago between Rishi Kamandaka and King Angaristha. One day, Angaristha saluted Kamandaka as he was comfortably seated and, taking advantage of a long-sought opportunity, asked him, "If a king impelled by lust and folly commits sins for which he later repents, through what actions, O Rishi, can he wash away those sins? If an ignorant man commits a sin in the belief that he is acting righteously, how will the king stop this sin from gaining currency among men?"

Kamandaka said, "The man who abandons dharma and artha and pursues only kama reaps the destruction of his intelligence. Heedlessness then follows, destroys both virtue and wealth, and leads to godlessness and inveterate wickedness of conduct.

If the king does not restrain such evil men of sinful conduct, all good subjects will live in fear of him, like the inmates of a room where a snake has hidden itself. The subjects, including Brahmanas and all pious men, will not follow such a king. As a result, he incurs great danger and ultimately the risk of death itself. Disgraced and insulted, he has to drag on a miserable existence equal to death.

Men learned in the shastras have indicated the following method for checking sin. The king should always dedicate himself to the study of the three Vedas, be devoted to dharma and make alliances of marriage with noble families. He should respect the Brahmanas, give them good offices and wait upon high-minded ones who possess the virtue of mercy. He should perform ablutions, chant sacred mantras and thus pass his time righteously and happily.

Banishing all evil subjects from himself and his kingdom, he should seek the companionship of Dharmatmans. He should please all with his speech or good karma. He should tell everyone ‘I am yours,’ and proclaim the virtues of even his enemies. Thus, he will soon cleanse himself of his sins and win the high regard of all.

You should complete all the important duties your elders and gurus tell you to perform, and you will be certain to gain great benefits as a result of their blessings.”””

"Yudhishtira says, 'Everyone on earth, O greatest of men, lauds conduct that conforms to dharma. However, I have grave doubts about this praise. If we are to understand this, I want to hear everything about the way in which virtuous behaviour can be acquired and what its characteristics are.'

Bhishma replies, 'Once, Duryodhana asked his father Dhritarashtra the same question, when he was afire with jealousy at the sight of you and your brothers' opulence in Indraprastha, and for the jeers he received when made to look a fool in your magnificent court, the Mayasabha. Listen to what happened then, O Bhaarata. When he had seen your grand sabha and your great prosperity, Duryodhana spoke of it to his father.

Dhritarashtra then asked his son and Karna, "Tell me, why do you grieve, Duryodhana? If there is adequate reason for your sorrow, I will try to advise you. O subjugator of hostile towns, you too have obtained great riches; all your brothers, friends and relatives are obedient to you and you also wear the best clothes, eat the richest food and ride the finest horses. Why, then, have you become pale and emaciated?"

Duryodhana said, "Tens of thousands of ascetic Snataka Brahmanas daily eat at Yudhishtira's palace from golden plates. When I see the great prosperity of my enemies, the sons of Pandu, Yudhishtira's splendid palace adorned with beautiful flowers and fruit, his horses of the Tittiri and the Kalmasha breeds, his diverse raiment and his wealth that equals that of Vaisravana himself, I burn with grief, father!"

Dhritarashtra said, “If you wish to become prosperous like Yudhishtira, or even richer, endeavour to be virtuous, my son, for then without doubt you can conquer the three worlds by conduct alone. There is nothing impossible that dharma cannot attain. Mandhatri conquered the whole world in course of one night, Janamejaya, in three and Nabhaga, in seven. All these kings possessed compassion and were men of dharma, and so won the earth with their virtue.”

Duryodhana said, “I want to hear, O Bhaarata, of that dharma by which the kings you named won the earth so swiftly.”

Dhritarashtra said, “Let me relate the story that Narada once recounted on the subject of dharma. Long ago, the Daitya Prahlada, by the punya of his karma, snatched from noble Indra his sovereignty and reduced the three worlds to subjection. Then Indra, Lord of the Devas, approached the wise Brihaspati with folded hands and said to the great Devaguru, ‘I want you to tell me what the source of happiness is.’

Brihaspati replied that the knowledge which leads to mukti is the source of the highest happiness. Indra then asked him again whether there was anything still higher.

Brihaspati said, ‘There is something still higher. The Mahatman Bhargava-Usanas will instruct you better. Go and ask him, O king of the Devas!’

Indra then went to the great Rishi Sukra Bhargava and obtained from him the knowledge of what would be of great good for him. After he had the permission of the Maharishi Bhargava, Indra again asked the Rishi whether there was any higher happiness to acquire than what the Muni had already taught him.

The omniscient Bhargava said, ‘The Mahatman Prahlada has better knowledge of this.’

Indra, the percipient vanquisher of Paka, was delighted and, assuming the form of a Brahmana, went to Prahlada and entreated him, ‘I want to know what causes happiness.’

Prahlada answered, ‘O Mahamuni, I have no time to instruct you for I am occupied in the task of ruling the three worlds.’

The Brahmana said, ‘Rajan, when you have leisure, I wish to receive instruction from you on what course of conduct produces happiness.’

At this King Prahlada was pleased and said, ‘Tathaasthu!’

He then found a favourable opportunity to impart to Indra the deep truths of knowledge. Indra duly showed to Prahlada the reverence expected from a sishya towards his guru and began with his whole heart to do what Prahlada wanted. Many a time he enquired, ‘Parantapa, how have you been able to win the sovereignty of the three worlds? Tell me, Dharmarajan, what those means are.’

Prahlada said, ‘I neither feel any pride in being a king, nor do I cherish any hostility towards Brahmanas. On the other hand, I accept and follow the guidance they give me on matters of policy, based upon the teachings of Sukra. With complete confidence they tell me whatever they wish and restrain me from sinful deeds or straying from dharma.

I am always obedient to the teachings of Sukra. I wait upon and serve the Brahmanas and my elders. I bear no malice to any creature; I am a Dharmatman. I have conquered wrath, and all my senses are under my control. These Munis who are my masters pour beneficial teachings on me like bees dropping honey into the cells of their comb. I taste the nectar these learned men let fall and, like the moon among the constellations, I live among those of my varna.

To listen to the teachings of Sukra from the lips of Brahmanas and to follow their advice, is like nectar on earth, like the clearest eye. In these consist the good of a man.’ So said Prahlada to the Brahmana by whom he was dutifully served.

‘Maharishi, I am gratified by your reverential behaviour towards me. You are blessed. Ask me for a boon and I will grant you whatever you wish for.’

Indra the Brahmana said, ‘If you are gratified with me, and if you wish to give me what I desire, I want then to acquire your dharma. This is the boon that I beg.’

At this, though he was pleased, Prahlada became filled with a great fear. Indeed, when Indra asked for his boon, the Daitya king guessed that the Brahmana could not be an ordinary man. Wondering, Prahlada at last said, ‘Tathaasthu. Let it be so!’

The Brahmana went away, but deep anxiety filled Prahlada, and he did not know what to do. While he sat brooding over the matter, a flame of light emerged from his body. It had a shadowy form of great splendour and huge proportions.

Prahlada asked the form, ‘Who are you?’

The form answered, ‘I am Neeti, the embodiment of your conduct. Cast off by you, I am leaving. I will henceforth, Rajan, dwell in that faultless and best of Brahmanas who has become your devoted disciple.’ The form disappeared and soon entered the body of Sakra.

After the disappearance of that form, another of similar shape issued from Prahlada’s body. The Daitya king addressed it, ‘Who are you?’

The form answered, ‘Know me, Prahlada, for the embodiment of Dharma. I will go where the greatest of Brahmanas is, for I reside where Neeti dwells.’

Upon the disappearance of Dharma, a third form, ablaze with splendour, came out of the body of the ascetic. Asked by Prahlada who he was, the magnificent form answered ‘Know, O Lord of the Daityas, that I am Satya. I will leave you, and follow the way of Dharma.’

After Truth had left Prahlada, in the wake of Dharma, another great one issued out of his body. Asked who he was by the Daitya king, the mighty being answered, ‘I am the embodiment of good deeds. Know, O Prahlada, that I live where Satya lives.’

After this one had left Prahlada, another being emerged, roaring loudly. Questioned by Prahlada, he answered, ‘Know that I am Might, and dwell where good deeds are.’ Then Might went away to where good deeds had gone.

After this, a Devi of great brilliance issued out of Prahlada’s body. The Daitya king asked her who she was, and she told him that she was Sree, the embodiment of prosperity, adding, ‘I dwelt in you, O hero, incapable of being obstructed! Cast off by you, I will follow Might.’

The noble Prahlada, stricken with fear, once more asked the goddess, ‘Where do you go, Devi, you who live amid lotuses? You are always devoted to truth and are the greatest of deities. Who is that best of Brahmanas who was my disciple? I want to know the truth.’

The goddess of prosperity said, ‘That Brahmana whom you instructed, O mighty one, was Indra, assuming the vow of Brahmacharya. He robbed you of the sovereignty that you had over the three worlds. Maharishi, it was by your conduct that you had reduced the three worlds to subjection. Knowing this, the king of the Devas robbed you of your Neeti. Righteousness, Truth, Good deeds, Might and Prosperity, O wise man, all have their root truly in Neeti, conduct.’”

Bhishma continues, ‘With these words, the goddess of prosperity went away like all the rest, Yudhishtira!

Duryodhana once more addressed his father, “Kurupravira, I want to know the truth about Neeti. Tell me how it can be acquired.”

Dhritarashtra told him, “The noble Prahlada revealed these to Indra. However I will tell you in brief how you can acquire Dharmaneeti. Abstention from injury by act, thought and word, towards all creatures, compassion and charity, constitute conduct that is worthy of praise.

You should never do anything which does not benefit others, or which makes you ashamed. On the other hand, you should do what will win praise in society. Kurusthama, I have now told you in brief what Dharmaneeti is. If men of evil conduct ever win prosperity, O King, they do not enjoy it for long and are exterminated by the root.

Now that you know all this, be of good conduct if you want to have prosperity greater than that of Yudhishtira.”

This even was what King Dhritarashtra said to his son. Act according to these instructions, son of Kunti, and you will surely find their reward.’”

CANTO 125

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have said, O Pitamaha, that Neeti is the primary requirement for any man. But tell me, what is hope, and from where does it arise? Only you can clear this grave doubt, which has risen in my mind. I had great hope that Suyodhana would do what was proper, even when the battle was about to begin.

Every man cherishes hope and when that hope is dashed, he feels grief almost equal to death. Fool that I am, Dhritarashtra's evil son destroyed the hope that I had nurtured. Look at the idiocy of my mind! I think that hope is larger than a mountain with all its trees, or perhaps it is vaster than the firmament itself, truly immeasurable. Hope is veritably difficult to fathom, and equally difficult to subdue. What else, Pitamaha, is as unconquerable as hope?'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen, Yudhishtira, while I narrate to you the discussion between Sumitra and Rishabha that took place long ago.

A Rajarishi of the Haihaya vamsa, called Sumitra, went out to hunt. He pursued a deer, which he had struck with an arrow but could not kill. That strong deer ran ahead with the arrow sticking out of him, with the virile king in hot pursuit. The fleet animal quickly cleared a low ground and then a level plain, with the king, young, active, strong, armed with bow and sword and clad in mail, still in chase. Alone in the hunt, Sumitra followed the deer through the vana, crossing many rivers, streams, lakes and copses. The swift animal, struck by many shafts of the king, ran on through one forest after another, showing itself now and then tantalizingly to the king as if in sport, and lessening the distance between itself and its pursuer.

At last, that Parantapa drew his sharpest and most terrible arrow, capable of piercing the very vitals of any creature, and fitted it to his bowstring. The great and mighty deer, as if mocking his pursuer's efforts, suddenly raced away and flew four yojanas out of range, and the magnificent shaft fell harmlessly to the ground. The deer entered a large vana, but the king still continued the chase.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The king entered that great vana and came upon an asrama of Rishis. Exhausted by the chase, he sat down to rest. The Rishis, when they saw him armed with bow, worn out and hungry, approached him and duly honoured him. The king accepted the honours the Rishis offered and enquired about the progress of their tapasya. Having answered the king's questions, the Rishis endowed with the wealth of tapasya asked him what had led him to their asrama.

They said, "Blessed Rajan, what delightful pursuit brings you to this asrama on foot, armed with sword, bow and arrows? Tell us your vamsa and your name."

The king gave all the Brahmanas an account of himself, O Bhaarata, and said, "I am born into the race of the Haihayas, my name is Sumitra and I am the son of Mitra. I chase herds of deer and hunt them in thousands with my arrows.

Accompanied by a large force, my ministers and the women of my household, I came out on a hunt. I shot a deer with an arrow, but the animal, with the shaft stuck in his body, sped away. While chasing it, I have accidentally arrived in this vana and find myself in your presence, in this pitiable condition—shorn of all splendour, weary and disappointed. I am not at all sorry, august Rishis, at my present plight, being without the signs of royalty or far from my capital. However, I feel a poignant grief at my hope being dashed. Just as Himavat, prince of mountains, and Sagara, vast receptacle of waters, cannot measure the extent of the sky, O Maharishis, I cannot measure the limits of hope.

You are endowed with the punya of tapasya and are infinitely wise; there is nothing unknown to you. You are also highly blessed. I beg you to resolve my quandary. Which of these two appears vaster to you—hope cherished by man, or the wide firmament? I want to know why hope is so unconquerable.

If the subject is not improper for you to discuss, then tell me without delay. I do not want to hear from you anything, Maharishis, that is a mystery that cannot be revealed, or is harmful to your tapasya, or not a worthy matter to speak of. Otherwise, I would like to hear of this, and in detail. Devoted to tapasya as you are, I beg you to instruct me.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The Maharishi Rishabha, who sat in the midst of all the other Rishis, smiled a little and said, "Once, Sumitra, while I was on a tirtha yatra, I went to the delightful Badrikasrama, the beautiful hermitage of the sages Nara and Narayana, near the lake where the sacred Ganga rises and where the sage Aswasiras always reads the eternal Vedas. I performed my ablutions in that lake, offered, with due rites, oblations of water to the Pitris and the Devas and entered the asrama where the spirits of those two immortal Rishis, Nara and Narayana, always pass their time in true bliss.

I then went to another asrama not far away to make my home. While seated there I saw a very tall and emaciated Rishi named Tanu, clad in rags and skins, approaching me. Blessed with a wealth of tapasya, he was eight times taller than other men, Mahabaho, and I can say that I have never seen anyone like him. His body was as thin as one's little finger, his neck, arms, legs and hair extraordinary, with his head, ears and eyes, proportionate to his body. His speech and his movements were exceedingly feeble.

When I saw this emaciated Brahmana, Bharatarishabha, I was frightened and full of dread. I touched his feet, stood before him with joined hands, informed him of my name and family, my father's name, and then slowly sat down on a seat that he indicated. Then Dharmatman Tanu, in the midst of the Rishis living in that asrama, began to discuss the issues of dharma and artha, O Rajan.

While the discourse was going on, a king with eyes like lotus petals came to the asrama in a chariot drawn by fleet horses, accompanied by his forces and his women. He was the handsome and famed Viradyumna, who was unhappily looking for his missing son Bhuridyumna and had come there in the course of his search in the vana. He had urged himself on through that forest for days thinking, 'Surely I will find my son here! I will surely find my son here!'

Addressing the macilent Rishi Tanu he said, 'My noble son, my only child, is lost. I had great hopes of finding him, but with my hope being constantly dashed, I am on the point of death.'

When he heard this, the great Rishi Tanu remained for a short while with his head hanging down and sunk in dhyana. Seeing him thus engrossed, the king became exceedingly disturbed. In great grief, he asked slowly and softly, 'Devarishi, what is unconquerable and what is greater than hope? Tell me this, if there is no impropriety in my hearing it.'

The Rishi said, 'Your son has insulted a holy Maharishi through his ill-luck and foolishness. The Rishi asked your son for a golden jar and herbal bark, which he contemptuously refused to give. His conduct infuriated the Maharishi.'

Thus addressed, the king paid homage to that Rishi whom the whole world revered. Viradyumna sat there, spent with fatigue, as you are now. The Maharishi Tanu, in return, according to the rites vanavasis observed, offered the king water to wash his feet and the usual ingredients that make up the arghya. Then all the Rishis sat around him like the Saptarishis around Dhruva, and questioned the unvanquished king about the reason for his arrival at the asrama.'"

"The king said again, 'I am a king called Viradyumna and my fame has spread in all directions. My son Bhuridyumna is lost and I have come to this forest in search of him, O noble Brahmanas. He is my only son, sinless ones, and of tender years. Since I cannot find him here, I wander everywhere in search of him.'

Rishi Tanu hung down his head again, remained perfectly silent and did not utter a single word. In the past, the king had not honoured Tanu and, in chagrin, the ascetic had practised austere tapasya for a long time, resolving that he would never accept any gift from either kings or members of any other varna, saying to himself, 'Hope agitates every man of foolish understanding. I will drive hope from my mind.' Such was his determination.

King Viradyumna once more questioned the Maharishi: 'What is the measure of the thinness of hope? What in this world is exceedingly difficult of acquisition? Tell me this, holy one, for you know dharma and artha well.'

The sage Tanu of the straw-lean body remembered all the past incidents about the King's neglect of him, and now brought them to the recollection of the king. He said, 'There is nothing, Rajan, that equals hope in flimsiness. I solicited many kings and found that nothing is as difficult to attain as an image that Hope sets before the mind.'

The king said, 'From your words, Brahmana, I understand what is thin and what is not. I understand also, how difficult it is to acquire the images set by hope before the mind. I regard your words as Sruti, but I have one doubt in my mind. If it pleases you, and it is a subject that you can discuss without impropriety, explain it in detail to me. What is more slender than your body?'

The emaciated sage said, 'A contented supplicant is exceedingly difficult to meet. Perhaps there is no such person in the world. Rarer still is one who never disregards a supplicant. The hope that rests upon such men who, after swearing promises, do not render service to others to the best of their abilities and according to the supplicant's merit, is even leaner than my body.

The hope that rests upon an ungrateful man, or on one who is cruel, or an idle man, or one who injures others, is even slenderer than my body. The hope a father who has but one son cherishes of seeing him once more after he has been lost, is slenderer than even my body. The hope that old women entertain of giving birth to sons, Rajan, and that which rich men cherish, is even thinner than my body. The hope of marriage that springs up in the hearts of old maids when they hear anybody talk of it, is leaner than my body.'

Hearing these words, Rajan, King Viradyumna and the women of his household prostrated themselves before the great Brahmana and touched his feet with their bent heads.

The king said, 'By your grace, O holy one, I want to find my child. What you have said is true. There is no doubt of the verity of your words.'"

Rishabha continued, "The holy Tanu, foremost of Dharmatmans, smiled, and with his gyana and his tapasya caused the king's son to be brought to the place. The sage rebuked the king and then revealed himself to be Dharma Deva, the god of righteousness himself. After displaying his own wonderful and celestial form, he entered an adjacent vana, with heart freed from wrath and the desire of revenge.

I saw all this, Rajan, and heard the words I have said. Drive out your hope that is even slenderer than any mentioned by the sage."'

Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by the Dharmatman Rishabha, King Sumitra cast off the hope that was in his heart and which was slimmer than any of the kinds of hope the skeletal Rishi had indicated. You, too, O son of Kunti, pay heed to what I have said and be calm as Himavat. Overcome with distress, you have questioned me and heard my reply. Now that you have heard it, Rajan, you should dismiss your regrets!'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Like one who drinks amrita, I am never satiated listening to you speak. Just as a person who has knowledge of the Atman is never content with meditation, I am never satisfied after I drink the nectar of your discourse on dharma. Therefore, Pitamaha, speak again on dharma.'

Bhishma replies, 'Then let me tell you the old story of the discourse between Maharishi Gotama and the illustrious Yama. Gotama owned an extensive asrama on the Paripatra hills, where for sixty thousand years the sage sat in tapasya. One day, O Naravyaghra, the regent of the world, Yama, arrived there and saw him engaged in the most stern tapasya.

The Muni, understanding that it was Yama who had come, quickly saluted him and sat attentively with folded hands, awaiting his command. Lord Dharma in return saluted that bull among Brahmanas and enquired what he could do for him.

Gotama asked, "What does one do to liberate oneself from the debt one owes to one's mother and father? And how does one win regions of pure bliss that are so difficult to attain?"

Yama replied, "One should devote oneself to the dharma of satya, practise purity and tapasya ceaselessly, and worship one's mother and father. One should also perform Aswamedha yagnas, with gifts in plenty for Brahmanas. Through such deeds one wins many wonderful regions of felicity."'"

CANTO 130

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Bhaarata, what course of conduct should a king adopt who is without friends and troops, who has many enemies and an exhausted treasury? What should be his conduct when evil ministers surround him, when all his counsels are divulged, when he does not see his way clearly before him while he is attacking or subduing a hostile kingdom, or when, though weak, he is at war with a stronger ruler?

What should be the conduct of a king in whose kingdom affairs are ill-regulated, who disregards the requirements of place and time, who is unable to bring about peace and cause dissension among his enemies because he is oppressed? Should he seek to acquire wealth by evil means, or should he lay down his life and not seek artha?'

Bhishma replies, 'Though you know your dharma, O Bharatarishabha, you asked me a question that relates to a mystery about duty. This dharma is not something I would have spoken about had you not asked me. Dharma is very subtle, and one can understand it with the shastras.

Some men may become Dharmatmans when they practise the good deeds they remember having heard about. By clever and ingenious methods, the king can acquire wealth, or he may fail. Now, using your own intelligence, can you think of an answer to your question?

Listen, Bhaarata, to methods which have great punya, and which kings can use during times of distress, although I would not say that they conform to true dharma. If the king fills the treasury by oppression, this will bring him to the verge of destruction. This is also the conclusion of all wise men who have deliberated upon the subject.

The kind of shastras one studies only gives one knowledge which it is capable of bestowing and is to his liking. Ignorance stunts the development of methods, while knowledge promotes ingenuity and becomes the source of great happiness.

Without any scruples or malice and with a pure heart, listen to these teachings. Through the decrease of the treasury, the king's forces diminish, so he should fill his coffers by any means possible, just as he would locate water in an arid wilderness. However, in conformity with the code of ethics that the ancients practised, the king should show compassion to his people, when this times arrives. This is the eternal dharma.

Under ordinary circumstances, for men who are able and competent, dharma is of one kind, while in times of misfortune one's duties are different. A king without wealth may acquire religious punya by tapasya and the like. Since life is much more important than punya, and one cannot support it without wealth, no punya should be sought which stands in the way of gaining wealth.

A weak king can never obtain just and proper means of sustenance or power through religious merit. Since he cannot, even by his best exertions, acquire power with the aid of punya, practices during times of misery can be condoned, even though the learned opine that they lead to sin.

When the time of trial is over, the Kshatriya should conduct himself in such a way that he does not destroy his punya. He should also work so that he will not have to succumb to his enemies. Even these are declared to be his dharma. He should not sink into despondency or seek to rescue from the peril of destruction his own punya or that of others. On the other hand, he must preserve himself. This is the well-established judgement on dharma.

There is this Sruti, which decides that Brahmanas who know dharma should have the expertise to perform. Similarly, the Kshatriya should be proficient in exertion, since might of arms is his greatest possession.

When a Kshatriya has no means of support, what should he take, other than what belongs to Munis and Brahmanas? Even a Brahmana in times of distress can officiate at the yagna of one for whom he should never officiate during ordinary times, and he may even eat forbidden food; so, also, there is no doubt that a Kshatriya in distress can take wealth from everyone, except Rishis and Brahmanas.

For one troubled by an enemy and trying to escape, what can be a forbidden recourse? For a man imprisoned within a dungeon who wants to escape, what outlet can be an improper one? For someone in difficulty, even a normally forbidden way out is permissible.

For a Kshatriya who is in distress because of an empty treasury and a weak army, neither a life of mendicancy nor the profession of a Vaisya or a Sudra has been prescribed. The profession ordained for a Kshatriya is the acquisition of wealth by battle and victory. He should never beg from a member of his own varna.

One who supports himself in ordinary times by following the practices primarily prescribed for him, can in times of distress follow alternative practices which the shastras have laid down. In times of travail, when a Kshatriya cannot follow his ordinary dharma, he may live by even unjust and improper means.

Brahmanas are seen do the same when their means of livelihood are destroyed. When they can conduct themselves in this manner, what doubt need there be in respect of Kshatriyas? One, indeed, accepts this. Without sinking into despondency and ruin, a Kshatriya may forcibly take what he can from rich men with a view to protecting the people in the longer term, for he is their defender and destroyer as well.

No one in this world, Rajan, can support life without injuring other creatures. Even the Muni who leads a solitary vanavasa is no exception. A Kshatriya should not rely upon destiny, especially he who wants to rule. The king and the kingdom should always mutually protect each other. This is an eternal duty. As the king protects the kingdom when it sinks into danger, by making use of all his possessions, the kingdom should also protect the king when he is in trouble.

Even as a last resort, the king should never give up his treasury, his weapons to punish evildoers, his army, the chieftains of his kingdom, his friends and allies, and other necessary institutions.

Men who have knowledge of dharma say that one must save one’s seeds by deducting them from one’s very food. This is a truth cited from the treatise of the Asura Sambara, well-known for his great powers of illusion: “Shame on that king whose kingdom languishes! Shame on the life of that man who, from want of means, goes to a foreign country for a living! The king’s roots are his treasury and army. His army has its roots in his treasury, and his religious punya is the root of all.”

One can never fill the treasury without oppressing others. How, then, can the army be kept without oppression? The king in times of distress incurs no fault when he persecutes his subjects to fill the treasury. To perform yagnas, many adharmic deeds are done, and a king whose object is to fill his treasury in times of misfortune incurs no fault by any of these, since otherwise evil is certain to befall both him and his kingdom.

Institutions which cause death and misery exist to collect wealth. An astute king must decide what his policy should be in times of distress. He should remember that animals and other things are necessary for yagnas, which one requires as sacrifices to purify the heart, and that yagnapasus, yagnas and purity of the heart are all essential for final mukti. Similarly, policy and danda exist for the treasury, which in turn exists for the army, while policy, treasury and army, all three exist to vanquish enemies and protect or enlarge the kingdom.

I will give you an example which illustrates the true ways of dharma. When a great tree is cut down for making a sacrificial stake, other trees that stand in its way have also to be felled. These, when they fall, in turn knock down others in their path. Similarly, one should eliminate those who stand in the way of a treasury being filled. I do not see how else success can be had.

Through wealth both worlds, this and the next, can be gained, as well as truth and punya. A man without wealth is more dead than alive. One should acquire wealth by any means for the performance of yagnas. The sin that attaches to an action done during times of hardship is not equal to that which attaches to the same deed done at other times.

You cannot possibly see both the acquisition of wealth and its abandonment in the same person, Rajan! I have never seen a rich man in the forest. All the wealth one sees in this world is attended by struggle. All contend with others, saying, “This must be mine! This will be mine!”

There is nothing more meritorious for a king than the possession of a kingdom. While in ordinary times it is sinful for a king to oppress his subjects with heavy taxes, in times of trouble it is quite different. Some acquire wealth through gifts and yagnas, some who prefer tapasya acquire it by penance, and some through their intelligence and ingenuity. A man without wealth is considered weak, while he who has wealth is regarded as powerful, for he can buy everything.

A king who has a well-filled treasury can accomplish anything and thus earn punya, gratify his kama, and gain this world and the next. One should, however, always fill the treasury with the help of dharma, not by practices that can pass for dharma in times of need and distress.'"

PART II

Apaddharmanusasana Parva

"Yudhishtira says, 'What, besides this, should a weak and procrastinating king do, who shrinks from battle through anxiety for his friends' lives, who is timorous and lacking in discretion? What should that king do whose cities and kingdom his enemies have annexed and partitioned among themselves, who has lost his wealth, who from poverty cannot honour and win friends to his side, whose ministers are disunited or bought over by his adversaries, who is obliged to face his foes, whose army has declined, and whose heart is being agitated by a strong enemy?'

Bhishma replies, 'If the invader is principled and conversant with both dharma and artha, a king of the kind you have described should immediately sue for peace and negotiate for him to restore those parts of the kingdom that have been seized. If the invader is powerful and seeks victory through unprincipled means, the king should make peace with him abandoning a portion of his territories. If the invader is bent upon hostilities, the king should abandon his capital and all his possessions and make his escape. If he saves his life, he can hope for equivalent gains in the future. Which man, knowing his dharma, would sacrifice himself, his most precious possession, to encounter danger from which he can escape by abandoning his treasury and army? A king should protect the women of his household, but if they fall into the hands of the enemy, he should not be moved to risking his own capture to save them. As long as he can, he should never surrender his own person to the enemy.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘When his own people are dissatisfied with him, when invaders oppress him, when his treasury is empty, and when his secrets are divulged, what then should a king do?’

Bhishma says, ‘Under such circumstances, a king, should make peace, if his enemy is righteous. If he is not, the king should then show courage and try to drive the enemy out of his kingdom; or, fighting bravely, he should lay down his life and ascend to Swarga. A king can conquer the whole earth with the help of even a small force if it is loyal, spirited, and devoted to him. If he kills his enemies, he is sure to enjoy the earth, while, if he is killed in battle, he is sure to ascend to heaven. By laying down one’s life in battle, one obtains the companionship of Indra himself.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'When dharmic rule and practices for the good of the world disappear, when all the means and resources for supporting life fall into the hands of brigands, at such a calamitous time, how should a Brahmana survive, O Pitamaha, who from affection is unable to abandon his sons and grandsons?'

Bhishma replies, 'When such a time comes, the Brahmana should live by his knowledge. Everything in this world is for those who are good, and nothing for the evil. He who makes himself an instrument of acquisition, taking wealth from the evil and giving it to the good, is said to know the dharma of adversity. The king who wants to maintain his rule without driving his subjects to indignation and rebellion, can seize what the owner does not give voluntarily, saying, "This is mine!" This conduct of the wise man, blameworthy in ordinary times, does not deserve to be censured in times of necessity when cleansed by knowledge and power. They who always support themselves by force, prefer no other method of living. Those who are powerful, Yudhishtira, always live by their strength.

A king should practise what the ordinary shastras prescribe for times of distress without any exceptions. An intelligent king, however, should also do something more, such as levy more taxes upon the evil and punishable among his own subjects and upon the subjects of other kingdoms. At such times, the king should not oppress Ritwijas, Purohitas, Acharyas and Brahmanas, who are honoured and esteemed. Even during bad times, he will incur censure and sin if he afflicts them. This is the eternal eye, the authority by which one should be guided in the world. By this, one judges whether a king is to be called good or evil.

One sees that many men in villages and towns bring accusations against one another from jealousy and anger. The king should never honour or punish anybody based on such reports. Slander should be neither spoken nor heard. When slanderous conversation takes place, one should close one's ears or walk right out, for such talk is characteristic of evil men, an indication of depravity. Conversely, those who speak of the virtues of others in assemblies of the good, are honest men.

Just as a pair of sweet-tempered bulls, governable and well-broken, bend their necks to the yoke and draw the cart willingly, the king should bear his burden in troubled times. Others say that a king at such times should conduct himself so as to gain a large number of allies. Some regard ancient usage as the highest indication of dharma. Others, such as those who favour the conduct of Sankha when his brother Likhita stole a few fruits from him, are of a different opinion, but not from malice or covetousness. One sees examples of Maharishis who are of the opinion that even acharyas, if given to evil practices, should be punished, although no authority has approved of such a proposition. The Devas can be left to punish men who are vile and guilty of evil practices.

The king who fills his treasury by fraudulent means certainly falls away from dharma. The code of morality should be followed which good men honour in every respect in affluent circumstances, and which every honest heart approves. He is said to be conversant with dharma who knows that it stands on four foundations, as elusive as the legs of the snake. Just like a hunter who tracks a shaft-struck deer by observing spots of blood on the ground, one should seek to discover the basis of dharma. A man should tread humbly along the ancient path trodden by the virtuous, as this was the dharma of the great Rajarishis of old, O Yudhishtira!'"

"Bhishma says, 'The king should fill his coffers by drawing wealth from his own kingdom and from those of his enemies. From his treasury springs his punya, O son of Kunti, and from it extend the roots of his kingdom. For these reasons a king must fill his treasury, augment it and carefully husband it by reducing needless expenditure. This is the eternal practice. The treasury can neither be filled by pure and dharmic actions, nor by heartless cruelty. One should fill it by adopting a middle course. How can a weak king acquire a treasury? How can a king who has no treasury have strength? How can a weak man have a kingdom? From where can one without a kingdom obtain prosperity?

For a man of high rank, adversity is like death. For this reason the king should always increase his resources, army, allies and friends. Men do not heed a king with an empty treasury, and his servants will not show any zeal in his business if he pays them little. It is on account of his wealth that a king succeeds in obtaining great honour, as it covers up his sins like clothes that conceal parts of a female body that should not be exposed to view.

Those with whom the king has formerly quarrelled become jealous at the sight of his new affluence, and like dogs they once more take service under him. Though they only wait for an opportunity to destroy him, he takes to them as if nothing has happened. How, O Bhaarata, can such a king obtain happiness?

The king should strive to acquire greatness, and never bend down meekly. Exertion is manliness, He should rather break in adverse conditions, take to vanavasa and live there with the wild animals, than bend before anyone or dwell among ministers and officers who behave like robbers, without restraints. Even the brigands of the forest can furnish a large number of fighters for the accomplishment of the fiercest of deeds. O Bhaarata!

If the king transgresses wholesome restraints, everyone becomes alarmed. The very robbers, strangers to compassion, dread such a king. For this reason, the king should always establish rules and restraints for the well-being of his people. The people welcome rules in respect of even trivial matters.

There are men who think that this world is nothing, and the future a mirage. One should never trust atheists of this type, even if secret doubts agitate his heart. If the brigands of the forest, while observing other dharma, commit depredations only to property, one can regard them as harmless, since they do not threaten the lives of thousands of people. Even brigands regard as evil actions like killing an enemy who is fleeing from battle, ingratitude, plundering the property of a Brahmana, depriving a man of the whole of his property, violating maidens, ravishing wives, having adulterous congress with other people's wives and occupying villages and towns as their lawful lords.

Certain kings strive to make peace in order to inspire confidence in the hearts of the bandits, only to destroy them after their ways have been studied. A king should never behave cruelly towards them, thinking that he is more powerful. Rather than exterminate the robbers outright, the king should bring their families, habitations and property under his control. Kings who do not seek to annihilate them need not fear for their own existence, while those who do have always to live with that apprehension.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Men learned in the shastras declare that an intelligent Kshatriya knows his obvious dharma, the earning of punya and the acquisition of wealth. Subtle discussions on duty and on unseen consequences in respect of a future world should not stop him from performing those two duties. As it is useless to argue, upon seeing certain foot-prints on the ground, whether or not they are those of a wolf, so too is discussion on the nature of dharma and adharma.

Nobody in this world ever sees the fruits of dharma and adharma. A Kshatriya, therefore, should seek to acquire power. He who is powerful is master of everything. Wealth leads to the possession of an army. He who is powerful obtains intelligent advisers, while he who is without means is truly fallen. One regards too little of anything in the world as the unclean remnants of a feast. Even if a strong man performs many bad deeds, everybody is afraid to says or do anything to censure or check him.

Associating power with dharma and truth can rescue men from great peril. If one compares the two, power will appear to be superior, since dharma springs from and rests upon power, as all immobile things do upon the earth, as smoke depends for its motion upon the wind.

Dharma is dependent on the more powerful, as pleasure is contingent upon those who desire enjoyment. There is nothing that powerful men cannot do, and everything they do becomes pure. A powerless man committing evil actions can never escape, because men are alarmed by his conduct as at the appearance of a wolf. One fallen on hard times leads a life of disgrace and sorrow, which is akin to death. The learned have said that when a man is abandoned by friends and companions as result of his sinful conduct, their taunts will pierce him and bring him to burn with grief.

Acharyas versed in the shastras have suggested that to expiate sin, one should study the three Vedas, wait upon and worship the Brahmanas, gratify all men by looks, words and acts, cast off meanness, marry into high families, proclaim the praises of others while confessing one's own worthlessness, recite mantras, perform the usual water-rites, be mild of demeanour and frugal of speech, perform austere yagnas, and seek the refuge of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas. One who has committed evil deeds should do all this without resenting the reproaches of others. By following this course and by sharing his wealth with others, he will redeem himself in the regard of the world and come to enjoy different kinds of happiness here, and great rewards and punya in the next.'"

"Bhishma says, 'An old story is told of a brigand who practised restraints in this world and so did not meet with destruction in the next. Once there lived a robber called Kayavya, born of a Kshatriya father and a Nishada mother, who practised Kshatriya dharma. Strong, intelligent, courageous, an expert in the shastras, he was devoid of cruelty. He was devoted to the Brahmanas, worshipped his elders and gurus with reverence and protected the Rishis in the observance of their practices. Though a brigand, he earned felicity in Swarga.

Morning and evening he used to chase deer and drive them to frenzy. He knew well all the practices of the Nishadas and the ways of all animals living in the forest. Well versed in the requirements of time and place, he roved over the mountains. His arrows never missed their aim, his weapons were powerful and he could vanquish hundreds of troops single-handedly. He worshipped his old, blind and deaf parents daily in the forest. He was hospitable to everyone who deserved the honour, entertained them with honey, meat, fruits, roots and other kinds of excellent food and did them many favours. He showed great respect for those Brahmanas who retired from the world for vanavasa, and often took meat for them when he killed deer. In the case of those unwilling, from fear of censure, to accept gifts from him because of his profession, he went to their homes before dawn and left meat at their doorstep.

One day the entire band of robbers, pitiless and unbridled as they were, moved to elect him as their leader. The robbers said, "You are familiar with the requirements of place and time, wise and courageous, and committed to everything you undertake. Be our supreme leader, respected by us all, and we will do as you direct. Protect us as a father or mother would."

Kayavya replied, "Never kill a woman, a child, an ascetic or one who from fear abstains from a fight. Never seize women or bring them away with force. None of you should ever, amongst all creatures, kill a female.

Brahmanas should be always blessed, and you must fight for their good. Never sacrifice Truth. Never obstruct wedding ceremonies or destroy houses in which the Devas, the Pitris and Athitis are honoured.

Of all creatures, Brahmanas should be exempt from your plundering raids. You should worship them by giving away even all you have. He who incurs the wrath of the Brahmanas will fail to find a rescuer in the three worlds, if they wish to humiliate him. He who speaks ill of the Brahmanas and wishes for their destruction, himself meets with destruction like darkness at sunrise.

Living here, you will obtain the fruits of your valour, and troops will be sent against those who refuse to give us our dues. The danda of punishment is intended for evil, not for self-glorification. Those who oppress the good deserve death, and those who seek to increase their fortunes by attacking kingdoms in unscrupulous ways, very soon come to be regarded like vermin in a dead body. Those brigands whose conduct conform to the restraints prescribed by the shastras soon win salvation, though they lead a life spent in plunder."

By obeying all the commands of Kayavya and desisting from sin, the robbers obtained great prosperity, while, by doing good to the honest and restraining the robbers from evil deeds, Kayavya won great happiness in the next world. He who bears in mind this story of Kayavya will not fear the denizens of the forest, or any earthly creature, not even wicked men O Bhaarata! If such a man takes to vanavasa, he will be able to live there as secure as a king.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Regarding how a king should fill his treasury, men who know the shastras cite the following verses that Brahma himself sang. One should never take the wealth of those who perform yagnas, or wealth dedicated to the gods. A Kshatriya should seize the wealth of those who never perform religious rites and yagnas and are regarded as equal to brigands. All the creatures who inhabit the earth, all the pleasures of sovereignty, and all the earth's wealth, belong to the Kshatriya alone, O Bhaarata. The Kshatriya should use this wealth for the upkeep of his army and for the performance of yagnas.

Men weed out creepers and plants that are not of any use and burn them as fuel to cook their food. Similarly the king should, by punishing the wicked, cherish the good. Men who know dharma say that one's wealth is useless if it is not used to feed with libations of ghrita the Devas, the Pitris, and men. A virtuous ruler, O Rajan, should confiscate such wealth so that a large number of good people can be gratified, but he should not hoard that wealth in his treasury. He who makes himself an instrument of acquisition by taking away wealth from the evil and giving it to the good is said to know the whole science of dharma.

A king should extend his conquests in the next world according to his ability, as gradually as vegetables are seen to grow. Like white ants who appear and multiply from no apparent cause, yagnas spring for no particular external reason. As one drives off flies, gnats and ants from the bodies of domestic cattle at the time of milking, one should drive away from the kingdom those who are averse to performing yagnas. This is consistent with dharma. Just as soil becomes finer and finer with pounding between two stones, questions of morality, become finer and finer the more they are reflected on and discussed.'"

"Bhishma says, 'One who provides for the future, and one who has presence of mind, both enjoy happiness, while the man of procrastination is lost. Listen attentively to an excellent story concerning these types.

In a lake that was not very deep and which abounded with fish, there lived three Sakula fishes, friends and constant companions. Amongst the three, one always planned ahead and liked to provide for the future, another had great presence of mind, while the third always put things off. One day some fishermen who came to the lake began to drain away its water to a lower ground through different outlets. Seeing the water of the lake gradually decreasing, the fish with foresight perceived the danger and addressed his two companions.

He said, "A great peril is about to overtake all the creatures who live in this lake. Let us speedily escape to some other place before our path is blocked. One who avoids a future evil through good planning will never incur serious danger. Listen to my advice and let us all depart." The lazy one among the three answered, "Well said, but it is my considered opinion there is no need for such haste." The fish with presence of mind said to his procrastinating companion, "When the actual time comes for action, I always come up with a plan."

Hearing the answers of his two companions, the prudent and intelligent fish immediately set out by a flowing current and reached another deep lake. The fishermen, when they saw that the lake had been drained, shut in the
